They continued routing them until they had driven them into al-Kunāsah. Ibrāhīm's men said to him, "Pursue them and take advantage of the fear which has infected them. God knows whom we are calling the people to support and what we seek, and He knows whom they are calling the people to support and what they seek." But Ibrāhīm refused and said, "Come with me to our master so that God may give him security through us against his being left alone, that we may be apprised of his affairs and he too may know of our concern, and that he and his men may add strength and ardor to that which they have already. Furthermore, I do not feel sure he [619] may not have been attacked."

Ibrāhīm and his men proceeded, and came to the mosque of al-Ashᶜath,[667] where he halted for a short time. Then he went on until he came to the house of al-Mukhtār, where he found raised voices and the men engaged in battle. Shabath b. Ribᶜī had come from al-Sabakhah and al-Mukhtār had detailed Yazīd b. Anas to withstand him, and Ḥajjār b. Abjar al-ᶜIjlī[668] had come and al-Mukhtār had stationed Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ against him. The people were fighting when Ibrāhīm came from the direction of the governor's residence [al-qaṣr]. Ḥajjār and his men heard that Ibrāhīm had come against them from their rear, and they scattered before he could reach them and fled into the lanes and alleys.

Qays b. Ṭahfah[669] came with about a hundred men of the Banū Nahd of those who supported al-Mukhtār and attacked

666. A number of *ṣaḥrā'*s feature in the topography of al-Kūfah; their function and relationship to the *jabbānah*s is not clear (see EI², s.v. Kūfa).

667. Al-Ashᶜath b. Qays had been the chief of Kindah in al-Kūfah (see EI², s.v. al-Ashᶜath).

668. This notable of Bakr b. Wā'il had been among those who testified against Ḥujr b. ᶜAdī (Ṭabarī, II, 133).

669. According to the list in Ansāb, V, 219, this Qays had been one of the guarantors demanded for al-Mukhtār by ᶜAbdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah. For the Banū Nahd, see n. 642 above.

Shabath b. Ribʿī, who was fighting against Yazīd b. Anas. (Yazīd) cleared the road for (Qays and his men) so they were able to join forces, and then Shabath b. Ribʿī abandoned the lane to them and went off and joined Ibn Muṭīʿ.

He said to Ibn Muṭīʿ, "Send for the commanders of the squares and tell them to come to you, and assemble all your men and then rush upon this mob and fight them. Send somebody you trust against them, and may fighting them be enough, for their movement has strengthened and al-Mukhtār has come out in revolt and shown himself and their movement has been entrusted to him." When al-Mukhtār heard of the advice which Shabath b. Ribʿī had given to Ibn Muṭīʿ, he went forth with a group of his men and halted behind Dayr Hind in the vicinity of the garden of Zā'idah[670] in al-Sabakhah.

Abū ʿUthmān al-Nahdī[671] went forth and gave the call among Shākir,[672] who were gathered together in their houses for fear of showing themselves in the maydān because of Kaʿb b. Abī Kaʿb al-Khathʿamī's proximity to them. Kaʿb was in the jab- [620] bānah of Bishr. When he heard Shākir were coming out, he came forward and established himself in the maydān, barring the lanes and roads against them.

When Abū ʿUthmān al-Nahdī came against (Kaʿb and his men) with a group of his companions, he called out, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn! Oh Manṣūr, deal death! Oh you clan of the rightly-guided, verily, the one given authority by the family of Muḥammad, and their wazīr, has come forth and stopped at Dayr Hind. He has sent me to you as a summoner and bringer of good tidings. Come out to join him, may God have mercy on you!" They came out of the houses, calling to one another, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn!" and then attacked Kaʿb b. Abī Kaʿb until he opened the road for them, and they went to al-Mukhtār and waited with him in his camp.

ʿAbdallāh b. Qurād al-Khathʿamī came forth with a group of about two hundred of Khathʿam and joined al-Mukhtār and waited with him in his camp. Kaʿb b. Abī Kaʿb had opposed 670. Bustān Zā'idah is mentioned at II, 960, in connection with the entry of Shabīb into al-Kūfah.

671. This man is often cited as a traditionist; see the general index.

672. The Banū Shākir b. Rabīʿah of Hamdān (Caskel/Ibn Kalbī, II, 524).

him and drawn up battle lines against him, but when he recognized them and saw they were people of his own tribe, he let them pass and did not fight them.

Shibām came forth in the latter part of the night and they agreed to go to the jabbānah of Murād. When ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saᶜīd b. Qays heard that, he sent to them, saying, "If you wish to join al-Mukhtār, do not pass over the jabbānah of al-Sabīᶜ," and they joined al-Mukhtār. Of the 12,000 who had given him the oath of allegiance, 3,800 came to al-Mukhtār and joined with him before dawn broke. By morning, he had completed his preparations.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—(al-Ḥārith b. Kaᶜb) al-Wālibī: I and Ḥumayd b. Muslim and al-Nuᶜmān b. Abī al-Jaᶜd[673] went out to join al-Mukhtār on the night he began his revolt. We came to him in his house and went out with him where his army was. And, by God, dawn had not broken before he had completed his preparations. He came forward next morning [621] and led us in the prayer of daybreak while it was still dark. Then he recited (the Koranic surahs) "Those who draw out" and "He frowned and turned around,"[674] and we never heard an imām leading a people in prayer with a clearer tone than he.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥaṣīrah b. ᶜAbdallāh: Ibn Muṭīᶜ sent to the men of the jabbānahs and told them to gather in the mosque, and he said to Rāshid b. Iyās b. Muḍārib, "Call to the men and let them go to the mosque!" The crier proclaimed, "Anybody who is not present in the mosque tonight will be held liable," and the men all went to the mosque. When they had gathered, Ibn Muṭīᶜ sent Shabath b. Ribᶜī with about 3,000 men against al-Mukhtār, and he sent Rāshid b. Iyās with 4,000 of the men of the police force.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-Taymī—Abū Saᶜīd al-Ṣayqal:[675] When al-Mukhtār had conducted the morn-

673. I am unable to identify al-Nuᶜman, cf. p. 210 below; for identification of al-Wālibī, see p. 208 below.

674. Qur'ān, sūrahs 79, 80 (both deal with eschatology and divine punishment of evil-doers in forceful and martial language).

675. Previously (I, 3423, 3429), this narrator has appeared as Abū Saᶜīd al-ᶜUqaylī; see pp. 207f. below for his status as a mawlā.

ing prayer and turned away, we heard voices raised somewhere between the Banū Sulaym and the lane of the Barīd.[676] Al-Mukhtār said, "Who will get us information about those; what are they?" and I said to him, "I will, may God preserve you!" Al-Mukhtār said, "In that case, throw down your sword and hurry so you can get in among them as if you were an onlooker, and then bring me news about them."

So I did that, and when I drew near them I saw that their muezzin was summoning to prayer. I came and drew nearer to them and I saw Shabath b. Ribʿī. With him was a powerful troop of horse commanded by Shaybān b. Ḥurayth al-Ḍabbī,[677] while Shabath himself was among the footmen, of whom there was a large number. When their muezzin had called to prayer, Shabath went forward and conducted his men in the ritual prayer, reciting, "When the earth trembles with her quaking!"[678] I said to myself, "Indeed, by God, I hope that God [622] will cause you to tremble!" And he recited, "By the chargers snorting!"[679] Some of his companions said to him, "If only you would recite two sūrahs longer than these two!" but Shabath replied, "You see the Daylamī's have pitched camp in your courtyard and yet you say, 'If only you would read sūrat al-Baqarah and Āl ʿImrān!'"[680] There were three thousand of them.

I went on quickly and got back to al-Mukhtār and gave him the news about Shabath and his men. At the time I came to him, there came with me Siʿr b. Abī Siʿr al-Ḥanafī galloping from the direction of the Banū Murād. He was one of those who had given the oath of allegiance to al-Mukhtār, but had not been able to join him on the night when he began his revolt for fear of the guard. But in the morning he came on his horse and passed the square of Murād where Rāshid b. Iyās was. They said to him, "Stop, you![681] Who are you?" but 676. Massignon, "Kūfa," does not refer to this sikkah.

677. This seems to be the only appearance of this al-Ḍabbī.
678. Qur'ān, sūrah 99.
679. Qur'ān, sūrah 100.
680. "Daylamīs" (literally, men from Daylām, the province southwest of the Caspian) is often metaphoric for "fiends" (cf. "Turks," "Abyssinians"). Sūrat al-Baqarah and sūrat Āl ʿImrān are the two longest sūrahs in the Qur'ān.
681. See, for this sense of kamā anta, Gloss., s.v. ka.

he outpaced them and got to Mukhtār, to whom he reported on Rāshid while I reported on Shabath.

Al-Mukhtār dispatched Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar toward Rāshid b. Iyās with 900 men (it is also said: 600 horsemen and 600 footmen), and he sent Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah,[682] the brother of Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah, with 300 horsemen and 600 footmen. He told them both, "Push on until you confront your enemy. When you meet them, dismount among the footmen, force the issue and attack them on foot, but do not leave yourselves open to them for they outnumber you, and do not come back to me until you have won the victory or been slain." Ibrāhīm set forth to meet Rāshid while al-Mukhtār sent Yazīd b. Anas forward ahead of him to the place of Shabath's mosque with 900 men. Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah set off toward Shabath.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Saʿīd al-Ṣayqal: I was one of those who set out with Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah against Shabath, and Siʿr b. Abī Siʿr al-Ḥanafī was with me. When we came against him, we attacked fiercely. Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah put Siʿr b. Abī Siʿr al-Ḥanafī in charge of the cavalry while he himself marched with the footsoldiers, and he fought them until the sun had risen and it was light. We fought them until we had driven them into their houses, and then Shabath b. Ribʿī called out to them, "Oh warriors of wickedness! Wretched fighters for the truth are you! Do you flee from your slaves!" A group of them rallied to him and fought hard against us, and we were scattered and put to flight. Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah stood resolute and patient and was killed, and Siʿr stood with him and was made captive. I too was taken captive together with Khulayd the mawlā of Ḥassān b. Maḥdūj.[683] [623]

Shabath said to Khulayd, who was comely and physically huge, "Who are you?" and he replied, "Khulayd the mawlā of Ḥassān b. Maḥdūj al-Dhuhlī." Shabath said to him, "Oh son of a fishwife! You have given up the selling of fish at al-Kunāsah, and the recompense for him who freed you is that you assail him with your sword to flail at his shoulders! Cut off his head!" And he was slain. He saw Siʿr al-Ḥanafī and recognized him, and he said to him, "(Are you a) brother of the Banū Ḥanīfah?" Siʿr replied, "Yes!" Shabath said to him, "Woe unto you! What did you want in following this Saba'iyyah?[684] God has abhorred your point of view! Leave that one alone, men!"

682. Of the Banū Shaybān (Bakr b. Wā'il), he has a reputation as a "Shīʿī" (Ṭabarī, I, 3441) while his brother, Maṣqalah, who had been governor for ʿAlī over Ardashīr Khurrah, was one of the witnesses against Ḥujr b. ʿAdī (ibid., I, 3439ff., II, 133).

683. For the name, see Add. et emend.

I said to myself, "He killed the mawlā but left the Arab. By God, if he knows I am a mawlā, he will kill me!" When I was arraigned before him, therefore, he said, "Who are you?" and I answered, "I am from the Banū Taym Allāh." "Are you an Arab or a mawlā?" he asked. I replied, "Indeed no, I am an Arab from the family of Ziyād b. Khaṣafah."[685] "Good, good," he said, "you have mentioned the worthy noble man. Go and join your people." So I went on my way until I reached [624] the Ḥamrā',[686] and I had shown ardor in the fighting against the enemy.

Then I came to al-Mukhtār and said to myself, "By God, surely I will go to my companions and assist them myself. May God consider a life apart from them as base!" I went to them, Siʿr al-Ḥanafī having already reached them before me. The horsemen of Shabath advanced against Mukhtār and news of the killing of Nuʿaym b. Hubayrah reached him, resulting in great concern among al-Mukhtār's men. I drew close to al-Mukhtār and informed him of what had happened to me, but he said, "Hush! This is not the place for talk."

Shabath came on until he had encircled al-Mukhtār and Yazīd b. Anas, and Ibn Muṭīʿ sent Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruwaym with two thousand men from the direction of the lane of the butcher Jarīr, and they waited at the entrances to these lanes. Al-Mukhtār put Yazīd b. Anas in charge of his cavalry while he himself went out in the infantry.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Kaʿb al-Wālibī (Wālibah of the Azd): The horsemen of Shabath b. Ribʿī attacked us twice, but no man of us moved from where he was. Yazīd b. Anas addressed us:

684. A polemical name for the supporters of ʿAlī (see *EI*², s.v. ʿAbd Allāh b. Saba').

685. Or Ziyādah b. Khaṣafah al-Taymī; see Caskel/Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 608.

686. Descendants of the Persian infantry who had joined the Arabs at the time of the conquest of Iraq.

> Oh group of the Party [yā maᶜshar al-shīᶜah], you have been put to the slaughter, your hands and feet have been cut off, your eyes have been gouged out, and you have been hung on the trunks of palm trees in your love for the family of your Prophet. But you were remaining in your houses and in submission to your enemies. What do you think these people will do if they defeat you today? In that case, by God, they will not leave of you an eye to squint and, indeed, they will slaughter you patiently enduring. Indeed, you may expect of them a fate worse than death insofar as your offspring, your wives and your properties are concerned. By God, the only things which will save you from it will be uprighteousness, patience and endurance, accurate thrusting in their eyes, and effective blows[687] on their heads. Make ready to fight and prepare to attack. When I wave my banner twice, attack!

So we prepared and made ready, we rested on our knees and awaited his order. [625]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī: When Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar approached Rāshid b. Iyās, he went forward and came upon him in (the jabbānah of) Murād. He was surprised to see Rāshid had 4,000 men with him, but Ibrāhīm said to his men, "Do not let their number alarm you! By God, many a time one man is better than ten 'and many a time a band small in number has defeated a more numerous band with God's permission, and God is with the patiently enduring.' "[688] Then he said, "Oh Khuzaymah b. Naṣr,[689] go against them with the cavalry!" He dismounted and went on foot with the foot soldiers. His banner was with Muzāḥim b. Ṭufayl and Ibrāhīm started saying to him, "Go forward with your banner! Straight ahead, straight ahead!" The men did 687. See Add. et emend. and Gloss., s.v. dirāk.

688. Qur'ān, 2:250.

689. Of the Banū ᶜAbs b. Baghid of Ghaṭafān/Qays (Caskel/Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 135).

battle together and their fighting was fierce. Khuzaymah b. Naṣr al-ᶜAbsī caught sight of Rāshid b. Iyās, attacked and killed him. Then he called out, "I have killed Rāshid, by the Lord of the Kaᶜbah!" and Rāshid's men were put to flight.

After the killing of Rāshid, Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar, Khuzaymah b. Naṣr and those with them went toward al-Mukhtār, and Ibrāhīm sent al-Nuᶜmān b. Abī al-Jaᶜd to announce the good news of the success granted him and the killing of Rāshid. When the messenger informed al-Mukhtār's men they called out, "God is most great!" and they took heart, while Ibn Muṭīᶜ's men became discouraged.

Ibn Muṭīᶜ sent Ḥassān b. Fā'id b. Bukayr al-ᶜAbsī[690] with a powerful force of about 2,000 men, and he came on Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar a little above the (quarter of the) Ḥamrā', attempting to divert him from those of Ibn Muṭīᶜ's men in al-Sabakhah. Ibrāhīm sent Khuzaymah b. Naṣr forward against Ḥassān b. Fā'id with the cavalry, while he himself went on foot towards him wtih the infantry. He said, "By God, no sooner have we stabbed with a spear or struck with a sword then they have been put to flight."

[626] Ḥassān b. Fā'id stayed behind in the rear guard to protect his men and Khuzaymah b. Naṣr attacked him. When he saw him, he recognized him and said to him, "Oh Ḥassān b. Fā'id, indeed, by God, if it were not for kinship, I know that I would seek with all my effort to kill you, but (now) flee!" But Ḥassān's horse stumbled with him and he fell. Khuzaymah said to him, "Bad luck, Oh Abū ᶜAbdallāh!" and the men rushed on him and surrounded him. He fought against them with his sword for a while, and Khuzaymah b. Naṣr called out to him, saying, "You have a safe conduct, Oh Abū ᶜAbdallāh. Do not kill yourself!" He went and stood over him and the men held back. Ibrāhīm came up and Khuzaymah b. Naṣr said to him, "This is my cousin, and I have given him safe conduct." Ibrāhīm said to him, "You have done well!" and Khuzaymah ordered that Ḥassān's horse be sought, and it was brought and he was mounted upon it. Khuzaymah then said, "Go and join your people!"

690. I.e., of the same tribe as Khuzaymah.

Ibrāhīm went forward toward al-Mukhtār, while Shabath surrounded al-Mukhtār and Yazīd b. Anas. When Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith (b. Ruwaym), who was guarding the lanes of al-Kūfah in the vicinity of al-Sabakhah, saw Ibrāhīm advancing against Shabath, he himself moved forward to prevent Ibrāhīm from attacking Shabath and his men. Ibrāhīm then dispatched a party of his men with Khuzaymah b. Naṣr, saying to him, "Protect us from Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith," while he went on with the rest of his men against Shabath b. Ribʿī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Kaʿb: When Ibrāhīm approached us, we saw Shabath and his men slowly drawing back behind them, and, when Ibrāhīm got close to Shabath and his men, he attacked them and Yazīd b. Anas ordered us to attack them too. We did so, and they were thrown into disorder and had to withdraw into the houses of al-Kūfah. Khuzaymah b. Naṣr attacked Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruwaym and defeated him, and they crowded together in the openings of the lanes. Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith had stationed bowmen at the openings of the lanes in front of the houses. Al-Mukhtār advanced against Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith in a body of men, and when al-Mukhtār's men reached the mouths of the lanes, these [627] bowmen fired arrows at them and prevented them from entering al-Kūfah from that direction. Ibn Muṭīʿ's men then withdrew to him in defeat from al-Sabakhah, and he heard about the killing of Rāshid b. Iyās and his spirit was broken.[691]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yaḥyā b. Hānīʾ: ʿAmr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī[692] said to Ibn Muṭīʿ, "Do not lose heart and do not throw in your hand! Go out to the people, assign them against your enemy and attack them. Our people are numerous and all of them are with you, apart from this leader of error [ṭāghiyah], who has rebelled against the people, by God, shaming and destroying them. (I volunteer to be) the first to be assigned; detail a party to go with me and a party with someone else." So Ibn Muṭīʿ went out and stood among the people, praised God and extolled Him, and then said:

691. See Gloss., s.v. saqaṭa.

692. One of those who bore witness against Ḥujr b. ʿAdī (Ṭabarī, II, 133; Caskel/Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 174); for the Banū Zubayd of Madhḥij, see Caskel/Ibn al-Kalbī, II, 608.

> Oh people, one of the most surprising things is your lack of resolution before a gang fewer in number than you, wicked in religion, misguided and misguiding. Go out against them, defend your women against them, fight them to protect your garrison town, and defend your income from the conquered lands [fay'akum] against them. If you do not, by God, those who have no right to it will surely share in your fay'. By God, I have heard that there are among them 500 of your manumitted slaves under a commander who is one of them. If they increase in number it can only mean the passing away of your power and authority and the alteration of your religion.

Then he got down. Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith prevented them from entering al-Kūfah.[693] Al-Mukhtār went on from al-Sabakhah and won control over the jabbānah, and then he went up to the houses of Muzaynah,[694] and instilled zeal and fire in them. He rested by their mosque and their houses, which were detached and separate from the houses of the (other) Kūfans, and they brought water for him and provided drink for his men. Al-Mukhtār, however, refused to drink. His men thought [628] he was fasting, and Aḥmar b. Hudayj of Hamdān[695] said to Ibn Kāmil, "Do you think the commander is fasting?" He replied, "Yes, he is fasting." Aḥmar said to him, "If he broke his fast today, it would make him stronger." Ibn Kāmil answered, "He is immune from error [maᶜṣūm],[696] and he knows best what he is doing." Aḥmar said, "What you say is true, and I ask for God's pardon."

Al-Mukhtār said, "This is an excellent place for fighting." Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar said to him, "God has defeated them and broken them, and instilled fear into their hearts. You dismount here and lead us forward. By God, there is nobody outside

693. Presumably this refers to the central area, the fighting so far having been in outlying areas.

694. On the north of the town; Massignon, "Kūfa," in Opera Minora, III, 36.

695. One of the Fā'ishiyyūn of Hamdān (Ṭabarī, II, 666).

696. On this concept, see EI², s.v. ᶜIṣma, but cf. Gloss., s.v., which suggests the more neutral sanctus ("blameless?").

the governor's residence [al-qaṣr] to resist and there will be almost no opposition."[697] Al-Mukhtār said, "Let every shaykh who lacks strength and every sick man rest here. Put down your burdens and your equipment so you can set out against our enemy." The did that, and al-Mukhtār appointed Abū ᶜUthmān al-Nahdī to remain behind in charge of them. Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar went on ahead of him and he got his men ready in the condition in which they had been in al-Sabakhah.

ᶜAbdallāh b. Muṭīᶜ sent ᶜAmr b. al-Ḥajjāj with 2,000 men, and he came out against Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar from the lane of the Thawriyyūn.[698] Al-Mukhtār sent to Ibrāhīm, "Contain him but do not remain with him!" So Ibrāhīm closed him up, and al-Mukhtār summoned Yazīd b. Anas and told him to move out against ᶜAmr b. al-Ḥajjāj. Yazīd headed towards him while al-Mukhtār himself went off following Ibrāhīm. They proceeded together until al-Mukhtār came to the place of the oratory of Khālid b. ᶜAbdallāh,[699] where he halted and ordered Ibrāhīm to go ahead until he entered al-Kūfah from the direction of al-Kunāsah. Ibrāhīm went on and came out to it from the lane of Ibn Muḥriz.[700] Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan advanced with 2,000 men and al-Mukhtār sent against him Saᶜīd b. Munqidh al-Hamdānī, who engaged him in battle. Al-Mukhtār sent to Ibrāhīm, telling him, "Contain him and carry on ahead!" He proceeded until he came to the lane of Shabath, where he found Nawfal b. Musāḥiq b. ᶜAbdallāh b. Makhramah[701] with about 2,000 men (or it is said 5,000, which is correct). Ibn Muṭīᶜ had ordered Suwayd b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān (to give the command) and (the latter) gave the summons, "Join Ibn Musāḥiq!" Ibn Muṭīᶜ himself left Shabath b. Ribᶜī behind in control of the governor's residence [al-qaṣr] and went out and halted at al-Kunāsah. [629]

697. See Gloss., s.v. aḥad.

698. For the Thawriyyūn of the Banū Hamdān, see Ṭabarī, I, 3348 (N.B. not the Banū Thawr who were part of the confederation of Ribāb).

699. Apparently a reference to the later governor of Iraq, Khālid b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Qasrī (724–38).

700. The index to the Cairo edition identifies him as al-ᶜAlā' b. ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥriz.

701. Of Quraysh (see Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 427; Ibn Saᶜd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 179–80), Ibn Muṭīᶜ was his maternal uncle.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥaṣīrah b. ᶜAbdallāh: I saw Ibn al-Ashtar when he went forward with his men. When he drew close to the enemy, he said to his men, "Dismount!" and they dismounted. He said, "Tether your horses close together and then advance against them on foot with sword drawn. Do not let it alarm you that it is said, 'Shabath b. Ribᶜī has come against you, and the people of ᶜUtaybah b. al-Nahhās,[702] and the people of al-Ashᶜath, and the people of so-and-so, and the people of Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith!' " He named several of the leading families of the Kūfans and then he said, "If they (once) experience the heat of the swords, they will abandon Ibn Muṭīᶜ like goats fleeing from a wolf."

I saw Ibn al-Ashtar and his men when they tethered their horses close together and when Ibn al-Ashtar took the hem of his qabā', lifted it up and pushed it into a red belt made from the borders of burdah materials[703] which he had put on over his qabā'. He had covered up his armor with the qabā'. Then he said to his men, "Attack them, may my paternal and maternal uncles be a ransom for you!" And by God, it was not long before he had defeated them and they jostled one another in the mouth of the lane and crowded together. Ibn [630] al-Ashtar reached Ibn Musāḥiq, seized the bridle of his mount, and lifted his sword against him. Ibn Musāḥiq said to him, "Oh Ibn al-Ashtar, I implore you by God! Do you seek vengeance from me? Is there any hatred between us?" And Ibn al-Ashtar let him go, and said to him, "Remember it!" Subsequently, Ibn Musāḥiq remembered what he owed to Ibn al-Ashtar. They started to advance until they reached al-Kunāsah on the enemy's heels. They penetrated the market and the mosque, and besieged Ibn Muṭīᶜ for three days.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: Ibn Muṭīᶜ remained three days distributing meal to his men in the governor's residence where he was besieged. With him were the notables of the population, except for ᶜAmr b. Ḥurayth, who went to his house and did not think it necessary to submit to the siege. Then ᶜAmr betook himself off and settled outside the town.

---

702. Of the Banū ᶜIjl (Bakr b. Wā'il), he had participated in the conquest of Iraq and governed Ḥulwān under ᶜUthmān.

703. A burdah is a type of mantle; here the word seems to refer to a type of material rather than a garment (see Gloss., s.v. and *EI*², s.v. Libās, 734a).

Al-Mukhtār came and pitched camp at the side of the market and entrusted the siege of the governor's residence to Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar, Yazīd b. Anas, and Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ. Ibn al-Ashtar was next to the mosque and the gate of the governor's residence [al-qaṣr], Yazīd b. Anas adjoined (the houses of) the Banū Ḥudhayfah[704] and the lane of Dār al-Rumiyyīn,[705] while Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ abutted the house of ᶜUmārah[706] and the house of Abū Mūsā.[707]

When the siege became oppressive to Ibn Muṭīᶜ and his companions, the notables put their arguments to him. Shabath arose and said, "May God preserve the governor! Consider your position and that of those with you. By God, they have neither enough for you nor for themselves." Ibn Muṭīᶜ said, "Come, all of you, and advise me of your views." Shabath said, "We think you should obtain a safe-conduct from this man for yourself and for us, and that you should leave and not destroy yourself and those with you." Ibn Muṭīᶜ said, "By God, I am reluctant to obtain a safe-conduct from him while the authority of the Commander of the Faithful[708] is accepted in the whole of the Ḥijāz and in the territory of al-Baṣrah." Shabath said, "Then, leave and no one will know, and take [631] shelter in a dwelling in al-Kūfah with someone from whom you can ask advice and in whom you trust. (Al-Mukhtār) will not know where you are before you leave and join your lord." Ibn Muṭīᶜ said to Asmā' b. Khārijah,[709] ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saᶜīd b. Qays, and the notables of the Kūfans, "What do you think about this view which Shabath has put to me?" They said, "We have no view other 704. I.e., Hudhayfah b. al-Yamān al-ᶜAbsī (?).

705. See Morony, Iraq, 267.

706. ᶜUmārah b. ᶜUqbah b. Abī Muᶜayṭ (of Quraysh) (nazala 'l-Kūfah: Zubayrī, Nasab Quraysh, 140) or ᶜUmārah b. Ruwaybah al-Tamīmī (Morony, Iraq, 241)?

707. Abū Mūsā al-Ashᶜarī, a former governor of al-Kūfah.

708. I.e., Ibn al-Zubayr.

709. Of the Banū Fazārah (Qays), he was one of the witnesses against Ḥujr b. ᶜAdī (Ṭabarī, II, 133).

than that which he has put to you." He replied, "Wait, then, until evening."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mughallas al-Laythī: ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Laythī[710] was looking down on al-Mukhtār's men from the governor's residence in the evening, shouting insults at them. Mālik b. ᶜAmr Abū Nimrān al-Nahdī[711] fired an arrow at him and it scraped his throat, cutting a piece oı skin, so that he stumbled and fell. But then he got up and recovered. When he hit him, the Nahdī said, "Take that from Mālik, whoever acts thus!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ—Ḥassān b. Fā'id b. Bukayr: When we got to the evening of the third day in the governor's residence, Ibn Muṭīᶜ called us, spoke of God as befits Him, prayed for His Prophet and said:

> Now, I know who they are, those of you who have done this, and I know they are merely the base ones among you, the ignorant, the lowly, and the mean, apart from one or two. The noble ones among you, and those of worth, have never stopped hearing, obeying, and profering sincere advice. I shall inform my > [632] lord of that and let him know of your obedience and your struggle [jihād] against his enemies until God took control of his affair. You know what the view was which you put to me. I think I should go forth now.

Shabath said to him, "May God bless you for a governor! You have refrained from taking our wealth, you have been generous to the noble ones among us, you have given good advice to your lord, and you have fulfilled your duties. By God, we would never part from you were it not that we have permission from you." He said, "May God bless you! A man takes the road wherever he wishes." Then he went in the direction of the road of the Rūmiyyūn until he reached the house of Abū Mūsā. He vacated the governor's residence, and his men opened the gate and said, "Oh Ibn al-Ashtar, do we have safe-conduct?" He replied, "You have safe-conduct," and they came out and gave the oath of allegiance to al-Mukhtār.

710. The Banū Layth of Kinānah; this seems to be Ṭabarī's only reference to him.

711. For the form of the name, see Add. et emend., and see n. 642 above.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. ᶜĀmir al-ᶜAdawī (of ᶜAdī Juhaynah; he was Abū al-Ashᶜar): Al-Mukhtār entered the governor's residence where he passed the night. Next morning, the notables among the people were in the mosque and at the gate of the governor's residence. Al-Mukhtār went forth and ascended the minbar. He praised God and extolled him, saying:

> Praise be to God who has promised assistance to His friend and damage to His enemy, and He has made it for him until the end of time a promise carried out and a decree achieved, and he who fabricated a slander has failed! Oh people, a banner has been raised for us and an objective set before us. Regarding the banner we have been told, "Raise it up and do not put it down!" and regarding the objective, "Pursue it and do not abandon it!" We have heard the call of the caller and what was said by the memorizer, and how many are the men and women who wail for those slain in the memorable event! Away with he who tyrannizes, turns his back, disobeys (God), lies, and faces away! Verily, Oh people, enter in and give an oath of allegiance which is rightly guided. By He Who created the Heavens as a vault held back, and the earth as broad paths, after the one to ᶜAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and the family of ᶜAlī, you have not taken any oath of allegiance more rightly guided than it!

Then he went in, and we and the notables went in to him and clasped his hand (in allegiance). The people rushed to him and gave him the oath of allegiance, and he began, saying, "You are giving me the oath of allegiance on (the understanding that we will follow) the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Prophet, that we will seek vengeance for the blood of the family, pursue jihād against those who violate God's law, protect the weak, fight against those who fight us and give peace to those who seek it from us, and fulfill the oath of allegiance which you have given to us. We will not release [633] you from it nor ask you to cancel it." When each man said, "Yes," he took the oath of allegiance from him.

By God, it is as if I can see now al-Mundhir b. Ḥassān b. Ḍirār[712] as he came to him and greeted him as the holder of authority. Then he gave him the oath of allegiance and left him. But, as he came out of the residence, he drew near Saʿīd b. Munqidh al-Thawrī in a group of the Shīʿah waiting by the maṣṭaba.[713] When they saw him, and with him he had his son Ḥayyān b. al-Mundhir, one of the stupid ones of them said, "By God, this is one of the leaders of the tyrants [al-jabbārīn]!" They attacked him and his son and killed them. Saʿīd b. Munqidh called out to them, "Wait! Wait until we see what your commander [amīr] thinks about him!" Al-Mukhtār heard about that and was so angry about it that it could be seen in his face; and he began to arouse the hopes of the people and to win their love and that of the notables, and to follow a righteous way of life as much as he could.

Ibn Kāmil came to him and said to al-Mukhtār, "Are you aware that Ibn Muṭīʿ is in the house of Abū Mūsā?" He answered him not a word. Ibn Kāmil repeated it three times, but he did not answer. Then he repeated it again, but he still did not answer, and Ibn Kāmil suspected it must be unwelcome news to him, for previously Ibn Muṭīʿ had been a friend to al-Mukhtār. In the evening, al-Mukhtār sent 100,000 dirhams to Ibn Muṭīʿ and said to him, "Use this to make ready and go. I have discovered where you are and I think the only thing [634] preventing your departure must be that you do not possess enough to encourage you to leave."

Al-Mukhtār won possession of 9,000,000 dirhams in the treasury of al-Kūfah. He gave to every one of his men with whom he had fought when he besieged Ibn Muṭīʿ in the residence—3,800 of them—500 dirhams. And he gave to 6,000 of his men who had joined him after he had encircled the residence, and who had remained with him for that night and those three days until he entered the residence, 200 dirhams each. He showed kindness to the people and led them to expect justice and righteousness of conduct. He attracted the notables to him, and they were his companions in his councils and discussions. Over the police troop he appointed ᶜAbdallāh b. Kāmil al-Shākirī, and over his (personal) guard Kaysān Abū ᶜAmrah, a mawlā of ᶜUraynah.[714]

712. One of the leaders of the Banū Ḍabbah who had taken part in the conquest of Iraq (Donner, Conquests, index).

713. A stone bench built into a wall.

One day, the latter stood guarding him and saw the notables talking with him and he saw him tête-à-tête with them in his conversation. Some of his mawlā companions said to Abū ᶜAmrah, "Do you not see how Abū Isḥāq has drawn close to the Arabs and does not regard us?" Al-Mukhtār summoned Abū ᶜAmrah and said to him, "What were those men I saw saying to you?" He said to him, whispering, "It troubled them, may God preserve you, that you have turned your face from them to the Arabs." Al-Mukhtār said to him, "Tell them, 'Indeed do not let that trouble you, for you are of me and I am of you!' " Then he was silent for a considerable time before reciting, 'We shall surely take vengeance on the sinners.'[715]

(According to Abū Mikhnaf)—Ḥaṣīrah b. ᶜAbdallāh al-Azdī, Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī, and al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ al-ᶜAbsī: The first man to whom al-Mukhtār gave a banner was ᶜAbdallāh b. al-Ḥārith, the brother of al-Ashtar; he gave him authority over Armenia. And he sent Muḥammad b. ᶜUmayr b. ᶜUṭārid[716] [635] over Ādharbayjān, ᶜAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saᶜīd b. Qays over al-Mawṣil, Isḥāq b. Masᶜūd[717] over al-Madā'in and the region of Jūkhā, Qudāmah b. Abī ᶜĪsā b. Rabīᶜah al-Naṣrī, an ally of Thaqīf,[718] over upper Bihqubādh,[719] Muḥammad b. Kaᶜb b. Qaraẓah[720] over central Bihqubādh, Ḥabīb b. Munqidh al-Thawrī[721] over lower Bihqubādh, and Saᶜd b. Ḥudhayfah b. al-

714. See EI², s.v. Kaysān.

715. Qur'ān, 32:22.

716. Of Tamīm, he had been one of the witnesses against Ḥujr (Ṭabarī, II, 133).

717. This seems to be the only reference to him, and I have not been able to identify him from independent sources.

718. Apparently, Ṭabarī's only reference to him.

719. For Upper, Middle and Lower Bihqubadh, see Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, 81.

720. Presumably the same man as the often-cited traditionist Muḥammad b. Kaᶜb al-Quraẓī (of the Banū Qurayẓah/Anṣār) (?).

721. Brother of the above mentioned Saᶜīd b. Munqidh.

Yamān over Ḥulwān. With Sa^{c}d b. Ḥudhayfah there were a thousand horsemen at Ḥulwān. Each month, al-Mukhtār paid him 1,000 dirhams, and he ordered him to fight the Kurds and keep the roads open. He wrote to his (financial) officials who had authority in the Jibāl,[722] telling them to bring the revenue from their districts to Sa^{c}d b. Ḥudhayfah at Ḥulwān.[723]

^{c}Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr had sent Muḥammad b. al-Ash^{c}ath b. Qays over al-Mawṣil telling him to exchange correspondence with Ibn Muṭī^{c} and to listen to him and obey him, except that Ibn Muṭī^{c} would have no power to remove him from office, unless on the orders of Ibn al-Zubayr. Previously, under the governorate of ^{c}Abdallāh b. Yazīd and Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad, Muḥammad b. al-Ash^{c}ath had been independent in the governorate of al-Mawṣil, communicating with no one but Ibn al-Zubayr. When ^{c}Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa^{c}īd b. Qays came upon him as governor from al-Mukhtār, he fell back from al-Mawṣil before him and took up residence in Takrīt where he remained with some of the notables of his tribe and others. He was withdrawn [mu^{c}tazil] from the conflict, waiting to see what the people would do and how their affairs would turn out. Then he departed, went to al-Mukhtār, gave him the oath of allegiance and entered into what the people of his land had entered into.

[636] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ṣilah b. Zuhayr al-Nahdī—Muslim b. ^{c}Abdallāh al-Ḍabbābī: When al-Mukhtār had triumphed and seized power, Ibn Muṭī^{c} had fled, and he had sent out his officials, he began to hold sessions for the people morning and evening and to judge between those in dispute. Then he said, "By God, with what I am striving and endeavoring for I am too preoccupied to judge between the people." And he caused Shurayḥ[724] to hold sessions for the people and he gave judgment for them. But then Shurayḥ feared them and pretended to be sick. They used to say that he was an ^{c}Uthmānī,[725] that he was one of those who had borne witness 722. See Le Strange, Eastern Caliphate, map II.

723. Concerning the above list, cf. Rotter, Bürgerkrieg, 103.

724. Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith al-Kindī, a famous qāḍī who is supposed to have been first appointed by the caliph ^{c}Umar.

725. I.e., a supporter of the views of the murdered caliph ^{c}Uthmān.

against Ḥujr b. ᶜAdī,[726] that he had not reported from Hāni' b. ᶜUrwah the information which Hāni' had sent to him, and that ᶜAlī b. Abī Ṭālib had removed him from his office as judge. When Shurayḥ heard that and saw them blaming him and applying such opinions to him, he feigned illness and al-Mukhtār appointed in his place ᶜAbdallāh b. ᶜUtbah b. Masᶜūd. But then ᶜAbdallāh fell sick, and al-Mukhtār made ᶜAbdallāh b. Mālik al-Ṭā'ī judge in his stead.

Muslim b. ᶜAbdallāh said: ᶜAbdallāh b. Hammām[727] had heard Abū ᶜAmrah[728] referring to the Shīᶜah and decrying ᶜUthmān b. ᶜAffān, and he had obtained satisfaction from him with the whip. When al-Mukhtār achieved the victory Ibn Hammām remained neutral, and eventually ᶜAbdallāh b. Shaddād sought a safe conduct for him. One day, Ibn Hammām came to al-Mukhtār and said:[729]

Indeed, Umm Sarīᶜ has turned away from you with her love and turned her back openly forsaking ties of affection.
A slanderer who spread lies without stopping short beset her,
and you have returned full of grief in your heart.
But do not take the matter so seriously. Let not passion destroy you;
the passing of a need is not anything marvellous.
One night al-Mukhtār, distracting the young man [637] and making him forget the playful freshness of youth, Proclaimed, "Revenge for al-Ḥusayn!" and there came detachments from Hamdān after a third part of the night.
And the chief Ibn Mālik came from Madhḥij, leading bands arranged for battle in units.
And from Asad, Yazīd came to his aid, with every young man protecting and defending those things which it is his duty to.

726. See Ṭabarī, II, 134.
727. ᶜAbd Allāh b. Hammām al-Salūlī, the poet (see EI², s.v.).
728. Abū ᶜAmrah Kaysān, the leader of al-Mukhtār's bodyguard.
729. Cf. Dīnawārī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 291.

And Nuᶜaym, the best man of the whole of Shaybān, brought something which, at the time of fighting, is sharper by far.
And Ibn Shumayṭ, when he incited his clansmen, was there neither left without help nor neglected, Nor was Qays of Nahd, indeed, nor Ibn Hawāzin; everyone was a brother in humility and submissiveness.
And Abū al-Nuᶜmān set out, may his hastening be for God, against Ibn Iyās, going out to the fighting,
With horsemen wearing armor on the day of battle and others uncovered, without armor.
The horsemen made an attack which overtook the enemy, and at the start of it assailed Ibn Muṭīᶜ.
[638] He turned in flight with a blow, the fall of which would split open the head, and a painful thrust of the spear on the "Day of the Two Lanes."
He was besieged in the government house, returning to it with disgrace, humiliation and submissiveness.
But the wazīr of the son of the Legatee was gracious to them
and was the best intercessor for them among the people.
Right guidance indeed returned to its seat, most rightly returning and coming back To the Hāshimī, the rightly guiding and the rightly guided; him we hear and obey.

When he had recited it to al-Mukhtār, al-Mukhtār said to his men, "He has praised you as you heard, and he has been generous in his praising you. Be generous in rewarding him, therefore!" Then al-Mukhtār arose and went in, saying to his men, "Do not depart until I come out to you!"

ᶜAbdallāh b. Shaddād al-Jushamī said, "Oh Ibn Hammām, I have a horse and shawl for you." And Qays b. Ṭahfah al-Nahdī, who was married to al-Ribāb bint al-Ashᶜath, said, "And I have a horse and shawl for you." Each of them was [639] embarrassed that the other might give him something and he not give the same. Qays said to Yazīd b. Anas, "What will you give him?" and Yazīd replied, "If he was aiming at a reward from God by saying what he did, then what is with God is a benefit for him. But if he only wanted to get his hands on our property by making this speech, by God, there is nothing in our property which will suffice him—what was left over out of my pay has gone to strengthen my brethren." Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ, getting in ahead of them before they addressed Ibn Hammām, said, "Oh Ibn Hammām, if you desired the face of God in saying what you did, then seek your reward from God; but if you merely aimed at the approval of the people and the seeking of their property, then you will not achieve anything! By God, he who makes a speech to someone other than God, and concerning something other than what God possesses, is not fitting to be made presents to or donated to."

Ibn Hammām said to him, "May you bite the penis of your father!" and Yazīd b. Anas raised his whip and said to Ibn Hammām, "Do you say that, Oh wicked one!" and he said to Ibn Shumayṭ, "Strike him with your sword!" Ibn Shumayṭ lifted his sword against him and sprang at him, and the companions of Yazīd b. Anas and Ibn Shumayṭ sprang at him too, to escape Ibn Hammām's tongue. However, Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar took him by the hand, placed him behind himself, and said, "I grant him protection. Why do you behave toward him as I see? By God, he is attaching himself to our ties of friendship, approving of what we are doing, and generous in his praise. Even if you will not reward him for the generosity of his praise, at least do not abuse his honor and shed his blood." Madhḥij sprang up and interposed themselves in front of him, saying, "Ibn al-Ashtar has given him protection! No, by God, he shall not be reached!"

Al-Mukhtār heard their clamor, went out to them and signaled to them with his hand, "Sit down!" They sat and he said to them, "When something good is said to you, accept [640] it. And if you have the ability to reward it, then do so. If you cannot give a reward, then withdraw. And fear the tongue of the poet; his ill will is long-lasting, what he says causes damage, his slander is fertile and he deceives you in future times." They said, "And shall we not slay him?" He replied, "No! We have given him safe-conduct and protection, and your brother Ibrāhīm Ibn al-Ashtar has given him protection." Then Ibn Hammām sat with the people.

Ibrāhīm arose and returned to his abode, and he gave 1,000 dirhams and a horse and shawl to Ibn Hammām who went back with it and said, "No, by God, I shall never take more than these!" Hawāzin came and waxed furious and gathered in the mosque to defend Ibn Hammām, but al-Mukhtār sent to them, asking them to forgive the offense, and they did so.

Ibn Hammām said to Ibn al-Ashtar, eulogizing him:

The master of generous deeds, Ibn Mālik, put out for me
the fire of two dogs, who incited the dogs against me.
(He is) a young man who, when he confronts the horsemen, disperses them
with an effective spear thrust or a speedy blow.
A group of Hawāzin defended me,
(a group) mighty and powerful.
When Ibn Shumayṭ or Yazīd opposed it, those two fell into deadly confusion.
Oh mawlās of Ṭayyi', you attacked us suddenly with Ibn Shumayṭ, the most evil man who walked or moved,
And the most slanderous turncoat against God.
But no slandering heretic can be compared with a pious ascetic.
[641] How surprising then that an Aḥmasī,[730] son of an Aḥmasī, attacked me with spears and lances,
As if your strength compared with that of Qays and Khath-ʿam;
but are you any more than the shameful things of menstruating women?

On the following day ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād came and sat in the mosque, saying, "The Banū Asad and the Aḥmas attacked us. By God, we shall never find that acceptable." Al-Mukhtār heard of it and sent for him, and summoned Yazīd b. Anas and Ibn Shumayṭ. He praised God and extolled Him and then said, "Oh Ibn Shaddād, what you have done is one of the promptings of Satan. Turn to God in repentance!" He said, "I have repented." Al-Mukhtār said, "These two are your brethren. Turn to them and submit to them, and give me this thing!" He replied, "It is yours."

730. I.e., Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ al-Aḥmasī.

Ibn Hammām had meanwhile composed another qaṣīdah about the affair of al-Mukhtār. He said:

Sulaymā appeared after a long period of rebuke and the ending and passing away of the irritability of youth.
She had decided on leaving me and avoiding me, and after she had done this she went to extremes in an attempt to conciliate me.
When I saw the governor's residence, its door locked, and Hamdān in charge of the ropes; [642]
And when I saw the men of no substance, as if they were bees around the dens of foxes;
And when I saw the gates of the lanes around us closed off with every sort of stick and sword tip;
I knew for sure that the horsemen of the rightly guided party, not even a fly's penis would survive them.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXI

The Victory of the Marwānids

TRANSLATED BY MICHAEL FISHBEIN

The Events of the Year 66 (cont'd)

(AUGUST 8, 685–JULY 27, 686)

[Al-Mukhtār Acts against the Slayers of al-Ḥusayn]

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, al-Mukhtār[1] seized the slayers of al-Ḥusayn[2] who were in al-Kūfah[3] and those who were accomplices in his murder. He killed those of them over whom he gained power; some, however, fled from al-Kūfah and eluded his grasp. [642]

---

1. The Shīʿī leader al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd b. Masʿūd al-Thaqafī seized al-Kūfah earlier in 66/685 as the self-proclaimed "assistant" or "helper" (wazīr) of ʿAlī's son, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah. See Ṭabarī, II, 598–642; EI[1], s.v.

2. Al-Ḥusayn, the grandson of the Prophet, was the son of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib by Muḥammad's daughter, Fāṭimah. The Shīʿah, supporters of the right of ʿAlī and his family to political and spiritual leadership, considered his death at the hands of Umayyad forces at Karbalāʾ on 10 Muḥarram 61 (October 10, 680) a martyrdom and demanded vengeance against the Umayyads. See EI[2], s.v. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī.

3. The Muslim garrison city (miṣr) and provincial capital of al-Kūfah was founded ca. 17/638 in the caliphate of ʿUmar on the Euphrates near the older city of al-Ḥīrah. It grew rapidly and in 36/657 became ʿAlī's capital. ʿAlī was assassinated outside the city's great mosque in 40/661, and al-Kūfah became a focus of pro-ʿAlid Shīʿī activity. See EI[2], s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 74ff.

Why He Seized Them; Names of Those He Killed and of Those Who Fled and Eluded His Grasp

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī][4]—ʿAwānah b. al-Ḥakam:[5] The reason for this was as follows. When Syria had become completely obedient to him, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam[6] sent out two armies. One of them was sent to the Ḥijāz under Ḥubaysh b. Duljah al-Qaynī, and we have previously mentioned him and how he perished.[7] The other was sent to Iraq under ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, and we have mentioned what took place between him and the Tawwābūn[8] of the Shīʿah[9] at ʿAyn al-Wardah. When Marwān sent ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād to Iraq, he granted him [the 4. Hishām b. Muḥammad b. al-Sāʾib al-Kalbī (b. ca. 120/737, d. 204/819 or 206), often called "Ibn al-Kalbī" after his father (d. 146/763), who was himself a genealogist, historian, geographer, and Qurʾān commentator, was a Shīʿī native of al-Kūfah who wrote prolifically on many subjects. The isnād here is introduced by dhakarahū Hishām, indicating that Ṭabarī used one of Ibn al-Kalbī's books, but without authorization from a scholar who had studied with Ibn al-Kalbī. Technically, such a procedure was called "wijādah." See EI[2], s.v. al-Kalbī; F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 268–271.

---

5. ʿAwānah b. al-Ḥakam b. ʿAwānah al-Kalbī (d. 147/764 or 158) was a blind Kūfan whose interests included history of the Umayyad period, genealogy, and poetry. The Fihrist of Ibn al-Nadīm lists two books of his: a Kitāb al-Tārīkh, and a Kitāb Sīrat Muʿāwiyah wa-Banī Umayyah on the life of Muʿāwiyah and the Banū Umayyah. Ṭabarī's material from ʿAwānah was probably obtained indirectly through the works of Ibn al-Kalbī and al-Madāʾinī. See EI[2], s.v.; F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 307–8.

6. The Umayyad caliph Marwān b. al-Ḥakam ruled for nine months in 64–65 (683–684). He began to reassemble the empire that his cousin Muʿāwiyah, the first Umayyad caliph, had ruled and that had fallen away from Umayyad allegiance during the reigns of Yazīd and Muʿāwiyah II. He was succeeded by his son, ʿAbd al-Malik, in Ramaḍān 65 (April 685). See EI[1], s.v.

7. This army was sent in 65/684 to take Medina from Ibn al-Zubayr, but was defeated when an army from al-Baṣrah reinforced the Zubayrid forces in the Ḥijāz. See Ṭabarī, II, 578–79.

8. The Tawwābūn ("penitents") were a Shīʿī group. Blaming their own inaction for having caused the death of al-Ḥusayn, they vowed to expiate their guilt by exacting vengeance. Their revolt after the death of Yazīd ended in defeat at the battle of ʿAyn al-Wardah on 22 Jumādā I, 65 (January 4, 685). Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, their leader, was killed, and the Tawwābūn were routed by the forces of ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. See Ṭabarī, II, 497ff.; EI[1] s.v. Sulaimān b. Ṣurad al-Khuzāʿī; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 35–37; and Jafri, Origins, 159.

9. Literally, "the followers, group, associates, or partisans," the word shīʿah came to refer to those who supported the rights of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib and his descendants to political leadership of the Muslim community and to a special spiritual leadership (the imamate). See EI[1], s.v.; Jafri, Origins, 1–23 governance of] whatever he conquered and commanded him to sack al-Kūfah, if he overcame its people, for three days. [643]

'Awānah said: 'Ubaydallāh passed through the land of al-Jazīrah[10] and was delayed there. Qays 'Aylān [tribesmen][11] were there, obedient to Ibn al-Zubayr.[12] Marwān had inflicted heavy losses on the Qays at the battle of Marj Rāhiṭ,[13] when they were on the side of al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays,[14] opposing Marwān and his son 'Abd al-Malik, [who ruled] after him. 'Ubaydallāh remained preoccupied with them and unable to turn his attention to Iraq for about a year. Then he proceeded to al-Mawṣil.[15] Al-Mukhtār's governor of al-Mawṣil, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays, wrote to al-Mukhtār:

> To proceed: I hereby inform you, O commander (amīr), that 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād has entered the territory of al-Mawṣil and has turned his horsemen and foot soldiers toward me. I have withdrawn to Takrīt[16] until your opinion and command reach me. Peace be upon you.[17]

---

10. Al-Jazīrah ("the island" or "peninsula") was the Arabic name for upper Mesopotamia. It included as its principal towns al-Mawṣil, al-Raqqah, and Āmid. See Le Strange, Lands, 86–114; *EI*², s.v. al-Djazīra.

11. Qays 'Aylān, or Qays (sometimes called "Muḍar"), were a group of northern Arab clans from the Ḥijāz and western Arabia. They formed the bulk of the men involved in the first conquests in Syria under Abū Bakr and were rewarded with lands in al-Jazīrah. Because Mu'āwiyah relied on the support of rival Kalb (Yemeni) tribes, and also because Yazīd, Mu'āwiyah's heir, had a Kalbī mother, many of the Qays supported Ibn al-Zubayr. Mu'āwiyah's opening of al-Jazīrah to immigration from unrelated Arab clans may also have been a factor. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳays 'Aylān; Shaban, Islamic History, I, 82–84, 92.

12. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr ruled the Ḥijāz at this time as a rival caliph and was recognized by opponents of the Umayyads in Syria, Egypt, southern Arabia, and al-Kūfah. See *EI*², s.v.

13. A plain near Damascus where Marwān defeated forces loyal to Ibn al-Zubayr at the end of 64 (July 684). See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.; Ṭabarī, II, 474ff.; *EI*², s.v.

14. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī, leader of the Qays and at first a loyal supporter of the Umayyads against 'Alī, went over to Ibn al-Zubayr after the death of Mu'āwiyah II in 64/684. He was defeated and killed by Marwān at Marj Rāhiṭ. See *EI*², s.v.

15. Al-Mawṣil, on the upper Tigris River, was a principal town of al-Jazīrah. See Le Strange, Lands, 87–89.

16. Takrīt lay south of al-Mawṣil on the Tigris, on the Iraq side of the border between al-Jazīrah and Iraq. See Le Strange, Lands, 25, 57; *EI*¹, s.v.

17. Cf. the longer version in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 230: "'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays wrote informing al-Mukhtār that the horsemen of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād were approaching al-Mawṣil, and that he, having neither horses nor men, feared he would be too weak to deal with him."

Al-Mukhtār wrote to him:

> To proceed: Your letter has reached me, and I have understood all you said in it. You did well to withdraw to Takrīt. Remain where you are until my command reaches you, God willing. Peace be upon you.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf[18]—Mūsā b. ʿĀmir:[19] When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd's letter reached al-Mukhtār, he summoned Yazīd b. Anas[20] and said to him,[21] "Yazīd b. Anas, one who knows is not like one who is ignorant; truth is not like falsehood. I tell you the report of one who has not lied and has not been called a liar, who has not disobeyed or wavered. We are the believers, the fortunate ones; the victorious, the sound ones. You are the master of horses whose quivers you draw[22] and whose tails you plait, until you bring them to water in olive groves, their eyes sunken, their bellies lank.[23] Go out to al-Mawṣil and encamp in its vicinity. I will provide you with men followed [644] by even more men." Yazīd b. Anas said to him, "Send with me three thousand horsemen whom I shall choose, and leave me to take care of the region to which you send us. If I need men, I will write to you." Al-Mukhtār said to him, "Go out and choose, in the name of God, whomever you like."

Yazīd b. Anas went out and chose three thousand horsemen.

---

18. Abū Mikhnaf Lūṭ b. Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd b. Mikhnaf al-Azdī (b. ca. 70/689, d. 157/775) was a late Umayyad composer of historical monographs, about forty of which can be identified from Ibn al-Nadīm's Fihrist and other works. His books, mediated through Ibn al-Kalbī, were one of Ṭabarī's major sources of information about events of the Umayyad period, particularly those centered around al-Kūfah. See *EI*², s.v.; F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 308–9; and U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 40–47.

19. Mūsā b. ʿĀmir Abū al-Ashʿar al-Juhanī al-ʿAdawī identifies himself (Ṭabarī, II, 646) as having been in the army of Yazīd b. Anas. All his reports, mediated through Abū Mikhnaf, deal with A.H. 66. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 213.

20. Yazīd b. Anas b. Kilāb al-Asadī, an early supporter of al-Mukhtār, was influential in drawing Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar to al-Mukhtār's cause and commanded part of al-Mukhtār's forces in the seizure al-Kūfah in 66/685. See Ṭabarī, II, 599–630, passim.

21. The speech is in rhymed prose (sajʿ), on which see *EI*¹, s.v. Sadj.

22. The meaning of tajurru jiʿābahā is problematic. Ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CLXV: "probably metaphorical for the sheath of the penis of a horse. Horses' jiʿāb are drawn (or slit?) and tails plaited when they are to make a very long journey." No source for this meaning of jiʿāb or further explanation is given.

23. I.e., from long and strenuous traveling.

He put al-Nuʿmān b. ʿAwf b. Abī Jābir al-Azdī in charge of the fourth[24] of Medina, ʿĀṣim b. Qays b. Ḥabīb al-Hamdānī in charge of the fourth of Tamīm and Hamdān, Warqāʾ b. ʿĀzib al-Asadī in charge of Madhḥij and Asad, and Siʿr b. Abī Siʿr al-Ḥanafī in charge of the fourth of Rabīʿah and Kindah. Then he set out from al-Kūfah, and al-Mukhtār and the people went out with him to escort him. When he reached Dayr Abī Mūsā,[25] al-Mukhtār said goodbye to him and turned back, saying, "When you encounter your enemy, grant them no respite. When opportunity presents itself, do not delay. Let me have a report from you every day. If you need assistance, write to me, although I will assist you even if you do not ask for it; for it will give your arm more strength, make your army more powerful, and put more fear into your enemy." Yazīd b. Anas said to him, "Assist me only with your prayer; that will be enough assistance." The people said to him, "May God accompany you! May He convey you and aid you!" Then they said goodbye to him. Yazīd said to them, "Pray to God on my behalf for martyrdom! I swear by God, if I meet them and victory escapes me, martyrdom shall not escape me, God willing."

Al-Mukhtār wrote to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays:

> To proceed: Let Yazīd [b. Anas] deal with the territory—
> God willing! Peace be upon you.

Having marched forth with the men, Yazīd b. Anas spent the night at Sūrā.[26] The next day he marched with them and spent the night at al-Madāʾin.[27] The men complained to him that they were suffering from the speed of the march, so he stayed there a day [645] and a night. Then he took them along the territory of Jūkhā,[28]

---

24. The fourths (rubʿ, pl. arbāʿ) were divisions of the Kūfan army, in accordance with a system created by Ziyād b. Abīhi.

25. Apparently the same as Dayr Mūsā, a place near al-Kūfah on the way to Sūrā. See *EI*², s.v. Dayr Mūsā.

26. At Sūrā, a town on the upper Nahr Sūrā (modern Shaṭṭ Hindiyyah branch of the Euphrates), the main road from al-Kūfah to al-Madāʾin crossed the Euphrates by bridge. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 26, 70–72.

27. Al-Madāʾin ("the cities," so named because it consisted of a number of separate towns linked by a floating bridge across the Tigris) was the former Sasanian winter capital about 20 miles south of Baghdad. See *EI*², s.v.

28. Jūkhā was a district east of al-Madāʾin, extending along the Diyālā River. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v. Jūkhā; Le Strange, Lands, 42; Morony, Iraq, 137–141.

brought them out in the Rādhān [districts],[29] and crossed with them into the territory of al-Mawṣil, encamping at Banāt Talā.[30] His location and the place at which he had encamped were reported to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, who asked about their number. His spies told him that three thousand horsemen had left al-Kūfah with him. 'Ubaydallāh said, "I will dispatch two thousand for every thousand." He summoned Rabī'ah b. al-Mukhāriq al-Ghanawī and 'Abdallāh b. Ḥamlah al-Khath'amī and dispatched them, each with three thousand men. He sent Rabī'ah b. al-Mukhāriq first, waited a day, and then sent 'Abdallāh b. Ḥamlah after him. Then he wrote to them, saying, "Whichever of you arrives first is to be the commander over his fellow. If you both arrive together, the older of you is to be commander over his fellow and the entire force." [Continuing,] he[31] said: Rabī'ah b. al-Mukhāriq arrived first and encamped by Yazīd b. Anas while he was at Banāt Talā. Yazīd b. Anas came out to [fight] him sick and exhausted.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt[32]—Abū Sa'īd al-Ṣayqal,[33] who said: Yazīd b. Anas came out to us sick and mounted on a donkey. Men walked with him, holding him on his right and 29. Upper and Lower Rādhān were subdistricts of Jūkhā. The town of Rādhān lay on the east side of the old bed of the Tigris between the 'Adhaym and Diyālā Rivers. See Le Strange, Lands, 35, 80; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.; Morony, Iraq, 138–39.

---

30. Vocalization and location uncertain. The mss. show much uncertainty about the dotting of the consonants of the name. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 229 reads "Bātilī," with variants such as "Māyilī" and "Mātilī."

31. One is tempted to omit in translation this peculiar feature of the reports collected in Ṭabarī's history—namely, the frequent interruption of narratives by qāla, "he said." Normally, "he" refers to the earliest source in the previous isnad. One might thus translate: "[Mūsā b. 'Āmir continued,] saying...." However, in some cases it is not easy to determine whether the text after qāla resumes the words of the earliest informant or begins a passage of summary by Abū Mikhnaf or even Hishām b. al-Kalbī. I have therefore thought it best to preserve the ambiguity of the Arabic. On the other hand, these repeated *qāla*s should not be omitted. An argument can be made that they mark places where an account has been shortened through the omission of material. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 91–92, for a discussion of the problem.

32. Abū al-Ṣalt al-Taymī is perhaps to be identified with the Kūfan scholar Zā'idah b. Qudāmah al-Thaqafī (d. 160/776), author of various works on ḥadīth and Qur'ān readings and a kinsman and friend of al-Mukhtār. See Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 39–40; and U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 149, 226–7.

33. Abū Sa'īd al-Ṣayqal, an eyewitness, was a mawlā who had fought on al-Mukhtār's side at the seizure of al-Kūfah. See Ṭabarī, II, 623. For mawlā, see n. 49.

on his left by his legs, arms, and sides. He stopped at each fourth and said, "O choice army (shurṭah) of God, be steadfast, and you shall be rewarded; vie with your enemy in steadfastness, and you shall be victorious![34] 'Fight you against the friends of Satan; surely the guile of Satan is ever feeble.'[35] If I perish, your commander [646] is Warqā' b. 'Āzib al-Asadī. If he perishes, your commander is 'Abdallāh b. Ḍamrah al-'Udhrī. If he perishes, your commander is Si'r b. Abī Si'r al-Ḥanafī." [Continuing,] he said: I, by God, was among those who walked with him and held his arm and hand, and I saw by his face that death had descended upon him.

[Continuing,] he said: Yazīd b. Anas put 'Abdallāh b. Ḍamrah al-'Udhrī in charge of his right wing, and Si'r b. Abī Si'r in charge of his left wing. He put Warqā' b. 'Āzib al-Asadī in charge of the horsemen. He himself dismounted and was placed on a litter among the men. He said to them, "Go forth to encounter them in the open field. Put me in front among the men. Then, if you will, fight for your commander; or, if you will, flee and leave him." [Continuing,] he said: We brought him out in the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, on the Day of 'Arafah of the year 66.[36] Sometimes we held him by his back, and he would say, "Do this, do this, and do this," giving his order. Before long the pain would overcome him and he would be set down for a while. The men were fighting. It was the morning twilight, before sunrise. [Continuing,] he said: Their left wing attacked our right wing, and their fighting became fierce. Our left wing attacked their right wing and put it to flight. Warqā' b. 'Āzib al-Asadī attacked with the horsemen and put them to flight. By midmorning we had put them to flight and taken their camp.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. 'Āmir al-'Adawī, who said: We reached Rabī'ah b. al-Mukhāriq, their commander. His forces had been put to flight, leaving him, and he had dismounted

34. Cf. Qur'ān 3:200, "O believers, be patient, and vie you in patience." An alternate translation would be, "Show endurance (or steadfastness)...vie with your enemy in endurance (or steadfastness)."

35. Qur'ān 4:76.

36. July 7, 686: The ninth day of Dhū al-Ḥijjah is called "the day of 'Arafah" (or 'Arafāt) because it is the day when pilgrims gather on the plain of 'Arafāt, about 15 miles east of Mecca, for the wuqūf ("standing," or "station") that climaxes the Ḥajj (pilgrimage). See *EI*², s.vv. 'Arafa and Ḥadjdj.

and was calling out, "O supporters of the truth, O people who hear and obey, come to me! I am Ibn al-Mukhāriq." [Continuing,] Mūsā [b. 'Āmir al-'Adawī] said: As for me, I was a young lad, so I was frightened and halted. 'Abdallāh b. Warqā' al-Asadī and 'Abdallāh b. Ḍamrah al-'Udhrī attacked him and killed him.

[647] According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Amr b. Mālik Abū Kabshah al-Qaynī,[37] who said: I was a lad who had just reached adolescence and was with one of my paternal uncles in that army. When we encamped by the army of the Kūfans, Rabī'ah b. al-Mukhāriq set us in order, and he did so with care. He put his brother's son in charge of his right wing and 'Abd Rabbih al-Sulamī in charge of his left wing. He himself went forth with the horsemen and foot soldiers and said, "People of Syria, you are fighting only runaway slaves and men who have abandoned Islam and departed from it. They have no remnant [of strength][38] and do not speak Arabic!"[39] [Continuing,] he said: By God, I supposed it to be so until we fought with them.

[Continuing,] he said: By God, as soon as the men began to fight, one of the Iraqis stood in the way of the men with his sword, saying:

I have disavowed the religion of the Muḥakkimūn;[40] in respect to religion, that is the worst religion among us.

---

37. He was an eyewitness on the Umayyad side. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 198.

38. Following MS Pet, as suggested by ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXX, and reading baqiyyah. For the idiomatic meanings of baqiyyah—"remnant of strength, firmness of spirit, excellence" or "mercy, indulgence"—see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CXXXIX. The original Leiden text has taqiyyah, which, if correct, can be understood as a synonym for taqwā, "piety, fear of God."

39. Although Ṭabarī's account of al-Mukhtār (mostly from Abū Mikhnaf) does not pass over the role of non-Arabs, it does not emphasize it as much as some other accounts. Cf. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 296: "Most of those who responded to al-Mukhtār were [Arabs] from the tribe of Hamdān and Persians who were in al-Kūfah and whom Mu'āwiyah had enrolled in the military. They were called al-Ḥamrā' ['fair-skinned']."

40. The Muḥakkimūn (from ḥakkama, "to pronounce a formula containing the word ḥukm") were the Khārijites, who abandoned 'Alī when he agreed to arbitration with Mu'āwiyah. Their slogan was lā ḥukma illā li-llāh, "Judgment [belongs] to God alone!" See Lane, Lexicon, II, 618.

There was fierce fighting between them and us for an hour of the day. By midmorning they had put us to flight. They killed our leader and took our camp. We went away in flight, until ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥamlah met us an hour's journey from the village called Banāt Talā and turned us back. We went with him until he encamped by Yazīd b. Anas. We spent the night keeping watch by turns. The next day, we prayed the daybreak prayer and went forth in good order. He put al-Zubayr b. Khuzaymah[41] from [the tribe of] Khathʿam in charge of his right wing, Ibn Uqayṣir al-Quḥāfī from Khathʿam in charge of his left wing, and advanced with the horsemen and foot soldiers. It was the Day of Sacrifice.[42] We fought fiercely with them. They badly defeated us, slew many of us, and took our camp. We made our way to ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and [648] told him what we had encountered.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. ʿĀmir [al-ʿAdawī], who said: ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥamlah al-Khathʿamī advanced toward us. He met the defeated troops of Rabīʿah b. al-Mukhāriq al-Ghanawī, turned them back, and then came and encamped at Banāt Talā. The next day, both they and we went forth early. The two troops of horsemen attacked each other from the beginning of daylight. Both they and we then withdrew until after we had prayed the noon prayer, at which time we went forth and fought, defeating them. [Continuing,] he said: ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥamlah dismounted and called out to his forces, saying, "After wheeling round, return to the fight, O people who hear and obey!" He was attacked and killed by ʿAbdallāh b. Qurād al-Khathʿamī, and we took their camp and what was in it. Three hundred prisoners were brought to Yazīd b. Anas, who was dying. He gestured with his hand that they should be beheaded, so they were killed to the last man.[43]

---

41. Following the reading of Ms. Ahmet III, adopted in ed. Cairo. The various manuscripts show so much uncertainty about the dotting of the consonants on this name, that ed. Leiden omits all dots.

42. The tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, when pilgrims sacrifice an animal at Minā in memory of Abraham's sacrifice. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥadjdj.

43. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 231 (from Hishām b. al-Kalbī): "Prisoners were brought to Yazīd b. Anas al-Asadī, who was on the verge of death. He kept saying, 'Kill! Kill!' until his tongue became heavy. Then he began to signal with his hand, until his hand became heavy. Then he began to signal with his eyebrows, until he died in that condition."

Yazīd b. Anas said, "If I perish, your commander is Warqā' b. 'Āzib al-Asadī." Yazīd died by evening, and Warqā' b. 'Āzib prayed [the funeral prayer] over him and buried him. When his companions saw that, they were bewildered, and their spirits were broken by his death. After they buried Yazīd, Warqā' said to them, "Men, what do you think best? I have been told that 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād is coming at us with eighty thousand Syrians." They therefore began to slip away and go back. Warqā' then summoned the heads of the fourths and the most skillful horsemen among his forces and said to them, "Men, what do you think about what I have told you? I am only one of you, and not the best among you in regard to counsel. Advise me. Ibn Ziyād has come at you with the great army of the Syrians— their greatest men, horsemen, and ashrāf.[44] I do not think we and you have power to deal with them [649] under these circumstances. Yazīd b. Anas, our commander, has died. Part of our forces have dispersed. If we turn back today of our own accord before we encounter them and before we reach them, so that they know that only the death of our commander turned us back, they will continue to fear us because we have killed their commander and because we can plead the death of our commander as an excuse for our withdrawal. But, if we meet them today, we run a risk. If we are defeated today, our having defeated them previously will be of no use to us." They said, "Your idea is excellent; turn back, and may God have mercy on you!" So he turned back. Their having turned back was reported to al-Mukhtār and the people of al-Kūfah. Not knowing how things had turned out, people spread alarming rumors that Yazīd b. Anas had been killed and the men defeated.

Then al-Mukhtār's governor of al-Madā'in sent al-Mukhtār one of his spies, a Nabatæan from the Sawād,[45] who gave him a report. Al-Mukhtār summoned Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar[46] and put 44. The ashrāf (plural of sharīf), literally, "eminent or distinguished men," were the tribal dignitaries.

45. "Nabatæan" refers to any of the Aramaic-speaking peasantry of the agricultural lands (sawād, meaning "the black," i.e., alluvial soil) of Iraq.

46. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar, son of the famous Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakha'ī, had become one of al-Mukhtār's most important military aides earlier in this year and played a leading role in driving Ibn al-Zubayr's governor, Ibn Muṭī', out of al-Kūfah. See Ṭabarī, II, 609–30; and EI^{2}, s.v.

him in command of seven thousand men, saying to him, "Go, and, when you meet the army of Ibn Anas, turn them around with you, and go meet your enemy and fight it out with them." Ibrāhīm went out and encamped at Ḥammām A'yan.[47]

[The Kūfan Ashrāf Rise against al-Mukhtār]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Zuhayr al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ,[48] who said: When Yazīd b. Anas died, the ashrāf in al-Kūfah met and told disturbing stories about al-Mukhtār. They said that Yazīd b. Anas had been killed, and did not believe he had died [a natural death]. They began to say, "By God, this man has made himself commander over us without our consent. He has drawn our mawālī[49] near to himself, mounted them on horses, given them stipends,[50] and assigned our fay'[51] to them. Our slaves have disobeyed us, and our orphans and widows have thus been despoiled." They settled on the house of Shabath b. Rib'ī[52] and said, "We will meet in the house of our shaykh." [Shabath was a man who

47. "A'yan's Hot Spring," near al-Kūfah, named for A'yan, the mawlā of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

48. Abū Zuhayr al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ b. Ḥabīb b. Zuhayr al-'Absī, an eyewitness of events from 61 to 77, also transmits information about earlier events through informants. He introduces one of his reports for 77/696 by saying that he was a young man in the prime of youth at the time. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 70, 80–81, 214.

49. Mawlā, pl. mawālī, "client[s], or freedmen," referred to non-Arabs, frequently of Persian origin, who, upon conversion to Islam, were put under the protection of an Arab tribe or a tribal leader as a way of incorporating them into the Arab social system. For a discussion of the social status of mawālī at this time, see Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 48–49; and *EI*², s.v.

50. Literally, "given them 'aṭā'," the stipend paid from the treasury on a regular basis to Arab soldiers registered in the dīwān (military roll). See *EI*², s.v. 'Aṭā'.

51. Fay', "permanent booty," was the tribute or tax income from which the stipends of Muslim soldiers were paid. See *EI*², s.v.

52. Shabath b. Rib'ī al-Tamīmī headed the Banū Ḥanẓalah (a powerful clan of the Tamīm) in al-Kūfah. During al-Mukhtār's uprising in 66/685, he supported Ibn al-Zubayr's governor, Ibn Muṭī', but advised Ibn Muṭī' to withdraw gracefully when al-Mukhtār's victory appeared inevitable. On his role in the events of 66, see Ṭabarī, II, 614–30, esp. 623 (an incident illustrating his prejudice against mawālī) and 630. See also Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 223, 243; and Ṭabarī, I, 1919, 3270, 3349, 3380, 3388.

had lived both in the Time of Ignorance[53] and in the time of Islam.] They gathered and came to his house. After he had led his [650] companions in prayer, they began to discuss the subject among themselves. [Continuing,] he said: Among al-Mukhtār's innovations concerning them, none was more grievous than his having appointed a share of the fay' for the mawālī.

Shabath said to them, "Leave me until I meet with him." He went and met with him and left unmentioned none of the things his companions found objectionable. Whenever he mentioned a practice, al-Mukhtār said to him, "I will satisfy them regarding this practice and do everything they like." [Continuing,] he said: Shabath mentioned the slaves (mamālīk). Al-Mukhtār said, "I will return their slaves ('abīd) to them." Shabath mentioned the mawālī to him, saying, "You have had recourse to our mawālī, who are a fay' that God has made permanent booty, together with these lands, for us all. We have freed them, and for that we hope for remuneration, reward, and thanks. But you, not satisfied with this for them, have made them our partners in our fay'." Al-Mukhtār said to them, "If I leave you your mawālī and give your fay' to you, will you fight on my side against the Umayyads and Ibn al-Zubayr and give me a promise and covenant by God to fulfill this, together with oaths that I can trust?" Shabath replied, "I do not know, until I go to my companions and talk to them about it." He left and did not return to al-Mukhtār. [Continuing,] he said: The ashrāf of al-Kūfah decided to fight al-Mukhtār.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Qudāmah b. Ḥawshab, who said: Shabath b. Rib'ī, Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan, Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays came before Ka'b b. Abī Ka'b al-Khath'amī.[54] Shabath spoke. Having praised and extolled God, he told Ka'b that they had decided to fight al-Mukhtār, and he asked him to concur with them in the matter. Berating al-Mukhtār, Shabath said, "He has made himself commander over us without our consent. He has alleged that Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah[55] sent him to us, but we have found out that Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah did not do so. He has assigned our fay' to our mawālī [651] and taken our slaves, despoiling our orphans and widows by means of them. He and his Saba'iyyah[56] have openly disavowed our righteous predecessors."[57] [Continuing,] he said: Ka'b b. Abī Ka'b welcomed them and responded favorably to their call.

53. Jāhilī, someone who has lived in the Jāhiliyyah, the "Time of Ignorance," before the coming of Islam. See EI^{2}, s.v. Djāhiliyya.

54. These men had supported Ibn al-Zubayr's governor, Ibn Muṭī', against al-Mukhtār. See Ṭabarī, II, 614, 629, 631.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—my[58] father, Yaḥyā b. Sa'id: The ashrāf of al-Kūfah came before 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf [al-Azdī] and called upon him to concur with them in fighting al-Mukhtār. He said to them, "Men, if you insist on rebelling, I will not fail you; but, if you listen to me, you will not rebel." "Why?" they asked. He said, "Because I fear you will become divided, disagree among yourselves, and abandon each other. By God, your own valiant men and skilled horsemen are on the man's side. Are not so-and-so and so-and-so with him? Your slaves and mawālī are also on his side, and they are of one mind. Your slaves and mawālī are more angry with you than your enemy. So he will fight you with the courage of the Arabs and the hostility of the Persians. But, if you leave him alone for a while, the arrival of the Syrians or the coming of the Baṣrans will spare you the trouble of dealing with him; you will have been spared dealing with him by others and will not have set your strength among yourselves." They said, "We implore you by God not to differ with us or spoil our plan and the consensus our group has reached." "I am one of you," he replied; "if you will, rebel." They went among them-

55. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah was 'Alī's son by a woman of the Banū Ḥanīfah who had been brought to Medina as a prisoner. Despite his reluctance to involve himself in politics and the fact that he was not directly descended from the Prophet, he became a focus of Shī'ī attention after al-Ḥasan's abdication and al-Ḥusayn's death at Karbalā'. See EI[1], s.v.; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 40; and Jafri, Origins, 228–29, 235–37, 239–42.

56. Saba'iyyah ("followers of ['Abdallāh b.] Saba'") is used here as an abusive epithet for Shī'ī extremists (ghulāt). 'Abdallāh b. Saba' is said to have founded "heterodox" Shī'ism by attributing supernatural character to 'Alī, refusing to recognize his death, and condemning the first two caliphs in addition to 'Uthmān. See EI[2], s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Saba'; Jafri, Origins, 300f.; cf. Ṭabarī, II, 623.

57. Aslāfinā al-ṣāliḥīn: specifically including Abū Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Uthmān. See Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1408.

58. I.e., Abū Mikhnaf's father.

selves and said, "Wait until Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar goes away from him."

[Continuing,] he said: They delayed until Ibn al-Ashtar had reached Sābāṭ[59] and then rose against al-Mukhtār. [Continuing,] he said: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays al-Hamdānī went out with [men of] Hamdān to Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ.[60] Zaḥr b. Qays al-Juʿfī and Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath went out to Jabbānat Kindah.

[652] According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—Sulaymān b. Muḥammad al-Ḥaḍramī, who said: Jubayr al-Ḥaḍramī went out to the two[61] and said to them, "Get out of our cemetery; we do not want to be involved in trouble." Isḥāq b. Muḥammad asked him, "And is it your cemetery?" "Yes," he said. So they left him.[62]

Kaʿb b. Abī Kaʿb al-Khathʿamī went out to Jabbānat Bishr,[63] and Bishr[64] b. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh went out to them with [men of the tribe of] Bajīlah. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf went out to Jabbānat Mikhnaf. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad and Zaḥr b. Qays went to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays at Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ. [The tribes of] Bajīlah and Khathʿam went to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, who was with the [tribe of] Azd. Word reached the men in Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ that al-Mukhtār had mustered horsemen to advance on them. They sent messengers, one after the other, to Azd, Bajīlah, and Khathʿam, asking them for the sake of God and kinship to hasten to them. So they went to them, and all gathered in Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ. When word reached al-Mukhtār, he was glad they had gathered in one place.

---

59. Sābāṭ, on the west bank of the Tigris at the confluence of the Nahr al-Malik, was one of the seven cities that formed al-Madāʾin. See *EI*², s.v. al-Madāʾin.

60. The jabbānāt, or tribal cemeteries of al-Kūfah, also served as places of assembly, mobilization, and taking up arms. See *EI*², s.v. al-Kūfa. The most recent attempt to map the topography of Umayyad al-Kūfah is Hichem Djaït, Al-Kūfa, naissance de la ville islamique. See especially pp. 227–41, on the battles connected with al-Mukhtār, and the map, p. 302.

61. I.e., Zaḥr b. Qays al-Juʿfī and Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, who had assembled their men in Jabbānat Kindah.

62. Ms. O: it.

63. Jabbānat Bishr, named after Bishr b. Rabīʿah, a hero of the battle of Qādisiyyah, belonged to the tribe of Khathʿam. See Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 238.

64. Reading "Bishr," instead of "Bashīr," here and at 656, 13. Cf. Ṭabarī, II, 857; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 297; and al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 664, 4 [ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXX].

Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan went out and encamped in Jabbānat Banī Salūl with [the tribe of] Qays. Shabath b. Rib'ī, Ḥassān b. Fā'id al-'Absī, and Rabī'ah b. Tharwān al-Ḍabbī encamped with [tribesmen of] Muḍar[65] in al-Kunāsah.[66] Ḥajjār b. Abjar and Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ru'aym encamped with those of Rabī'ah between al-Tammārīn[67] and al-Sabakhah.[68] 'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī encamped in Jabbānat Murād with the men who had followed him from [the tribe of] Madhḥij. The Yemenis sent to them asking that he come to them, but he refused to do so, saying to them, "Strive earnestly, and it will be as if I had come to you."

[Continuing,] he said: That very day, al-Mukhtār sent a messenger named 'Amr b. Tawbah to ride at a gallop to Ibrāhīm b. [653] al-Ashtar at Sābāṭ and say, "Do not put this letter down until you are on your way to me with every man you have." [Continuing,] he said: That day, al-Mukhtār sent to them, saying, "Tell me what you want, and I will do everything you like." They said, "We want you to depart from us. You alleged that Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah had sent you, but he did not send you." Al-Mukhtār sent word to them, saying, "Send a delegation to him on your behalf, and I will send him one on my behalf, and then wait until you have clarified the matter." With this proposal, he wanted to delay them so that Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar could reach him. He commanded his forces, and they restrained their hands. Meanwhile, the people of al-Kūfah

65. I.e., men from the tribes of Tamīm (Shabath's tribe), 'Abs (Ḥassān's tribe), and Ḍabbah (Rabī'ah's tribe), each of which belonged to a larger grouping called "Muḍar." In pre-Islamic times, Muḍar and Rabī'ah were large, powerful combinations of North Arabian tribes. Prominent Muḍar tribes included Qays 'Aylān, Hudhayl, Khuzaymah, Asad, Kinānah, Quraysh, Dabbah, and Tamīm. Prominent Rabī'ah tribes included 'Anazah, 'Abd al-Qays, and the two Wā'il tribes (Bakr and Taghlib). By Umayyad times, the terms had shifted meaning, as new political conditions caused new alliances among tribes. Muḍar meant especially the tribes of Tamīm and Qays; Rabī'ah meant especially Bakr, Taghlib, and the allied Yemeni tribes of Azd and Quḍā'ah (Kalb). See EI[1] Suppl., s.v. Rabī'a and Muḍar.

66. "The Place of the Sweepings," originally a dumping ground west of al-Kūfah, later became an unloading place for caravans from Arabia, a livestock market, a place of execution, and a poets' fair similar to al-Baṣrah's Mirbad. See Le Strange, Lands, 74–5; EI[2], s.v. al-Kūfa; and Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 230.

67. The Street or Market of Date Sellers (See Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 236).

68. Sabakhah means a salt marsh or salty ground with sparse vegetation (Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1292). The term was applied to the open space between the built-up area of al-Kūfah and the Euphrates River to the east. See Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 231.

blocked the mouths of the streets against them, so that no water was reaching al-Mukhtār and his forces, except for a paltry amount that escaped the people's notice.

[Continuing,] he said: 'Abdallāh b. Sabī' went out into the square. The [men of the tribe of] Shākir fought violently with him.[69] 'Uqbah b. Ṭāriq al-Jushamī came and fought on his side for a time until he had turned the attackers away from him. Then both of them betook themselves to their defense lines. 'Uqbah b. Ṭāriq encamped with Qays in Jabbānat Banī Salūl, and 'Abdallāh b. Sabī' encamped with the Yemenis in Jabbānat al-Sabī'.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq:[70] Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan went to the Yemenis and said to them, "If you gather in a place where we can form two wings and fight in one direction, I am your companion; otherwise, I am not. By God, I will not fight in a place like this, in narrow streets, where we shall be attacked from all sides." So he went off to the main body of his people in Jabbānat Banī Salūl.

[Continuing,] he said: When al-Mukhtār's messenger left to go
[654] to Ibn al-Ashtar, he reached him the same day in the evening. Ibn al-Ashtar announced to the men, "Return to al-Kūfah." He marched the rest of that evening and encamped when night fell. His forces ate their evening meal and rested their mounts very briefly. Then Ibn al-Ashtar called them. He marched all that night, prayed the morning prayer at Sūrā, marched that day, and prayed the afternoon prayer of the following day by Bāb al-Jisr.[71] Then he went and spent the night at the mosque, accompanied by his strongest and bravest forces. The morning of the third day after his enemies had taken the field against him, al-Mukhtār went out [to the mosque] and ascended the pulpit.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī:[72] Shabath b.

---

69. On the loyalty of the clan of Shākir (part of the tribe of Hamdān) to al-Mukhtār, see Ṭabarī, II, 619–20. Al-Mukhtār's chief of police, 'Abdallāh b. Kāmil, was from this tribe.

70. Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh al-Hamdānī al-Sabī'ī (d. 159/775 in al-Kūfah) is known as a muḥaddith who transmitted ḥadīth from his father. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 225–26.

71. The Gate of the (Pontoon) Bridge.

72. Abū Janāb Yaḥyā b. Abī Ḥayyah al-Kalbī al-Kūfī (d. 147/764 or 150) was a Rib'ī sent his son 'Abd al-Mu'min to al-Mukhtār. 'Abd al-Mu'min said to him, "We are your kinfolk and the palm of your right hand. No, by God, we will not fight you. Trust this from us." His plan was to fight al-Mukhtār, but he deceived him.

When the Yemenis assembled in Jabbānat al-Sabī', the time for prayer came, and each chief of the Yemenis disliked having his fellow take precedence over him.[73] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf said to them, "This is the beginning of disagreement. Set in front [of you] the man who is well regarded,[74] for among your kinfolk is the master of this city's Qur'ān reciters (qurrā'); let Rifā'ah b. Shaddād al-Fityānī from Bajīlah lead you in prayer."[75] They did so, and he continued to be their leader in prayer until the battle took place.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Wāzi' b. al-Sarī: Anas b. 'Amr al-Azdī went forth and entered among the Yemenis. He heard them saying, "If al-Mukhtār goes to [fight] our brothers from Muḍar, we will go to [help] them; and if he goes to [fight] us, they will go to [help] us." Having heard them say this, a certain man went swiftly, climbed up to al-Mukhtār on the pulpit,[76] and told him what they [655] had said. Al-Mukhtār said, "As for the Yemenis, if I go to [fight] Muḍar, they are indeed likely to go to [help] them. But I bear witness that if I go to [fight] the Yemenis, Muḍar will not go to [help] them." (Later, al-Mukhtār used to invite that man and honor him.) Al-Mukhtār came down from the pulpit, mustered his forces in the market (in those days the building that is now in the market did not exist), and said to Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar, "Against which of the two groups do you prefer to march?" He replied, "Against whichever of the two groups you like." Being a man of discernment, al-Mukhtār considered. He disliked the idea of muḥaddith also known to have collected materials about the Battle of Ṣiffīn and the death of al-Ḥusayn. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 223f.

---

73. Literally, "place himself before him," i.e., to lead the prayer.

74. Riḍā, a man "with whom one is pleased, well pleased, contented, or satisfied; regarded with good will, or favor; liked, or approved." Lane, Lexicon, III, 1100.

75. The presence of Rifā'ah b. Shaddād, an early supporter of al-Mukhtār (Ṭabarī, II, 599–600), among the opposition to al-Mukhtār is noteworthy. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 233, for Rifā'ah's account of how he became angered by al-Mukhtār's lies and broke with him.

76. Ms. O: and came to al-Mukhtār, who had climbed into the pulpit.

having Ibn al-Ashtar go to fight his own kin[77] and not do his utmost in fighting them. So he said, "Go to fight Muḍar in al-Kunāsah. Shabath b. Ribʿī and Muḥammad b. ʿUmayr b. ʿUṭārid are their leaders. I will go to the Yemenis." [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār is still known for his rigor and lack of mercy toward the Yemenis and others when he was victorious.

Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar went to al-Kunāsah; al-Mukhtār went to Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ. Al-Mukhtār halted at the house of ʿUmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ[78] and sent Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ al-Bajalī al-Aḥmasī and ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil al-Shākirī ahead. He said to Ibn Shumayṭ, "Stay on this street until you come out upon the people in Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ from among the houses of your kinfolk." He said to ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil, "Stay on this street until you come out at Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ from the house of the family of al-Akhnas b. Sharīq." He summoned the two of them and confided in them, saying, "[The tribe of] Shibām has sent word to me that they have come at the people from behind." The two men went forward along the two streets that al-Mukhtār had commanded them to take.

When the Yemenis learned that these two men were advancing [656] on them, they divided the two streets among themselves: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays al-Hamdānī, Isḥāq b. al-Ashʿath, and Zaḥr b. Qays stood in the street behind the Mosque of Aḥmas; ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, Bishr b. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh, and Kaʿb b. Abī Kaʿb stood in the street beside the Euphrates. Then the two sides fought as fiercely as men have ever fought. The forces of Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ as well as those of ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil were routed. Al-Mukhtār was surprised when the defeated men came back to him. He asked, "What has happened to you?" They said, "We have been defeated." He asked, "What has happened to Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ?" They said, "When we left him, he had dis-

77. Ibn al-Ashtar's clan, Nakhaʿ, a division of the tribe of Madhḥij, belonged to the Yemeni group (Lisān, s.v.; Wüstenfeld, Genealogische Tabellen, 8).

78. ʿUmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, the son of the military leader who had founded al-Kūfah, was particularly hated by the Shīʿah because he had commanded the Umayyad army that the Umayyad governor of al-Kūfah, ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād, had sent to prevent al-Ḥusayn from reaching al-Kūfah.

mounted [to fight] by the Mosque of al-Quṣṣāṣ."[79] [They meant the Mosque of Abū Dāwūd in [the tribal district of] Wādiʿah. The people of that time frequented this mosque to tell stories.] "Some of his companions had dismounted with him." The companions of ʿAbdallāh [b. Kāmil] said, "We do not know what happened to Ibn Kāmil." Al-Mukhtār shouted to them, "Turn back!" He went with them until he reached the house of Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Jadalī. He sent out ʿAbdallāh b. Qurād al-Khathʿamī, who was at the head of four hundred men, companions of his, saying, "Take your forces to Ibn Kāmil. If he has perished, you are in his place; fight the enemy with your forces and his. If you find him alive and well, take a hundred of your companions, all of them skilled horsemen, and give him the rest of your forces. Order them to exert themselves on his behalf and serve him loyally, for they will thereby be serving me loyally; and whoever serves me loyally, let him rejoice! Then advance with the hundred men until you come upon the people in Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ from the direction of the Bath of Qaṭan b. ʿAbdallāh."

ʿAbdallāh b. Qurād al-Khathʿamī went forth. He found Ibn Kāmil standing by the Bath of ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth. With him were some of his forces who had held firm; he was fighting the enemy. ʿAbdallāh b. Qurād gave him three hundred of his companions [657] and continued on toward Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ. Then he turned into those streets, until he reached the Mosque of ʿAbd al-Qays, where he halted. He asked his companions, "What do you think?" They replied, "We will follow what you say." [All who were gathered with him were from his kinfolk; they were a hundred.] He said to them, "By God, I want al-Mukhtār to be victorious. Yet, by God, I do not want the ashrāf of my people to perish today. By God, I would rather die than that death descend on them by my hands. But stop for a moment; I have heard people say that Shibām will come at them from behind. Perhaps Shibām will do it, and we shall be spared having to do it." His companions said, "As you think best." So he stayed by the Mosque of ʿAbd al-Qays.

79. As the parenthetical remark explains, the word quṣṣās (pl. of qāṣṣ) means "storytellers."

Al-Mukhtār sent out Mālik b. ʿAmr al-Nahdī with two hundred men (he was a man of the greatest prowess) and sent out ʿAbdallāh b. Sharīk al-Nahdī with two hundred skilled horsemen to Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ. The latter had remained in the same place. When they reached him, the enemy had gained the upper hand and were overwhelming him, so they fought as hard as they could. Ibn al-Ashtar went and encountered Shabath b. Ribʿī, who had many men from Muḍar with him, among them Ḥassān b. Fāʾid al-ʿAbsī. Ibrāhīm [b. al-Ashtar] said to them, "Woe unto you! Go back, for I do not want anyone from Muḍar to be killed by my hands. Do not bring ruin upon yourselves." However, they refused and fought with him. Ibn al-Ashtar defeated them. Ḥassān b. Fāʾid was carried away to his family and died when he was brought into their presence. On his deathbed, he regained consciousness briefly and said, "By God, I do not want to recover from this wound of mine. I do not want my death to be from anything but the thrust of a javelin or the blow of a sword." He spoke not a word afterward until he died.

[658] The good news reached al-Mukhtār from Ibrāhīm concerning the defeat of Muḍar. Al-Mukhtār sent the news on to Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ and Ibn Kāmil. The men were in the same state in which they had been, with the people of each street defending what was beside it.

[Continuing,] he said: The men of Shibām assembled. They had made Abū al-Qalūṣ their leader and had agreed and decided to come at the Yemenis from behind. But then they said to each other, "By God, it would be better if you directed your efforts against opponents who are not from your own tribal group.[80] March upon Muḍar or Rabīʿah, and fight them." Their shaykh, Abū al-Qalūṣ, fell silent and did not speak. They said, "Abū al-Qalūṣ, what do you think best?" He said, "God, may His praise be exalted, has said, 'O believers, fight the unbelievers who are near to you, and let them find in you a harshness.'[81] Arise!" They rose up; he led them two or three spear lengths,[82] and then said to them, "Sit down." They sat down. He led them a little farther and made them sit down. Then he said to them, "Get up!" The third time, he led them a little farther and then made them sit down. "Abū al-Qalūṣ," they said to him, "by God, we consider you the bravest of the Arabs. What is causing you to do what you are doing?" He replied, "An experienced man is not like one who is untried. I wanted your hearts to return to you, and that you should prepare your minds for fighting; I did not want to rush you into battle while you were in a state of bewilderment." They said, "You are most clearsighted in what you have done."

80. Shibām was a subdivision (ḥayy) of Hamdān, a Yemeni tribe.
81. Qurʾān 9:123.
82. A spear length (rumḥ) was about five cubits (Lane, Lexicon, III, 1153).

As the men of Shibām came out toward Jabbānat al-Sabī', al-A'sar al-Shākirī met them at the mouth of the street. Al-Jundu'ī and Abū al-Zubayr b. Kurayb attacked him, threw him down, and [659] entered the Jabbānah. The men entered the Jabbānah after them, shouting, "Vengeance for al-Ḥusayn!" Ibn Shumayṭ's forces answered them with "Vengeance for al-Ḥusayn!" When Yazīd b. 'Umayr b. Dhī Murrān from Hamdān heard this, he said, "Vengeance for 'Uthmān!"[83] Rifā'ah b. Shaddād said to them, "What have we to do with 'Uthmān? I will not fight alongside men who seek vengeance for the blood of 'Uthmān." Some of his kinfolk said to him, "You brought us, and we obeyed you. And now that we have seen our people being slain by the sword, you tell us, 'Go back and leave them!'" So he attacked [the enemy], saying:

I am Ibn Shaddād; I follow the religion of 'Alī.
No friend am I to 'Uthmān, the son of Arwā.[84]
Today, I will take the heat amidst those who are tested in war's hottest flame, without flagging.

He fought until he was killed.

Yazīd b. 'Umayr b. Dhī Murrān was also killed, as were al-

83. "Vengeance for 'Uthmān!" was the rallying cry of the Umayyads, who demanded that 'Alī punish the murderers of their kinsman, the third caliph, and who withheld their allegiance when he did not do so. Both Yazīd b. 'Umayr and Rifā'ah b. Shaddād are inside Jabbānat al-Sabī'; the episode illustrates the disunity of the defenders.

84. Arwā, the mother of 'Uthmān, is mentioned because through her 'Uthmān was distantly related through the female line to the Prophet. Arwā's mother was Umm Ḥakīm, daughter of 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib, Muḥammad's grandfather. The line contrasts 'Alī, whose relation to the Prophet (first cousin and son-in-law) was very close, and 'Uthmān, whose relation was remote. See Ṭabarī, I, 3055.

Nu'mān b. Ṣuhbān al-Jarmī al-Rāsibī, who was an ascetic,[85] and Rifā'ah b. Shaddād b. 'Awsajah al-Fityānī at the Bath of al-Mahbadhān at al-Sabakhah. He, too, was an ascetic. Al-Furāt b. Zaḥr b. Qays al-Ju'fī was killed, and Zaḥr b. Qays was carried away wounded. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays was killed, as was 'Umar b. Mikhnaf. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf fought until he was carried away wounded; the men carried him away unconscious, while men of Azd were fighting around him. Ḥumayd b. Muslim[86] said:

In defense of Abū Ḥakīm,[87] I will strike the heads of slaves and nobles.

[660] And Surāqah b. Mirdās al-Bāriqī[88] said:

O my soul, if you are not steadfast, you will commit a blameworthy action;
do not turn away from Abū Ḥakīm.

Five hundred prisoners were taken from the houses of the [tribe of] Wādi'ah.[89] They were brought to al-Mukhtār with their hands bound behind their backs. A man from the Banū Nahd, one of al-Mukhtār's chief companions, 'Abdallāh b. Sharīk by name, whenever he encountered an Arab, would set him free. This was reported to al-Mukhtār by Dirham, a mawlā of the Banū Nahd. Al-Mukhtār said to him, "Bring the prisoners before me; watch for any of them who was present at the murder of al-Ḥusayn, and let me know about him." So whenever a man who had been present at the murder of al-Ḥusayn was led before him, he was

85. Al-Nu'mān b. Ṣuhbān was "a Shī'ī ascetic (nāsik) who had come from al-Baṣrah to fight on the side of the Shī'ah and avenge the death of al-Ḥusayn. When he heard al-Mukhtār say things he found objectionable, he fought against him with the people in Jabbānat al-Sabī' and was killed" (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 233).

86. Ḥumayd b. Muslim was a major source for Abū Mikhnaf's account of the fight against al-Ḥusayn, in which he was a participant, to his later regret. He was a friend of Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar (Ṭabarī, II, 613), and later composed an elegy for 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf (Ṭabarī, II, 878). See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 218.

87. The kunyah (agnomen) of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf.

88. The poet Surāqah b. Mirdās al-Bāriqī, later a supporter of al-Farazdaq in his rivalry with Jarīr, appears here fighting beside the Azdī leader 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf. The poet's family, the Banū Bāriq, were a clan of the Azd. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 327–8; Hahn, Surâqa b. Mirdâs.

89. Wādi'ah was a group associated with Hamdān. See Lisān, s.v.

told, "This is one of those who were present at his murder," and he had him brought forward and beheaded. Before he left the place, he killed two hundred and forty-eight men.

Whenever al-Mukhtār's companions saw a man who had annoyed them, quarreled with them, or harmed them, they took him aside and killed him. Many of these men were killed without al-Mukhtār's knowledge. When al-Mukhtār was informed of this afterward, he summoned the remaining prisoners and freed them, making them swear not to aid any enemy against him or seek to do him or his companions mischief. Surāqah b. Mirdās al-Bāriqī was an exception; [al-Mukhtār] ordered him to be led with him to the mosque. [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār's crier proclaimed, "Anyone who closes his door will be safe, except for any man who participated in shedding the blood of the family of Muḥammad."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mujālid b. Sa'īd[90]—'Āmir al-Sha'bī:[91] Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Yazīd b. Ru'aym and Ḥajjār b. Abjar[92] sent out messengers, saying to them, "Be close to the Yemenis. If you see that they have gained the upper hand, let the first of you who reaches us say 'ṣarafān.' If they have been defeated, let him say 'jumzān.'" When the Yemenis were defeated, their messengers came to them, and the first who reached them said "jumzān." So the two men arose and said to their people, "Go back to your houses." So they went back. [661]

'Amr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zubaydī, who was one of those who had been present at the murder of al-Ḥusayn, left [his house], mounted his camel, and rode away, taking the road to Sharāf and Wāqiṣah.[93]

---

90. Mujālid b. Sa'īd b. 'Umayr al-Hamdānī Abū 'Amr Abū Sa'īd al-Kūfī (d. 144/762) transmitted ḥadīth from al-Sha'bī, was a rāwiyah (prolific transmitter) of akhbār (historical reports), and was credited with the composition of a biography of the Prophet. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 210–11.

91. Abū 'Amr 'Āmir b. Sharaḥīl al-Sha'bī (b. 19/640, d. 103/721) was a Kūfan-born jurist, collector of poetry, and transmitter of ḥadīth, in addition to his interest in history. He served as a special ambassador to the Byzantines for 'Abd al-Malik, and as qāḍī under 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. Later historians considered him very trustworthy and often used him as a source. See EI[1], s.v. al-Sha'bī; F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 277; and U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 136–37.

92. See above, Ṭabarī, II, 652. They were encamped with members of the Rabī'ah tribes "between al-Tammārīn and al-Sabakhah."

93. Sharāf and Wāqiṣah are two watering places about 110 miles south of al-Kūfah on the road to Najd. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Sharāf.

He was never seen again, and no one knows whether the earth swallowed him up or the sky rained stones on him.[94]

When Furāt b. Zaḥr b. Qays was killed, ʿĀ'ishah bint Khalīfah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Juʿfiyyah, who had been the wife of al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī, sent and asked al-Mukhtār to allow her to bury his body. He did so, and she buried it.

Al-Mukhtār sent a lad (ghulām)[95] of his named Zirbī to pursue Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—Muslim b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḍabābī, who said: Al-Mukhtār's lad Zirbī followed us and overtook us. We had left al-Kūfah on lean[96] horses of ours. He approached us, riding at a fast gait. When he came near us, Shamir said to us, "Run, and get away from me. Perhaps the slave wants [to take] me." [Continuing,] he said: We ran and distanced ourselves. The slave wanted to take Shamir, but Shamir wheeled round to draw him away. When the slave had been separated from his companions, Shamir attacked him and broke his back. When word of this was brought to al-Mukhtār, he said, "Alas for Zirbī! Had he asked my advice, I would not have commanded him to go out after Abū al-Sābighah."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Muḥammad[97] al-Hamdānī—Muslim b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḍabābī, who said: When Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan keft [al-Kūfah], I was with him. (This was at the time
[662] when al-Mukhtār defeated us, killed the Yemenis at Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ, and sent his lad Zirbī to seek Shamir, with the result

94. Cf. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 310: "ʿAmr b. al-Ḥajjāj [printed text reads Ḥajjāḥ], one of the chief murderers of al-Ḥusayn, fled for al-Baṣrah. However, he was afraid the people would gloat over his misfortune; so he turned toward Sarāf. The people of the watering place told him to leave, since they did not feel safe from al-Mukhtār. After he rode away, they chided each other, saying, 'We have behaved badly.' A group of them rode in search of him, to bring him back; but when he saw them from afar, he thought they were al-Mukhtār's men and turned onto the sand at a place called al-Buyayḍah, between the villages of Kalb and those of Ṭayyiʾ. It was the heat of summer. He fell asleep there at midday, and he and his companions died of thirst." Cf. also Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 240.

95. Ghulām means "a young lad"; that Zirbī was in fact a slave is shown by the use of the word ʿabd ("slave") to refer to him in the next paragraph.

96. Ḍāmir, "lean and lank in the belly," was applied to a horse that was fattened and then put on short rations so that it lost weight and became faster for purposes of racing. See Lane, Lexicon, V, 1804.

97. Perhaps the kunyah of Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 109, 189.

that Shamir killed the lad.] Shamir went on until he reached Sātīdamā.[98] Then he went and encamped next to a village called "al-Kalbāniyyah,"[99] on a riverbank beside a hill. He sent to the village, took a native peasant, beat him, and said, "Hurry with this letter of mine to al-Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr."[100] He wrote the address of the letter, "To the Commander, al-Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr, from Shamir b. Dhī al-Jawshan." [Continuing,] he said: The native went until he entered a village in which there were some houses. Abū 'Amrah[101] was there, having been sent to that village in those days by al-Mukhtār to be an armed guard [over the road] between him and the people of al-Baṣrah.[102] That native met a native of that village and started complaining to him of what he had suffered at the hands of Shamir. While they were talking, one of Abū 'Amrah's men passed and saw the letter in the possession of the native, with its address, "To Muṣ'ab, from Shamir." They asked the native where he was, and he told them. It turned out that only three farsakhs[103] lay between them and him. [Continuing,] he said: So they set out toward him.

---

98. The location is unknown. Ms. O omits the phrase; Mss. Pet and Co leave the word undotted. Ed. Leiden reads "Sātīdamā" on the basis of Yāqūt, Mu'jam, which mentions that the word occurs in poetry and lists several possible identifications, none likely in this context. Le Strange, Lands, 111, places the Sātīdamā River near Mayyāfāriqīn. The context indicates that Shamir is apprehended somewhere between al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 308, reads, "He encamped near al-Baṣrah, in a place called Sādamāh."

99. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, gives al-Kaltāniyyah, a village between al-Sūs (in Khūzistān) and al-Ṣaymarah (near al-Baṣrah), as the place where Shamir was killed. The mss. of Ṭabarī read "al-Kalbāniyyah," which ed. Leiden originally emended to agree with Yāqūt. However, ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXX, restores "al-Kalbāniyyah." De Goeje's reasons can be found in his edition of Ibn Rustah, Kitāb al-a'lāq al-nafīsah, 188d. Morony, Iraq, 198, refers to a place of this name in western Khūzistān.

100. Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr was governor of al-Baṣrah for his brother, the anti-Umayyad caliph 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. See EI[1], s.v.; Ṭabarī, II, 602, 665.

101. Kaysān Abū 'Amrah, a mawlā of 'Uraynah, was in charge of al-Mukhtār's personal guard (ḥaras). See EI[2], s.v. Kaysān; Ṭabarī, II, 634. On the use of Kaysāniyyah ("followers of Kaysān") to designate the followers of al-Mukhtār, see EI[2], s.v. Kaysāniyya.

102. Al-Baṣrah was a Muslim Arab garrison city (miṣr) and provincial capital near the Tigris-Euphrates estuary in lower Iraq, just south of the modern city. See Le Strange, Lands, 44–46; EI[2], s.v.

103. A farsakh, from Persian farsang, was originally the distance that could be covered on foot in an hour's march. In Islamic times, it was standardized at three Arab miles, each of 1000 bā' (fathoms), each of four canonical ells of 49.875 cm.; or 5.985 km/3.717 miles. See EI[2], s.v.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muslim b. ʿAbdallāh, who said: By God, I was with Shamir that night. We said to him, "If only you would take us away from this place, for we are apprehensive in it." He replied, "And all this from fear of the great liar? By God, I will not move from here for three days. God has filled your hearts with panic." [Continuing,] he said: There were many locusts [663] in the place where we were. By God, I was between waking and sleeping when I heard the sound of horses' hooves. I said to myself that it was the sound of the locusts. Then I heard it louder, so I roused myself and rubbed my eyes. "No, by God," I said, "it is not locusts." [Continuing,] he said: I went to get up, and suddenly I saw them looking down at us from the hill. With a shout of "Allāhu akbar [God is most great]!" they surrounded our tents. We went out, running on foot, and left our horses. [Continuing,] he said: I passed Shamir. He had wrapped the lower part of his body in a cloak with a colored pattern. He was suffering from leprosy, and I can still see the white of his flanks above the cloak. He was thrusting at them with a lance, for they had rushed him before he could put on his sword and his clothes. We went on and left him. [Continuing,] he said: I had been running only a short time when I heard, "Allāhu akbar! God has slain the villain."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mishraqī[104]—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUbayd Abū al-Kanūd,[105] who said: By God, I was the man who got the letter. I saw it with the native and took it to Abū ʿAmrah, and I killed Shamir. [Al-Mishraqī] said: I asked [Abū al-Kanūd], "Did you hear him say anything that night?" "Yes," he replied, "he came out toward us and tried to thrust at us with his lance for a time. Then he threw down his lance, went into his tent, got his sword, and came out at us, saying:

You have aroused a bold lion from his covert, a grim-faced one who breaks the back [of his prey].
Never has he been seen to shrink from a foe, but rather fighting or killing,
Striking them with force and quenching the spear's thirst."

---

104. Al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. ʿAbdallāh al-Mishraqī, see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 200–1.

105. Abū al-Kanūd ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUbayd al-Azdī al-Kūfī (born in pre-Islamic times, d. after 70/689) transmitted traditions from ʿAlī. In 50, he was Ziyād b. Abīhi's agent (ʿāmil) at al-Kūfah, according to Ṭabarī, II, 101. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, XII, 213 (who gives a different ism); and U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 218.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq: When al-Mukhtār left Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ and went to the palace, Surāqah b. Mirdās began to call to him at the top of his voice:[106] [664]

Be gracious to me today, O best of Maʿadd;[107]
O best of those who dwell at Shiḥr and al-Janad;[108]
O best of those who greet with the Muslim greeting, perform the pilgrimage, and bow in worship.[109]

Al-Mukhtār had him sent to prison and held for a night. The next morning, he sent and had him taken out. He summoned Surāqah. As the latter approached al-Mukhtār, he recited:

Tell Abū Isḥāq[110] that we leapt a leap[111] that was to our harm.
We revolted, thinking the poor[112] were nothing;
but our revolt was insolence and death.
We thought them[113] few in their ranks;
but when we met they were like locusts.
We took the field when we saw them; and when we saw that the people had come out toward us,
We suffered at their hands strong blows and well-aimed thrusts, so that we turned back.
You were aided against your enemy every day by squadrons each of which was mourning al-Ḥusayn;
Even as Muḥammad was aided on the day of Badr

106. The Dīwān of Surāqah preserves a fuller version of the poet's encounter with al-Mukhtār. See Hahn, Surâqa b. Mirdâs, 19–29, 31–33; and Jumaḥī, Tabaqāt al-shuʿarā', 105.

107. Maʿadd, the son of ʿAdnān, and father of Nizār, was an ancestor of the northern Arabian tribes, to which al-Mukhtār's tribe of Thaqīf belonged.

108. Shiḥr, on the south coast of the Arabian peninsula, and al-Janad, in the highlands, are two places in Yemen. Al-Mukhtār is being praised as the best of the northern and southern Arabs.

109. I.e., best of all Muslims. Use of the greeting al-salāmu ʿalaykum (cf. Qurʾān 6:54, and 7:46) was a mark of the Muslim and was believed to mirror the greeting of those in Paradise. "Perform the pilgrimage": the Arabic means, literally, "say the formula beginning labbayka," which is used by pilgrims to Mecca.

110. I.e., al-Mukhtār, whose kunyah was Abū Isḥāq.

111. I.e., made an attack, revolted. The verb nazā also suggests rashness, succumbing to base instincts, or greed.

112. Al-Mukhtār invoked defense of the poor (ḍuʿafā') along with vengeance for al-Ḥusayn as reasons for his revolt. Cf. Ṭabarī, II, 606–7, 609–10.

113. Dīwān: You would think them.

and on the day of the gorge when he reached Ḥunayn.[114]
Having obtained your object, grant pardon; had we obtained our object,
We would have acted unjustly in governing and transgressed.
Accept my repentance; as for me,
I will be thankful if you make the cash a debt.[115]

When he reached al-Mukhtār, he said to him, "May God preserve you, commander! Surāqah b. Mirdās swears by God, other than Whom there is no god,[116] that he saw the angels fighting on piebald horses between heaven and earth."[117] Al-Mukhtār said to him, "Go up into the pulpit and let the Muslims know about it." So he went up and told them of it; then he came down. Al-Mukhtār took him aside and said, "I know indeed that you did [665] not see the angels. But I know what you wanted: that I should not kill you. Go away from me, wherever you wish, and don't corrupt my companions for me."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥajjāj b. ʿAlī al-Bāriqī[118]—Surāqah b. Mirdās, who said: "In no oath I ever swore did I lie more vigorously or outrageously than in this oath of mine, when I swore to them that I had seen the angels fighting on their side."

They set Surāqah b. Mirdās free, and he fled and joined ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf in the entourage of al-Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr in al-Baṣrah. The ashrāf of al-Kūfah and leading men left and joined Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr in al-Baṣrah. As Surāqah b. Mirdās was leaving al-Kūfah, he recited:

114. The Qur'ān says that God gave the Prophet supernatural assistance at the Battle of Badr, in A.H. 2, at which the infant Muslim community defeated a much larger Meccan force, and the Battle of Ḥunayn, in A.H. 8, at which a coalition of tribes was turned back near al-Ṭā'if. See Qur'ān 8:9, 17 (Badr) and 9:25–27 (Ḥunayn). The Sīrah literature elaborates upon these incidents. See *EI*², s.vv. Badr and Ḥunayn.

115. The sense is, "I will be thankful if you make my obligation, which ought to be paid immediately in cash, payable as a debt in the future." The Dīwān adds another line: "Thus you will find Surāqah; so be kind to him, for he will make your foes ever more contemptible."

116. Qur'ān 59:22.

117. In Ibn Hishām's biography of the Prophet, enemy spies before the Battle of Ḥunayn come back terrified at having seen "white men on piebald horses." See Ibn Hishām, Sīrah, IV, 891.

118. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 204.

Tell Abū Isḥāq that I saw that the piebald horses were black and of one color!
I deny your revelation, and I have bound myself by vow to fight you to the death.
I make my eyes see what they did not perceive;
both of us are experts in lies!
When they speak, I say to them, "You have lied."
And when they come out, I gird on my weapon for them.[119]

According to Abū al-Sā'ib Salm b. Junādah—Muḥammad b. Barrād (one of the descendants of Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī)—a shaykh, who said: When Surāqah al-Bāriqī was taken prisoner, he said, "Was it you who took me prisoner? No, I was taken prisoner by men wearing white garments and riding piebald horses." [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār said, "Those were the angels!" And he released him. Then Surāqah recited:

Tell Abū Isḥāq that I saw that the piebald horses were black and of one color!
I make my eyes see what they did not see;
both of us are experts in lies!

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Umayr b. Ziyād: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī said on the day of the Battle of Jabbānat al-Sabī', "Alas for you! Who are these who have come [666] at us from behind?" When he was told that they were men from Shibām, he said, "O the wonder of it! One who has no kindred fights me by means of my kindred!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Rawq:[120] Shuraḥbīl b. Dhī Buqlān, a member of the Nā'iṭ,[121] was killed that day. He was one of the nobility[122] of [the tribe of] Hamdān. That day, before he was killed, he said, "What a way of killing! How misguided

119. The Dīwān adds: "When al-Mukhtār learned of his having gone to al-Baṣrah and of these verses of his, he tore down Surāqah's house. Muṣ'ab rebuilt it after al-Mukhtār was killed."

120. Full name: 'Aṭiyyah b. al-Ḥārith Abū Rawq al-Hamdānī. He is known as a traditionist and Qur'ānic commentator, in addition to his activity as a historian. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 199.

121. Nā'iṭ was a clan (baṭn) of the tribe of Hamdān.

122. Arabic, buyūtāt, "the [noble] houses."

those who were slain! A fight without a leader! A fight without a purpose! A hastening of the separation from loved ones! Even if we kill them, we shall not be safe from them. 'Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return.'[123] By God, I went out only to share the lot of my people, fearing that they would be oppressed. I swear by God that I have not escaped from that, neither have they been saved. I have been of no avail to them, neither have they availed anything." [Continuing,] he said: A man named Aḥmar b. Hadīj, from the Fā'ish [clan] of Hamdān, shot him with an arrow and killed him.

[Continuing,] he said: Three men fought with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī: Si'r b. Abī Si'r al-Ḥanafī, Abū al-Zubayr al-Shibāmī, and another man. Si'r said, "I hit him with a thrust [of the lance]." Abū al-Zubayr said, "But I struck him ten blows [with the sword], or more, and his son said to me, 'Abū al-Zubayr, will you kill 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd, the lord (sayyid) of your people?' I said to him, 'Thou shalt not find any people who believe in God and the Last Day who are loving to anyone who opposes God and His Messenger, not though they were their fathers, or their sons, or their brothers, or their clan.'"[124] Al-Mukhtār said, "You all did well." The battle left seven hundred and eighty of his people slain.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: At that time, there was great slaughter among the Yemenis. Of the people of [667] Muḍar in al-Kunāsah a dozen or so were struck down. They then went and passed by the men of Rabī'ah, whereupon Ḥajjār b. Abjar, Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ru'aym, Shaddād b. al-Mundhir (the brother of Ḥuḍayn[125]) and 'Ikrimah b. Rib'ī retreated, all of them returning to their homes. 'Ikrimah attacked the enemy and fought violently with them, but retreated from them wounded. He came to his house and entered it. Then he was told that horsemen had passed by the quarter of the tribe. He went out of the house and tried to jump from the wall of his house to another house beside it, but was unable to do so until a [slave] lad of his lifted him up.

123. Qur'ān 2:156.
124. Qur'ān 58:22.
125. Corrected by ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXX, from "Ḥusayn."

The battle of Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ took place on Wednesday, six days before the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, 66.[126]

[Al-Mukhtār Acts against the Murderers of al-Ḥusayn]

[Continuing,] he said: The ashrāf left and reached al-Baṣrah.[127] Al-Mukhtār turned his attention to the murderers of al-Ḥusayn. He said, "It is no part of our religion to leave people who murdered al-Ḥusayn walking alive in this world and safe. What a bad avenger[128] of the family of Muḥammad I should then be in this world! I should then be the liar they have called me. I take God as my helper against them. Praise be to God, Who has made me a sword whereby He has smitten them, a lance whereby He has thrust at them, the avenger of the family of Muḥammad, and the upholder of their right! Verily, God's right it is to slay those who slew them and humble those who ignored their right. Name them to me, and follow them until you annihilate them."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. ʿĀmir: Al-Mukhtār said to them, "Seek me out the murderers of al-Ḥusayn; food and drink will have no savor for me until I purify the earth and cleanse the city of them."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mālik b. Aʿyan al-Juhanī:[129] ʿAbdallāh b. Dabbās (he was the man who killed Muḥammad b. ʿAmmār b. Yāsir, of whom the poet said:

Slain by Ibn Dabbās; he hit the back of his head) [668] was the man who guided al-Mukhtār to some of the men who had murdered al-Ḥusayn, among them ʿAbdallāh b. Usayd b. al-Nazzāl al-Juhanī from [the clan] of Ḥuraqah, Mālik b. al-Nusayr al-Baddī, 126. Literally, "six nights remaining," i.e., 23 Dhū al-Ḥijjah 66 A.H. (July 21, 686), which, however, fell on Saturday, not Wednesday.

127. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 237: "After the men had been defeated at the Battle of Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ, the Kūfan ashrāf left and joined Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr, who had come to al-Baṣrah as governor of the two provinces of Iraq."

128. Nāṣir, literally, "helper," but for this meaning see Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2802, s.v. naṣara.

129. Perhaps to be identified with the Abū Manṣūr al-Juhanī who passed on a collection of ʿAlī's sermons collected by Zayd b. Wahb al-Juhanī. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 209.

and Ḥamal b. Mālik al-Muḥāribī. Al-Mukhtār sent one of his chief companions, Abū Nimrān[130] Mālik b. ʿAmr al-Nahdī, after them. He came upon them while they were in al-Qādisiyyah,[131] took them, and brought them back to al-Mukhtār in the evening.

Al-Mukhtār said to them, "Enemies of God, enemies of His Book, enemies of His Messenger and the family of His Messenger! Where is al-Ḥusayn, the son of ʿAlī? Deliver al-Ḥusayn to me. You killed him whom you were commanded to bless during prayer." They replied, "May God have mercy on you. We were sent unwillingly. Be gracious to us and spare us." Al-Mukhtār said, "Why were you not gracious to al-Ḥusayn, the son of your prophet's daughter? Why did you not spare him and give him drink?" Then al-Mukhtār said to al-Baddī, "You took his hood?"[132] ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil said to him, "Yes, he is the very man." Al-Mukhtār said, "Cut off his hands and feet, and leave him. Let him thrash about until he dies." This was done to him. He was left and continued bleeding until he died.[133] [Al-Mukhtār] gave orders for the other two. They were brought forward. ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil killed ʿAbdallāh al-Juhanī, and Siʿr b. Abī Siʿr killed Ḥamal b. Mālik al-Muḥāribī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt al-Taymī—Abū Saʿīd al-Ṣayqal: Al-Mukhtār was guided to some of the murderers of al-Ḥusayn by Siʿr al-Ḥanafī. [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār sent ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil. We went out with him. He passed through the Banū Ḍubayʿah[134] and took from them a man named Ziyād b. Mālik [Continuing,] he said: Then he went to [the clan of] [669] ʿAnazah[135] and took from them a man named ʿImrān b. Khālid. [Continuing,] he said: Then he sent me, together with some of his

130. Ed. Leiden, Addenda, pp. DCLXIX–DCLXX, emends ms. "Abū Nimr" to "Abū Nimrān" on the basis of Ṭabarī, II, 727.

131. Al-Qādisiyyah, 19 miles southwest of al-Kūfah, was a large hamlet at the first stage on the road to Mecca. In 14/635, the Muslims had won their first great victory over the Persians near it. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳādisiyya; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.; and Le Strange, Lands, 76.

132. Burnus, which at first meant a long, pointed hat or hood, later was applied to any cloak with a hood attached. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 196.

133. Cf. the equally graphic account in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 239, where Mālik is gradually dismembered, with each limb being thrown into a fire.

134. A clan of the tribe of Bakr b. Wāʾil, or from the Rabīʿah group. See Lisān, s.v.

135. A tribe from the Rabīʿah group. See Lisān, s.v.

men who were called "the investigators,"[136] to a house in the Persian section.[137] ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Khushkārah al-Bajalī and ʿAbdallāh b. Qays al-Khawlānī were in it. We brought them back to [al-Mukhtār]. He said to them, "Murderers of the righteous! Murderers of the lord of the youth of Paradise! Do you not see that God has retaliated against you today? The wars[138] came to you on an unlucky day." (They had taken some wars that had been in al-Ḥusayn's possession.) "Take them out to the market and behead them." This was done to them. They were four men.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid[139]—Ḥumayd b. Muslim, who said: Al-Sāʾib b. Mālik al-Ashʿarī[140] came with al-Mukhtār's horsemen to take us. I went our toward [the tribe of] ʿAbd al-Qays, and ʿAbdallāh and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, the two sons of Ṣalkhab,[141] went out following me. The arrest of the two diverted al-Mukhtār's men from me, so I escaped. Taking the two men, they passed by the house of a man named ʿAbdallāh b. Wahb b. ʿAmr, a cousin of Aʿshā Hamdān,[142] from the Banū

---

136. Dabbābah, from the verb "to creep," could mean either (as collective pl. of dabbāb) "those much given to creeping about," or (as a nomen instrumenti) "a machine for creeping." In the latter sense, it was applied to a siege engine (Latin testudo) used to protect men advancing to breach the walls of a city. Either sense could be extended to give the meaning suggested by the Leiden edition glossary.

137. Literally, "in [the section of] al-Ḥamrāʾ. The Ḥamrāʾ ("fair or light-complexioned people") were originally a group of Persian soldiers who went over to the Arab side at the Battle of Qādisiyyah. Later, some of them were settled at al-Kūfah with the Muslim army. They included some 4,000 Daylamīs, who became allies of the Banū Tamīm and had their own chief (naqīb) and mosque. See Morony, Iraq, 197–98.

138. Wars is a bright yellow dye derived from a plant grown in Yemen. Mixed with oil, it makes an ointment still used in parts of the Arabian peninsula to protect against sunburn. The Arabic rhymes and has a proverbial ring to it: jāʾakumu-l-wars bi-yawmi naḥs.

139. He mediated reports on the deaths of ʿAlī and al-Ḥusayn and on the campaign of Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 217.

140. One of al-Mukhtār's early supporters and chief companions, al-Sāʾib b. Mālik had spoken out in opposition to Ibn al-Zubayr's governor of al-Kūfah before al-Mukhtār's seizure of the city and had been present when al-Mukhtār approached Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar seeking his support. See Ṭabarī, II, 601, 603, 612.

141. Variant in P, "Ṣalḥab"; Ibn Athīr has "Ṣalḥat."

142. Aʿshā Hamdān (ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh Abū al-Muṣabbiḥ), of the Jusham clan of the South Arabian tribe of Hamdān, was a major poet. He was consistently hostile to the Umayyads and was to meet his death in 83/702 for his part in Ibn al-Ashʿath's rebellion against al-Ḥajjāj. See *EI*², s.v.; F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 345–46.

ʿAbd, and took him. They brought these men to al-Mukhtār; he gave orders concerning them, and they were killed in the market. They were three men.

When he escaped from al-Mukhtār's men, Ḥumayd b. Muslim said:

Have you not seen me in dismay?
I escaped, but almost did not escape.
The hope for God saved me;
I hope for nothing but Him.

[670] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. ʿĀmir al-ʿAdawī from [the tribe of] Juhaynah (Shahm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Juhanī also knew this report), who said: Al-Mukhtār sent ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil to [take] ʿUthmān b. Khālid b. Usayr al-Duhmānī from Juhaynah and Abū Asmāʾ Bishr b. Sawṭ al-Qābiḍī. Both men were among those who had been present at the murder of al-Ḥusayn and had participated in shedding the blood of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAqīl b. Abī Ṭālib[143] and in taking his spoils. About the time of the mid-afternoon prayer, ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil surrounded the mosque of the Banū Duhmān and said [to us], "If ʿUthmān b. Khālid b. Usayr is not brought to me, upon me be sins like those of the Banū Duhmān from the day they were created until the day on which they shall be resurrected, if I do not behead you to your last man." "Give us time," we said to him, "and we will seek him." So the men went out with horses to seek him. They found the two men sitting in the cemetery (jabbānah), about to leave for al-Jazīrah. They were brought to ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil, who said, "Praise be to God, Who 'spared the believers a fight!'[144] Had they not found this man together with that one, it would have put us to the bother of going to his house to seek him. Praise be to God, Who has brought the time of calamity upon you, so that it has overpowered you." He took them away to the site of Bi'r al-Jaʿd and beheaded them. Then he returned and gave al-Mukhtār a report about them. The latter ordered him to go back to them and burn them with fire, saying, "They shall not be buried until they are burned." These were two men.

143. Al-Ḥusayn's cousin, killed at Karbalāʾ. See Ṭabarī, II, 357, 387.
144. Qurʾān 33:25.

A'shā Hamdān recited the following verses as an elegy for 'Uthmān al-Juhanī:

Weep, my eye, for the most valiant of young men, 'Uthmān;
O young man of the family of Duhmān, do not go afar.
Recall a glorious young man of beautiful character;
there is no horseman like him among the people of Hamdān.[145]

[Continuing,] Mūsā b. 'Āmir said: Al-Mukhtār sent out Mu'ādh b. Hāni' b. 'Adī al-Kindī, the son of Ḥujr's brother,[146] and Abū 'Amrah, the head of his bodyguard. They went and surrounded the house of Khawalī b. Yazīd al-Aṣbaḥī, the man who had taken al-Ḥusayn's head and brought it [to al-Kūfah]. Khawalī concealed himself in the latrine.[147] When Mu'ādh ordered Abū 'Amrah to seek him in the house, Khawalī's wife came out to them. They asked her. "Where is your husband?" She said, "I do not know where he is." But she pointed with her hand to the latrine. They went in and found him—he had put a basket over his head. They brought him out. Al-Mukhtār was walking in al-Kūfah and going to see his companions. Abū 'Amrah sent him a messenger, and al-Mukhtār received the messenger at the house of Abū Bilāl.[148] Ibn Kāmil was with him. The messenger told him the news. Al-Mukhtār went to meet them and took charge of Khawalī. He brought him back and killed him in the presence of his family. Then he called for fire and burned him, not leaving until the body had turned to ashes; then he departed. Khawalī's wife (she was from Ḥaḍramawt and was named al-'Ayūf bint Mālik b. Nahār b. 'Aqrab) had become hostile to Khawalī when he had brought al-Ḥusayn's head [to al-Kūfah]. [671]

145. Dīwān (ed. Geyer), poem no. 48; translation in von Goutta, Der Agānīartikel über 'A'šā von Hamdān, 50.

146. In 51/671, the Kūfan Shī'ī leader Ḥujr b. 'Adī al-Kindī and his associates revolted against Mu'āwiyah and the governor of Iraq, Ziyād b. Abīhi. Ziyād arrested Ḥujr and sent him to Syria, where he was beheaded. See Ṭabarī, II, 111–55; *EI*², s.v. Ḥudjr b. 'Adī al-Kindī; and Jafri, Origins, 159–66.

147. Makhraj ("exit") also means "a place in the open air where one satisfies the needs of nature" (Dozy, Supplément, I, 360). The context suggests an enclosed outhouse.

148. Probably to be read "Bilāl," without "Abū," as at Ṭabarī, II, 735. See ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXX.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. ʿAmir Abū al-Ashʿar: One day while al-Mukhtār was talking to his companions, he said, "Tomorrow I will kill a man with big feet, sunken eyes, and prominent eyebrows. His death will gladden believers and the angels stationed near [God]." [Continuing,] he said: Al-Haytham b. al-Aswad al-Nakhaʿī was close to al-Mukhtār when he heard this statement. It occurred to him that the man whom al-Mukhtār [672] meant was ʿUmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ; so when he returned to his house, he called his son al-ʿUryān and said, "Meet Ibn Saʿd tonight and tell him about such-and-such a matter. Tell him, 'Take care, for he means no one else but you.'" [Continuing,] he said: The son went to ʿUmar b. Saʿd, took him aside, and told him what had been said. ʿUmar b. Saʿd said to him, "God reward your father for his brotherly behavior! How could he intend to do such a thing to me after the promises and covenants he has given me?" Now when al-Mukhtār had first achieved victory, he had behaved in the best and friendliest possible manner toward people. ʿUmar b. Saʿd had spoken to ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿdah b. Hubayrah (one of the men most honored by al-Mukhtār because of his closeness to ʿAlī) and had said to him, "I do not feel safe from this man"—meaning al-Mukhtār. "Get me a guarantee of safety (amān) from him." ʿAbdallāh had done so.[149]

[Continuing,] he said: I saw his guarantee of safety and read it:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate: This is a guarantee of safety from al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd for ʿUmar b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ. You are safe, with God's protection for yourself, your property, your family, and the people of your house and your children. You will not be taken to task for any offense committed by you in the past, so long as you heed and obey and keep close to your domicile,[150] your family, and your city. Whosoever encounters ʿUmar b. Saʿd, whether one of the police (shurṭat Allāh), the supporters (Shīʿah) of the family of Muḥammad, or anyone else, let him do him only good.

149. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 237, according to which ʿUmar b. Saʿd had gone into hiding after al-Mukhtār's victory and had come out only after obtaining an amān.

150. Raḥl, "a man's dwelling, or habitation" (Lane, Lexicon, III, 1054): ʿUmar was not to leave al-Kūfah for any of his other properties.

Witnessed by: al-Sā'ib b. Mālik, Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ, 'Abdallāh b. Shaddād, and 'Abdallāh b. Kāmil. And al-Mukhtār has taken upon himself an oath and covenant by God to uphold for 'Umar b. Sa'd the guarantee of safety he has given him, unless he cause some offense. He has made God his witness—"and God suffices for a witness."[151] [673]

[Continuing,] he said: Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī[152] used to say, "As for al-Mukhtār's guarantee of safety for 'Umar b. Sa'd, 'unless he cause some offense,' he meant by it: 'if he enters the privy and causes offense!'"[153]

[Continuing,] he said: When al-'Uryān had brought him this message, 'Umar b. Sa'd left under cover of that night. Having come to Ḥammām ['Umar],[154] he said to himself, "I will go and stay in my house." So he returned to it, passing al-Rawḥā',[155] and reaching his house in the morning. He told a mawlā of his what had happened concerning his guarantee of safety and what had been planned for him. His mawlā said, "What offense is greater than what you have done? You have left your residence and your family and come here. Go back to your residence [in al-Kūfah]. Do not give the man a way against you." So he returned to his home. His departure was reported to al-Mukhtār, who said, "No, indeed. On his neck there is a chain that will bring him back even if he does his utmost to depart." [Continuing,] he said: The next morning, al-Mukhtār sent Abū 'Amrah to him and ordered him to bring 'Umar to him. Abū 'Amrah went before 'Umar and said,

---

151. Qur'ān 4:79.

152. I.e., Abū Ja'far Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, called Muḥammad al-Bāqir (d. 113/731), the fifth Imām according to both the Twelvers and the Ismā'īlīs.

153. Al-Mukhtār tricked 'Umar by an equivocation. Arabic aḥdatha ḥadathan, "he caused an incident," was a euphemism for "he voided excrement."

154. Ḥammām 'Umar (the text reads "his ḥammām," but the context requires a place name, not "his bath") was a village on the Nars Canal, some 40 miles northeast of al-Kūfah. See Le Strange, Lands, 73; Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 282. Morony, Iraq, 269–70, places it at the village of Bitrī, across the Euphrates from al-Kūfah. Ṭabarī, II, 910, locates it between Qaṣr Hubayrah and Qubbīn.

155. A village of al-Rawḥā' near al-Sindiyyah on the Nahr 'Īsā close to Baghdad is mentioned by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

"Obey the commander!" ʿUmar got up, but tripped over his coat (jubbah), and Abū ʿAmrah struck him with his sword and killed him. He brought the head, wrapped in the lower part of his tunic (qabāʾ), and set it before al-Mukhtār. Al-Mukhtār said to the man's son, Ḥafṣ b. ʿUmar b. Saʿd, who was sitting in his presence, "Do you recognize this head?" [Ḥafṣ] exclaimed, "Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return!"[156] and said, "Yes, and there is no good in life after his death." "You are right," al-Mukhtār said to him, "for you shall not live after him." He gave orders concerning him; he was killed, and his head was with his father's. Al-Mukhtār said, "This one is for Ḥusayn, and that one for ʿAlī b. Ḥusayn! But there is no equivalence; by God, if I killed three-fourths of Quraysh[157] in requital for Ḥusayn, they would not measure up to one of his fingernails!"

Ḥumaydah, the daughter of ʿUmar b. Saʿd, recited the following, lamenting her father:

[674] Had someone other than a brother of Qasiyy[158] deceived him, or other than one of Yemen, or other than a Persian,
That would have consoled me somewhat. Know this concerning him (and a patrician is not like a most base man):
In the scroll, he gave Ibn Saʿd and his son a promise that even a speckled snake would treat him gently.

When al-Mukhtār killed ʿUmar b. Saʿd and his son, he sent their heads with Musāfir b. Saʿīd b. Nimrān al-Nāʿiṭī and Ẓabyān b. ʿUmārah al-Tamīmī, who brought the heads to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah. Al-Mukhtār wrote Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah a letter concerning the matter.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. ʿĀmir, who said: What aroused al-Mukhtār to kill ʿUmar b. Saʿd was the fact that Yazīd b. Sharāḥīl al-Anṣārī had come to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah; after greetings, the conversation had turned to the subject of al-

156. Qur'ān 2:156, traditionally said in times of misfortune.

157. Quraysh, as the Prophet's tribe, was the most prestigious and "valuable" tribe.

158. Qasiyy b. Munabbih was the brother of Thaqīf, the ancestor of al-Mukhtār's tribe, and Qasiyy became a nickname for the entire tribe. There is an allusion here to the derivation of the name from qasā "he was cruel." See Lisān, s.v.

Mukhtār, his rebellion, and his call for avenging the blood of the people of the Prophet's family.[159] Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah said, "To his least important messengers he alleges that he is a partisan (shī'ah) of ours, yet the murderers of al-Ḥusayn are his table companions, seated on chairs, and conversing with him." [Continuing,] he said: The other man noted what he had said. When he came to al-Kūfah, he went to al-Mukhtār and greeted him. Al-Mukhtār asked him, "Did you meet the Mahdī?"[160] He replied, "Yes." Al-Mukhtār asked, "What did he say to you and what did he discuss with you?" [Continuing,] he said: So he gave him a report.

[Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār therefore lost no time in killing 'Umar b. Sa'd and his son and then sent their heads to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah with the two messengers named above. He sent the following letter with them to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah: [675]

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To the Mahdī, Muḥammad b. 'Alī, from al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd. Peace be upon you, O Mahdī! I praise God to you, the God save Whom there is no god. To proceed: God has sent me as a vengeance upon your enemies. They have either been killed or imprisoned, or are outcasts and fugitives. Praise be to God, who has slain those who slew you and assisted those who helped you. I have sent you the head of 'Umar b. Sa'd and his son. We have killed whoever participated in [shedding] the blood of al-Ḥusayn and his household—God's mercy upon them!—all those over whom we have gained power. Those who remain will not escape from God. I will not cease from them, until no vestige of them on the face of the earth is reported to me. Write to me, O Mahdī, giving your opinion, and I will follow it and conform to it. Peace be upon you, O Mahdī, and God's mercy and blessings!

---

159. Ahl al-bayt, means literally, "people of the house." I have translated it as "people of the Prophet's family." The phrase occurs in Qur'ān 33:33 in a passage referring to Fāṭimah, 'Alī, and their sons. Jafri, Origins, 9ff., argues that even before Islam the phrase was used to honor the Banū Hāshim as hereditary keepers of the Ka'bah, and that the Shī'ī use of the phrase reflects the idea that the pre-Islamic eminence of this family climaxed in the appearance of the prophetic office in it. See *EI*², s.v.

Then al-Mukhtār sent ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil to [take] Ḥakīm b. Ṭufayl al-Ṭāʾī al-Sinbisī, who had taken the spoils of al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAlī[161] and shot Ḥusayn with an arrow. (He used to say, "My arrow caught in his coat of mail[162] and did not harm him.") ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil came, seized him, and led him away. Ḥakīm's family went and sought help from ʿAdī b. Ḥātim.[163] The latter overtook the men in the street and spoke to ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil about Ḥakīm. ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil said, "I have nothing to do with his affair. It is a matter for the commander, al-Mukhtār." ʿAdī b. Ḥātim said, "I will go to him." ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil said, "Then go to him—and may you take the right way!"[164] So ʿAdī went to al-Mukhtār. Now al-Mukhtār had already accepted ʿAdī's intercession for a group of his tribesmen taken prisoner on the day of Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ who had said nothing concerning al-Ḥusayn or the members of his family. The Shīʿah therefore said to Ibn Kāmil, "We are afraid that the commander will accept the intercession of ʿAdī b.
[676] Ḥātim for his villain, whose guilt you know. Let us kill him." He said, "Do what you want with him." They took him with his hands bound to the place where the tribe of ʿAnazah lived and set him up as a target. Then they said to him, "You despoiled ʿAlī's son of his clothing; by God, we will despoil you of your clothes while you are alive and watching." So they stripped off his clothes. Then they said to him, "You shot Ḥusayn and used him as a 160. Mahdī, "the rightly guided one," was in the early days of Islam used as an honorific epithet in poems praising the Prophet, ʿAlī, and various Umayyad rulers. Sometime during the Second Civil War, the term developed the sense of a restorer of religion and justice after a period of injustice such as saw the martyrdom of al-Ḥusayn. Al-Mukhtār was not the first to apply the term to ʿAlī and his descendants. Sulaymān b. Ṣurad, the leader of the Tawwābūn, had used it in reference to al-Ḥusayn (Ṭabarī, II, 546), calling him "the Mahdī, son of the Mahdī." The novelty, if one can call it that, in al-Mukhtār's use of the term lay in the application of it to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Mahdī; and Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 36.

161. Al-ʿAbbās b. ʿAlī, the half-brother of al-Ḥusayn, was killed at Karbalāʾ. See Ṭabarī, II, 386.

162. Sirbāl, which can mean either "shirt" or "coat of mail." See Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1343; and ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCXC.

163. ʿAdī b. Ḥātim al-Ṭāʾī was the leader of the powerful tribe of Ṭayyiʾ and an old supporter of ʿAlī. See EI^{2}, s.v.

164. Literally, "Go to him, taking the right way, or being well guided (rāshidan)." The phrase is based on an idiom: "One says to the traveller, rashidta, 'Mayest thou take, or follow, the right way.'" (Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1089).

target for your arrows, and you said, 'My arrow caught in his coat of mail and did not harm him.' We swear to God that we will shoot you the way you shot him with arrows, and let what sticks in you be sufficient for you!" [Continuing,] he said: They shot him with one volley of arrows, many of which hit him, and he fell dead.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Jārūd[165]—someone who saw him dead: He had so many arrows in him that he looked like a hedgehog.

When 'Adī b. Ḥātim came before al-Mukhtār, the latter gave him a seat with him in the place he was sitting. 'Adī told al-Mukhtār why he had come, and al-Mukhtār said to him, "Abū Ṭarīf,[166] do you think it permissible to petition for the murderers of al-Ḥusayn?" 'Adī replied, "He has been falsely accused, God preserve you!" Al-Mukhtār said, "Then we leave him to you." [Continuing,] he said: Before long Ibn Kāmil entered. Al-Mukhtār said to him, "What has happened to the man?" He replied, "The Shī'ah have killed him." Al-Mukhtār, who would not have been pleased had he not killed him, said, "What made you hurry to kill him before bringing him to me? 'Adī, here, has come for him, and he is a man whose intercession deserves to be accepted and whose wish should be carried out." Ibn Kāmil said, "By God, the Shī'ah overcame me." 'Adī said to him, "You are lying, enemy of God! You thought someone better than you was going to accept my intercession for him, so you forestalled me and killed him, and you had no nobility[167] to restrain you from what you did." [Continuing,] he said: Ibn Kāmil cursed him roundly, but al-Mukhtār put his finger on his mouth, commanding Ibn Kāmil to be still [677] and leave 'Adī alone. So 'Adī arose satisfied with al-Mukhtār and angry with Ibn Kāmil, about whom he complained to any of his tribesmen he encountered.

---

165. Abū al-Jārūd Ziyād b. al-Mundhir (d. between 150/767 and 160/776), a famous student of Abū Ja'far al-Bāqir and, after the latter's death, a follower of al-Bāqir's brother Zayd. The Jārūdiyyah (a Zaydī Shī'ite group) took their name from him. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 386–387; Shahrastānī, Milal, 161; EI^{2}, s.v. al-Djārūdiyya; and U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 227.

166. 'Adī's kunyah.

167. On khaṭar as "eminence, nobility, dignity" see Lane, Lexicon, II, 764; and ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCXXVI.

Al-Mukhtār sent ʿAbdallāh b. Kāmil to [take] the slayer of ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn. This was a man from ʿAbd al-Qays named Murrah b. Munqidh b. al-Nuʿmān al-ʿAbdī. He was a brave man; when Ibn Kāmil came for him and surrounded his house, he came out to meet them, lance in hand, and mounted on a swift horse. He thrust at ʿUbaydallāh b. Nājiyah al-Shibāmī and threw him down, but did not injure him. [Continuing,] he said: Ibn Kāmil would strike him with his sword, and he would ward it off with his left hand. Soon the sword had cut into it, but the horse spirited him away. He escaped and joined Muṣʿab, but his arm was paralyzed after that.

[Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār also sent out ʿAbdallāh al-Shākirī to [take] a man from Janb[168] called Zayd b. Ruqād, who used to say, "I shot one of their young men with an arrow: he was holding his hand on his forehead, warding off the arrows, and I pinned his hand to his forehead, so that he could not remove his hand from his forehead."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū ʿAbd al-Aʿlā al-Zubaydī: The young man was ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim b. ʿAqīl.[169] When his hand was pinned to his forehead, he said, "O God, they have despised and humiliated us; slay them, O God, as they have slain us, and humiliate them, as they have humiliated us." Then Zayd b. Ruqād hit the young man with another arrow and killed him. Zayd said, "I came to him when he was dead and pulled out of his body my arrow with which I had killed him. I kept working the arrow in his forehead back and forth until I pulled it out, but the arrowhead remain fixed in his forehead; I could not pull it out."

[Continuing,] he said: When Ibn Kāmil came to Zayd b. Ruqād's
[678] house, he surrounded it, and the men rushed in to seize him. Zayd, who was a brave man, came out to meet them with his sword drawn. Ibn Kāmil said, "Do not strike him with the sword or thrust at him with the lance; shoot him with arrows and pelt him with stones." They did this, and he fell. Ibn Kāmil said, "If there is still a last gasp of life in him, bring him out." They brought him

168. Janb was a Yemeni tribal group of uncertain affiliation. See Lisān, s.v.

169. In the account of the death of ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim b. ʿAqīl b. Abī Ṭālib in Ṭabarī, II, 357, the man who shot him is identified as ʿAmr b. Ṣubayḥ al-Ṣudāʾī.

out; there was still life in him. Ibn Kāmil called for fire, and they burned him alive, before he had given up the ghost.[170]

Al-Mukhtār sought out Sinān b. Anas, who claimed to have killed al-Ḥusayn. Finding that he had fled to al-Baṣrah, he tore down his house.

Al-Mukhtār sought out ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUqbah al-Ghanawī. Finding that he had fled and reached al-Jazīrah, he tore down his house. This al-Ghanawī had killed one of the young men [of the family of al-Ḥusayn], and another man, of the Banū Asad [his name was Ḥarmalah b. Kāhil], had also killed a man from al-Ḥusayn's family. Ibn Abī ʿAqib al-Laythī recited the following about these two men:

Amongst [the tribe of] Ghanī there is a drop of our blood; and amongst [the tribe of] Asad there is another [drop] to be counted and remembered.

Al-Mukhtār sought out a man from Khathʿam called ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUrwah al-Khathʿamī, who said that he had shot twelve arrows at them unsuccessfully. When ʿAbdallāh eluded him and joined Muṣʿab, al-Mukhtār tore down his house.

Al-Mukhtār sought out a man from [the tribe of] Ṣudā'[171] named ʿAmr b. Ṣubayḥ, who said, "I thrust at some of them and wounded them, but killed none of them."[172] They came to get him at night, after people were at rest. He was on his roof, unaware, though [679] with his sword under his head. When they grabbed him and took his sword, he said, "God damn you, sword; so close, yet so far!" He was brought to al-Mukhtār, who imprisoned him with him in the palace. The next morning, he gave audience to his companions, and it was announced, "Let anyone who wants to enter enter." The people came in, and ʿAmr was brought in, bound. He said, "You band of infidels and liars, if my sword were in my hand, you would know that I do not tremble or quake at the blade of a sword. Since it is my fate to be killed, I want no one but you 170. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 239, for a version in which he is flayed alive.

171. Ṣudā' was a Yemeni tribe (Lisān, s.v.).

172. "But some said that he was the man who had shot ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim in the forehead, while Zayd b. Ruqād had pierced his heart" (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 239).

to kill me. I know you are the worst of God's creatures. But I wish there were a sword in my hand so that I could strike you with it for a time." Then he lifted his hand and slapped Ibn Kāmil, who was beside him, in the eye. Ibn Kāmil laughed, grabbed his hand, and held it. Then he said, "He claims to have wounded and thrust at some of the family of Muḥammad. Give us your command concerning him." Al-Mukhtār said, "Bring me lances!" They were brought. "Thrust at him," he said, "until he dies." So he was thrust with lances until he died.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[173] and his son al-Ḥakam b. Hishām: Al-Mukhtār's companions passed by the house of the sons of Abū Zurʿah b. Masʿūd, who shot at them from atop the house. So they went into the house and killed al-Hibyāṭ[174] b. ʿUthmān b. Abī Zurʿah al-Thaqafī and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿUthmān b. Abī Zurʿah al-Thaqafī. ʿAbd al-Mālik b. Abī Zurʿah escaped from them with a blow on his head. He went swiftly and came before al-Mukhtār, who gave orders to his wife, Umm Thābit bint Samurah b. Jundab, who nursed the [680] wound. Then al-Mukhtār called him and said, "I am not at fault. You shot at the men and angered them."

Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath b. Qays[175] was at the village of al-Ashʿath next to al-Qādisiyyah. To take him, al-Mukhtār sent out Ḥawshab, the Keeper of the Chair,[176] with a hundred men, saying, "Set out after him. You will find him diverting himself hunting, or standing cringing with fear, or afraid and turning this way and that in confusion, or lurking hidden. If you overpower him, bring me his head." Ḥawshab went out, reached Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath's palace, and surrounded it. The latter left and joined Muṣʿab. The men stayed by the palace, thinking that he was in it. When they entered and learned that he had eluded them, they returned to al-Mukhtār, who sent and had the house town down.

---

173. Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Thaqafī; see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 204.

174. Ms. O, al-Himyāṭ.

175. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath b. Qays al-Kindī, a descendant of the kings of Kindah, was the father of the ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (often called simply "Ibn al-Ashʿath"), who in 81/700 led a major revolt against al-Ḥajjāj in Iraq.

176. On the Chair that al-Mukhtār exhibited as a relic of ʿAlī, see below, Ṭabarī, II, 702–06.

With the adobe bricks and clay he [re]built the house of Ḥujr b. ʿAdī al-Kindī, which Ziyād b. Sumayyah[177] had torn down.

[The Swearing of Allegiance to al-Mukhtār in al-Baṣrah]

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah al-ʿAbdī summoned the people of al-Baṣrah to swear allegiance to al-Mukhtār.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr[178]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī][179]—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAṭiyyah al-Laythī and ʿĀmir b. al-Aswad: Al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah al-ʿAbdī was among those who had witnessed [the Battle of] ʿAyn al-Wardah with Sulaymān b. Ṣurad. Afterwards, he returned with the surviving Tawwābūn who returned to al-Kūfah. Al-Mukhtār was then being detained. Al-Muthannā waited until al-Mukhtār came out of prison and then swore allegiance to him secretly. Al-Mukhtār said to him, "Make your way back to your territory in al-Baṣrah and summon the people, keeping your activity secret." Al-Muthannā went to al-Baṣrah and received a favorable response from some of his tribesmen and others.

When al-Mukhtār evicted Ibn Muṭīʿ from al-Kūfah and prevented ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām from entering al-Kūfah, al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah went out and [681] took possession of a mosque. His tribesmen gathered round 177. The governor Ziyād b. Abīhi, whose paternity was notoriously unclear, is in this form of his name given a nisbah to his mother Sumayyah, a notorious prostitute of al-Ṭāʾif. Ms. O adds, "May God curse him!"

178. Abū Bakr Aḥmad b. Abī Khaythamah Zuhayr b. Ḥarb al-Nasāʾī (b. 185/801, d. 279/892) was a Baghdad traditionist, historian, and literary scholar, probably of Khurasanian origin. He was a student of al-Madāʾinī and a teacher of al-Ṭabarī. See F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 319–20; Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung einiger historischer Werke Madāʾinīs," 110.

179. Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Sayf al-Madāʾinī (b. 135/752, d. ca. 228/843), a historian of the generation following Abū Mikhnaf, was active al-Baṣrah (his birthplace), al-Madāʾin, and Baghdad, and was credited with over 200 works on history and literature, most of which survive only as quoted in the works of later authors. See EI^{2}, s.v.; Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung einiger historischer Werke Madāʾinīs"; and Schoeler, "Die Frage der schriftlichen oder mündlichen Überlieferung."

him,[180] and he propagandized for al-Mukhtār. Then he went to the provision depot[181] and encamped by it. (Food was stored and camels were slaughtered in "the city.") Against them, al-Qubā'[182] dispatched 'Abbād b. Ḥuṣayn, the head of his police, and Qays b. al-Haytham with police and soldiers. Turning into the street of the mawālī, they came out into al-Sabakhah and halted. People remained in their houses; no one came out. 'Abbād kept waiting to see someone he might question. Seeing no one, he said, "Isn't there any man here from the Banū Tamīm?" Khalīfah al-A'war, a mawlā of the Banū 'Adī ('Adī al-Ribāb),[183] replied, "This is the house of Warrād, a mawlā of the Banū 'Abd Shams." "Knock on the door," he said. So Khalīfah knocked on the door, and Warrād came out to him. 'Abbād cursed him, saying, "Woe unto you! Here I am standing, and you did not come out to me." Warrād replied, "I did not know what would please you." "Put on your sword," he said, "and get your mount." He did so. They waited. Al-Muthannā's forces came and stood opposite them. 'Abbād said to Warrād, "Stay where you are with Qays." Qays b. al-Haytham and Warrād stayed where they were. While the men waited in al-Sabakhah, 'Abbād went back and turned into al-Dhabbāḥīn[184] Street until he reached al-Kallā'.[185] Now the supply depot had four gates: one adjoining al-Baṣrah, one toward al-Khallālīn,[186] one toward the mosque, and one toward the quarter from which the north wind blows. 'Abbād came to the gate facing the river, 180. Ms. O: "some of his tribesmen gathered around him in it." Al-Muthannā's tribe was 'Abd al-Qays (nisbah, "al-'Abdī").

181. Madīnat al-rizq "the city of provisions." After the Arab conquest, a supply depot was set up at Zābūqah, one of the abandoned Sasanian fortresses at the site of al-Baṣrah. It had a courtyard and was called a "village of provisions" (qaryat al-arzāq). It was rebuilt and enlarged by Ziyād b. Abīhi and his son 'Ubaydallāh, so that it resembled a city and had four iron gates. See Morony, Iraq, 62–63; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Rizq.

182. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah al-Qurashī al-Makhzūmī al-Qubā', one of the first men to have sworn allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr as caliph in 64/683, was Ibn al-Zubayr's governor for al-Baṣrah. See Madelung, "'Abd Allāh b. al-Zubayr and the Mahdī," 295; Ṭabarī, II, 601.

183. Since several tribes or clans had the name 'Adī, his tribe is further defined as the 'Adī of the al-Ribāb confederation, which included the tribes of Ḍabbah, Thawr, 'Ukl, Taym, and 'Adī. See Lisān, s.vv. 'Adī and Ribāb.

184. Butchers' Street.

185. Al-Kallā' ("the place where boats are drawn up") was a riverside market.

186. The street or section of vinegar makers or sellers.

next to the people who deal with rubbish.[187] It was a small gate. There he halted and called for a ladder, which he placed against the wall of the depot. Thirty men climbed up. He told them, "Stay on top. When you hear the shout of 'Allāhu akbar,' shout 'Allāhu akbar' on the roof." 'Abbād then went back to Qays b. al-Haytham and said to Warrād, "Incite the men to attack." Warrād attacked al-Muthannā's forces. The fighting became confused. [682]
Forty of al-Muthannā's men and one of 'Abbād's men were killed. Hearing the tumult and the shouts of "Allāhu akbar," the men on the roof of the supply depot[188] shouted "Allāhu akbar." Those who were in the depot fled. Hearing shouts of "Allāhu akbar" behind them, al-Muthannā and his forces took to flight. 'Abbād and Qays b. al-Haytham ordered the men to stop pursuing them. They took the supply depot and its contents, while al-Muthannā and his forces went to [the tribal district of] 'Abd al-Qays. When 'Abbād and Qays and their forces returned to al-Qubā', he sent them to the 'Abd al-Qays district. Qays b. al-Haytham approached from the direction of the bridge; 'Abbād came at them from the Mirbad[189] road, and they met.

While al-Qubā' was in the mosque, sitting on the pulpit, Ziyād b. 'Amr al-'Atakī[190] came to him. Ziyād entered the mosque on his horse and said, "Turn your horsemen away from our brothers,[191] man, or we will fight them." Al-Qubā' sent al-Aḥnaf b. Qays[192]

---

187. Saqaṭ, which can mean rubbish, household goods of small value, or the offal of slaughtered animals (Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1381).

188. Here the term is Dār al-rizq, rather than Madīnat al-rizq.

189. Al-Mirbad ("the Kneeling Place for Camels"), near the western gate of al-Baṣrah, was the place where desert caravans halted and one of the busiest parts of the city. See Le Strange, Lands, 45; and EI^{2}, s.v.

190. Ziyād, a member of the 'Atīk, a division of the powerful Yemeni tribe of Azd, had become the leader of the Azd in al-Baṣrah after the assassination of the Azdī leader Mas'ūd b. 'Amr in 64/663. This assassination had provoked severe tribal conflict in al-Baṣrah between the Azd, allied with Bakr b. Wā'il (or Rabī'ah; Mālik b. Misma' was its leader) and 'Abd al-Qays, on the one hand, and Tamīm (Muḍar; al-Aḥnaf b. Qays was its leader), on the other. This tribal animosity now threatens to blaze up again. See Ṭabarī, II, 461.

191. I.e., the 'Abd al-Qays, with whom the Azd were allied.

192. Abū Baḥr Sakhr b. Qays al-Tamīmī al-Sa'dī, surnamed al-Aḥnaf ("having a misshapen foot"), headed the tribe of Tamīm in al-Baṣrah. In the tribal fighting that had racked al-Baṣrah in 64/663, he had worked for a moderate settlement and appears here again as a force for moderation. Compare the very different account of al-Aḥnaf's behavior (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 244–45), where the mediators are and ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Makhzūmī to bring about a settlement. The two went to the tribal district of ʿAbd al-Qays. Al-Aḥnaf said to Bakr and Azd and to the general population (ʿāmmah), "Are you not in a state of allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr?" "Yes," they said, "but we will not hand over our brothers." "Then," he said, "order them to leave for any territories they like and not disturb this city for its people who are dwelling in safety. Let them depart wherever they will." So Mālik b. Mismaʿ, Ziyād b. ʿAmr, and their most prominent companions went to al-Muthannā and said to him and his companions, "By God, we do not hold your opinion, but we do not want you to be harmed. Go join your leader,[193] for those who have responded favorably to your opinion are few; then you will be safe." Al-Muthannā accepted their proposal and advice and went away. Al-Aḥnaf [683] returned and said, "Never have I been deficient in my judgement, except today. I went to these people and left Bakr and Azd behind me." ʿAbbād and Qays returned to al-Qubāʿ, while al-Muthannā went to al-Mukhtār in al-Kūfah with a small band of his companions.

Suwayd b. Riʾāb[194] al-Shannī and ʿUqbah b. ʿAshīrah al-Shannī fell in that fighting. The latter was killed by a man from the Banū Tamīm, who was in turn killed. The brother of ʿUqbah b. ʿAshīrah lapped up the blood of the Tamīmī and said, "My revenge!"

When al-Muthannā arrived [in al-Kūfah], he told al-Mukhtār what Mālik b. Mismaʿ and Ziyād b. ʿAmr had done, how they had come to him and had defended him until he left al-Baṣrah. Hoping to win them to his side, al-Mukhtār wrote to them:

> To proceed: Heed and obey, and I will give you whatever you want of this world and guarantee Paradise to you.[195]

ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Makhzūmī and ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ, and where al-Aḥnaf resists attempts at conciliation, despite his reputation for moderation (ḥilm). The Balādhurī account, with al-Aḥnaf as head of Tamīm stubbornly hostile to al-Muthannā's tribe of ʿAbd al-Qays and its allies (Bakr and Azd) better explains al-Mukhtār's hostile letter to al-Aḥnaf (below, Ṭabarī, II, 683–84). See *EI*², s.v. al-Aḥnaf b. Ḳays.

193. I.e., al-Mukhtār.

194. Ms. O: Ziyād. Shann was a clan (ḥayy) of the tribe of ʿAbd al-Qays. See Lisān, s.v. Shann.

195. Cf. the longer version, in rhymed prose (sajʿ), in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 245.

Mālik said to Ziyād, "O Abū al-Mughīrah,[196] Abū Isḥāq has given us a great deal: this world and the next!" Ziyād replied jestingly to Mālik, "O Abū Ghassān,[197] as for me, I do not fight on credit; if someone gives me cash, I fight for him."

Al-Mukhtār wrote to al-Aḥnaf b. Qays:

> From al-Mukhtār to al-Aḥnaf and those who are with him. May you be at peace! To proceed: Woe to the mother of Rabī'ah from Muḍar![198] Al-Aḥnaf is taking his tribesmen to drink of Saqar,[199] whence he cannot bring them forth. I have no power over what has been written in the divine dispensation. I have been told that you call me a liar. The prophets were called liars before me, and I am no better than many of them.[200] [684]

He also wrote to al-Aḥnaf:

If you buy a horse with your money and take a shield in your left hand,
Make sharp sword fighting your concern.[201]

According to Abū al-Sā'ib Salm b. Junādah—al-Ḥasan b. Ḥammād—Ḥabbān[202] b. 'Alī—al-Mujālid—al-Sha'bī, who said: I entered al-Baṣrah and sat down by a circle of men among whom was al-Aḥnaf b. Qays.[203] One of the men said to me, "Who are 196. The kunyah of Ziyād b. 'Amr.

197. The kunyah of Mālik b. Misma'.

198. Cf. the variant below, Ṭabarī, II, 685: "Woe to the mother of Rabī'ah and Muḍar!" This makes better sense, since al-Mukhtār has reason to condemn both Muḍar (al-Aḥnaf's tribe) for opposing al-Muthannā and Rabī'ah for sending al-Muthannā back to al-Kūfah. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 245, reads "Rabī'ah and Muḍar."

199. A Qur'ānic name for hell.

200. Cf. Qur'ān 3:184. "But if they cry lies to thee, lies were cried to messengers before thee." Al-Mukhtār's language is ambiguous about whether he lays claim to being among the prophets. Cf. Balādhurī's version (loc. cit.): "By my life, if you fight me and call me a liar, those who were before me were called liars; and I am not the best of them."

201. The text is difficult and the manuscripts show many variants. My translation assumes the following text: Idhā shtarayta farasan min mālikā/thumma akhadhta l-jawba fī shimālikā/fa-j'al misā'an ḥadhiman min bālikā.

202. Ms. Ḥayyān, corrected in ed. Leiden on the basis of Dhahabī, Mīzān (Lucknow, 1301/1883–4), I, 182.

203. The context makes it clear that the conversation took place after the defeat and death of al-Mukhtār. Cf. al-Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 245.

you?" "A Kūfan," I said. He said, "You are mawālī of ours." "How so?" I asked. "We saved you," he said, "from the hands of your slaves, the forces of al-Mukhtār." "Do you know," I said, "what the shaykh of Hamdān[204] said about us and about you?" Al-Aḥnaf b. Qays asked, "And what did he say?" I said, "He said:

Will you boast, if you killed slaves and once defeated unarmed people?
If you view with us for glory, remember what we did to you on the Day of the Camel:[205] Both old man with dyed beard and young man, white, bright-faced, in long garments.
He came to us tottering[206] in a long coat of mail, and we slaughtered him in the morning as one slaughters a lamb.
We gave, but you forgot our giving;
you were ungrateful for the bounty of God the Most High.
You killed members of the Khashabiyyah[207] instead of them—the worst of substitutions on the part of your people!"

[685] Al-Aḥnaf became angry and said, "Boy, bring that scroll here!" A scroll was brought. It contained:

> In the name of God, the Merciful the Compassionate. From al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd to al-Aḥnaf b. Qays. To proceed: Woe to the mother of Rabī'ah and Muḍar! Al-Aḥnaf is taking his tribesmen to drink of Saqar, whence 204. I.e., the poet A'shā Hamdān. Another version of the incident is found in Aghānī, V, 157–58.

---

205. Cf. the explanation in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 245: "We spared (or pardoned) you, but you gave no thanks." At the Battle of the Camel (36/656), reinforcements from al-Kūfah helped 'Alī dislodge the rebels Ṭalḥah and Zubayr from al-Baṣrah. See *EI*², s.v. al-Djamal.

206. Yahdiju: Aghānī reads yarfulu, walking proudly.

207. An alternative translation would be, "You killed members of the Khashabiyyah instead—from your own kinsmen—the worst of substitutions." The term Khashabiyyah (from khashabah, a piece of wood, club) was applied disparagingly to al-Mukhtār's followers because some of the mawālī were armed with clubs, rather than swords. Other explanations connect the name with the rescue of Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah narrated below (Ṭabarī, II, 693), either because al-Mukhtār's men used clubs in order not to violate the prohibition on drawing swords in the Meccan sanctuary or because they took the wood Ibn al-Zubayr had prepared for burning Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 231; also *EI*², s.v. Khashabiyya.

they cannot come forth. I have been informed that you call me a liar. If I am called a liar, messengers were called liars before me, and I am not better than they.

"Is this [man] one of us or one of you?" al-Aḥnaf asked.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Manī' b. al-'Alā' al-Sa'dī: Miskīn[208] b. 'Āmir b. Unayf b. Shurayḥ b. 'Amr b. 'Udas was among those who fought al-Mukhtār. When the men were defeated, he joined Muḥammad b. 'Umayr b. 'Uṭārid in Ādharbayjān[209] and said:

Dukhtanūs[210] marveled when she saw that a veil of gray hair had come over me.
She raised her voice and cried out.
[I said to her:] Do not be frightened that my beard has turned gray.
If you see that the vigor of my youth has departed and that ages have passed since my birth, [I am] a man of fifty-two years;
what lifetime is there that does not have turns of fortune?
Would that she had had my sword and I her dress the day she said, 'Is there no generous man who is indignant?"
Would that we had died before that day, or had done what free men do.
But, like men from whom the good flees, [686]
we did not fight, but the brave man fought.
I turned away from them, and they were stricken;
disgrace and shame have exiled me from them.
O the sadness of my spirit for "the meteor of Quraysh,"[211] the day his head was brought to al-Mukhtār!

208. Known as Miskīn al-Dārimī (from the Dārim clan of the tribe of Tamīm), he wrote poems in praise of Mu'āwiyah and Yazīd and an elegy upon the death of Ziyād b. Abīhi. He is said to have died in 89/708. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 323.

209. Ādharbayjān was the province in northwestern Iran with its capital at Ardabīl. See EI[2], s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 158 ff.

210. Dukhtanūs was a pre-Islamic poetess of the Dārimī clan of Tamīm (Dīwān Miskīn al-Dārimī, 42).

211. The "Meteor of Quraysh" refers to 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī al-Waqqāṣ (Dīwān Miskīn al-Dārimī, 43).

Al-Mutawakkil[212] said:

They killed Ḥusayn; then they lament his death.
Verily, time brings changes to people!
Do not be far away at al-Ṭaff,[213] O slain ones who have been left untended, whose heads' resting places have been soaked by rains.
The picked troops of al-Dajjāl[214] under his banner are not more astray than those whom al-Mukhtār has deceived.
O Banū Qasiyy,[215] bind fast your Dajjāl, and the [obscuring] dust will clear away; you will be free.
If your fellow tribesman had had knowledge of the unseen, the learned[216] would have agreed with you about him,
And it would have been a clear matter, related in the past by prophecies and reports.
I hope that thrusts that break your lances and a siege will prove that your inspiration is a lie,
And that to you will come men whose swords in their hands under the dust of battle are like fire.
They will not retreat when they meet you, until the heads of your armored men are broken in pieces.

---

212. Al-Mutawakkil b. 'Abdallāh b. Nahshal Abū Juhmah al-Laythī was a poet from the tribe of Layth b. Bakr (Kinānah) who lived in al-Kūfah and visited Damascus, where he wrote poems in praise of Mu'āwiyah and Yazid. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 322.

213. Al-Ṭaff is the desert region west of al-Kūfah along the alluvial plain of the Euphrates. It is higher than the low-lying ground by the river and forms the transition to the central Arabian plateau. The area contains a number of springs and was the site of a number of Sasanian border forts. Karbalā', where al-Ḥusayn was killed, was located within it. See EI[1], s.v.; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 359. The translation given here amends the vocalization of the Leiden text from lā tab'adan (energetic second person singular) to lā tab'adun (energetic second person plural). "Do not be far away" was a ritualized expression of mourning. Cf. the poem quoted in the Lisān, s.v. ba'uda: "As they bury me, they shall say, 'Do not be far away!' But where is there a place of [greater] remoteness than my place?"

214. Al-Dajjāl ("the Liar") is an apocalyptic figure similar to the Antichrist; see EI[2], s.v. al-Dadjdjāl.

215. I.e., al-Mukhtār's tribe of Thaqīf.

216. Aḥbār, pl. of ḥabr or ḥibr: a Jewish scholar, or one who has become a Muslim (Lane, Lexicon, II, 498). Such scholars were often credited with an ability to predict the future. See below, Ṭabarī, II, 786, and note 572 on Ka'b al-Aḥbār.

[Al-Mukhtār Sends an Army to Trick Ibn al-Zubayr]

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, al-Mukhtār dispatched an army to Medina to trick Ibn al-Zubayr. He pretended to Ibn al-Zubayr that he had sent the army to help him fight the army that 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān[217] had sent to fight him and that had encamped in Wādī al-Qurā.[218]

Al-Mukhtār's Motive in Sending This Army; What Befell Them

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. 'Āmir, who said: Having been expelled by al-Mukhtār [687] from al-Kūfah, Ibn Muṭī' went to al-Baṣrah. Not wishing to proceed to Ibn al-Zubayr in Mecca in a state of defeat and flight, he stayed in al-Baṣrah until 'Umar b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām came to him. Thus, both of them were in al-Baṣrah.

The reason for 'Umar's coming to al-Baṣrah: When al-Mukhtār came into the open in al-Kūfah and met with success in his enterprise (the Shī'ah thought he was merely propagandizing for Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah and seeking to avenge the blood of the members of the Prophet's family), he set out to deceive Ibn al-Zubayr and wrote to him as follows:

> To proceed: You know my sincere advice to you and my effort against the people hostile to you and what you for your part gave to me, on condition that I do this. But when I satisfied you and carried out my obligation to you, you stood me up and did not fulfill what you had promised me, although you saw on my part that which you saw. If you wish to return to me, I will return to you; if you want my sincere advice, I will advise you.

By this means, al-Mukhtār wanted to keep Ibn al-Zubayr at arm's length until the success of his own enterprise. He told the Shī'ah 217. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān (b. 23/643 or 26/646, d. 86/705) succeeded his father Marwān b. al-Ḥakam as Umayyad caliph upon the latter's death in 65/684. See EI[2], s.v.

---

218. Wādī al-Qurā ("the Valley of the Villages") was a fertile valley stretching north from Medina on the road to Syria. See EI[1], s.v. Wādī 'l-Ḳurā; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.vv. Qurā and Wādī al-Qurā.

nothing about the matter; if anything about it reached them, he pretended to them that he was of all men the most remote from such a thing.

[Continuing,] he said: Desiring to know whether it was war or peace, Ibn al-Zubayr summoned ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī and said to him, "Make ready to go to al-Kūfah, for we have appointed you its governor (wālī)." "How can that be," he asked, "when al-Mukhtār is there?" Ibn al-Zubayr said, "He claims that he heeds and obeys." [Continuing,] he said: ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān outfitted himself at a cost of between thirty and forty thousand dirhams and set out for al-Kūfah. [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār's spy came from Mecca and reported the news. Al-Mukhtār asked, "At that cost did he outfit himself?" The spy answered, "Between thirty and forty thousand [dirhams]."

[688] [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār summoned Zā'idah b. Qudāmah and said to him, "Take seventy thousand dirhams with you—twice what he spent on his journey to us—and meet him in the desert. Take Musāfir b. Saʿīd b. Nimrān al-Nāʿiṭī with you, with five hundred skilled horsemen armed with chain mail, lances, and helmets, and say to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, 'Take this sum, which is twice your expense, for we have learned how much you spent to outfit yourself and do not want you to lose money. Take it and go back.' If he does, [good]; if not, show him the horsemen, and say to him, 'Behind them are a hundred squadrons like them!'" [Continuing,] he said: Zā'idah took the money and went out with the horsemen. He met ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān in the desert, offered him the money, and commanded him to go back. ʿUmar said to him, "The Commander of the Faithful appointed me governor of al-Kūfah, and his order must be carried out." Zā'idah summoned the horsemen, whom he had kept hidden out of sight. When ʿUmar saw them coming, he said, "This furnishes me more of an excuse and makes me look better. Hand over the money!" Zā'idah said to him, "He has sent it to you only on account of [the relation] between you and him." Then he paid him the money. ʿUmar took it and retreated toward al-Baṣrah. There he met with Ibn Muṭīʿ. It was during the time when al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīʿah was in command, before the uprising of al-Muthannā b. Mukharribah al-ʿAbdī in al-Baṣrah.[219]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ismāʿīl b. Nuʿaym:[220] Having been informed that the Syrians were approaching Iraq, al-Mukhtār knew he would be the first [to be attacked]. Therefore, fearing that the Syrians would come at him from the west and Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr would come at him from al-Baṣrah, he sought a reconciliation with Ibn al-Zubayr, beguiling him and deceiving him. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān had sent ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ to Wādī al-Qurā. Deceiving and beguiling Ibn al-Zubayr, al-Mukhtār wrote to him: [689]

> To proceed: I have been informed that ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān has sent an army against you. If you want me to provide you with help, I will help you.

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr wrote to him:

> To proceed: If you are in a state of obedience to me, I am not averse to your sending the army to my territories and having the men swear allegiance to me before you. When news of your having sworn allegiance reaches me, I will believe what you say and withdraw my soldiers from your territories. Hurry and dispatch to me the army you are sending. Command them to march against the soldiers of Ibn Marwān who are in Wādī al-Qurā and fight them. Peace!

Al-Mukhtār summoned Shurāḥbīl b. Wars, from Hamdān, and sent him with three thousand men, mostly mawālī, with only seven hundred Arabs among them. He said to him, "Go and enter Medina. When you have entered it, write to me, so that I can give you my command." His intention was that, when they had entered Medina, he would send a commander to be over them in his name[221] and would order Ibn Wars to advance on Mecca, besiege

---

219. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 244: "It was during the governorship of al-Qubāʿ (al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīʿah), and before the coming of Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr to al-Baṣrah."

220. Full name: Ismāʿīl b. Nuʿaym al-Namarī al-Bursumī, see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 209.

221. I.e., he would replace Ibn Zubayr's governor of Medina with his own man.

Ibn al-Zubayr, and fight him there. Shuraḥbīl left for Medina. Ibn al-Zubayr, however, afraid that al-Mukhtār was merely deceiving him, sent ʿAbbās b. Sahl b. Saʿd from Mecca to Medina with two thousand men and ordered him to seek aid from the Bedouin Arabs. Ibn al-Zubayr said to him, "If you see that the men are obedient to me, welcome them. If not, use deceit against them until you have destroyed them."

This, then, is what they did. ʿAbbās b. Sahl went and met Ibn Wars at al-Raqīm.[222] Ibn Wars had deployed his forces: In charge of his right wing he had placed Salmān b. Ḥimyar al-Thawrī from Hamdān; in charge of his left wing he had placed ʿAyyāsh b. Jaʿdah al-Jadalī. His entire cavalry was in his right and left wings.
[690] [ʿAbbās] approached and greeted him. [Ibn Wars] had dismounted to walk with the foot soldiers. ʿAbbās and his forces came separated from each other and not drawn up in order. He found Ibn Wars encamped by the watering place, with his forces drawn up for battle. He approached and greeted them. Then he said, "Come apart with me here." Ibn Wars went apart with him. ʿAbbās said to him, "God have mercy on you! Aren't you under obedience to Ibn al-Zubayr?" Ibn Wars replied, "Yes." "Then," he said, "march with us against this enemy of his in Wādī al-Qurā; Ibn al-Zubayr has told me that your master[223] has made you journey here only to attack them." Ibn Wars said, "I was not commanded to obey you. I was only commanded to go to Medina and, having reached it, to follow my own judgment." ʿAbbās b. Sahl said to him, "If you are under obedience to Ibn al-Zubayr, he has ordered me to march with you and your forces against our enemy in Wādī al-Qurā." Ibn Wars said to him, "I was not ordered to obey you, nor will I follow you, until I enter Medina and write to my master for his orders." When ʿAbbās b. Sahl saw his obstinacy, he realized his disobedience. Not wishing to let him know that he saw through him, he said, "Your opinion is better; do what seems best to you. As for me, I will march to Wādī al-Qurā."

ʿAbbās b. Sahl then came and encamped by the water. He sent

222. Ms. Pet. and Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 246, read "al-Raqam," which Yāqūt, Muʿjam, gives as a place near Medina. The reading "al-Raqīm" may reflect the Qurʾānic "al-Raqīm," the place associated with the Men of the Cave (Sūrah 18).

223. I.e., al-Mukhtār.

Ibn Wars some camels fattened for slaughter that he had brought and gave them to him as a gift. He also sent him flour and sheep that had been skinned. Ibn Wars and his men had been perishing of hunger. ʿAbbās b. Sahl sent a sheep for each ten of them. So they slaughtered the sheep and busied themselves with them. They mixed with each other at the watering place; the men left their battle array and felt safe with each other. When ʿAbbās b. Sahl saw how they had busied themselves, he gathered about a thousand of his bravest and most courageous men and went to [691] the tent of Shuraḥbīl b. Wars. When Ibn Wars saw them coming toward him, he called for his men. Before a hundred men had come to him, ʿAbbās b. Sahl reached him. Shuraḥbīl was saying, "O picked troops (shurṭah) of God, come to me! Come to me! Fight those who hold it permissible to shed innocent blood[224] and are friends of Satan, the accursed. You are followers of truth and right guidance; they have betrayed and acted wickedly."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yūsuf:[225] ʿAbbās b. Sahl reached them while he was reciting:

I am the son of Sahl, a skilled horseman, no weakling who commits matters to others!
Exciting admiration, bold to advance when the leader turns aside!
I smite the head of the celebrated hero, with sword on the day of battle, so that it is severed.

[Continuing,] he said: We had hardly fought for any time at all before Ibn Wars was skilled, together with seventy of the guards. ʿAbbās b. Sahl raised a banner of safety for Ibn Wars's companions; they went over to it, except for about three hundred men who retreated with Salmān b. Ḥimyar al-Hamdānī and ʿAyyāsh b. Jaʿdah al-Jadalī. When they fell into the hands of ʿAbbās b. Sahl, he gave orders and they were killed. However, about two hundred men were released because some of the men into whose custody

224. Al-muḥillīn: literally, "those who make [the illicit] licit," i.e., shedders of innocent blood. Here, the word designates those who had shed, or had allowed to be shed, the blood of al-Ḥusayn. For al-Mukhtār's use of the word, see Ṭabarī, II, 599.

225. Full name: Muḥammad b. Yūsuf b. Thābit al-Anṣārī al-Khazrajī Abū Yūsuf, see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 212.

they had been placed were unwilling to kill them. They went back, but most of them died along the way.

When al-Mukhtār learned what had happened to them, and those who came back returned, he stood up to preach and said: "Verily, the wicked libertines have killed the excellent pious ones. Verily, it was a thing fulfilled and a decree decreed."

Al-Mukhtār sent Ṣāliḥ b. Masʿūd al-Khathʿamī with the following letter to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah:

[692] In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To proceed: I sent you an army to humble your enemies for you and take possession of the country for you. They marched toward you, until, having approached Ṭaybah,[226] they were met by the army of the blasphemer. The latter deceived them by appeal to God and beguiled them by a promise in the name of God. When they felt at ease with them and trusted them because of this, they rose up against them and killed them. If you deem that I should send to the people of Medina a densely mustered army from me, while you send them messengers[227] from you, so that the people of Medina may know that I am under obedience to you and only sent the army at your order, do so. Then you shall find most of them readier to acknowledge your right and show pity toward you, the members of the Prophet's family, than they are toward the family of al-Zubayr, the wrongdoers and blasphemers. Peace be upon you!

Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah wrote to him:

To proceed: When your letter reached me, I read it and took cognizance of the veneration in which you hold me and of how you intend to render me joyful. Verily, the most pleasing of all things to me is that wherein obedience is showed to God. So obey God as much as you can in what you do openly and what you do secretly. Know that if I wanted fighting, I would find men hastening to me and my helpers to be many. But I am keeping apart from them and waiting patiently until God judges in my favor; and He is the best of judges.[228]

226. Ṭaybah, meaning "the fragrant," is an epithet for Medina. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v. Ṭaybah.

227. Ms. O: a man.

Ṣāliḥ b. Mas'ūd came to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah, who said farewell to him, wished him peace, and gave him the letter, saying, "Tell al-Mukhtār to fear God and turn away from blood." [Continuing,] he said: I[229] said to him, "May God preserve you! Have you not written to him saying so?" Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah said, "I have ordered him to obey God. Obedience to God gathers together all that is [693] good and prohibits all that is evil." When Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah's letter reached al-Mukhtār, the latter proclaimed to the people: "I have been commanded with an order that gathers together piety and ease and casts away unbelief (kufr) and betrayal."

[The Khashabiyyah Perform the Pilgrimage]

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year the Khashabiyyah[230] came to Mecca and performed the pilgrimage. Their leader (amīr) was Abū 'Abdallāh al-Jadalī.

Why the Khashabiyyah Came to Mecca

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf and 'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—Maslamah b. Muḥārib, the reason was as follows: 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr imprisoned Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah and those members of his family who were with him, together with seventeen notables from al-Kūfah, at Zamzam.[231] Unwilling to swear allegiance to someone upon whom the community (ummah) had not united in agreement, 228. Cf. Qur'ān 7:87, 10:109, and 12:80.

229. Leiden note suggests that one should read "He said...."
230. For the origin of the name, see note 207.
231. Zamzam was the sacred well within the Meccan sanctuary (ḥaram). See EI[1], s.v. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 250, explains Ibn al-Zubayr's motive as follows: "After al-Mukhtār gained control of al-Kūfah and the Shī'ah began propagandizing for Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah, Ibn al-Zubayr feared that people would unite in approval of Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah. So he pressured the latter and his companions to swear allegiance to him."

they had fled to the sacred precinct (ḥaram). [Ibn al-Zubayr] threatened to kill them and burn them. He swore an oath to God that, if they did not swear allegiance, he would carry out his threat to them; and he set them a deadline.

Some of those with Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah counseled him to send al-Mukhtār and the Kufans a messenger to inform them of their condition, the condition of those with them, and of Ibn al-Zubayr's threat. And so, while the guards at the door of Zamzam slept, Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah sent three Kūfans with a letter to al-Mukhtār and the people of al-Kūfah, informing them of his condition, the condition of those with him, and of Ibn al-Zubayr's threat to kill them and burn them with fire; he asked them not to fail him, as [694] they had failed al-Ḥusayn and the members of his family. The messengers came to al-Mukhtār and gave him the letter. He summoned the people and read them the letter, saying, "This is the letter of your Mahdī, the pure descendant of the family of your Prophet. They have been left penned up like sheep, waiting all night and all day to be killed and burned in the fire. I am not Abū Isḥāq if I do not aid them effectively and send them troop after troop of horsemen, as one torrent follows another, until woe descends on the son of the woman from the tribe of Kāhil."[232]

Al-Mukhtār sent Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Jadalī with seventy riders, men of strength. He sent Ẓabyān b. ʿUthmān,[233] a member of the Banū Tamīm, with four hundred men, Abū al-Muʿtamir with one hundred, Hāni' b. Qays with one hundred, ʿUmayr b. Ṭāriq with forty, and Yūnus b. ʿImrān with forty.

Al-Mukhtār wrote to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī[234] by way of al-Ṭufayl b. ʿĀmir and Muḥammad b. Qays about the sending of the armies to him. The men set out, one group on the heels of the other. Abū ʿAbdallāh [al-Jadalī] came to Dhāt ʿIrq[235] and encamped with seventy riders. Then ʿUmayr b. Ṭāriq overtook him with forty 232. This refers to Ibn al-Zubayr, whose great-grandfather, Khuwaylid, was the son of a woman (Zuhrah bint ʿAmr) from the Banū Kāhil b. Asad b. Khuzaymah. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 250.

233. Cf. Ṭabarī, II, 674, above (Ẓabyān b. ʿUmārah), which is probably the correct reading (ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXI).

234. I.e., Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah.

235. Dhāt ʿIrq lay two days' march northeast of Mecca, at the intersection of the two pilgrim roads from Mesopotamia to the Ḥijāz—one from al-Kūfah, the other from al-Baṣrah. See Le Strange, Lands, 83.

riders, and Yūnus b. ʿImrān with forty riders, so that they numbered one hundred and fifty in all. Abū ʿAbdallāh led them until they entered the sacred mosque, carrying clubs[236] and proclaiming, "Vengeance for al-Ḥusayn!" Finally they reached Zamzam. With two days remaining until the deadline, Ibn al-Zubayr had already prepared the wood to burn the prisoners. Al-Mukhtār's men chased away the guards, broke the wooden bolts (aʿwād) of Zamzam, went inside to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah, and said to him, "Leave us free to deal with God's enemy, Ibn al-Zubayr." Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah said to them, "I do not deem it lawful to fight in God's sacred precinct." [695]
Ibn al-Zubayr said, "Do you think I will release them without the pledge of allegiance from him and them?[237] Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Jadalī replied, "By the Lord of the Corner[238] and the Station,[239] the Lord of what is permitted and what is forbidden, you shall set him free, or we will contest it with you by our swords in fighting that will make the followers of falsehood doubt."[240] Ibn al-Zubayr replied, "By God, they are paltry in number.[241] If I gave my forces permission, their heads would be plucked before an hour had passed." Qays b. Mālik said to him, "By God, if you try it, I expect you will be reached before you see done to us what you want to do." Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah restrained his companions and cautioned them against discord (fitnah).

Then Abū al-Muʿtamir arrived with one hundred men, Hāni' b. Qays with one hundred, and Ẓabyān b. ʿUmārah with two hundred men and the money.[242] Having entered the mosque, they shouted, 236. Kāfirkūbāt: from Arabic kāfir, infidel, and Persian kūb, smash, pound, i.e. "infidel smashers." Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 231, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 251, on their unwillingness to carry swords in the sacred precinct.

---

237. Ms. O reads "you," instead of "them."

238. I.e., the corner (rukn) of the Kaʿbah, where the Black Stone kissed by pilgrims is affixed to the building.

239. I.e., the Station or Standing Place (maqām) of Abraham: according to Qur'ān 2:125 and 3:97, the Kaʿbah in Mecca was located at the place where Abraham had prayed. A stone on which Abraham stood is said still to show the imprint of his feet. See von Grunebaum, Muhammadan Festivals, 19.

240. Cf. Qur'ān 29:48. The meaning is that the fighting will be so violent that because of it those who follow falsehood (i.e., those who follow Ibn al-Zubayr) will doubt their allegiance.

241. Literally, "they are eaters of a head," i.e., so few that they could satisfy their stomachs with a single sheep. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 73.

242. Al-Mukhtār had sent 400,000 dirhams. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 250.

"Vengeance for al-Ḥusayn!" When Ibn al-Zubayr saw them, he was frightened of them. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah and those with him departed for Shi'b 'Alī. They were reviling Ibn al-Zubayr and asking Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah for permission to go to fight him, but he continued to refuse. Four thousand men gathered with Muḥammad b. 'Alī at Shi'b ['Alī], and he divided the money among them.[243]

[The Siege of the Banū Tamīm in Khurāsān]

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim[244] besieged the men of Banū Tamīm in Khurāsān in order to kill those of them who had killed his son Muḥammad.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd al-Jūzjānī[245]—al-Ṭufayl b. Mirdās al-'Ammī,[246] who [696] said: When the Banū Tamīm dispersed in Khurāsān during the days of Ibn Khāzim, a number of their skilled horsemen—between seventy and eighty—went to the fortress of Fartanā.[247] They made 'Uthmān b. Bishr b. al-Muḥtafiz al-Muzanī[248] their leader, and with him were Shu'bah b. Ẓahīr al-Nahshalī, Ward b. al-Falaq al-'Anbarī, Zuhayr b. Dhu'ayb al-'Adawī, Jayhān b. Mashja'ah al-Ḍabbī, al-Ḥajjāj b. Nāshib al-'Adawī, and Raqabah b. al-Ḥurr, with the skilled horsemen of the Banū Tamīm. [Continuing,] he said: Ibn Khāzim came against them. He besieged them and dug a fortified trench. [Continuing,] he said: The Banū Tamīm would come out to fight him and then return to the fortress.

[Continuing,] he said: One day Ibn Khāzim came out of his

---

243. Except for mentioning his presence at the pilgrimage in 68 (see Ṭabarī, II, 782, below), Ṭabarī does not record the subsequent fate of Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 251–54; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 66–86.

244. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī was the governor of Khurāsān province. For the events leading up to the siege, see Ṭabarī, II, 488–96, 593–97; also *EI*², s.v. 'Abd Allāh b. Khāzim.

245. See Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung einiger historischer Werke Madā'inīs," 127; Dhahabī, Mīzān, I, 228.

246. The Banū 'Amm were a subtribe of the Tamīm. See Rotter, op. cit., 119–20.

247. The fortress of Fartanā was located at Marw al-Rūdh. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

248. His nisbah is given as al-Māzinī below (Ṭabarī, II, 700). The latter may be correct, since the Banū Māzin were a subtribe of Tamīm, while the Muzaynah (nisbah, al-Muzanī) were a separate Muḍar tribe (Lisān, s.v.).

trench with six thousand men in battle order, and the men from the fortress came out to meet him. 'Uthmān b. Bishr b. al-Muḥtafiz said to the Banū Tamīm, "Avoid Ibn Khāzim today, for I do not think you have strength to prevail against him." But Zuhayr b. Dhu'ayb al-'Adawī swore that he would divorce his wife if he retreated before he had broken their battle lines.[249] Beside them there was a riverbed into which water came during the winter, but there was no water in it at that time. Zuhayr descended into it and advanced. None of Ibn Khāzim's men noticed him until he attacked them and pressed back those in the forefront against those in the rear. They[250] circled around. He hurried back, and they followed him on both sides of the riverbed, shouting at him, but with no one going down[251] to fight him, until he had reached the spot where he had climbed down. Coming out [of the riverbed], he attacked them, so that they got out of his way until he made his way back. [697] [Continuing,] he said: Ibn Khāzim said to his men. When you fight with Zuhayr, put hooks on your spears, and grapple them into his gear, if you gain the upper hand over him. One day, Zuhayr came out against them—they had attached hooks to their spears in readiness for him. They fought him and caught four spears in his armor, but he turned to attack them, and their hands became unsteady. They let go of their spears, and he went back to the fortress dragging four spears. [Continuing,] he said: Ibn Khāzim sent Ghazwān b. Jaz' al-'Adawī to Zuhayr, saying to him, "Say to Zuhayr, 'If I guaranteed your safety, gave you a hundred thousand [dirhams], and granted you Bāsār[252] as a means of support (ṭu'mah), would you be loyal to me?'" Zuhayr replied to Ghazwān, "Woe unto you! How can I be loyal to people who killed al-Ash'ath b. Dhu'ayb?" Ghazwān let word of this slip out in the presence of Mūsā, the son of 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim.

---

249. An oath to divorce one's wife was one of the most serious oaths that could be made.

250. Ms. O: he.

251. Ms. O: no one daring to go down.

252. Ms. "Bāsān"; Ms. O, "Maysān." Ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXI, amends to "Bāsār" on the basis of Bāsārā, a city in Khurāsān mentioned by Ibn Khurradādhbih (al-Masālik wa-al-mamālik, 37, l. 8), and Bāsārān, mentioned by al-Ya'qūbī (Kitāb-al-buldān, 289, l. 18).

[Continuing,] he said: When the siege became too long for the Banū Tamīm, they sent a message to Ibn Khāzim, saying, "Let us leave, and we will disperse." He replied, "Not unless you submit to my judgment." They said, "We will submit to your judgment." Zuhayr said to them, "May your mothers be bereft of you![253] By God, he will kill you to the last man. If you are content to die, die as honorable men. Let us all go out: Either you will all die, or some of you will escape and some will die. I swear to God that if [698] you attack them with true bravery, they will make a way for you as broad as the road to al-Mirbad. If you wish, I will be in front of you; and, if you wish, I will be behind you." [Continuing,] he said: They refused. So he said, "Then I will show you." He and Raqabah b. al-Ḥurr went out (Raqabah had a young Turkish lad [ghulām] of his with him), along with Shu'bah b. Ẓahīr.

[Continuing,] he said: They attacked with unusual vigor, so that the men made way for them and they advanced. Zuhayr, however, returned to his companions. Entering the fortress, he said to his companions, "You see! So obey me." (Raqabah and his lad and Shu'bah continued to press forward.) But Zuhayr's companions said, "Among us there are men who are too weak for this and who desire to live."[254] Zuhayr said, "May God bring evil upon you! Will you abandon your companions? By God, I will not be the most timorous among you at the time of death!"

[Continuing,] he said: So they opened the fortress and came down. Ibn Khāzim sent someone to them and had them bound. They were brought to him one by one. He wanted to spare them, but his son Mūsā refused, saying, "By God, if you pardon them, I will fall on my sword so that it comes out of my back!" 'Abdallāh [b. Khāzim] said to him, "By God, I know what you are ordering me to do is wrong." Then he killed all but three of them. [Continuing,] he said: One of those three was al-Ḥajjāj b. Nāshib al-'Adawī. He had shot Ibn Khāzim while the latter was besieging them and had broken his tooth. Ibn Khāzim had sworn that if he captured him, he would kill him or cut off his hand. Now al-Ḥajjāj was a youth, and some of the Banū Tamīm who had kept

253. This imprecation is not as strong as the literal translation suggests, but more like "You fools!"

254. Ms. O: They said, "We are too weak for this and desire to live."

aloof from ʿAmr b. Ḥanẓalah spoke to Ibn Khāzim concerning him. One of them said, "He is my cousin and a young, ignorant lad. Give him to me." [Continuing,] he said: Ibn Khāzim gave him to him, saying, "Get away, and let me not see you." [Continuing,] he said: There was also Jayhān b. Mashjaʿah al-Ḍabbī, who had thrown himself on Ibn Khāzim's son Muḥammad the day the latter was killed.[255] Ibn Khāzim said, "Let this mule that walks [on two feet] go." And there was a man from the Banū Saʿd who had said on the day they met Ibn Khāzim, "Turn back from the skilled horseman of Muḍar."

[Continuing,] he said: They brought Zuhayr b. Dhu'ayb. They [699] wanted to carry him bound, but he refused and walked with his legs shackled, until he sat down before Ibn Khāzim. The latter said to him, "What thanks will you give if I release you and give you Bāsār as a possession?" Zuhayr said, "If you did nothing but forbear to shed my blood, I would thank you." But Ibn Khāzim's son Mūsā stood up and said, "Will you kill the female hyena and leave the male? kill the lioness and leave the lion?" Ibn Khāzim said, "Woe unto you! Shall we kill a man like Zuhayr? Who will there be to fight the Muslims' enemies? who to protect the women of the Arabs?" Mūsā replied, "By God, had you—even you!—participated in shedding the blood of my brother, I would kill you." Then a man from the Banū Sulaym approached Ibn Khāzim and said, "I beseech you to be mindful of God concerning Zuhayr." But Mūsā said to him, "Use him as a stud for your daughters!" Ibn Khāzim became angry and ordered Zuhayr to be killed. Zuhayr said to him, "I have a request." "What is it?" he asked. "That you kill me separately," he said, "and not mix my blood with that of these base men; for I told them not to do what they did. I commanded them to die as honorable men and come out against you with drawn swords. By God, had they done so, they would have given this little son of yours a fright and would have made him too worried about his own life to seek vengeance for his brother. But they refused. Had they done it, not a man of them would have been killed before he had killed several men." Ibn Khāzim gave orders concerning him, and he was taken aside and killed.

255. He had tried to prevent the murder. See Ṭabarī, II, 594.

According to Maslamah b. Muḥārib: Whenever al-Aḥnaf b. Qays mentioned them, he said, "God curse Ibn Khāzim! As the price for his son, a foolish and stupid boy not worth anything of value,[256] he killed many men from the Banū Tamīm. Had he killed but one of them for him, he would have done enough. [Continuing,] he said: The Banū ʿAdī asserted that, when they tried to carry Zuhayr b. Dhu'ayb, he refused. Leaning on his spear [700] and gathering his legs together, he jumped the trench.

When news of their death reached al-Ḥarīsh b. Hilāl,[257] he said:

You who find fault with me, I did nothing blameworthy in the fight with them;
my sword struck their chief and penetrated to the bone.
You who find fault with me, I did not turn away until men dispersed and I found no place to advance.
You who find fault with me, the sword has destroyed me:
Whoever fights long with heroes returns wounded.
My eyes, if you shed tears, pour out the blood that adheres closely to me, before pouring out any [other] blood.
After Zuhayr and the son of Bishr followed each other [in death], and after Ward, shall I hope for any gain in Khurāsān?
You who find fault with me, how many days of war have I witnessed, wheeling to charge again when the bad horseman drew back!

By "after Zuhayr," he meant Zuhayr b. Dhu'ayb. "The son of Bishr" is ʿUthmān b. Bishr b. al-Muḥtafiz al-Māzinī. Together with Ward b. al-Falaq al-ʿAnbarī, they were killed on that day, and Sulaymān b. al-Muḥtafiz, Bishr's brother, was also killed.

[Those in Office during the Year]

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the pilgrimage this year. Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr was in charge of

256. With no change of consonants, Arabic ʿilq, "something of value," can be read as ʿalaq, "a blood clot."

257. Al-Ḥarīsh b. Hilāl b. Qudāmah is mentioned as a skilled horseman of the tribe of Tamīm, famous for his exploits in Khurāsān (Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 257).

Medina on behalf of his brother, 'Abdallāh. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah was in charge of al-Baṣrah, and Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of its judiciary. Al-Mukhtār controlled al-Kūfah, and 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim Khurāsān.

[Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar Goes to Fight 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād]

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar went out, heading toward 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, to fight him. this took place eight nights before the end of the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.[258]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ [who was alive at that time], Fuḍayl b. Khadīj[259] [who witnessed the event], and one or more others, who said:[260] After al-Mukhtār finished dealing with the people of [Jabbānat] al-Sabī' and the people of al-Kunāsah, Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar remained [in the city] only two days before al-Mukhtār sent him forth in the same direction as before to fight the Syrians. He left on Saturday, eight nights before the end of the month of Dhū al-Ḥijjah in the year 66. With him, al-Mukhtār sent his most eminent companions, skilled horsemen and valiant men who had seen and experienced war. Qays b. Ṭahfah al-Nahdī went out with him in charge of the fourth of the people of Medina.[261] He appointed 'Abdallāh b. Ḥayyah al-Asadī commander of the fourth of Madhḥij and Asad, sent al-Aswad b. Jarād al-Kindī in charge of the fourth of Kindah and Rabī'ah, and sent Ḥabīb b. Munqidh [701]

258. I.e., 21 [or 22, if the month had 30 days] Dhū al-Ḥijjah 66, corresponding to 19 or 20 July, 686. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 248, reads: "six [some say eight] nights into Dhū al-Ḥijjah." Neither date is consistent with the date given above [Ṭabarī, II, 668] for the battle of Jabbānat al-Sabī'. There is a discussion in Wellhausen, Oppositionsparteien, 84n.

259. Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī, see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 201.

260. The verb qālū is in the plural, implying a composite account, not the words of one observer. See the discussion of Abū Mikhnaf's methods in U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 68.

261. Cf. Tabari, II, 1382 [anno 101]: "The people of the Highland [al-'Āliyah] included the tribes of Quraysh, Kinānah, Azd, Bajīlah, Khath'am, all of Qays 'Aylan, and Muzaynah. In al-Kūfah, the people of al-'Āliyah are called 'the fourth of the people of Medina.' In al-Baṣrah, they are called 'the fifth of the Highland [al-'Āliyah].'" al-Thawrī from Hamdān in charge of the fourth of Tamīm and Hamdān.

Al-Mukhtār went out with [Ibn al-Ashtar] to escort him. When [Ibn al-Ashtar] reached Dayr ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam,[262] al-Mukhtār's companions met him with the Chair (al-Kursī),[263] borne upon a gray mule on which they used to carry it. They halted for him on the bridge. The man in charge of the Chair, Ḥawshab al-Bursumī, was saying, "O Lord, preserve us alive in Thy obedience, and help us against enemies; be mindful of us, forget us not, and protect us." His companions answered, "Amen, amen." Fuḍayl continued: I heard Ibn Nawf al-Hamdānī say: Al-Mukhtār said:

By the Lord of "the loosed ones [sent out] successively,"[264] we will kill rank after rank
And thousand upon thousand deviators.[265]

Fuḍayl continued: When al-Mukhtār and Ibn al-Ashtar reached them, they crowded together in a great throng on the bridge. Together with Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar, al-Mukhtār proceeded to the bridges of Raʾs al-Jālūt, which are beside Dayr ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. Behold, the people with the Chair had halted on the bridges of Raʾs al-Jālūt, calling [on God] for assistance.

[702] When al-Mukhtar arrived between the bridge of Dayr ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and the bridges of Raʾs al-Jālūt, he halted, since he wanted to go back. He said to Ibn al-Ashtar, "Receive three charges from me: Fear God in your secret and public actions; march quickly; and, when you meet your foe, fight them as soon as you meet them. If you meet them by night, and can do so, do not wait for morning before attacking them. If you meet them by day, do not wait for night to descend on them before summoning them to the judgment of God." Then he said, "Have you committed my advice 262. Dayr ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was located about one stage north of al-Nukhaylah. See *EI*², s.v.; al-ʿAlī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 240.

263. For a discussion of this cult object, see Ṭabarī, II, 702–06.

264. Qurʾān 77:1.

265. Al-qāsiṭīn: ʿAlī applied the word to his opponents at Ṣiffīn on the basis of Qurʾān 72:15: "Those who have surrendered sought rectitude, but as for those who have deviated, they have become firewood for Gehenna!" See Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2523, and Jafri, Origins, 96.

to memory?" Ibn al-Ashtar said, "Yes." "God accompany you," said al-Mukhtār and turned back. Ibrāhīm's army had been located at the site of Ḥammām A'yan, and from there he set forth with his army.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj, who said: After al-Mukhtār turned back, Ibrāhīm went on with his forces until he reached the people with the Chair. They were circling round it with hands upraised to heaven, praying for assistance. "O God," said Ibrahim, "do not take us to task for what the foolish ones have done after the manner of the Children of Israel—by Him in Whose hand my soul lies!—when they circled about their calf."[266] After Ibrāhīm and his forces crossed the bridge, the people with the Chair went back.

An Explanation of the Chair Whereby al-Mukhtār and His Companions Prayed for Assistance[267]

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: Its origin was as follows, according to what I was told by 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh, from his father, from Sulaymān,[268] from 'Abdallāh b. al- [703]
Mubārak,[269] from Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā[270] b. Ṭalḥah, from Ma'bad b. Khālid [al-Jadalī], from Ṭufayl b. Ja'dah b. Hubayrah, who said: I was once in need of money. While in that state, I went out one day and came upon an oil merchant, a neighbor of mine, who had a chair covered with a thick [coat of] filth. It occurred to me that I should speak to al-Mukhtār about it. So I went back and sent 266. The story of the Golden Calf worshipped by the Children of Israel is found in Qur'ān 7:147ff. There is also an echo of Qur'ān 2:286 and 7:155.

267. In an article tracing the survival of Persian royal symbolism into Islam, S. Shaked has drawn a connection between the veneration of 'Alī's Chair and Persian throne symbolism. That many of al-Mukhtār's followers were Persians may support Shaked's view. On the other hand, the poem by A'shā Hamdān quoted below [Ṭabarī, II, 704] identifies the venerators of the Chair as Arabs from the tribe of Hamdān. See Shaul Shaked, "From Iran to Islam," 81–82.

268. An isnād in Ṭabarī, II, 208 gives the name in fuller form as Abū Ṣāliḥ Sulaymān b. Ṣāliḥ.

269. 'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak b. Wāḍiḥ al-Ḥanẓalī al-Tamīmī Abū 'Abd al-Raḥmān (b. 118/736, d. 181/797 in Hīt) was a famous traditionist, historian, and Sufi, active both as transmitter of earlier works and as an author in his own right. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 95.

270. Ms. O: "'Abdallāh."

word to the oil merchant, saying, "Send me the chair." He sent it to me. I went to al-Mukhtār and said, "I have been concealing something from you which I do not think I ought to. It seems best that I mention it to you." "What is it?" he asked. I answered, "A chair on which [my father] Ja'dah b. Hubayrah[271] used to sit as if he thought that in regard to it there was a vestige of some knowledge."[272] [Al-Mukhtār] said, "Praise God! And you put the matter off until today? Send to him! Send to him!" [Continuing,] he said: When it was washed, it turned out to be tamarisk wood, and it shone from the oil it had absorbed. It was brought to al-Mukhtār covered. He ordered me to be paid twelve thousand [dirhams], and then he summoned to congregational prayer.

Ma'bad b. Khālid al-Jadalī continued, saying: Ṭufayl b. Ja'dah took me and Ismā'īl b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh and Shabath b. Rib'ī. People were running to the mosque. Al-Mukhtār said, "Nothing has existed among past communities but that its like will exist in this community. Among the Children of Israel there was the Ark, in which there was a remnant of what the family of Moses and the family of Aaron left behind.[273] Among us, this is like the Ark. Uncover it!" When they removed its draperies, the [704] Saba'iyyah[274] stood up, raised their hands, and shouted "God is great!" three times. Shabath b. Rib'ī stood up and said, "People of Muḍar, do not become infidels." But they pushed him aside and drove him away; they shunned him and put him out. [Isḥāq [b. Yaḥyā b. Ṭalḥah] said: "By God, I hope these words will be accounted to the credit of Shabath!"] Presently, someone said, "Behold, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād has encamped with the Syrians at Bājumayrā."[275] So they took the Chair out on a mule. It was covered; seven men held it on its right and seven on its left. The 271. Ja'dah was the nephew of 'Alī; hence, it would be plausible for him to possess some relic of 'Alī. See below, Ṭabarī, II, 705.

272. The Arabic atharah [uthrah, or athrah] min 'ilm echoes Qur'ān 46:4. The meaning is that Ja'dah used to sit upon the chair as if family tradition reported that it had belonged to 'Alī. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. atharah. The reading in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 258 [atharan min 'Alī, "a relic of 'Alī"] should be rejected on textual grounds as a lectio facilior.

273. Cf. Qur'ān 2:248.

274. See note 56 above.

275. Bājumayrā [for which Mss. O and Pet read "Bākhumayrā"] is near Takrīt. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

Syrians suffered a massacre such as they had never suffered before, and this tempted them even further; they advanced until they vied with each other in infidelity. I said, "We belong to God!"[276] and I regretted what I had done. The people spoke about the matter, and the Chair was made to disappear; I never saw it again.

According to 'Abdallāh [b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh]—his father —Abū Ṣāliḥ [Sulaymān b. Ṣāliḥ]: On this subject, A'shā Hamdān composed the following, as I have been told on the authority of someone other than 'Abdallāh [b. al-Mubārak]:

I bear witness against you that you are Saba'iyyah;
O picked troops of polytheism,[277] I know you well!
I swear that your Chair is no Sakīnah,[278] even if cloths have been draped over it;
And that it is not like the Ark among us, even if [705]
Shibām, Nahd, and Khārif[279] walk around it.
I am a man who loves the family of Muḥammad;
I have followed a revelation contained in the books [of the Qur'ān].
I followed 'Abdallāh [b. al-Zubayr], when the hoary-headed and noble men of Quraysh, one after another, followed him.[280]

---

276. See note 156 above.

277. Shirk, literally "associating [other gods with Allāh]," is a sin that would render a person outside the Islamic community.

278. Arabic sakīnah is a loan word from Hebrew shĕkhīnāh, "dwelling," specifically the Divine Presence in the Tabernacle in the wilderness (Exod. 25:8) and in the temple in Jerusalem. In Qur'ān 2:248, the word occurs in a context referring to the Ark of the Covenant: a prophet (unnamed) tells the Children of Israel, skeptical about whether Saul is really a God-appointed king over them, that "The sign of his kingship is that the Ark will come to you, in it a Sakīnah from your Lord, and a remnant of what the folk of Moses and Aaron's folk left behind, the angels bearing it." Arabic exegesis explains the word in many ways, either abstract, "a [cause of] tranquillity" (based perhaps on the Christian notion of the Holy Spirit as paraclētos, "comforter"), or as some sort of physical image that inspired fear in the enemy. See EI[1], s.v.

279. Shibām, Nahd, and Khārif are clans of the tribe of Hamdān.

280. The Dīwān of A'shā Hamdān (Poem 31), adds four extra lines: "Even though the tribesmen of Shākir circle round it, touch its wood, and devise, it will not help. Because of it, we ourselves have become obedient to Ibn al-Zubayr: among us there is no deception, nor are precedents cut off. The outcome, I think, will be in favor of the family of Muḥammad; the wronged will be helped, and the fearful become secure. My Lord will gather together a community that has become fragmented, among whom wars and enmities have raged."

Also, al-Mutawakkil al-Laythī said:

Tell Abū Isḥāq, if you come to him, that I am a nonbeliever as regards your Chair.
[The tribe of] Shibām goes leaping round its boards, and [the tribe of] Shākir ascribes inspiration to it.
Their eyes are as red around it as if they were swelling chickpeas.

Abū Mikhnāf, however, on the authority of certain of his shaykhs, mentions a story of this Chair different from the one that ʿAbdallāh b. Aḥmad mentions with the chain of authorities we have given going back to Ṭufayl b. Jaʿdah. We have been told Abū Mikhnaf's account according to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—[Abū Mikhnaf]—Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and his son, al-Ḥakam b. Hishām: Al-Mukhtar said to the family of Jaʿdah b. Hubayrah b. Abī Wahb al-Makhzūmī (Jaʿdah's mother was Umm Hāniʾ bint Abī Ṭālib, the full sister of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib), "Give me the Chair of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib." "No," they replied, "by God, we [706] do not have it, nor do we know whence we can obtain it." "Do not be foolish," he said. "Go and bring it to me." [Continuing,] he said: Thereupon, the family suspected that he would accept from them any chair they would bring him, saying it was the one. So they brought a chair and said, "That is it," and he accepted it. [Continuing,] he said: Having wrapped it with silk and brocade, the men of Shibām and Shākir and the chief companions of al-Mukhtār marched out with it.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. ʿĀmir Abū al-Ashʿar al-Juhanī: When Ibn al-Zubayr was told about the Chair, he said, "Why don't some of the Jundabs of Azd go to see it?"[281] [Continuing,] Abū al-Ashʿar said: When the Chair was obtained, the

281. For the idiom, "ayna . . . ʿan," see Dozy, Supplément, II, 46. Cf. the parallel passage in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 242: "Ibn ʿUmar, upon being told that al-Mukhtār had sought out ʿAlī's Chair and was carrying it about on a gray mule, and that his companions were encircling it, praying for rain and victory, said, 'Why don't the Jundabs of Azd go to see it? One of them would not be deceived by it.'" (Read lā yaghtarru bihī, for the printed edition's lā yuʿaqribuhū.) The allusion is to a pious companion of the Prophet, Jundab b. Kaʿb al-Azdī, who was so incensed by the impostures of a sorcerer in al-Kūfah (the man had pretended to cut off his assistant's head and reattach it), that he struck off the sorcerer's head. He is supposed to have said, "If he is genuine, let him revive himself." Al-Mukhtār, in other words, needs first person to serve as its keeper was Mūsā b. Abī Mūsā al-Ash'arī, who used to come to al-Mukhtār and serve him when [al-Mukhtār] first came, because his mother was Umm Kulthum bint al-Faḍl b. al-'Abbās b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib. Afterwards, he was reproved and became ashamed of it. He therefore gave it to Ḥawshab al-Bursumī, who was the man in charge of it until al-Mukhtār perished.

[Continuing,] he said: One of al-A'shā's paternal uncles was a man called Abū Umāmah. He used to come into the majlis[282] of his companions and say, "Today there has been established for us a [source of] inspiration the like of which men have never heard of. In it there is news of what will come to be."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. 'Āmir: It was 'Abdallāh b. Nawf who used to do this for them, and he used to say, "Al-Mukhtār commanded me to do it." But al-Mukhtār disavowed him.

---

someone like Jundab to deal with his impostures. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, I, 511–13; Aghānī, IV, 185–86.

282. The sitting place or assembly.

[707]

The Events of the Year 67

(JULY 28, 686–JULY 17, 687)

Among the events of this year was the death of ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and of the Syrians who were with him.

The Death of ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Ṣalt [al-Taymī]—Abū Saʿīd al-Ṣayqal, who said: We departed with Ibn al-Ashtar, heading toward ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād and the Syrians who were with him. We went out quickly, not turning aside, wanting to encounter him before he entered the land of Iraq.[283] [Continuing,] he said: We arrived well before him at the borders of the land of Iraq and pushed on into the land of al-Mawṣil. Hurrying toward him and marching quickly, we met him at the Khāzir [River], beside a village called Bārʿītā, five farsakhs from al-Mawṣil.[284] In charge of his vanguard, Ibn al-Ashtar had 283. See above, Ṭabarī, II, 643. "Iraq" means the part of Mesopotamia south of Takrīt; al-Mawṣil constituted a separate province.

284. I.e., about 15 miles east of al-Mawṣil. The Khāzir (or Khāzar) River is a placed al-Ṭufayl b. Laqīṭ, from the Wahbīl [clan] of [the tribe of] Nakhaʿ, a fellow tribesman of his and a brave and valiant man. Having approached Ibn Ziyād, Ibn al-Ashtar drew Ḥumayd b. Ḥurayth close to himself and began to march only in battle order. He drew all his forces close to himself, with his horsemen and foot soldiers, and began to advance with them all, not dividing them. He did, however, send al-Ṭufayl b. Laqīṭ ahead with advance forces, so that he entered that village.

[Continuing,] he said: ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād came and encamped near them on the bank of the Khāzir. ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥubāb [708] al-Sulamī[285] sent word to Ibn al-Ashtar, saying, "I am on your side and want to meet you tonight." Ibn al-Ashtar sent to him, saying, "Meet me, if you wish." The whole of Qays was in al-Jazīrah and were[286] opponents of Marwān and the family of Marwān. At that time, Marwān's army was from Kalb. Their commander was Ibn Baḥdal.

ʿUmayr came to Ibn al-Ashtar at night and swore allegiance to him, informing him that he was in charge of his commander's right wing, and promising him that he would fall back with his men. Ibn al-Ashtar said, "What do you think best? Should I dig myself in and wait two or three days?" ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥubāb replied, "Don't do it! We belong to God! What do they want but this? If they keep putting you off and procrastinating, it will be better for them. They greatly outnumber you; and the few gain no advantage over the many by procrastination. Rather, attack them, for they have been filled with fear of you. Come at them; for if they draw within sight of your companions and fight them day after day and time after time, they will feel at ease with them and gain courage against them." Ibrāhīm [b. al-Ashtar] said, "Now I know you are advising me sincerely. You have spoken the truth. What you have tributary of the Greater Zāb, which flows into the Tigris south of al-Mawṣil. [Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.vv. Khāzir and Zāb]. The mss. show uncertainty about the name of the village. Ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXI, amends the Ms. Pet reading Bārbīthā to Bārʿītā on the basis of Syriac Bārʿidtā. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 248, reads "Bārītā," which Goitein argues may reflect the actual pronunciation.

---

285. ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥubāb's tribe, the Banū Sulaym [nisbah al-Sulamī], were part of the Qays ʿAylān; thus there was a tribal element in his offer. Cf. above, Ṭabarī, II, 643; and the parallel account in Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 301–02.

286. Mss. O and Co: some of them were.

said is the right idea; indeed, my commander recommended this idea to me and commanded me to follow it." 'Umayr said, "Do not go against his opinion. War has tested the old man,[287] and he has experienced in it what we have not experienced.[288] Rise early and fight with the man."

'Umayr then went back. That night, Ibn al-Ashtar kept his [709] guards on alert all night long, and not a wink of sleep entered his eyes. At the crack of dawn he set his men in order, formed his battalions, and gave orders to his commanders. He sent out Sufyān b. Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal al-Azdī in charge of his right wing, and 'Alī b. Mālik al-Jushamī (the brother of Abū al-Aḥwaṣ) in charge of his left wing. He sent out 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh (Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar's half-brother by his mother) in charge of the horsemen. Since his horsemen were few, he kept them near him, so that they were in the right wing and the main part of the army. He placed al-Ṭufayl b. Laqīṭ in charge of his foot soldiers, and his banner was with Muzāḥim b. Mālik. [Continuing,] he said: When dawn broke, Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar led them in the morning prayer in the twilight. Then he led them out and lined them up, placing the commanders of the fourths in their positions. He made the commander of the right wing join the right wing, the commander of the left wing join the left wing, and the commander of the foot soldiers join the foot soldiers. He gathered the horsemen to himself, with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh, his half-brother on his mother's side, in charge of them, so that they were in the midst of the men.

Ibrāhīm dismounted and walked. He said to the men, "March," and the men marched with him at a gentle pace, advancing little by little, until he reached the top of a great hill overlooking the enemy. There he sat down; none of the men of the enemy had yet moved. He dispatched 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr al-Salūlī, who rode a horse of his that shone with sleekness. Ibrāhīm said to him, "Ride your horse at a gallop and bring me a report about them." 'Abdallāh departed. Shortly thereafter he came back and said, "The enemy have come out in a state of confusion and dismay. One of their men met me, and all he could say over and over again

287. Literally, "Wars have bitten into him." 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād is meant.
288. Another reading is, "what no one else has experienced."

was, 'O Shī'ah of Abū Turāb![289] O Shī'ah of the liar al-Mukhtār!' I said, 'The issue between you and us is too momentous for abuse.' He replied to me, 'O enemy of God, to what are you summoning us? You are fighting without an imām.'[290] I said to him, 'No, it is vengeance for al-Ḥusayn, the son[291] of the Messenger of God. Hand over to us 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, who killed the son of the [710] Messenger of God and the lord of the youth of Paradise, so that we can kill him to avenge some of our mawālī whom he killed with al-Ḥusayn; for we do not consider him al-Ḥusayn's equal, that we might agree to his being retaliation for him. If you hand him over to us and we kill him for some of our mawālī whom he killed, we will set between you and us the Book of God or any righteous Muslim you wish as mediator.' He said to me, 'We had experience with you another time involving this sort of thing'—he meant two mediators—'and you acted treacherously.' 'How so?' I asked. He said, 'We appointed two mediators between you and us, but you were not satisfied with their decision.' I said to him, 'You have produced no proof [of treachery]. Our peace was made on condition that if both mediators agreed on a man, we would follow their decision, accept him, and swear allegiance to him. But they did not agree on one man and went each his own way. God did not direct and rightly dispose the two of them.' 'Who are you?' he asked. I told him and asked him, 'Who are you?' 'Gee up!' he said to his mule, urging it on. I said to him, 'You haven't given me my due! This is the beginning of your treachery.'"

[Continuing,] he said: Ibn al-Ashtar called for a horse of his, mounted it, and passed by all the standard-bearers, stopping beside each banner that he passed. Then he said, "O helpers of the religion [of Islam], partisans of truth, picked army of God, here is 'Ubaydallāh b. Marjānah,[292] the murderer of al-Ḥusayn, the son

289. Abū Turāb ("Father of Dust," or "Dusty") was a nickname given to 'Alī by Muḥammad. Accounts differ about why it was given and whether it was meant to be laudatory or pejorative. The Umayyads, as is clear from this passage, used it pejoratively, sometimes calling the Shī'ah "Turābiyyah." Shī'ī writers explain it as laudatory. See Ṭabarī, I, 1271–72 for one version of the story; full discussion in Kohlberg, "Abū Turāb," 347–52.

290. Another possible translation: "You are fighting on the side of a non-imām."

291. I.e., the descendant. He was Muḥammad's grandson.

292. Marjānah was the mother of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād (Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 347). Calling a man by his mother's name was an insult.

of ʿAlī and of Fāṭimah, the daughter of the Messenger of God. He prevented him, his daughters, his wives, and his partisans from reaching the water of the Euphrates and drinking of it when they were in sight of it. He prevented him from coming to the son of his paternal uncle[293] so as to reach a peaceful settlement with him. He prevented him from going back to his dwelling and his family. He prevented him from traveling anywhere in the wide world, until he slew him and slew the members of his family. By [711] God, Pharaoh never did to the noble sons of the Children of Israel what the son of Marjānah did to the members of the family of the Messenger of God—God bless him and grant him peace!—people from whom God removed uncleanness and whom he truly purified.[294] God has brought him to you and has brought you to him. By God, I hope God has brought you and him together in this place only that He may give relief to your hearts through the shedding of his blood by your hands; for God knows that you have come forth in zeal for the family of your Prophet."

Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar went between the right wing and the left. He went among all the men, arousing their desire for holy war,[295] and urging them to fight. Then he returned and dismounted under his banner, and the enemy advanced toward him. Ibn Ziyād had placed al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī in charge of his right wing, ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥubāb al-Sulamī in charge of his left wing, and Shuraḥbīl b. Dhī al-Kalāʿ in charge of the horsemen. He himself walked among the foot soldiers. When the two battle lines drew near each other, al-Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr with the right wing of the Syrians attacked the left wing of the Kūfans, which was under ʿAlī b. Mālik al-Jushamī. The latter held his ground against him by himself and was killed. His banner was taken up by Qurrah, ʿAlī's son, who, together with some men of the guard, was also killed. The left wing was put to flight. The banner of ʿAlī b. Mālik al-Jushamī was taken up by ʿAbdallāh b. Warqāʾ b. Junādah al-

293. Al-Ḥusayn sent his cousin, Muslim b. ʿAqīl b. Abī Ṭālib, to al-Kūfah in response to the invitation of the Kūfan Shīʿah. Muslim was received enthusiastically and wrote to al-Ḥusayn to come to al-Kūfah. For this, Muslim was beheaded by ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād. See Jafri, Origins, 182–84.

294. Cf. Qurʾān 33:33.

295. The implication is that the enemy are unbelievers, against whom holy war (jihād) is an obligation.

Salūlī, the nephew of Ḥubshī b. Junādah, the companion of the Prophet. Confronting the men of the left wing as they were fleeing, he said, "To me, O picked troops of God!" Most of them went to him. He said, "Here is your commander fighting. Let us go to him." He went forward until he came to him. There he was, head uncovered, calling out, "O picked troops of God, to me! I am Ibn al-Ashtar. The best of those of you who fled are those of you who turn back [to fight]: he who turns from evil is no wrongdoer."[296] So his men returned to him. He sent to the commander of the right wing, saying, "Attack their left wing," for he hoped at that time that ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥubāb would fall back before them, as he had said. The commander of the right wing, Sufyān b. Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal, attacked, but ʿUmayr b. al-Ḥubāb held his ground against him and fought him vigorously. When Ibrāhīm saw that, he said to his companions, "Head toward this main body of men; by God, if we disperse it, those of them you see to the right and the left will flee like frightened birds taking wing." [712]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Anṣārī—Warqāʾ b. ʿĀzib [al-Asadī], who said: We walked toward them. Having drawn near them, we fought briefly with spears and then turned to swords and maces and struck blows at each other with them for a large part of the day. By God, I can compare the sound I heard of iron on iron as we fought with each other only to that of fullers' mallets in the house of al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah b. Abī Muʿayṭ. [Continuing,] he said: Thus it was. Then God defeated them and made them turn their backs to us [in flight].

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah[297]—Abū Ṣādiq:[298] Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar would say to his standard bearer, "Plunge into them with your banner." The standard bearer would reply to him, "May I be made your ransom! I have no room to advance." "Indeed you have," Ibn al-Ashtar would reply. "Your 296. Proverbial: see Freytag, II, 641 (Maydānī, II, 203).

297. Al-Ḥārith b. Ḥaṣīrah al-Azdī Abū Nuʿmān al-Kūfī was a muḥaddith of the sixth "class" and lived to the age of 100. The traditions related from him concern the virtues of the family of the Prophet. He was considered an extreme Shīʿī, even a Khashabī. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 205.

298. Abū Ṣādiq al-Azdī al-Kūfī: his full name is variously given as Muslim b. Yazīd or ʿAbdallāh b. Nājid. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 206.

comrades will fight[299] and, God willing, they will not flee." When his standard bearer advanced with his banner, Ibrāhīm attacked with his sword and felled every man he struck, driving the men [713] before him as if they were sheep. Whenever he attacked with his banner, his companions attacked as one man.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mishraqī:[300] 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād had with him on that day a sharp sword that spared nothing it touched. When his forces were defeated, 'Uyaynah b. Asmā' picked up his sister, Hind bint Asmā' (she was the wife of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād), and took her[301] away. He recited the following verse of rajaz poetry:[302]

If you sever our bonds, oft in the fray will I make the courageous distinguished man perish.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj: When Ibrāhīm [b. al-Ashtar] attacked Ibn Ziyād and his forces, the latter were defeated after fierce fighting and many deaths on both sides. When 'Umayr b. al-Ḥubāb saw that Ibrāhīm's men had defeated those of 'Ubaydallāh, he sent word to Ibrāhīm, saying, "Shall I come to you now?" Ibrāhīm replied, "Do not come to me until the anger of God's picked troops abates, for I fear they may do you harm."

Ibn al-Ashtar said, "I killed a man who smelled of musk.[303] His arms went to the east and feet to the west. He was under a separate banner on the bank of the Khāzir River."[304] They looked to see who he was, and it turned out to be 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād who had been slain: Ibrāhīm had struck him and cut him in two, so that his [714] feet had gone to the east and his arms to the west. Sharīk b. Jadīr al-Taghlibī attacked al-Ḥusayn b. Numayr al-Sakūnī, supposing him

299. Mss. O and Co add, "behind it."

300. Full name: al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. 'Abdallāh al-Mishraqī (U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 200).

301. Possibly, "took it (i.e., the sword) away."

302. Rajaz, the least formal of the Arabic meters, is often used for hastily improvised verses.

303. The parallel in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 250, adds that Ibn al-Ashtar did not know for certain who the man was. Cf. also Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 303.

304. Mss. O and Co read: "'I killed a man under a separate banner on the bank of the Khāzir River.' So they looked for him, and I smelled the odor of musk from him. His arms had gone to the east and his feet to the west."

to be 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād. Each of them grasped the other, and al-Taghlibī cried out, "Kill me and the son of the whore." Ibn al-Numayr was killed.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān [b. Ṣāliḥ]—'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak—al-Ḥasan b. Kathīr, who said: Sharīk b. Jadīr al-Taghlibī had been with 'Alī (may God bless him and grant him peace) and had been injured in the eye with him.[305] When the war involving 'Alī ended, he made his way to Jerusalem and was there when the murder of al-Ḥusayn was reported to him. He said, "I swear to God that if I am given the power to do so,"—that is, to avenge the blood of al-Ḥusayn—"I will kill Ibn Marjānah or die in the attempt." When he was told that al-Mukhtār had come out seeking vengeance for the blood of al-Ḥusayn, he went to him. [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār sent him with Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar, and he was placed in charge of the horsemen from [the tribal group of] Rabī'ah. He said to his companions, "Thus have I sworn to God." Three hundred men swore allegiance to him until death. When the encounter took place, he attacked and with his companions began to rip apart line after line until they reached 'Ubaydallāh. The dust rose and nothing was to be heard but the din of iron and swords. When the men separated, the two lay dead, al-Taghlibī and 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, with no one between them. [Continuing,] he said: It was he who said:

All life I think loathsome, save planting the spear firmly in the horse's shadow.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj, who said: Shuraḥbīl b. Dhī al-Kalā' was killed. Three men claimed to have killed him: Sufyān b. Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal al-Azdī, Warqā' b. 'Āzib al-Asadī, and 'Ubaydallāh b. Zuhayr al-Sulamī. [715]

[Continuing,] he said: When 'Ubaydallāh's forces were defeated, Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar's men pursued them. Those who drowned were more than those who were slain. Their camp was taken, with all sorts of things in it. This was reported to al-Mukhtār, who had been saying to his companions, "Victory will come to you today or tomorrow, God willing, at the hands of Ibrāhīm

305. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 264, adds: "at [the Battle of] Ṣiffīn."

b. al-Ashtar and his forces, who will have defeated the forces of 'Ubaydallāh b. Marjānah." [Continuing,] he said: Having appointed al-Sā'ib b. Mālik al-Ash'arī as his deputy over the city, al-Mukhtār left al-Kūfah. He led the men out and encamped at Sābāṭ.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mishraqī—al-Sha'bī, who said: My father and I were among those who went out with him. [Continuing,] he said: When we had passed beyond Sābāṭ, al-Mukhtār said to the people, "Rejoice, for God's picked troops have indeed slain them with the sword for a day until nightfall at Naṣībīn,[306] or close to Naṣībīn, and just this side of their own homes.[307] Most of them, however, are besieged at Naṣībīn."

[Continuing,] he said: We entered al-Madā'in and assembled in his presence. He ascended the pulpit. By God, even while he was preaching to us and commanding us to be earnest, hold right beliefs, exert ourselves, and be firm in obedience and in seeking vengeance for the blood of the people of [the Prophet's] family, the good news came to him, one message after another, about the death of 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, the defeat of his forces, the taking of his camp, and the killing of the Syrian ashrāf. So al-Mukhtār
[716] said, "You picked troops of God, did I not announce this good news to you before it took place?" "Yes," they said, "you said so."

[Continuing,] he said: A certain neighbor of ours from the tribe of Hamdān said to me, "Do you believe now, O Sha'bī?" [Continuing,] he said: I said, "What should I believe? Should I believe that al-Mukhtār knows the invisible? I will never believe it." He said, "Didn't he tell us they had been defeated?" I said to him, "He told us they had been defeated at Naṣībīn in the land of al-Jazīrah, but it was at Khāzir in the land of al-Mawṣil." He said, "By God, O Sha'bī, you will not believe until you see 'the painful chastisement.'"[308] Al-Mishraqī said: I asked al-Sha'bī, "Who was this man from Hamdān who was saying this to you?" He answered, "A man who, by my life, was brave and who was later 306. Naṣībīn, an important city of al-Jazīrah province, lay about 120 miles northwest of al-Mawṣil. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

307. Mss. O and Co read, "and have inherited their homes."

308. The Qur'ān speaks frequently of the "painful chastisement," i.e., the punishment in hell that awaits people who deny God's signs.

killed with al-Mukhtār at the Battle of Ḥarūrā'. He was called Salmān b. Ḥimyar, from the Thawr clan of Hamdān."

[Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār returned to al-Kūfah. Ibn al-Ashtar went from his camp to al-Mawṣil and sent out his financial agents ('ummāl) over the territory. He sent out his brother, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh, to be in charge of Naṣībīn, and he subdued Sinjār, Dārā, and the adjacent territory of al-Jazīrah.[309] The people of al-Kūfah whom al-Mukhtār had fought and defeated[310] went out and joined Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr in al-Baṣrah. Among those who went to Muṣ'ab was Shabath b. Rib'ī.

Praising Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar and his companions for killing 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, Surāqah b. Mirdās al-Bāriqī said the following:

There came upon you a young man, one of the chiefs of [the tribe of] Madhḥij, courageous against enemies, unflinching.
Son of Ziyād, be slain in retaliation for the greatest Mālik;[311] taste the blade of a burnished, piercing two-edged [sword].
We smote you with the cutting of the sword in fury,[312] when we slew a slayer in retaliation for a man slain.
May God reward the picked troops of God, for they sated my thirst for vengeance upon 'Ubaydallāh yesterday.

[Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr Becomes Governor of al-Baṣrah]

In this year, 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr removed al-Qubā'[313] from al-Baṣrah and sent his own brother Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr to be in charge of it. [717]

309. Sinjār lies about 55 miles west of al-Mawṣil. Dārā lies about 20 miles west of Naṣībīn. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.vv. Cf. the longer lists of agents to be found in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 251; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 302.

310. I.e., the ashrāf whom al-Mukhtār had defeated at the Battle of Jabbānat al-Sabī' in Dhū al-Ḥijjah 66 (July 686).

311. I.e., Mālik b. al-Ḥārith al-Nakha'ī, surnamed al-Ashtar, the father of Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar. Appointed by 'Alī to the governorship of Egypt, he was poisoned by an agent of Mu'āwiyah. See Ṭabarī, I, 3393f.

312. Instead of "in fury," the Dīwān, 34, reads, "and we did no wrong."

313. Full name: Al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah al-Qurashī al-Makhzūmī al-Qubā'.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah[314]—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—al-Sha'bī—Wāfid b. Abī Yāsir, who said: 'Amr b. Sarḥ, a mawlā of al-Zubayr, used to come to us. He said to us: "By God, I was with the party that came from Mecca to al-Baṣrah with al-Muṣ'ab[315] b. al-Zubayr." [Continuing,] he said: Muṣ'ab came with his face muffled. Having made his camel kneel by the door of the mosque, he entered and ascended the pulpit. The people said, "Commander! Commander!"

[Continuing,] he said: When al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah, who had been the city's commander before him, came, al-Muṣ'ab unveiled his face. The people recognized him and said, "Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr!" He said to al-Ḥārith, "Come up! Come up!" So the latter ascended and sat a step below Muṣ'ab on the pulpit. [Continuing,] he said: Then al-Muṣ'ab stood. Having praised and extolled God [and, by God, he did not speak a great deal], he said, "'In the Name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. Ṭā, Sīn, Mīm. Those are the signs of the Manifest Book. We will recite to thee something of the tiding of Moses [and Pharaoh].'"[316] When he reached the words, "He[317] was of the workers of corruption," he pointed his hand in the direction of Syria. [Continuing to recite, he said,] "'Yet We desired to be gracious to those that were abased in the land, and to make them leaders, and to make them the inheritors.'" Here he pointed his hand in the direction of the Ḥijāz. "'And to show Pharaoh and Haman, and their hosts, what they were dreading from them.'" Here he pointed his hand in the direction of Syria.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—'Awānah, who said: When Muṣ'ab came to al-Baṣrah, he delivered a sermon to the people and said: "People of al-Baṣrah, I have been told that you nickname your commanders. I have named myself 'al-Jazzār' [the Slaughterer]."[318]

---

314. Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah (b. 173/789, d. 262/875), a traditionist and historian, was a pupil of al-Madā'inī. According to Ṭabarī, II, 168, Ṭabarī personally studied 'Umar b. Shabbah's Kitāb akhbār ahl al-Baṣrah under the author. See F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 345; U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 44–5; and Rotter, "Zur Überlieferung einiger historischer Werke Madā'inīs," 110.

315. Mss. O and Co, Muṣ'ab

316. Qur'ān 28:1–5.

317. I.e., Pharaoh.

318. The nickname alludes to generosity (slaughtering many camels to feed

[Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr Defeats al-Mukhtār]

During this year, Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr marched against al-Mukhtār and killed him. [718]

Why Muṣʿab Marched against Him; an Account of Mukhtār's Death

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥabīb b. Budayl, who said:[319] When Shabath [b. Ribʿī] came to join Muṣʿab, he was riding a female mule whose tail had been docked and the tip of whose ear had been cut. He had torn his tunic (qabāʾ) and was shouting, "Help! Help!" Someone went to Muṣʿab and told him that there was a man at the gate with his tunic torn shouting for help, and he described him. Muṣʿab said, "Yes, this is Shabath b. Ribʿī; no one else would do this. Bring him in." Shabath was brought before Muṣʿab. The Kūfan ashrāf came before Muṣʿab and told him how they had gathered around Shabath, what they had suffered, and how their own slaves and mawālī had risen against them. They complained to him and asked him to assist them and march against al-Mukhtār with them.

Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath b. Qays also came to them. He had not been present at the fighting in al-Kūfah, having been in a fortress of his at Ṭīzanābādh, near al-Qādisiyyah. When the defeat of the men was reported to him, he prepared himself to march forth. Al-Mukhtār inquired about him, was told where he was, and sent ʿAbdallāh b. Qurād al-Khathʿamī with a hundred men to deal with him. When Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath was told that they were marching against him and had drawn near, he went out into the desert in the direction of al-Muṣʿab, until he joined him. Having reached al-Muṣʿab, he urged the latter to go forth. Muṣʿab drew him near to himself and honored him because of his high guests), rather than to bloodthirstiness. Cf. Dozy, Supplément, I, 192 (s.v. jazūr). In Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 281, the remark occurs in the context of descriptions of Muṣʿab's generosity.

319. Ḥabīb b. Budayl al-Nahshalī was governor of al-Rayy in 131/748. See Ṭabarī, III, 2, 3.

rank. [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār sent men to the house of Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath and destroyed it.

[719] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf[320] b. Yazīd: When al-Muṣʿab was about to march against al-Kūfah, many men having come to him,[321] he said to Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, "I will not go until al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah comes to me." Al-Muṣʿab wrote to al-Muhallab, who was his governor over Fārs,[322] saying, "Come to us, so that you may be present in our enterprise, for we are about to march against al-Kūfah." However, al-Muhallab and his companions delayed, giving as reason something having to do with taxes (kharāj), not wishing to go forth. Muṣʿab therefore ordered Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, among the things he urged him to do, to go to al-Muhallab and bring him. He informed him that he would not set out unless al-Muhallab came. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath took al-Muṣʿab's letter to al-Muhallab. When the latter read it, he said to Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, "Does someone like you, Muḥammad, come as a letter carrier? Could al-Muṣʿab find no letter carrier besides you?" Muḥammad [b. al-Ashʿath] replied, "By God, I am nobody's letter carrier—except that our slaves and mawālī have taken our wives, children, and families from us by force!"

Al-Muhallab therefore set out. He came bringing many troops and much money with him, with such troops and in such a state of readiness as none of the people of al-Baṣrah could match. When al-Muhallab entered al-Baṣrah, he went to al-Muṣʿab's door in order to go in to meet him, having obtained permission for the men. However, the gatekeeper barred his way, not recognizing him Al-Muhallab raised his hand and broke the man's nose. The man went inside to al-Muṣʿab with his nose dripping blood. "What happened to you?" asked Muṣʿab. He answered, "A man I do not know hit me." Al-Muhallab entered. When the gatekeeper

320. Ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXII, corrects ms. "Abū Yūsuf" to "Yūsuf."

321. The parallel in Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 310, puts the number of Kūfans who had left for al-Baṣrah at 10,000.

322. Arabic, Fāris (Persian, Fārs or Pārs): The Iranian province lying on the Persian Gulf, east of Khūzistān and west of Kirmān. Its chief city at this time was Iṣṭakhr. Shīrāz, located in it, was founded later by al-Ḥajjāj. See *EI*², s.v.; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 6, 248ff.

saw him, he said, "That's the one!" Al-Muṣ'ab said to him, "Go back to your post."

Al-Muṣ'ab ordered the men to encamp by the Great Pontoon Bridge (al-Jisr al-Akbar). Summoning 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, he said to him, "Go to al-Kūfah and induce everyone you can to come out to me. Invite them to swear allegiance to me secretly, and induce al-Mukhtār's companions to abandon him." So 'Abd [720] al-Raḥmān left him clandestinely and remained in his home, concealing himself, and not appearing [in public]. Al-Muṣ'ab set out. He sent 'Abbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Ḥabaṭī of the Banū Tamīm ahead in charge of his vanguard. He sent 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar in charge of his right wing, and al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah in charge of his left wing. He put Mālik b. Misma' in charge of the Bakr b. Wā'il fifth,[323] Mālik b. al-Mundhir in charge of the 'Abd al-Qays fifth, al-Aḥnaf b. Qays in charge of the Tamīm fifth, Ziyād b. 'Amr al-Azdī in charge of the al-Azd fifth, and Qays b. al-Haytham in charge of the Highland[324] fifth.

This was reported to al-Mukhtār, who stood up among his companions, praised and extolled God, and said, "People of al-Kūfah! People of the religion [of Islam], upholders of the truth, helpers of the weak, and partisans of the Messenger and of the family of the Messenger! Those who have fled from you, who sought to harm you, have gone to their fellow transgressors and drawn them into error against you, that truth may cease and vanity be lifted up, and that the friends of God may be slain. By God, if you perish, God will be worshiped on earth only with lying against God and cursing against the family of His Prophet.[325] Rally to the call with Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ. If you meet them, you will slay them, God willing, as 'Ād and Iram were slain."[326]

---

323. Khums, pl. akhmās, "fifth": The army of al-Baṣrah was divided into five divisions.

324. Arabic al-'Āliyah refers to the highlands of the Ḥijāz north and east of Medina. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v., gives a list of tribes included in this area. See note 261.

325. A reference to the Umayyad practice of cursing 'Alī from the pulpit.

326. 'Ād and Iram appear in the Qur'ān as examples of nations that perished, 'Ād because it rejected the prophet sent to it by God. The two names are juxtaposed in Qur'ān 89:7. See EI^{2}, s.vv.

Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ went out and encamped at Ḥammām A'yan. Al-Mukhtār summoned the heads of the fourths (arbā') who had been with Ibn al-Ashtar and sent them with Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ as they had been with Ibn al-Ashtar. (They had left Ibn al-Ashtar because they thought he was making light of al-Mukhtār's enter-[721] prise, and had departed from him.) Al-Mukhtār sent them with Ibn Shumayṭ and sent a massive army with him. Ibn Shumayṭ went out. In charge of his vanguard, he sent Ibn Kāmil al-Shākirī. Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ marched until he arrived at al-Madhār.[327] Al-Muṣ'ab came and encamped near him.

Each of them mustered his army, and they advanced toward each other. Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ put 'Abdallāh b. Kāmil al-Shākirī in charge of his right wing, 'Abdallāh b. [Anas b.][328] Wahb b. Naḍlah al-Jushamī in charge of his left wing, Razīn 'Abd al-Salūlī in charge of the horsemen, Kathīr b. Ismā'īl al-Kindī (at the battle of Khāzir he had been with Ibn al-Ashtar) in charge of the foot soldiers, and Kaysān Abū 'Amrah (a mawlā of 'Uraynah) in charge of the mawālī.

Having been put in charge of the left wing, 'Abdallāh b. Wahb b. Anas[329] al-Jushamī came to Ibn Shumayṭ and said to him, "Mawālī and slaves are weaklings when it comes time to show true fortitude. Although you are walking, they have many men on horseback with them. Order them to dismount with you, for they will have an example to emulate in you. I fear that if they are assaulted for a time and attacked with spears and swords, they will flee on the backs of their horses and abandon you. However, if you make them go on foot, they will have no choice but to hold out." ['Abdallāh b. Anas] said this only out of rancor toward the mawālī and slaves, because of what they [sc. the ashrāf] had experienced at their hands in al-Kūfah. If the battle turned against them, he wanted them to be on foot and none of them to escape. Ibn Shumayṭ did not suspect him; believing that he only wanted to give him good advice, so that they would hold out and fight, he said, "You mawālī, dismount with me and fight." So they dismounted with him and walked in front of him and his banner.

327. Al-Madhār, the main city of the Maysān district, lay about 200 miles southeast of al-Kūfah and 40 miles north of al-Baṣrah, on the shore of a backwater formed by a former bed of the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 42–3.

328. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 253 (and note).

329. Sic, except in Ms. C, which omits "b. Anas."

Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr came. He had put ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn in charge of the horsemen. Having approached Ibn Shumayṭ and his forces, ʿAbbād said, "We summon you only to the Book of God, the Sunnah of His Messenger, and allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr." The other side said, "We summon you to the Book of God, to the Sunnah of His Messenger, to allegiance to the commander al-Mukhtār, and to our making this issue a matter to be determined by consultation (shūrā) among the family of the Prophet. As for any person who alleges that someone ought to rule over them,[330] we disavow him and will strive against him." ʿAbbād returned and reported to al-Muṣʿab. Al-Muṣʿab said to him, "Go back and attack them." ʿAbbād went back and attacked Ibn Shumayṭ and his forces, but none of them gave way; then he returned to his position. Al-Muhallab attacked [ʿAbdallāh] b. Kāmil. The forces [of the latter] jostled[331] each other in the fray,[332] and Ibn Kāmil dismounted. Al-Muhallab then drew back from him, and [Ibn Kāmil][333] stood his ground. They stopped [fighting] for a time; then al-Muhallab said to his forces, "Charge them with true bravery, for the enemy have given you hope by their confusion." So he made a formidable attack on them, and they retreated. Ibn Kāmil held his ground with foot soldiers from Hamdān, and al-Muhallab could hear the men's battle cry, "I am the young man of Shākir! I am the young man of Shibām! I am the young man of Thawr!" But it was only a short time before they were defeated. [722]

ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar attacked ʿAbdallāh b. Anas. The latter fought for a time and then retreated. All the men together attacked [Aḥmar] b. Shumayṭ, who fought until he was killed. His men called to each other, "Men of Bajīlah and Khathʿam, be steadfast!" But al-Muhallab called to them, "Flee! Flight is safer for you today. Why will you kill yourselves on the side of these slaves? God has led your enterprise astray." Then he looked toward [723]

330. Viz., the family of the Prophet.
331. Mss. O and Co read: "They jostled each other."
332. For this meaning of jāla, see Blachère, Dictionnaire, s.v.
333. The antecedent is unclear.

his companions and said, "By God, I think the killing has been vehement today only among my men." The horsemen turned on Ibn Shumayṭ's foot soldiers, who separated and fled, taking to the desert. Al-Muṣ'ab dispatched 'Abbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn in charge of the horsemen, saying, "Behead any prisoner you take." And he sent Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath with a large body of horsemen, Kūfan horsemen who were among the people al-Mukhtār had expelled, saying, "Take your revenge!" The Kūfans were even more severe than the Baṣrans toward those who were defeated. They killed every fleeing man they overtook and pardoned no prisoner that they took. [Continuing,] he said: Of that army, only a group of horsemen escaped; the foot soldiers perished, except for a few.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ibn 'Ayyāsh al-Mantūf,[334] who said: Mu'āwiyah b. Qurrah al-Muzanī[335] said [to me], "I caught up with one of them, put the head of my spear into his eye, and began mashing his eye with the head of my spear." I said to him, "You did that to him?" "Yes," he said, "we thought it more permissible to spill their blood than to kill Turks and Daylamites."[336] Mu'āwiyah b. Qurrah was a judge of the people of al-Baṣrah. Concerning [the battle at al-Madhār], al-A'shā[337] said:

Yea, has it reached you? Reports are told about what [the tribe of] Bajīlah encountered at al-Madhār.
There a strong blow was ordained for them, and a well-aimed thrust at the beginning of the day.
It was as if a cloud had hurled thunderbolts upon them and encompassed them with destruction there.
Announce humiliation to al-Mukhtār's Shī'ah, 334. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh b. Abī Rabī'ah al-Mantūf Abū al-Jarrāḥ (d. 158/775) was an expert in genealogy and poetry. See Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 191.

335. Ibid., p. 191.

336. The Daylamites were an Iranian people living in the highlands of Gīlān in northern Iran. They had served the Sasanians as mercenaries and stubbornly maintained their independence despite many Muslim expeditions against them. See EI[2], s.v. Daylam.

337. I.e., A'shā Hamdān. The version in the Dīwān, 330, adds two lines at the end of the poem: "What happened to them did not displease me, whether things go badly or well for me. Rather, I was gladdened, my sleep became sweet, and I rested calmly because of their death."

if you pass by the little city[338] of al-Kūfah.
Their fallen men and the many remnants of their army slaughtered in the deserts delighted my eye.
I did not rejoice that my people were killed, even if they, in truth, were empowered to choose;[339]
Rather, I rejoiced at what overtook
Abū Isḥāq[340]—shame and disgrace. [724]

Al-Muṣʿab advanced across the reeds in the direction of Wāsiṭ.[341] (The present city of Wāsiṭ had not yet been built at that time.) He took the road to Kaskar,[342] and then loaded the foot soldiers, their baggage, and those who were weak onto boats and traveled by way of a canal called the Khurshādh. From that canal, he came out onto a canal called Qūsān, whence he brought his men out onto the Euphrates.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī: The people from al-Baṣrah would get out and pull their boats, saying:

Al-Muṣʿab has accustomed us to pulling hawsers and ships long and hollow.

[Continuing,] he said: When the Persians who were with al-Mukhtār learned what had befallen their brethren with Ibn Shumayṭ, they said in Persian, "Īn bār durōgh guft," meaning, "This time he has lied."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Thaqafī—ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī ʿUmayr al-Thaqafī, who said: By God, I was sitting by al-Mukhtār when the defeat of the men

338. Al-Kuwayfah, the diminutive of al-Kūfah, is probably being used contemptuously. There was, however, a place called Kuwayfat Ibn ʿUmar, near Bazīqiyā in the district of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v. al-Kuwayfah.

339. The translation follows the Leiden text (fī khiyārī) and von Goutta, Aġānī-artikel, 51. The sense would be: "even if they willingly chose to follow the error of al-Mukhtār."

340. I.e., al-Mukhtār.

341. The city of Wāsiṭ, founded in 84/703 by al-Ḥajjāj, lay on the Tigris, approximately equidistant (50 leagues) from Baghdad, al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, and Ahwāz. From al-Madhār, the site of Wāsiṭ lay about 100 miles to the northwest. South of Wāsiṭ, the Tigris flowed into the Great Swamp, the "reeds" to which the text refers. See Le Strange, Lands, 39–40; EI[1], s.v.

342. Kaskar was a town across the river from Wāsiṭ and gave its name to the surrounding district. See Le Strange, loc. cit.; EI[2], s.v.

and what had befallen them was reported to him. [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār turned to me and said, "By God, the slaves have been killed on an unheard-of scale." Then he said, "Ibn Shumayṭ and Ibn Kāmil have been killed, as well as others," and he named Arab casualties each of whom was better in war than a multitude of men. [Continuing,] he said: I said to him, "By God, this is a disaster." He said to me, "There is no escape from death, and there is no death I would rather die than one like that of Ibn Shumayṭ. How excellent the deaths of noble men!" [Continuing,] he said: Thus, I realized that the man had resolved inwardly that, [725] if he did not attain his object, he would fight until he died.

When it was reported to al-Mukhtār that Muṣ'ab's forces were coming toward him by water and by land, he took his men and encamped at al-Saylaḥīn,[343] facing the confluence of the al-Ḥīrah, al-Saylaḥīn, al-Qādisiyyah, and Yūsuf[344] canals. He dammed the Euphrates below the confluence of the canals, so that all the water of the Euphrates went into these canals, and the boats of the Baṣrans were left in the mud. When they saw this, they got out of the boats and walked. Their horsemen galloped forward, reached the dam, broke it, and headed toward al-Kūfah. When he saw this, al-Mukhtār went toward them and encamped at Ḥarūrā',[345] blocking their way to al-Kūfah. He had fortified his palace and the mosque and had brought provisions for the siege into his palace.

Al-Muṣ'ab came marching toward al-Mukhtār, who was at Ḥarūrā' and had left 'Abdallāh b. Shaddād as his agent in charge of al-Kūfah. Al-Mukhtār came out to meet Muṣ'ab, having put Sulaym b. Yazīd al-Kindī in charge of his right wing and Sa'īd b. Munqidh al-Hamdānī al-Thawrī in charge of his left wing. 'Abdallāh b. Qurād al-Khath'amī was in charge of al-Mukhtār's picked troops (shurṭah) that day. Al-Mukhtār sent 'Umar[346] b. 'Abdallāh al-Nahdī in charge of the horsemen and Mālik b. 'Amr[347] al-Nahdī in charge of the foot soldiers. Muṣ'ab put al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah in charge of his right wing, 'Umar b.

343. Al-Saylaḥīn (or al-Saylaḥūn) was located between al-Ḥīrah and al-Qādisiyyah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

344. Corrected from the ms. reading "Bursuf" (ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXII).

345. Ḥarūrā' was about two miles from al-Kūfah (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.).

346. Mss. O, Co and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 270: "'Amr."

347. Mss. O, Co and Ibn al-Athīr, loc. cit., "'Abdallāh."

ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar al-Taymī in charge of his left wing, ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Ḥabaṭī in charge of the horsemen, and Muqātil b. Mismaʿ al-Bakrī in charge of the foot soldiers. He himself dismounted to go on foot, shouldering a bow of his.

[Continuing,] he said: Muṣʿab put Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath in charge of the Kūfans. Muḥammad came and encamped between [726] al-Muṣʿab and al-Mukhtār, moving to the west and to the right. [Continuing,] he said: When al-Mukhtār saw that, he sent one of his companions against each of the fifths of the Baṣrans. He sent Saʿīd b. Munqidh, the commander of his left wing, against the [fifth of] Bakr b. Wāʾil, which was led by Mālik b. Mismaʿ al-Bakrī. He sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ al-Shibāmī, who was in charge of his treasury, against the [fifth of] ʿAbd al-Qays, which was led by Mālik b. al-Mundhir. He sent ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿdah al-Qurashī al-Makhzūmī against the [fifth] of the Highlanders, who were led by Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī. He sent Musāfir b. Saʿīd b. Nimrān al-Nāʿiṭī against the [fifth of] al-Azd, which was led by Ziyād b. ʿAmr al-ʿAtakī. He sent Sulaym b. Yazīd al-Kindī, the commander of his right wing, against the [fifth of] Banū Tamīm, which was led by al-Aḥnaf b. Qays. He sent al-Sāʾib b. Mālik al-Ashʿarī against Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath. He himself halted among the rest of his forces.

The men advanced and closed with each other. Saʿīd b. Munqidh and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ attacked [the fifths of] Bakr b. Wāʾil and ʿAbd al-Qays, which were in the left wing under ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar. The forces of Rabīʿah[348] fought them fiercely and held their own against them, but Saʿīd b. Munqidh and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Shurayḥ did not abandon the attack: when one attacked and withdrew, the other then attacked, and sometimes both attacked together.

[Continuing,] he said: Al-Muṣʿab sent word to al-Muhallab, saying, "Why are you waiting to attack those across from you? Don't you see what these two fifths have been encountering since the day began? Attack with your forces." Al-Muhallab replied, "By my life, I am not one to make the Azd and Tamīm slaughter, 348. I.e., the forces from the tribes of Bakr b. Wāʾil and ʿAbd al-Qays, both of which belonged to the grouping of Rabīʿah tribes.

for fear of the people of al-Kūfah, until I see my opportunity."[349]

[727] [Continuing,] he said: Al-Mukhtār sent word to ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿdah, saying, "Attack those opposite you." Accordingly, he attacked the Highlanders and put them to flight, so that they came at last to al-Muṣʿab. Not being one to flee, al-Muṣʿab knelt on his knees and shot his arrows, and the men took up a position beside him. The two sides fought for a time and then separated.

[Continuing,] he said: Al-Muṣʿab sent to al-Muhallab, who was with two large and numerous fifths and the skilled horsemen, saying, "May you have no father![350] Why are you waiting to attack the enemy?" The latter waited not far away and said to his companions, "The men have fought since the day began, while you have been standing still. They have done a good job; now it remains for you to do what you ought to do. Attack! Pray for God's help, and be steadfast." [Al-Muhallab] vigorously attacked those who were near him; they crushed al-Mukhtār's forces badly and put them to flight. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr al-Nahdī,[351] a veteran of Ṣiffīn,[352] said, "O God, I am in the same state of mind as I was that Thursday night at Ṣiffīn. O God, I declare to Thee that I have no part in the action of these men"—meaning his companions when they fled—"and I declare to Thee that I have no part with the souls of these men"—meaning the companions of al-Muṣʿab. He then fought with his sword until he was killed.

Mālik b. ʿAmr Abū Nimrān al-Nahdī, who was in charge of [al-Mukhtār's] foot soldiers, was brought his horse and he mounted. Al-Mukhtār's forces were in full flight, as if they were a canebrake set ablaze. Having mounted, Mālik said, "What am I going to do by mounting? By God, I would rather be killed here than be killed in my house. Where are the men of valor? Where are the men of 349. The reading in Balādhurī, Ansab, V, 259, is superior: "I am not one to make the Azd and Tamīm slaughter the Khashabiyyah of the people of al-Kūfah, until I see my opportunity." The words khashyah (fear) and khashabiyyah are easily confused in Arabic script.

350. Lā abā laka, which is more an expletive or an expression of impatience than a real curse.

351. He was commanding al-Mukhtār's cavalry. See Ṭabarī, II, 725, above.

352. At Siffīn, a plain on the right bank of the Euphrates near al-Raqqah, in 38/657, forces loyal to the caliph ʿAlī confronted those of Muʿāwiyah, the governor of Syria and leader of the party demanding vengeance for the death of the caliph ʿUthmān.

steadfastness?" About fifty men returned to him—it was toward evening—and he wheeled round to attack the forces of Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath was killed next to him—both he[353] and most of his companions. Some men therefore say [728] it was Abū Nimrān who killed Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath. (Abū Nimrān was found slain next to him.) But Kindah assert that ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ashāʾah al-Kindī was the man who killed him; that when al-Mukhtār with his companions passed by Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath lying dead, he said, "O supporters, attack the guileful foxes"; they attacked, and Abū Nimrān was killed. Khathʿam assert that ʿAbdallāh b. Qurād[354] was the man who killed [Ibn al-Ashʿath].

According to Abū Mikhnaf: I heard ʿAwf b. ʿAmr[355] al-Jushamī assert that one of their mawālī killed him. Four persons claimed his killing, each of them asserting to have slain him.

The forces of Saʿīd b. Munqidh retreated. He fought amid a band of his tribesmen, about seventy men, until they were killed. Salīm b. Yazīd al-Kindī fought amid ninety men, tribesmen of his and others. He fought until he was killed. Al-Mukhtār fought at the entrance of the Shabath Road.[356] He dismounted, intending not to withdraw, and fought most of that night, until the men left him. Among his companions, men of his bodyguard, who were killed with him that night were ʿĀṣim b. ʿAbdallāh al-Azdī, ʿAyyāsh b. Khāzim al-Hamdānī al-Thawrī, and Aḥmar b. Ḥadīj al-Hamdānī al-Fāyishī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Zubayr:[357] The men of Hamdān called to each other that night, saying, "People of Hamdān strike them with swords and fight them as hard as you can."

When they dispersed, leaving al-Mukhtār, his companions said to him, "Commander, the men have gone away. Go back to your [729] dwelling, to the palace." Al-Mukhtār said, "By God, I did not dismount intending to go to the palace. But since they have gone

353. I.e., Ibn al-Ashʿath.
354. Commander of al-Mukhtar's police.
355. Mss. O and C: ʿAmr b. ʿAwf.
356. This road was probably located in the southeast part of al-Kūfah. See Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 241.
357. Full name: Abū al-Zubayr al-Arḥabī al-Hamdānī. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 190.

away, let us ride in the name of God." So he came and entered the palace.

Concerning the death of Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, al-Aʿshā [Hamdān] said:[358]

To your eye its rheum returned;
to your soul its recollection returned.
You returned to one of your nights;
you were wakeful, though watchers sought sleep.
Not until its dawn brightened did the eye taste the savor of slumber.
Those who announced the death of Abū Qāsim[359] arose; and their weeping caused tears to flow.
It was right that for the son of al-Ashajj[360] eyes should not cease their flowing,
That they should continue to weep for him, and that their lashes be moist with tears.
For you, Muḥammad, since you have been slain, the lands and their trees weep.
Whenever people mention you, they weep—whenever a pact is betrayed by its protector.
Many a bare winter's night, when the maysir[361] players distributed nothing;
When the savage dogs did not bark, and there was nothing but growling and torpor [because of the cold];
When a cloak was of no benefit to the youth, nor the woman's close place of concealment to the lady;
On such nights, Muḥammad, you regarded camels as of little value and butchered them.
Your bowls remained set out, their edges running over with fat.

358. The poem can be found in the Dīwān (ed. Geyer), 331–32.

359. The kunyah of Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath.

360. The son of al-Ashajj is Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath. Al-Ashajj ("the man whose head was wounded") is another nickname for al-Ashʿath ("the man with dissheveled or matted hair") b. Qays al-Kindī. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Usd al-ghābah, I, 97.

361. Maysir was a game in which players cast lots for the pieces of a slaughtered camel; see EI[2], s.v.

The last drops in your milk skin were completely consumed [by your guests], when the camels whose milk was drying up were led back from pasture.
O bestower of comely servants; [730]
if they are measured, their stature is full.
O bestower of short-haired [horses swift] as arrows:
those who display them please the battle line.
O bestower of young she-camels of good breed that have recently foaled, and their first-born foals answer each other.
You were like the Tigris when its current heaps itself up and rushes into the sea.
You were bold and full of strength, when proof of these traits was sought of you.
If a town ever came to be in tumult, and its tyrant proclaimed war,
You sent against it men of piercing eyes, so that reports about it came succeeding one another—With God's permission! And the horses' training place was prepared for that campaign.
You fed your horses swift running, until their colts were neglected.
The stout camel cutting its first teeth knew that you would tire it on the plain.
Oh my grief the day you encountered them, when those who fled betrayed your men!
The horsemen came back defeated, in distress, their backs wounded,
At the river bank of Ḥarūrā'; and there gathered against you the mawālī and their beguiler.[362]
You risked your life in their defense, [731] and the risking of it gained disaster.
Do not be far, O Abū Qāsim!
For the soul's measure will reach it;
The accidents of fortune and the passage and succession of nights have made our lords perish.

362. I.e., al-Mukhtār.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]: My father said that al-Sā'ib came with Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr and was killed by Warqā' al-Nakha'ī from [the clan of] Wahbīl. Warqā' said:

Who will take a message from me to 'Ubayd, that I have overcome his brother with a sword of Indian steel?
If you seek knowledge about him, he is lying prostrate by the two monasteries, with no pillow for his head.
Resolutely I sought him and brought his head low with a trenchant blade;
and I bereaved him of [his son], Sufyān, after [the death of] Muḥammad.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥaṣīrah b. 'Abdallāh:[363] Every extremist of the Shī'ah used to gather and talk at the house of Hind bint al-Mutakallifah al-Nā'iṭiyyah and at the house of Laylā bint Qumāmah al-Muzaniyyah. The latter's brother, Rifā'ah b. Qumāmah, was a member of the Shī'ah of 'Alī, but, since he was a moderate, she did not like him. Abū 'Abdallāh al-Jadalī and Yazīd b. Sharāḥīl had informed Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah about these two women and their extremism and about Abū al-Aḥrās al-Murādī, al-Buṭayn al-Laythī, and Abū al-Ḥārith al-Kindī.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Yaḥyā b. Abī 'Īsā, who said:[364] Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah had sent a letter with Yazīd b. Sharāḥīl to the Shī'ah in al-Kūfah, warning them of these people. He wrote to them:

[732] From Muḥammad b. 'Alī to those of our Shī'ah who are at al-Kūfah. To proceed: Go forth to the assemblies and the mosques; remember God both publicly and secretly, and do not take for yourselves intimates outside the believers.[365] If you fear for your souls, beware those who speak lies against your religion. Be frequent in worship, fasting, and prayer; for no creature has power to hurt or profit anyone, except as God wills. Every soul shall be pledged for what it has earned.[366] No soul laden bears the load of another.[367] God stands over every soul for what it has earned.[368] Work righteousness, and forward goodness for your souls; and do not be among the heedless.[369] Peace be upon you.

363. Ḥaṣīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥārith b. Durayd al-Azdī was born probably ca. 50/670. All his reports, mediated through Abū Mikhnaf, concern the troubles in Iraq between A.H. 66 and 72. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 207.

364. Full name: Yaḥyā b. Abī 'Īsā al-Azdī. See ibid., 224.

365. Cf. Qur'ān 3:118.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥaṣīrah b. ʿAbdallāh: When the men went forth to Ḥarūrā', ʿAbdallāh b. Nawf came out of the house of Hind bint al-Mutakallifah, saying, "The day of Wednesday: the sky has risen aloft and judgment has descended, bringing the defeat of the enemy. Go forth then in the name of God to Ḥarūrā'."[370] He went forth. When the men encountered each other to fight, he was struck a blow on his face. As the men were retreating in defeat, ʿAbdallāh b. Sharīk al-Nahdī, who had heard his saying, met him and said to him, "Didn't you assert to us, Ibn Nawf, that we would defeat them?" ʿAbdallāh b. Nawf replied, "Have you not read in the Book of God, 'God blots out, and He establishes whatsoever He will; and with Him is the Essence of the Book.'"[371]

[Continuing,] he said: The next morning, al-Muṣʿab marched forth with the Baṣrans who were with him and the Kūfans who had gone out to him, taking them toward al-Sabakhah.[372] When 366. Cf. ibid., 74:38.

367. Ibid., 6:164.
368. Cf. ibid., 13:33.
369. Cf. ibid., 7:205.
370. The saying of ʿAbdallāh b. Nawf is in rhymed prose (sajʿ), the form in which pre-Islamic soothsayers delivered their predictions; see note 21, above. If the reading, "The sky has risen aloft," is correct, it is an allusion to daybreak. Ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXII, suggests reading tazabbaʿat, "has become stormy."
371. Qurʾān 13:39. Al-Mukhtār is said to have to derived a doctrine called "bidā'" ("change of mind") from this verse. Muslim theology accepted the idea that God might alter or abrogate earlier commands (e.g., that He might command the Muslim community to abstain from fighting at one time, but later command it to fight). What was not accepted was the idea that God's eternal decree could at one time be one thing (victory for someone) and at another time be different (defeat for that person). This is the position the heresiographers say al-Mukhtār adopted in order to explain why some of his predictions failed to be fulfilled. See Shahrastānī, al-Milal wa-al-niḥal, 151.
372. See note 68. An area between al-Kūfah and the Euphrates was referred to by this name.

he passed by al-Muhallab, the latter said to him, "What a victory!
[733] What a joy it would have been, had Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath not been killed!" Muṣʿab replied, "You are right. May God have mercy on Muḥammad!" He walked a short way and then said, "Muhallab—." "At your service, commander!" he replied. "Do you now," said Muṣʿab, "that ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib has been killed?" Al-Muhallab replied, "'Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return.'"[373] Al-Muṣʿab said, "Indeed, he was someone I wanted to have seen this victory. We do not consider ourselves more entitled to anything we now have than he was. Do you know who killed him?" "No," he said. Muṣʿab said, "He was killed by someone who claims to be a partisan of his father. And they killed him, knowing who he was!"[374] [Continuing,] he said: Muṣʿab then went and encamped at al-Sabakhah, cutting off water and supplies from al-Mukhtār's forces. He sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, who encamped at al-Kunāsah. He sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf b. Sulaym to Jabbānat al-Sabīʿ. He asked ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf,[375] "What have you done in the matter I entrusted to you?" He replied, "God make you prosper! I found the people to be of two sorts: whoever had an inclination toward you went out to you; whoever held the opinion of al-Mukhtār would not abandon him or prefer anyone over him. So I did not leave my house until you came." Muṣʿab said, "You have spoken the truth."

Muṣʿab sent ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn to Jabbānat Kindah. All these men were cutting off water and supplies from al-Mukhtār and his companions who were in al-Mukhtār's palace. He also sent Zaḥr b. Qays to Jabbānat Murād and sent ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr to Jabbānat al-Ṣāʾidiyyīn.[376]

---

373. See note 156.

374. Cf. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 312–13 (where his name is given as ʿUmar, not ʿUbaydallāh): "He had come from the Ḥijāz to al-Mukhtār. Al-Mukhtār asked him, 'Do you have Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah's letter with you?' 'No,' said ʿUmar b. ʿAlī, 'I do not have his letter with me.' 'Then go away, wherever you wish,' said al-Mukhtār, 'for I have nothing to give you.' He therefore left al-Mukhtār and went to Muṣʿab, who met him on the way and gave him a gift of 100,000 dirhams."

375. Muṣʿab had sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ahead to induce as many of al-Mukhtār's partisans as possible to abandon al-Mukhtār and go over to Muṣʿab. See Ṭabarī, II, 719.

376. The problem of its location is discussed in Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 245f.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj, who said: I saw 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr charging and fighting al-Mukhtār's horsemen in Jabbānat al-Ṣā'idiyyīn. Sometimes I saw their horsemen chase away his horsemen, while he was behind his horsemen [734] inciting their ardor; when he had reached the house of 'Ikrimah, he wheeled round and chased them until he made them reach Jabbānat al-Ṣā'idiyyīn. Sometimes I saw 'Ubaydallāh's horsemen take and beat one or more water carriers. Because of the difficulty they encountered, they would bring them water only if they gave them one or two dinars for each bag of water.

Sometimes al-Mukhtār and his companions would come out and fight feebly, inflicting no damage on their foe. Whenever horsemen of his came out, they were bombarded with stones from the housetops and doused with filthy water. The people were emboldened against them. Most of their sustenance came from their wives. A woman would leave her house carrying food, dainties, and water over which she had thrown her outer garment.[377] She would leave as if intending to go to the Great Mosque for prayers, or as if she were going to her kin and visiting a woman relative of hers. When she approached the palace, someone would open for her and she would bring in food and drink for her husband or relation. When word of this reached al-Muṣ'ab and his companions, al-Muhallab, who was experienced, said to him, "Set up barricades[378] against them, so that you prevent their families and children from coming to them and so that you leave them in their stronghold until they die in it."

When the people in the palace were hard pressed by thirst, they quenched their thirst with the water of the well. Al-Mukhtār ordered honey [to be given] to them; it was poured into [the well] to alter its taste, so that they might drink from it. Most of them satisfied their thirst in this way. Muṣ'ab then ordered his forces to approach the palace. 'Abbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Ḥabaṭī came and took up a position by the Mosque of Juhaynah. Sometimes he advanced until he reached the Mosque of the Banū Makhzūm,[379]

377. Literally, "over which she had put on her liḥāf." The liḥāf was an unlined sheet of cloth used as an outer wrap.

378. Durūb: the exact meaning is unclear; perhaps gates at the end of certain streets. See Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 246.

379. This mosque was named after the clan of the tribe 'Abs to which Ḥu-

[735] so that his forces might shoot arrows at any of al-Mukhtār's men who showed themselves to them from the palace. Whenever he met a woman close to the palace, he said to her, "Who are you, where have you come from, and what do you want?" One day, he seized three women, wives of men from the tribes of Shibām and Shākir, going to their husbands in the palace and sent them to Muṣ'ab. They had food with them. Muṣ'ab turned them back, but did them no harm.

Muṣ'ab sent out Zaḥr b. Qays, who took up a position at the [Street] of the Smiths,[380] where riding animals were hired out. Also, he sent out 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr: his position was by the house of Bilāl. He sent out Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays: his position was by his father's house. He sent out Ḥawshab b. Yazīd, who halted by the Lane of the Baṣrans, at the mouth of the Street of the Banū Jadhīmah b. Mālik, [a clan] of the Banū Asad b. Khuzaymah. Al-Muhallab came and took up a position at the crossroads of Khunays. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf came from the direction of Dār al-Siqāyah.[381]

Some young Kūfans and Baṣrans, inexperienced fellows with no knowledge of war, rushed to the marketplace and began to shout—they had no commander: "Son of Dawmah! Son of Dawmah!"[382] Al-Mukhtār looked out at them and said, "By God, even if the person reproaching me with the name 'Dawmah' were 'a man of moment from the two cities,'[383] he would not reproach me with it." Noting their disorganization, the state of their appearance, and how scattered they were, he felt a desire to subdue them, and said to a group of his companions, "Go out with me." About two dhayfah b. al-Yamān, a famous companion of the Prophet, had belonged. See Djaït, Al-Kūfa, 247.

---

380. Djaït locates it in the southwest part of the city, not far from al-Kunāsah (Al-Kūfa, 248).

381. Dār al-Siqāyah: "the building for providing water."

382. Dawmah bint 'Amr b. Wahb b. Mu'attib was al-Mukhtār's mother (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 214).

383. Referring to Qur'ān 43:31, where Muḥammad's opponents are said to have reproached the Prophet by asking, "Why was this Qur'ān not sent down upon some man of moment in the two cities?" The parallel text in Balādhurī, Ansab, V, 261, reads: "He whom you are reproaching is indeed the son of 'a man of moment from the two cities.'" (Goitein's note to the Balādhurī passage mentions that some commentators identified one of the men as al-Mukhtār's grandfather or great-grandfather.) hundred of them made a sortie with him. He attacked them, [736] wounded about a hundred of them, and put them to flight. They fled in confusion in the direction of the house of Furāt b. Ḥayyān al-ʿIjlī.

Then a man from the Banū Ḍabbah, a Baṣran named Yaḥyā b. Ḍamḍam, so tall that when he rode his feet almost touched the ground, a man most deadly to other men and awesome to behold, began to attack al-Mukhtār's forces. No man toward whom he directed himself held his ground. Al-Mukhtār, seeing him, attacked him and struck him a blow on his forehead, causing his forehead and brainpan to fly off; and he fell dead.

Then those commanders and chiefs [whom Muṣʿab had stationed] advanced from all sides. Al-Mukhtār's forces had no strength to stand up to them and so entered the palace. There they stayed, and the siege tightened around them. Al-Mukhtār said to them, "Alas! The siege is only making you weaker. Let us go down and fight until we are killed as honorable men, if we are to be killed. By God, I have not lost hope that if you fight them steadfastly, God will help you." But they lacked strength and hung back. So al-Mukhtār said to them, "As for me, by God, I will not submit, neither will I allow them to pass judgment over my life." When ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿdah b. Hubayrah b. Abī Wahb saw what al-Mukhtār wanted, he let himself down from the palace by a rope, joined some of his brothers, and went into hiding among them.

Seeing the weakness of his companions and their discouragement, al-Mukhtār determined to make a sortie against the enemy. He sent to his wife, Umm Thābit bint Samurah b. Jundab al-Fazārī, and she sent him a large quantity of perfume. He washed, sprinkled his clothes with spices,[384] and put the perfume on his head and beard. Then he went out with nineteen men. Among them was [737] al-Sāʾib b. Mālik al-Ashʿarī, who was al-Mukhtār's deputy over al-Kūfah whenever al-Mukhtār went out to al-Madāʾin. He was married to ʿAmrah bint Abī Mūsā al-Ashʿarī, who bore him a child whom he named Muḥammad. This Muḥammad was with his father in the palace. When his father was killed and those in the palace taken, he was found and released, since he was a young lad.

384. As if preparing himself for burial: Lane, Lexicon, II, 657, s.v. taḥannaṭa, refers to a tradition in which a man going into battle does this to prepare himself for death and to induce himself to endure the fight with patience.

When al-Mukhtār left the palace, he said to al-Sā'ib, "What do you think best?" Al-Sā'ib replied, "It is for you to say. What do you think?" Al-Mukhtār said, "I think? or God thinks?" Al-Sā'ib said, "Nay, what God thinks." Al-Mukhtār said, "Alas for you! You are a fool. I am a man of the Arabs. I saw Ibn al-Zubayr seize the Ḥijāz for himself; I saw Najdah[385] seize al-Yamāmah, and Marwān[386] Syria. Not being inferior to any man among the Arabs, I took this country and was like one of them—except that I sought vengeance for the members of the Prophet's family, while the Arabs were asleep about the matter. I killed those who participated in shedding their blood and have spared no effort in the matter until this very day. Fight, then, for the glory of your name, if you have no inner intention."[387] Al-Sā'ib said, "'Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return.'[388] What have I been doing that I should fight for the glory of my name? Thereupon, al-Mukhtār quoted the verses of Ghaylān b. Salamah b. Mu'attib al-Thaqafī:[389]

---

385. In 66/685, Najdah b. 'Āmir al-Ḥanafī became leader of a group of Khārijites who had controlled central Arabia (al-Yamāmah) since 64/683. See Ṭabarī, II, 517; Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 127–28; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 74.

386. I.e., the Umayyad caliph, Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.

387. The exchange is more cynical in tone in Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 313: Al-Mukhtār says to al-Sā'ib, "Let us go out to fight for the glory of our names, not for religion's sake." Shocked, al-Sā'ib exclaims, "Abū Isḥāq, people think you undertook this enterprise as a matter of religion!" Al-Mukhtār replies, "No, by my life it was only to seek [the goods of] this world. I saw that 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān had seized Syria, 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr the Ḥijāz, Muṣ'ab al-Baṣrah, Najdah the Ḥarūrī al-'Arūḍ [i.e., Arabia], and 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim Khurāsān. I am inferior to none of them. Only by advocating vengeance for the death of al-Ḥusayn, was I was able to do what I wanted." In al-Ṭabarī's version, al-Mukhtār combines Shī'ī dedication with opportunism; in Dīnawarī he is a cynical opportunist.

388. See note 156.

389. A slightly different version of the poem, together with a story that throws light on the imagery, can be found in Aghānī, XII, 48. The poet Ghaylān b. Salamah has accompanied Abū Sufyān b. Ḥarb and a group of Quraysh and Thaqīf on a trading caravan to Iraq. As they cross into Iraq, Abu Sufyān gathers the men, warns them of the danger of entering the kingdom of a tyrant (jabbār) whose country is not their accustomed place of trade, and asks who is willing to go first and receive half the profit of the entire enterprise. Ghaylān volunteers. To illustrate the value of daring, he goes to a stream bed and begins striking (shaking off?) the leaves of the trees, reciting the poem.

Were Abū Ghaylān to see me, when anxieties retired from me because of some affair having consequence, He would say in fright and fear that two things are joined together:
life's profit, and soul's terror and fear.[390]
Either you obtain glory and noble deeds, or the leaves are an example for you in regard to the one whom you destroy.[391]

Al-Mukhtār went out with nineteen men. He said to Muṣ'ab's [738] men, "Will you give me an assurance of safety, and I will go out to you?" They said, "No, except on condition of your submitting to judgment." Al-Mukhtār said, "I will never allow you to pass judgment over my life"; and he fought with his sword until he was killed. He had said to his companions when they refused to follow him out, "If I make a sortie against them and am killed, you will only become weaker and more humiliated. If you submit to their judgment, your enemies whose relatives you have killed will jump up; each of them will say about one of you, 'This one is my revenge for my kinsman,' and the man will be killed, while you watch each other being struck down. Then you will say, 'If only we had obeyed al-Mukhtār and done what he thought best.' Had you gone out with me, failing to gain victory, you would have died as honorable men; or if any of you had escaped and reached his people, his people would have protected him. At this hour tomorrow, you will be the most abject people on the face of the earth." And it came to pass as he had said. [Continuing,] he said: People have asserted that al-Mukhtār was killed at the present site of al-Zayyātīn [Street],[392] and that he was killed by two men of the Banū Ḥanīfah, brothers, one of whom was named Ṭarafah, and the other Ṭarrāf, sons of 'Abdallāh b. Dajājah of the Banū Ḥanīfah.

The day after al-Mukhtār's death, Bujayr b. 'Abdallāh al-Muslī

390. Version in Aghānī: "He would say that desire and fear are joined together: the love of life, and the soul's terror and fear."

391. Version in Aghānī: "Either you continue in [pursuit of] glory and fame, or the leaves are an example for you as regards those who perish." As the story in Aghānī shows, the life of a man who dies without glory is being compared to leaves that fall.

392. I.e., the oil sellers' street.

said, "Men, yesterday your commander gave you good advice: would that you had obeyed him! Men, if you submit to the enemy's judgment, you will be slaughtered like sheep. Go forth with your swords, and fight until you die nobly." But they disobeyed him and said, "Someone with more claim to our obedience and better than you at advising us commanded us to do it, and we disobeyed him. Shall we obey you?" So the men gave themselves up and submitted to be judged. Muṣ'ab sent 'Abbād b. al-Ḥusayn al-Ḥabaṭī to deal with them. He brought them out with their hands tied [739] behind their backs. 'Abdallāh b. Shaddād al-Jushamī made a will to 'Abbād b. al-Ḥusayn.[393] 'Abdallāh b. Qurād sought a stick or a piece of iron or anything with which to fight, but found nothing; that was because he was seized with regret after they came in, took his sword, and brought him out with his hands tied. 'Abd al-Raḥmān [b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath] passed by him as he was saying:

I was not afraid that I would be seen a prisoner:
Those who disobeyed the commander
Have been humbled and utterly destroyed.

So 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath said, "Bring this one to me. Give him to me so that I can cut off his head." 'Abdallāh b. Qurād said, "If I didn't smite your father and kill him with my sword, then I have the same religion as your grandfather, who believed and then became a nonbeliever!"[394] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad dismounted and said, "Bring him near me." They brought him near, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad killed him. 'Abbād became angry and said, "You killed him, though you were not commanded to kill him."

'Abd al-Raḥmān passed 'Abdallāh b. Shaddād al-Jushamī, who was a sharīf. 'Abd al-Raḥmān asked 'Abbād to detain him until he had spoken to the commander concerning him. He then went to Muṣ'ab and said, "I would like you to give me 'Abdallāh b. Shaddād so that I may kill him. It is a matter of blood revenge."

393. The meaning apparently is that he asked 'Abbād to protect his children after his death. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 822.

394. This refers to the fact that al-Ash'ath had taken part in the Riddah, the defection of some Arab tribes from Islam after the death of Muḥammad.

Muṣʿab ordered him to be given to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. The latter went to him, took him, and beheaded him. ʿAbbād used to say, "By God, had I known that you only wanted to kill him, I would have given him to someone else and he would have killed him. But I thought you would speak to him concerning him and would then release him."

The son of ʿAbdallāh b. Shaddād was brought, Shaddād by name. He had reached puberty, but had applied a depilatory to himself. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said, "Uncover him. Has he matured?" They said, "No, he is still is boy." So they released him.

Al-Aswad b. Saʿīd had asked Muṣʿab to offer his brother assurance of safety, and, if he submitted, to leave him to him. Al-Aswad therefore went to him and offered him assurance of safety, but the brother refused to submit, saying, "Dying with my comrades is more pleasing to me than life with you." He was named Qays, and he was brought out and killed among those who were killed. [740]

When Bujayr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Muslī—it is said that he was a mawlā of theirs—was brought to Muṣʿab together with many of al-Mukhtār's men, he said to Muṣʿab, "Praise be to God, who has tested us with shackles, and tested you by your forgiving us. There are two stations: one of them is God's good pleasure, the other His wrath. Whoever forgives, God forgives him and increases him in might; whoever punishes is not safe from retaliation. Ibn al-Zubayr, we are people who turn to the same qiblah[395] as you and hold your creed;[396] we are not Turks or Daylamites. If we have quarreled with our brothers and fellow countrymen, either we are right and they are wrong, or we are wrong and they are right. We have fought among ourselves as the people of Syria fought among themselves, who fought each other and then drew together; or as the people of al-Baṣrah fought among themselves, who quarreled and fought among themselves and then made peace and drew together. Now that you have obtained power, be gentle; having prevailed, forgive." He kept saying this and things like it until the men felt pity for them. Muṣʿab himself felt pity for them and wanted to free them, but ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath arose and said, "Will you free them? Choose us, Ibn al-Zubayr; or choose them!" And Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays al-Hamdānī jumped up and said, "My father and five hundred men of Hamdān, ashrāf of the people, and men of the city were killed; and you set them free, while our blood still is surging in their bodies! Choose us, or choose them!" Every man and member of a family that had lost a member jumped up and said something similar.

395. The qiblah is the direction of the Kaʿbah in Mecca, which Muslims face in prayer. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳibla.

396. Millah means both a religious creed and the community that holds that creed.

[741] When Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr saw this, he ordered the men to be killed. They cried out to him all together, "Ibn al-Zubayr, do not kill us! Make us your vanguard against the Syrians tomorrow; by God, neither you nor your forces will be able to do without us tomorrow, when you meet your enemy. If we are killed, we shall have weakened them for you before being killed. If we win victory over them, it will be to your advantage and to the advantage of those who are with you." But Muṣʿab refused them and followed what pleased the generality of the people. Bujayr al-Muslī said, "My request to you is that I not be killed with these men. I commanded them to come out with their swords and fight to the death as honorable men, but they disobeyed me." So he was brought forward and killed.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—his father—Abū Rawq: Musāfir b. Saʿīd b. Nimrān said to Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr, "Ibn al-Zubayr, what will you say to God when you come before Him after having put to death a group of Muslims who made you judge over their lives?—when the right thing in regard to their lives was that you not kill a Muslim soul except for a Muslim soul. If we killed a number of your men, kill as many [of us] as we killed of you, and free the rest of us. Among us now there are many men who were not present for a single day at any battlefield of the war between you and us. They were in al-Jibāl[397] and the Sawād,[398] collecting taxes and securing the roads." But Muṣʿab did not listen to him.

---

397. Al-Jibāl ("the mountains") was the region known earlier as Māh or Media. It was bounded on the east by the great desert of Khurāsān, on the southeast by Fārs, on the south by Khūzistān, on the west and southwest by Iraq, on the northwest by Ādharbayjān, and on the north by the Alburz range. See *EI*², s.v. Djibāl; Le Strange, Lands, 185ff.

398. See note 45; and Le Strange, Lands, 24.

So Musāfir said, "God's curse upon people I ordered to make a night sortie against the guards of one of these roads, so that we might drive them off and join our kin, but who disobeyed me until they drove me to suffer what is most contemptible, base, and low, insisting upon dying the death of slaves! I ask you not to mix my blood with theirs." So he was brought forward and killed separately.

Al-Muṣ'ab then ordered al-Mukhtār's hand to be cut off and nailed with an iron nail to the side of the mosque. There it remained until al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf arrived.[399] He looked at it and said, "What is this?" They said, "Al-Mukhtār's hand." He ordered it to be taken down. [742]

Muṣ'ab sent his financial agents in charge of al-Jibāl and the Sawād. Then he wrote to [Ibrāhīm] b. al-Ashtar, summoning him to obedience to him, and saying to him, "If you respond to me and become obedient to me, Syria will be yours; you shall have control of the horses and of whatever land of the west[400] you subdue, as long as the family of al-Zubayr has dominion." 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān also wrote to Ibn al-Ashtar from Syria, summoning him to obedience to him, and saying, "If you respond to me and become obedient to me, you shall have Iraq." Ibrāhīm [b. al-Ashtar] summoned his companions and said, "What do you think?" Some of them said, "You should become obedient to 'Abd al-Malik." Others said, "You should become obedient to Ibn al-Zubayr." Ibn al-Ashtar said, "Had I not killed 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād and the leaders of the Syrians, I would follow 'Abd al-Malik, even though I do not want to choose [the people of] another city over the people of my city, or other tribesmen over my tribesmen." He therefore wrote to Muṣ'ab, and Muṣ'ab wrote him to come. So he came to him in obedience.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Janāb al-Kalbī: Muṣ'ab's letter came to Ibn al-Ashtar containing the following:

> To proceed: God has killed the liar al-Mukhtār and his partisans who adopted unbelief as their religion and be-

399. After being appointed governor of Iraq by 'Abd al-Malik, al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf reached al-Kūfah in Ramaḍān of A.H. 75. (December 694–January 695). See Ṭabarī, II, 872.

400. For "west" (maghrib), Mss. O, Co and C read "of the Arabs" ('arab).

guiled[401] with enchantment. We summon you to the Book of God, the Sunnah of His Prophet, and allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful. If you respond favorably to this, come to me. You shall have the territory of al-Jazīrah and all the territory of the west, as long as you live and as long as the dominion of the family of al-Zubayr remains.
[743] In this matter you have an oath and covenant by God, and the strictest oath or bond that God accepted from the prophets. Peace!

ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān wrote to him as follows:

To proceed: The family of al-Zubayr have revolted against the Imāms of guidance, have tried to wrest command from those entitled to it, and have blasphemed in the Sacred House.[402] God will give power over them,[403] and will bring an evil turn upon them.[404] I summon you to God and the Sunnah of His Prophet. If you accept and respond favorably, you shall have authority over Iraq, as long as you live and I live. You have my oath and covenant by God that I will fulfill this.

Ibn al-Ashtar called his companions, read the letter to them, and asked their advice. One said ʿAbd al-Malik; another said Ibn al-Zubayr. So he said to them, "And my opinion is to follow the Syrians; but how can I do so, when there dwells not a tribe in Syria but I have slain members of it, giving it cause to seek revenge? Also, I am not going to leave my tribesmen and the people of my city." He therefore went to Muṣʿab. When word of his arrival reached Muṣʿab, the latter sent al-Muhallab to the district where he was to serve as governor. (This was the year in which al-Muhallab took up residence in the Euphrates [district].)

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū ʿAlqamah al-Khathʿamī:[405]

401. Mss. O and Co read: "and were learned men of enchantment."
402. I.e., the Kaʿbah. Mss. O and Co add: "and have profaned the sacred precinct."
403. Cf. Qurʾān 8:71.
404. Cf. Qurʾān 9:98 and 48:6.
405. Abū ʿAlqamah ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlqamah al-Khathʿamī died in 87/706 as the last surviving Companion of the Prophet (ṣaḥābī) in al-Kūfah, cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 324, 151–2; and U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 191.

Al-Muṣʿab sent for Umm Thābit bint Samurah b. Jundab, al-Mukhtār's wife, and ʿAmrah bint al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr al-Anṣārī, who was also al-Mukhtār's wife, and said to them, "What do you say about al-Mukhtār?" Umm Thābit said, "What should we say? We say about him only what you yourselves say." So they told her to go. ʿAmrah, however, said, "God's mercy upon him, if[406] he [744] was one of God's righteous servants." Muṣʿab therefore had her taken away to prison and wrote concerning her to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, saying that she claimed al-Mukhtār was a prophet. ʿAbdallāh wrote back that he should take her out and kill her. Muṣʿab therefore had her taken out between al-Ḥīrah and al-Kūfah after nightfall, and Maṭar gave her three strokes with the sword. (Maṭar, a servant [tābiʿ] of the Qafal family of the Banū Taymallāh b. Thaʿlabah, was with the police.) ʿAmrah cried out, "O my father! O my family! O my people!" One of the Anṣār heard about her—it was Abān b. al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr—and went to Maṭar and slapped him, saying, "Son of a whore! You cut off her soul; may God cut off your right hand!" Maṭar held fast to him, until he had taken him to Muṣʿab, where Maṭar said, "My mother is a Muslim woman." He claimed that the Banū Qafal would bear witness. No one, however, bore witness to him. Muṣʿab said, "Let the young man go free, for he has seen something horrible."

ʿUmar b. Abī Rabīʿah al-Qurashī[407] composed [the following verses] about Muṣʿab's killing of ʿAmrah bint al-Nuʿmān b. Bashīr:

A thing most amazing in my eyes is the slaying of a fair-skinned, free, graceful-necked woman.
Though without fault, she was killed in this way:[408]
    Oh what an excellent person has been killed!
Killing and fighting have been prescribed for us, but for chaste women the dragging of skirts.

406. Ed. Cairo reads, "verily, he was." Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 263: "I only know that he was a Muslim, one of God's righteous servants."

407. ʿUmar b. Abī Rabīʿah, a resident of Medina, was one of the most famous early writers of ghazal (love poetry) in Arabic. The verses are also attributed to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zabīr al-Asadī (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 264).

408. For "in this way," Dīwān, 498, reads, "in vain"; Balādhurī, Ansāb, loc. cit., reads, "unjustly."

[745] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muḥammad b. Yūsuf: Muṣʿab met ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar,[409] and, greeting him, said, "I am your brother's son, Muṣʿab." Ibn ʿUmar replied to him, "Yes, you are the man who in a single morning killed seven thousand people who turn toward the qiblah. Live as long as you are able!" Muṣʿab said, "They were unbelievers, beguilers." Ibn ʿUmar said, "Had you killed their number in sheep from your father's inheritance, it would have been extravagance."

Concerning this [viz. the killing of al-Mukhtār's wife], Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ḥassān b. Thābit[410] composed [the following verses]:

A rider came bringing amazing tidings:
the killing of al-Nuʿmān's daughter, a woman of religion and nobility:
The killing of a young woman pleasing of mien, modest, refined in character, disposition, and lineage;
A woman most pure, a descendant of noble men who chose virtue in ages past.
The friend and helper of the Chosen Prophet, his companion in war, misfortune, and grief, Reported to me that the blasphemers agreed upon killing her: may they themselves not be spared killing and plundering!
May life give no joy to the family of al-Zubayr!
May they taste the garment of humiliation, fear, and despoliation!
[746] You would think that when they brought her out and she was cut to pieces by their swords, they had won the kingdom of the Arabs!
Did the people not marvel at the killing of a free woman, chaste[411] of religion, praiseworthy of manners:

409. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, the son of the caliph ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, was one of the most frequently cited authorities for traditions. He was married to al-Mukhtār's sister, Ṣafiyyah, and had interceded with the Umayyad authorities on al-Mukhtār's behalf in 64/783 (Ṭabarī, II, 522–23) and with the Zubayrids in 66/685 (Ṭabarī, II, 599–600). See EI^{2}, s.v.

410. A Medinan poet, grandson of the Prophet's "court poet," Ḥassān b. Thābit. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 423.

411. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 315, reads, "sincere of religion."

A woman of leisure, a believer free from blame, slander, doubt, or lying?
Upon us the divine decree of slaying and valor is incumbent;
but women are to be chaste in their bridal pavilions and veils.
In the religion of her noble grandfathers and fathers, she passed on, not shaming her kin or acting immodestly.
A bashful woman, not frequent in going forth or unseemly in speech, one who promoted harmony, [not] envious of the neighbor not of her clan, Nor of the neighbor who was a kinsman: she did not know what foul speech was;
she never made evil draw near, nor did she like it.
I marveled on her account, when she was wrapped in a shroud, while alive.
Verily, this affair is a most extraordinary wonder.

According to ʿAlī b. Ḥarb al-Mawṣilī[412]—Ibrāhīm b. Sulaymān al-Ḥanafī (the son of the brother of Abū al-Aḥwaṣ)[413]—Muḥammad b. Abān—ʿAlqamah b. Marthad—Suwayd b. Ghaflah, who said: While I was journeying behind al-Najaf,[414] a man overtook me and struck me from behind with his staff. When I turned to him, he [747] said, "What do you have to say concerning the shaykh?" "Which of the shaykhs?" I asked. He said, "ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib." I said, "I bear witness that I love him with my hearing and sight and my heart and tongue." He said, "And I make you a witness that I hate him with my hearing and sight and my heart and tongue." Then we journeyed on until we entered al-Kūfah and parted. (After this, Suwayd stayed there some years, or, he may have said, for some time.)

[Continuing,] he said: Once while I was in the Great Mosque, a man wearing a turban entered. He carefully examined the faces of 412. Abū al-Ḥasan ʿAlī b. Ḥarb al-Mawṣilī (b. 170/786, d. 265/879) was a traditionist, scholar of ancient Arabian history, and poet. See F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 145.

413. On Abū al-Aḥwaṣ, see Dhahabī, Tadhkirat al-ḥuffāẓ, ed. F. Wüstenfeld (Göttingen, 1833–34), 9, 71 [Leiden note].

414. Al-Najaf lies about four miles west of al-Kūfah. ʿAlī was buried there, but for security reasons the site was kept secret during this period. In 175/791, the Caliph Hārūn "discovered" the spot and ordered a shrine to be built there. See EI[1], s.v. al-Nadjaf.

the people and kept looking at them. Seeing no beards more foolish than those of Hamdān, he sat down with them. I therefore moved and sat down with them. They asked, "Where have you come from?" He said, "From the family of your Prophet." They said, "What news have you brought us?" "This is not the right time for it," he said and arranged to meet them the following day. When he came the next day—I came, too—he took out a letter he had with him (at the bottom of it there was a lead seal), handed it to a young lad, and since he himself was illiterate and could not write, said to him, "Read it, boy." The boy said, "'In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. This is a letter to al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd, which the legatee[415] of the family of Muḥammad wrote to him. To proceed...,'" and so forth. The people having burst out in tears, the man said, "Boy, put your letter aside until the people pull themselves together." I said, "People of Hamdān, I bear witness by God that this man once met me behind al-Najaf," and I told them his story. But they said, "By God, you insist upon holding people back from the family of Muḥammad and commending Na'thal, who rent the books of the Qur'ān."[416] [Continuing, he said]: I said, "People of Hamdān, I tell you only what my ears have heard and my heart remembers from 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib (peace be upon him!). I heard him say, 'Do not call 'Uthmān "him who ripped up the books of the Qur'ān"; by God, he ripped them up only after consultation with us, the companions of Muḥammad. Had I come across them,[417] I would have done to [748] them as he did.'" They said, "God! You heard this from 'Alī?" I said, "By God, I heard it from him." [Continuing, he said]: They therefore left him. He then turned to the slaves, made use of them, and plied his craft.

---

415. On 'Alī's special role as waṣī, "legatee" of the Prophet, in the ideology of early Shī'ī Islam, see Jafri, Origins, 92f, 97, 119, 121, 153. Here the term is extended to Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah.

416. The Lisān, s.v., gives two explanations for na'thal. Either it means "foolish old man," or it is the name of a long-bearded Egyptian who resembled 'Uthmān. In any case, 'Uthmān's enemies applied the term abusively. The epithet shaqqāq, "he who ripped up (the books of the Qur'ān)," refers to 'Uthmān's attempt to impose a standard recension of the Qur'ān and suppress variant texts. Some Shī'ites accused him of altering or suppressing passages supporting the claims of 'Alī and the family of the Prophet to leadership.

417. I.e., books containing variant texts of the Qur'ān.

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: Part of what we have reported about al-Mukhtār b. Abī ʿUbayd has been related by al-Wāqidī,[418] who differs on the subject from some of the people whose reports we have given. He alleges that al-Mukhtār openly opposed Ibn al-Zubayr only when Muṣʿab came to al-Baṣrah. When Muṣʿab set out toward al-Mukhtār and news of his setting out reached the latter, he sent Aḥmar b. Shumayṭ al-Bajalī against Muṣʿab, ordering him to attack him at al-Madhār and saying, "Victory is at al-Madhār." [Al-Wāqidī] continued: Al-Mukhtār said that only because it was said that, "A man from the [tribe of] Thaqīf will be granted a great victory at al-Madhār." He thought it was he, but it really had to do with al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf and his fight with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ashʿath.[419]

Muṣʿab ordered the commander of his vanguard, ʿAbbād al-Ḥabaṭī, to march toward the assembled forces of al-Mukhtār. ʿAbbād advanced, and with him went ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib. Muṣʿab encamped at Nahr al-Baṣriyyīn, on the bank of the Euphrates. (He dug a canal there which for that reason came to be called Nahr al-Baṣriyyīn.)[420] [Al-Wāqidī] continued: Al-Mukhtār went forth with twenty thousand men and halted facing them. Muṣʿab and his forces advanced and came upon al-Mukhtār by night ready for battle. Al-Mukhtār sent word to his forces when evening came, saying, "Let none of you leave his place until he hears a crier cry out, 'Yā Muḥammad.' When you hear it, attack." One of al-Mukhtār's companions said, "This man, by God, is a liar against God." He and those with him went over to al-Muṣʿab. Al-Mukhtār delayed until the moon rose and then gave orders to a crier, who cried out, "Yā Muḥammad." Then they attacked Muṣʿab and his forces, put them to flight, and made him enter his camp, and they continued fighting them until morning. In the [749]

418. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī (b. 130/747 in Medina, d. 207/823 in Baghdad): major historian, author of Kitāb al-maghāzī on the early Islamic conquests. See F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 294–97.

419. In 81–82/701, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ibn al-Ashʿath led a revolt against the governor of Iraq, al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. Of two battles in which al-Ḥajjāj defeated Ibn al-Ashʿath (al-Zāwiyah and Dayr al-Jamājim), the former seems more likely to be meant here. Although both locations lie between al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah, al-Zāwiyah is closer to al-Madhār. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Ashʿath; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v. al-Madhār, Dayr al-Jamājim.

420. I.e., the river or canal of the Baṣrans.

morning, al-Mukhtār, having no one with him, and with his forces having penetrated into the forces of Muṣʿab, retreated in flight and entered the palace in al-Kūfah. When al-Mukhtār's forces came in the morning, they waited for a time and, not seeing al-Mukhtār, said, "He has been killed." Those who were able fled and went into hiding in the houses of al-Kūfah; about eight thousand of them, finding no one to lead them in fighting, betook themselves to the palace. There they found al-Mukhtār, and they went inside with him. During that night, al-Mukhtār's forces had killed many men from Muṣʿab's forces, including Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath. In the morning, Muṣʿab came and surrounded the palace. Muṣʿab continued besieging it for four months. Every day, al-Mukhtār made a sortie against them and fought them in the market of al-Kūfah from one direction, but he was unable to overcome him. Finally, al-Mukhtār was killed.

After al-Mukhtār was killed, those in the palace sent and asked for a guarantee of safe-conduct. Muṣʿab refused, until they submitted to his judgment. After they submitted to his judgment, he killed about seven hundred of the Arabs; the rest of those he killed were Persians. [Al-Wāqidī] continued: When they came out, Muṣʿab wanted to kill the Persians and spare the Arabs; but those with him spoke to him, saying, "What kind of religion is this? How do you hope for victory when you kill the Persians and spare the Arabs, though their religion is the same!" So he had the Arabs brought forward and beheaded.

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]—ʿUmar b. Shabbah—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī], who said: After al-Mukhtār had been killed, Muṣʿab consulted his companions about the besieged men who had submitted to his judgment. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b.
[750] Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays, and others like them whose kinsmen al-Mukhtār had slain said, "Kill them." [The tribe of] Ḍabbah also raised an outcry and said, "The blood of Mundhir b. Ḥassān!"[421] ʿUbayd-allāh b. al-Ḥurr said, "Commander, turn over each man you have to his people, bestowing them as a favor to them; for, if they have killed us, we have killed them. Also, we need them on our frontiers. Turn over our slaves that you have to their masters; for they belong to our orphans and widows and those who are frail, that they may return them to their work. But kill these mawālī; for their unbelief has become obvious, their pride great, and their thankfulness small." Muṣʿab laughed and said to al-Aḥnaf [b. Qays], "What do you think, Abū Baḥr?" Alluding to them, he replied, "Ziyād wanted me to, but I refused him."[422] Muṣʿab then gave orders concerning all the men, and they were killed. They were six thousand. ʿUqbah al-Asadī composed [the following verses]:

421. Al-Mundhir b. Ḥassān b. Ḍirār al-Ḍabbī was a Kūfan sharīf. After al-Mukhtār's victory over Ibn Muṭīʿ, Ibn al-Zubayr's governor, in 66/685, al-Mundhir had gone to swear allegiance to al-Mukhtār. As he left the palace, a group of Shīʿites attacked him as "one of the chief tyrants," killing him and his son Ḥayyān, despite the attempts of their leader, Saʿīd b. Munqidh, to restrain them. See Ṭabarī, II, 633.

You killed the six thousand in cold blood, their hands tied behind them, in spite of a firm pledge.
You made the protection of al-Ḥabaṭī[423] a bridge whose back was easy for the tramplers.
The morning they were called and deceived by their pledge, they were not the first men to perish by their own foolishness.
I had commanded them—if only they had obeyed me!—
to fight in the lanes, unsheathing their swords.

Al-Mukhtār was killed, it has been said, at the age of sixty-seven, on the fourteenth day of the month of Ramaḍān in the year 67 (April 3, 687).

---

422. The reference is unclear. "Ziyād" is the Leiden editor's conjecture (the mss. have "Riyād"). Apparently, al-Aḥnaf recommended mercy, alluding to a previous occasion on which he had refused to give in to pressure to kill prisoners, but his advice was rejected by Muṣʿab. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 263: "(According to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣāliḥ al-Muqriʾ—al-Haytham [b. ʿAdī]—ʿAwānah) When Muṣʿab was about to kill al-Mukhtār's companions who had submitted to his judgment, he consulted al-Aḥnaf b. Qays about them. Al-Aḥnaf said, 'I think you should forgive them; forgiveness is nearer to piety.' But the Kūfan ashrāf said, 'Kill them,' and became unruly. After they were killed, al-Aḥnaf said, 'Now that you have taken vengeance by killing them, may there be no evil consequence in the future [or, in the world to come].'" Another report in Balādhurī, loc. cit., has Muṣʿab's wife send a message recommending mercy, but the message arrives too late.

423. I.e., ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Ḥabaṭī, Muṣʿab's commander, to whom the besieged partisans of al-Mukhtār had surrendered. See Ṭabarī, II, 738f.

Having concluded the affair of al-Mukhtār and his companions, and with Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar having come to him, Muṣ'ab sent al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah to be in charge of al-Mawṣil, al-Jazīrah, Ādharbayjān, and Armenia; he himself resided in al-Kūfah.

[Ibn al-Zubayr Removes Muṣ'ab from al-Baṣrah]

During this year, 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr removed his brother Muṣ'ab from al-Baṣrah and sent his own son, Ḥamzah b. 'Abdallāh, [751] there. Differing reasons have been given for his removal of Muṣ'ab from al-Baṣrah and of how it took place.[424] Some have said what 'Umar [b. Shabbah] told me, [as follows]:

According [to 'Umar b. Shabbah]—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī], who said: Al-Muṣ'ab continued in charge of al-Baṣrah until he went from there to fight al-Mukhtār, leaving as his deputy over al-Baṣrah 'Ubaydallāh[425] b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar. Al-Mukhtār having been killed, Muṣ'ab went to visit 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr, who removed him from office and detained him in his house. He excused his removing him, saying to him, "By God, I know you are worthier and more qualified than Ḥamzah, but my opinion in the matter is that of 'Uthmān concerning 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir,[426] when he appointed him [governor] and removed Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī."

According to 'Umar [b. Shabbah]—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-

424. The chronology of Muṣ'ab's movements is not easy to determine. Compare the following notice in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 264–65: "[According to al-'Umarī—al-Haytham b. 'Adī—'Awānah, and others] Muṣ'ab went [to Mecca] to visit his brother 'Abdallāh three times. The first time was from al-Kūfah after the death of al-Mukhtār, and Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar was with him. The second time was from al-Baṣrah, bringing the tribute from Iraq; and on that occasion ['Abdallāh] removed him from [the governorship] of al-Baṣrah and appointed his son Ḥamzah." Ḥamzah having proved incompetent, 'Abdallāh removed him "and reappointed Muṣ'ab to al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. Finally, Muṣ'ab needed to speak face to face with his brother concerning 'Abd al-Malik, when he learned of the latter's decision to invade Iraq. He went to see him, stayed only a day, and then rode back to Iraq."

425. Mss. O and Co: 'Umar.

426. In 29/649, 'Uthmān removed Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī from the governorship of al-Baṣrah, to which he had been appointed by 'Umar in 17/649, and replaced him with 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz, after a delegation of Baṣrans had complained about abuses allegedly committed by Abū Mūsā. See Ṭabarī, I, 2829ff; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 256; EI^{2}, s.v. al-Ash'arī.

Madā'inī], who said: Ḥamzah came to al-Baṣrah as governor. He was munificent and generous, but disorderly in his affairs: sometimes he was generous to the point of not sparing anything he possessed; sometimes he held back what someone like him [ordinarily] would not hold back. In al-Baṣrah, his unsteadiness[427] and weakness became apparent. It is said that one day he rode to the estuary[428] of al-Baṣrah. When he saw it, he said, "If they handle the matter properly, this pond will suffice them for their summer." Some time afterwards, he rode out to it and chanced to come upon it when the water had ebbed. "I have already seen this once," he said, "and I suspected it would not be sufficient for them." Al-Aḥnaf [b. Qays] said to him, "This is water that comes to us and then ebbs away from us." He set out for al-Ahwāz.[429] When he saw its mountain, he said, "This is Quʿayqiʿān," referring to the place near Mecca, and therefore they named the mountain Quʿayqiʿān. He sent to Mardānshāh[430] and urged him [to hand over] the taxes. When the latter delayed, he betook himself to him with his sword, smote him, and killed him. Al-Aḥnaf said to him, "How sharp the commander's sword is!"

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī], who said: When Ḥamzah had caused such confusion in al-Baṣrah, these traits of his having become apparent, and when he was about to smite ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Bishr, al-Aḥnaf wrote to [752]
Ibn al-Zubayr about it and asked him to reinstate Muṣʿab. [Continuing,] he said: It was Ḥamzah who put ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr al-Laythī in charge of fighting the Najdiyyah[431] in al-Baḥrayn.

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-

427. Khiffah [literally, "lightness"] also connotes bad judgment, as illustrated in the next paragraph.

428. The fayḍ of al-Baṣrah, i.e., the Tigris-Euphrates estuary, the present Shaṭṭ al-ʿArab. See Le Strange, Lands, 43.

429. Al-Ahwāz was a city in Khūzistān, about 70 miles northeast of al-Baṣrah. See *EI*², s.v.

430. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb V, 256, this was the name of the dihqān of al-Ahwāz. *Dihqān*s were Persian landlords in Iraq who administered subdistricts.

431. These Khārijites, followers of Najdah b. ʿĀmir al-Ḥanafī, had extended their control from Central Arabia to the coastal region of al-Baḥrayn. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmayr's expedition failed to dislodge them. Najdah remained in control until 72/691, when his followers deposed him and settled on Abū Fudayk as his successor. See below, Ṭabarī, II, 829; Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 133ff; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 169ff.

Madā'inī], who said: When Ibn al-Zubayr removed Ḥamzah, the latter carried off a great deal of money from the treasury of al-Baṣrah. Mālik b. Misma' confronted him, saying, "We will not allow you to go away with our stipends."[432] However, 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Ubayd b. Ma'mar guaranteed him the stipend ('aṭā') and he yielded. Ḥamzah took away the money. When Ḥamzah left his father and came to Medina, he deposited the money with some men, but they made off with it, except for a Jew with whom he had deposited money and who fulfilled his obligation. When Ibn al-Zubayr heard what Ḥamzah had done, he said, "God curse him! I wanted to vie for glory with the sons of Marwān through him, but he retreated."

Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī], on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf, mentions a different story about Muṣ'ab and how his brother removed him from al-Baṣrah and then reinstated him. What he mentions on the subject is in the course of a report that has been related to me [as follows]:

According to [Abū Mikhnaf]—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī:[433] After Muṣ'ab had subdued al-Kūfah, he resided there for a year, having been removed from the governorship of al-Baṣrah. ['Abdallāh [b. al-Zubayr] had removed him and had sent his own son Ḥamzah.] Having stayed there a year, Muṣ'ab went to visit his brother 'Abdallāh in Mecca, and the latter reinstated him over al-Baṣrah.

It has also been said that when Muṣ'ab had concluded the affair of al-Mukhtār, he returned to al-Baṣrah and put al-Ḥārith b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Rabī'ah in charge of al-Kūfah.[434]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]: After Muṣ'ab killed al-Mukhtār, he held both al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah.

---

432. On the role of Mālik b. Misma' in leading the opposition to Ḥamzah, see Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 265; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 281; EI^{2}, s.v. Masāmi'a.

433. He is, according to U. Sezgin, perhaps to be identified with Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Kūfī, who belonged to the fourth "class" of traditionists. See her Abū Miḥnaf, 189.

434. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 279, gives a fuller version: "It has been said that Muṣ'ab returned to al-Baṣrah after having killed al-Mukhtār. He made al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabī'ah his agent for al-Kūfah, for both [cities] were in his governorate. Then his brother removed him from al-Baṣrah and appointed his son Ḥamzah to be its governor. He afterwards removed Ḥamzah at the petition of al-Aḥnaf and the people of al-Baṣrah and reinstated Muṣ'ab."

[Those in Office during the Year]

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the pilgrimage this year. His governor (ʿāmil) in charge of al-Kūfah was Muṣʿab. (I have mentioned how the historians[435] differ about the governor of al-Baṣrah.) ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. Masʿūd was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah. Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah. [753] ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān was in Syria, and ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī was in charge of Khurāsān.

435. Ahl al-siyar, literally, "people concerned with biographies, stories of how men conducted themselves."

The Events of the Year 68

(JULY 18, 687–JULY 5, 688)

Among these events was ʿAbdallāh [b. al-Zubayr's] returning of his brother Muṣʿab to Iraq as commander (amīr). We have already mentioned why ʿAbdallāh returned his brother Muṣʿab to Iraq as commander after having removed him. Having been returned there as commander, Muṣʿab sent al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabīʿah to be commander in charge of al-Kūfah. This was because Muṣʿab, after his removal, began his return to Iraq as commander in al-Baṣrah and went there.

[The Azāriqah Return from Fārs to Iraq][436]

In this year, the Azāriqah[437] returned from Fārs to Iraq. They came into the vicinity of al-Kūfah and entered al-Madāʾin.

436. Parallels, often implying different chronology, in Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 110ff; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 281ff.

437. The Azāriqah (pl. of Azraqī) were a group of Khārijites named for their leader, Nāfiʿ b. al-Azraq, who is said to have held that all his adversaries, with their wives and children, should be put to death. In 64/683, these Khārijites took

An Account of Them, Their Departure, and Their Return to Iraq

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī: Muṣ'ab sent 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar as commander in charge of Fārs. After al-Muhallab's onslaught upon them in al-Ahwāz, the Azāriqah had gone to Fārs, Kirmān, and the neighborhood of Iṣbahān.[438] When al-Muhallab left that area and was sent as governor in charge of al-Mawṣil and its neighborhood,[439] 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar being in charge of Fārs, the Azāriqah, with al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz, de- [754] scended upon 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh in Fārs. He met them at Sābūr,[440] fought them vigorously, and won a clear victory over them; however, not many of them were killed, and they went away as if on the defensive, having left the battle in that condition.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—a shaykh of the tribe [of Azd][441] in al-Baṣrah, who said: I heard the letter of 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh being read:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. To proceed: I hereby inform the commander—may God preserve him!—that I met the Azāriqah, who have strayed from the religion of Islam and followed their caprices without guidance from God. With the Muslims, I fought them most vigorously for a part of the day. God then advantage of the disturbances in al-Baṣrah to gain temporary control of the city; they were expelled, but remained a threat centered in neighboring Khūzistān province. In 65/684, both Nāfi' b. al-Azraq and the Zubayrid commander Muslim b. 'Ubays were killed fighting each other in Khūzistān. The Azāriqah regrouped under 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Māḥūz and spread terror between al-Ahwāz and al-Baṣrah. In 66/685, al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah was sent from al-Baṣrah to deal with them; he defeated to Azāriqah at Sillā wa-Sillibrā, near al-Ahwāz. 'Ubaydallāh was killed, but his successor, al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz, retreated to Fārs and regrouped his forces. See, in addition to the parallels cited above, Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 78ff.; EI^{2}, s.v.

---

438. Iṣbahān lay north of Fārs, in the province of al-Jibāl. See EI^{2}, s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 204–6.

439. Muṣ'ab's strategy was to use al-Muhallab as a barrier between himself and the forces of 'Abd al-Malik. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 282.

440. Sābūr, or Shāpūr, is a city in Fārs province, some 65 miles west of Shīrāz. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 248, 262f.

441. I.e., of Abū Mikhnaf's own tribe. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 100.

smote them before and behind and made them turn their backs to us. Those whom God killed suffered by failing to attain and by losing [what they hoped to gain in this world and the hereafter]—and all are [destined] for loss! I have written this letter of mine to the commander while on the back of my horse, seeking the foe, whom I hope God will exterminate, if He so wills. Peace.

ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh followed them. They immediately went and encamped by Iṣṭakhr.[442] He went after them, met them at the Ṭamastān bridge, and fought them vigorously. His son was killed, but he won a victory over them. Having cut the Ṭamastān bridge,[443] the Azāriqah removed to the neighborhood of Iṣbahān and Kirmān, where they remained until they had recovered and become strong, ready, and numerous. They then passed into Fārs, where ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar was, crossing its territory in an area other than the one where he was. They made their way [755] past Sābūr and then went out through Arrajān.[444] When ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh saw that the Khārijites had crossed his territory, heading toward al-Baṣrah, he became afraid that Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr would not forgive him for this. Hastening after them, he reached Arrajān and found that they had left it, heading toward al-Ahwāz. The coming of the Azāriqah was reported to Muṣʿab, who went forth and encamped with his men at the Great Bridge.[445] He said, "By God, I don't know what I have gained by putting ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh in Fārs and giving him an army whose provisions (arzāq) I pay every month, whose stipends (aʿṭiyāt) I pay in full every year, and for whom I order special grants (maʿāwin)[446] every 442. Iṣṭakhr, just north of ancient Persepolis (modern Takht-e-Jāmshīd), lay on the Pulwar River about 40 miles northeast of Shīrāz. See *EI*², s.v.; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 275ff.

443. They cut the bridge to hinder the forces pursuing them. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 282.

444. Arrajān, on the Ṭāb River (modern Āb-i Kurdistān or Mārūn), lay on the border between Fārs and Khūzistān. See *EI*², s.v. Arradjān; Le Strange, Lands, 268ff.

445. Arabic, al-jisr al-akbar.

446. Maʿūnah, pl. maʿāwin, referred to money given to a tribe to prepare it to make an expedition, then to a special levy made when the public treasury was depleted, and finally was extended to cover taxes in general. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 192; and *EI*², s.v.

year equal to the stipends! I have cut off any pretext he might have, supplied him with men, and made them strong—and the Khārijites cross his territory toward me! By God, had he fought them and then fled, it would have been more excusable for him in my eyes, even though someone who takes flight should not have his excuse accepted and has not acted in a way that deserves honor."

Led by al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz, the Khārijites came and encamped at al-Ahwāz. Their spies having reported to them that ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh was on their heels and that Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr had left al-Baṣrah to fight them, al-Zubayr arose among them, praised and extolled God, and said, "To proceed: For you to fall between these two forces would be bad strategy and confusion. Let us hasten toward our enemy and meet them from one direction."

He led them across the district of Jūkhā, turned toward the Nahrawān districts,[447] and followed the bank of the Tigris until he reached al-Madāʾin, where Kardam b. Marthad b. Najabah al-Fazārī was. They made a raid on the people of al-Madāʾin, killing children, women, and men, and ripping open pregnant women. Kardam fled. Then they went to Sābāṭ and used their swords on [756] the people, killing a slave woman who had borne a child[448] to Rabīʿah b. Nājid, and also killing Bunānah, the daughter of Abū Yazīd b. ʿĀṣim al-Azdī. Bunānah had read the Qurʾān and was exceedingly beautiful. When they came at her with swords, she said, "Woe unto you! Have you ever heard of men killing women? Woe unto you! You kill someone who stretches out no hand against you, wishes you no harm, and has no power to help herself. Will you kill someone who grew up bedecked with ornaments and was never seen in conflict?" One of them said, "Kill her." A certain man among them said, "You should leave her." Somebody said [to him], "Her beauty pleases you, you enemy of God! You have fallen into unbelief[449] and been seduced." Then the man 447. The Nahrawān districts (Upper, Middle, and Lower) lay on a canal east of the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 80, 57ff.

448. Literally, "an umm walad," i.e. a slave woman who had borne a child to her master. Such a woman was normally freed and her children recognized as legitimate after her master died. See Schacht, Islamic Law, 129.

449. Kafarta, "you have disbelieved, become a kāfir (nonbeliever)."

went away and left them. We thought he had left them no longer disagreeing [with him],[450] but they attacked her and killed her.

Rayṭah bint Yazīd said, "Praise God! Do you think God is pleased with what you do, killing women, children, and those who have done you no wrong?" Then she went away. They attacked her. In front of her was al-Ruwā' bint Iyās b. Shurayḥ al-Hamdānī, the daughter of Rayṭah's full brother. They attacked Rayṭah and struck her on the head with the sword; the point of the sword hit the head of al-Ruwā', and the two fell to the ground together. Iyās b. Shurayḥ fought the attackers for a time, but was thrown down and lay among the slain; they left him, thinking they had killed him. A man from Bakr b. Wā'il, named Razīn b. al-Mutawakkil, was also injured. When the Khārijites went away from them, only Bunānah bint Abī Yazīd and the slave woman who had borne a [757] child to Rabī'ah b. Nājid died; the rest of them recovered. They gave each other water to drink, bandaged their wounds, hired mounts, and went toward al-Kūfah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ruwā' bint Iyās, who said: I never saw a man more cowardly than one who was with us. His daughter was with him; when they came at us, he put her into our hands and fled, leaving her and us. On the other hand, I never saw a man nobler than one who was with us. We did not know him, nor he us. When they came at us, he fought to protect us until he was thrown down [wounded] among us. It was Razīn b. al-Mutawakkil al-Bakrī. Afterwards, he used to visit us and befriended us. He perished during al-Ḥajjāj's term of office. The Arab tribesmen were his heirs: he was a righteous worshiper [of God].

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—his father[451]—his paternal uncle:[452] Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr had sent Abū Bakr b. Mikhnaf to be in charge of Upper Ustān.[453] When al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabī'ah came,[454] he removed him. After-

450. For this meaning of fāraqa, see Dozy, Supplément, II, 259.

451. Abū Mikhnaf's father was Yaḥya b. Sa'īd b. Mikhnaf.

452. I.e., Muḥammad b. Mikhnaf b. Sulaym, the paternal uncle of Abū Mikhnaf's father. From Ṭabarī, I, 3266, one can deduce that he was born about 19/640 and was present at the Battle of Ṣiffīn. See U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf, 224f.

453. Ustān al-'āl: Middle Persian ōstān, which designated Sasanian crown land, occurs in Arabic as ustān, istān, or astān. Upper Ustān was the territory controlled from al-Anbār on the middle Euphrates. See Le Strange, Lands, 80; Morony, Iraq, 145.

wards, however, he confirmed him in charge of his financial district ('amal) in the second year. When the Khārijites came to al-Madā'in, they dispatched one of their bands, led by Ṣāliḥ b. Mikhrāq, to fight him. He encountered him at Karkh,[455] fought him for a time, and then they dismounted: Abū Bakr dismounted and the Khārijites dismounted [to fight]. Abū Bakr, his mawlā Yasār, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Ji'āl, and one of his tribesmen were killed, and the rest of his forces were put to flight. Surāqah b. Mirdās al-Bāriqī (from a subtribe of Azd) said:[456]

Help, O people, against the anxieties that visit by night!
Against the event that has brought distress!
The death of a chieftain of noble descent; [758]
one who was daring, a protector, and exceedingly brave!
The death of [Abū Bakr] b. Mikhnaf was reported to me just before [I reached] the foothills,[457] when the first of the flickering stars had set.
I said, "May God receive you with mercy!
May God, the Lord of East and West, bless you!"
May God cover with shame a people who turned aside from you in the morning and did not endure steadfastly the shining, flashing [swords].
They turned their backs; in the morning they distanced themselves from our leader and master in the distressing strait.
Therefore, whenever you come to us in our houses,
you hear wailing from women and young girls.
They weep for a man of praiseworthy nature, glorious, steadfast in battle for those he must defend.
Therefore my soul has become sad, and my hair has turned white from the burden I bear because of him.

454. I.e., when he came to al-Baṣrah to serve as governor for Ibn al-Zubayr. This happened in 66/685; see Ṭabarī, II, 601.

455. Karkh: a village that became a southwestern suburb of Baghdad. Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 115, reads "Karkh of Baghdad." See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

456. See Dīwān, 35–36.

457. Al-khayf can either be a generic term or refer specifically to Khayf al-Minā, near Mecca. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥadrah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Azdī, al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ al-ʿAbsī, and Fuḍayl b. Khadīj (all of whom reported this to me): The people of al-Kūfah came to al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabīʿah[458] and cried out to him, saying, "Go out [to fight]; behold, our enemy has drawn near us, and he has no mercy." He [759] went out, exerting himself energetically, until he encamped at al-Nukhaylah.[459] There he stayed for several days. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar jumped up before him; having praised and extolled God, he said: "To proceed: A merciless foe has come toward us, killing men, women, and children, terrorizing travelers, and laying waste to towns. Let us hasten to meet him. Order a departure." So al-Ḥārith went forth and encamped at Dayr ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. There he stayed until Shabath b. Ribʿī came before him and spoke to him as Ibn al-Ashtar had spoken. So he departed, but did not exert himself. When the people saw how slowly he was traveling, they recited this verse of rajaz about him:

Al-Qubāʿ has led us an arduous march:
he travels for a day and halts for a month!

They made him journey on from that place, but whenever he encamped with them, he halted until the people raised a clamor about it and cried out around his tent. It took him something over ten days to reach al-Ṣarāt.[460] When he came to al-Ṣarāt, the enemy's vanguard and first horsemen had already reached it.

When spies brought the Azāriqah word that the forces of the people of the garrison city [sc. of al-Kūfah] had come to them, they cut the bridge between them and these forces. The people began to recite this verse of rajaz:

Al-Qubāʿ has traveled a smooth journey:
five days between Dabīrā and Dabāhā![461]

---

458. Mss. O and Co add: "who was nicknamed al-Qubāʿ."

459. Al-Nukhaylah is close to al-Kūfah, on the road to Syria (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.). Al-ʿAlī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 237–38, locates it as the first stage north of al-Kūfah, close to present-day Jisr al-ʿAbbāsiyyāt.

460. There were two canals named al-Ṣarāt. The first, which is probably the one meant here, branched from the Nahr ʿĪsā between al-Anbār and Baghdad, and flowed into the Tigris. The second lay further south, was usually called the Great Ṣarāt, and flowed from the Euphrates just north of al-Ḥillah, to the Tigris. See Le Strange, Lands, 66, 72.

461. Dabīrā is mentioned by Yāqūt as a village near Baghdad; Dabāhā is men-

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—his father: There was a man from Sabī'[462] with a touch of insanity about him in a village called Jawbar, near al-Kharrārah.[463] He was named Simāk b. Yazīd. The Khārijites came to his village and took him and his daughter. His daughter they brought forward and killed. Abū al-Rabī' al-Salūlī stated to me that his daughter's name was Umm Yazīd and that she kept saying to them, "People of Islam, my father is afflicted;[464] do not kill him. As for me, I am only a girl. I swear to God I have never committed indecency, harmed any neighbor of mine, or been proud and conceited."[465] When they brought her forward to kill her, she started to cry out, "What is my offense? What is my offense?" She fell down in a faint or dead, and then they cut her up with their swords. Abū al-Rabī' said: This report was given to me by her nurse, a Christian woman from the people of al-Khawarnaq,[466] who was with her when she was killed. [760]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—his father: The Azāriqah brought Simāk b. Yazīd with them, until they came within sight of al-Ṣarāt. [Continuing,] he said: Turning to our army and seeing the large number of men assembled, Simāk b. Yazīd began to shout to us in a loud voice, "Come over to them; they are few and wicked." Thereupon, they beheaded him and crucified him, while we were looking on at him. [Continuing,] he said: When night fell, a tribesman and I crossed over, took him down, and buried him.

---

tioned by him as a village near Baghdad in the administrative subdistrict (tassūj) of Nahr al-Malik. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.vv.

462. Sabī' was a division of the Hamdān tribe. Note that the report is being related on the authority of Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq 'Amr b. 'Abdallāh al-Hamdānī al-Sabī'ī.

463. For Jawbar, Mss. O and Co read Juwayn, which is in Khurāsān, nowhere near al-Kharrārah, a place near al-Saylaḥūn, in the district of al-Kūfah (Yāqūt). The Leiden editor corrects to Jawbar. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, lists a village named Jawbar in the sawād of Baghdad. The Nahr Jawbar canal connected the Tigris and the Euphrates just south of al-Madā'in (Le Strange, Lands, 68).

464. A euphemism for "weak-minded," or "insane."

465. The verbs taṭalla'tu...tasharraftu also have the literal sense of looking down from a high place, perhaps to spy.

466. Al-Khawarnaq Palace, built according to tradition by al-Nu'mān, prince of al-Ḥīrah, for the Sasanian king Bahrām Gūr (reg. 421–431, or 420–438), lay a few miles south of al-Kūfah and about one mile east of Najaf. See EI^{2}, s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, 75ff; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

[761] According to Abū Mikhnaf—his father: Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar said to al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabī'ah, "Send the men with me, so that I can cross over to these dogs and bring you their heads right now." But Shabath b. Rib'ī, Asmā' b. Khārijah, Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith, Muḥammad b. al-Ḥārith, and Muḥammad b. 'Umayr said, "May God preserve the commander! Let them go; don't start anything with them." [Continuing,] he said: They seem to have been jealous of Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥaṣīrah b. 'Abdallāh [b. al-Ḥārith al-Azdī] and Abū Zuhayr [al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ] al-'Absī: When the Azāriqah reached the bridge of al-Ṣarāt and saw that the army of the people of the garrison city [sc. of al-Kūfah] had come out to fight them, they cut the bridge. Al-Ḥārith, taking advantage of the opportunity to delay, sat down with the men, praised and extolled God, and said: "To proceed: The first part of fighting is the shooting of arrows, then the pointing of spears, then the thrusting of them right and left; and the end of it all is the drawing of swords." [Continuing,] he said: A man stood up before him and said, "The commander—may God preserve him!—has described it well. But how long shall we keep doing this, while this river lies between us and our enemy? Order this bridge rebuilt the way it was, and lead us across to them. God will make you see a result you will like concerning them."

Al-Ḥārith therefore commanded that the bridge should be rebuilt, and the men crossed toward the Azāriqah. The latter fled until they reached al-Madā'in. When the Muslims arrived at al-Madā'in, some horsemen from the Azāriqah came and weakly charged some Muslim horsemen at the [floating] bridge and then drew back from them. Al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabī'ah had 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf pursue them with six thousand men to expel them from the territory of al-Kūfah; however, they were to let them go, if they reached the territory of al-Baṣrah. So he pursued [762] them until they left the territory of al-Kūfah and went toward Iṣbahān; then he turned away from them, not having fought them; no fighting had taken place between him and them. The Azāriqah proceeded and encamped near 'Attāb b. Warqā', who was at Jay.[467]

467. Jay was one of two adjacent cities that together formed Iṣbahān. See Le Strange, Lands, 203. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 284–87, reports that before besieging Iṣbahān, the Khārijites went to Rayy, where the local inhabitants (non-Muslims?)

They stayed there and besieged him. He made a sortie and fought them, but was unable to prevail against them. They attacked his forces, so that they went back into the city. (At that time, Iṣbahān was assigned as a grant (ṭuʿmah) to Ismāʿīl b. Ṭalḥah from[468] Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr. [Ismāʿīl b. Ṭalḥah] had sent ʿAttāb to be in charge.) ʿAttāb held out against them; every day he made a sortie and fought them at the gate of the city, and they bombarded the Azāriqah from the wall with arrows and stones.

There was with ʿAttāb a man from Ḥaḍramawt[469] named Abū Hurayrah b. Shurayḥ. He used to go out with ʿAttāb and was a brave man. As he attacked the Azāriqah, he would recite:[470]

You dogs of hell! What do you think of the attack of Abū Hurayrah, the snarler?
He snarls at you by night and by day,
O Ibn Abī al-Māḥūz and you evil ones.
What do you think of Jay[471] as a goal?

When his recitations had gone on too long for the Khārijites, one of them (he is supposed to have been ʿAbīdah b. Hilāl) laid wait for him. Abū Hurayrah went out one day and did as he had been doing, saying what he was accustomed to say. Suddenly, ʿAbīdah b. Hilāl attacked him and struck him a blow with the sword on the muscle[472] of his shoulder blade and threw him down. Abū Hurayrah's companions attacked ʿAbīdah b. Hilāl; they carried away Abū Hurayrah, brought him inside [the city], and treated him. Afterwards, the Azāriqah began calling at them, saying, "You [763] helped them defeat the governor, Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruʿaym, whose son Ḥawshab fled ignominiously. Muṣʿab later ordered ʿAttāb b. Warqāʾ to punish the inhabitants of Rayy for helping the Khārijites. ʿAttāb did so, defeating them and their leader al-Farrukhān.

468. Correcting ibn, "son of," to min, "from," as proposed in ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXIII. No son of Muṣʿab named Ṭalḥah is known. On the other hand, Ismāʿīl b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿUbaydallāh is mentioned by Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, 120, and is given the kunyah Abū al-Bakhtarī in Ṭabarī, II, 808.

469. Ḥaḍramawt is the extreme south of the Arabian peninsula, modern South Yemen. See EI[2], s.v.

470. The lines, in rajaz meter, pun on the literal meaning of "Abū Hurayrah," "father of the cat," i.e. a man fond of cats. Variants can be found in al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 1096, and in Ibn ʿAbd Rabbih, ʿIqd, I, 219.

471. Another reading: "What do you think of fighting me..." (Mss. O, Co, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 285).

472. Ḥabl can mean muscle, nerve, or vein (Lane, Lexicon, II, 504f).

enemies of God! What did Abū Hurayrah, 'the snarler,' do?" They, in turn, would call out, "You enemies of God! By God, he has nothing to fear." Abū Hurayrah soon recovered and afterwards went out against them. The Azāriqah began to say, "You enemy of God! We had hopes that we had sent you to visit your mother!" He said to them, "You ungodly ones! Why do you mention my mother?" They started to say, "Indeed, he is angry on account of his mother and is going to visit her shortly!" Abū Hurayrah's companions said to him, "Woe unto you! They mean hell." Realizing what they meant, he said, "You enemies of God, how undutiful you are to your mother when you separate yourselves from her! She[473] is your mother and unto her you are destined to go!"

The Khārijites continued attacking them for several months, until their horses died and their food ran out; the siege had become very severe, and they were afflicted by great weariness. So 'Attāb b. Warqā' summoned the people of Jay. Having praised and extolled God, he said, "To proceed: People, you see what weariness has befallen you. By God, naught remains save that each of you die in his bed and that his brother come to bury him, if he can. But the brother will most likely be too weak to do it; so each will die by himself and find no one to bury him or pray over him. Then fear God; for by God you are not so few in number that your strength will be contemptible to your enemy. Among you there are skilled horsemen from the garrison city, and you are the most pious among your fellow tribesmen. Let us make a sortie against these men, while there is life and strength in you, before each of you becomes unable to march toward his enemy from weariness or defend himself from a woman if she comes at him. May each man fight to protect himself; may he be steadfast and brave! By God, I have hope that if you fight bravely, God will make you victorious over them and cause you to subdue them."

[764] The people cried to him from every side, "You have gone straight to the mark. Let us make a sortie against them." So he gathered the people to himself at night and ordered them given a large evening meal. They ate the evening meal at his house. The next morning, he led them out under their banners. They came upon the enemy in their camp in the morning, when they felt safe that they would not be come upon in their camp. They attacked the enemy beside the camp and fought with them. The Khārijites cleared away from the front of the camp, so that the attackers reached al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz. Together with a band of his companions, he dismounted and fought until he was killed. The Azāriqah withdrew and joined Qaṭarī,[474] to whom they swore allegiance. ʿAttāb reentered his city, having taken whatever he wanted from their camp. Qaṭarī came pursuing him, apparently intending to fight him, and halted at the camp of al-Zubayr b. al-Māḥūz. The Khārijites assert that one of Qaṭarī's spies came to him and said, "I heard ʿAttāb say, 'If these men were to ride donkeys and lead horses, and if they were to sojourn today in one land and tomorrow in another, they would be more likely to survive.'" When that was reported to Qaṭarī, he went away and left them alone.

473. I.e., the fire of hell. ("Fire" is grammatically feminine in Arabic.)

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Zuhayr [al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ] al-ʿAbsī [who was with them]: We went forth to meet Qaṭarī the following day, on foot, with drawn swords. [Continuing,] he said: They departed; and, by God, it was the last they were encountered. [Continuing,] he said: Qaṭarī then went until he reached the area of Kirmān,[475] where he stayed until many troops had joined him. He pillaged the land,[476] appropriated the revenues, and became strong. Then he turned to the territory of Iṣbahān, came out by way of the Nāshiṭ mountain pass to Īdhaj,[477] and stayed in the territory of al-Ahwāz.

Al-Ḥārith b. Abī Rabīʿah was Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr's governor in [765] charge of al-Baṣrah. He wrote informing Muṣʿab that the Khārijites had descended upon al-Ahwāz and that only al-Muhallab could deal with them. Muṣʿab therefore sent to al-Muhallab, who was in charge of al-Mawṣil and al-Jazīrah, ordering him to go and fight 474. On the career of Qaṭarī b. al-Fujā'ah, the last and most famous leader of the Azāriqah, see *EI*², s.v. Ḳaṭarī b. al-Fudjā'a.

475. Kirmān, major city of the province of the same name, lay about 350 miles southeast of Iṣbahān. See *EI*², s.v.

476. Literally, "He ate up the land." For this meaning, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 31.

477. Modern Persian, Izeh, 80 miles northeast of Ahwāz, at the foot of the Zagros Mountains. See *EI*², s.v.

the Khārijites, and sending Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar to [take charge of] his district. Al-Muhallab went to al-Baṣrah, chose men, and led out the men he had selected. He then headed toward the Khārijites, and they advanced toward him. They met at Sūlāf[478] and fought there for eight months in some of the hardest fighting the men had ever seen, with neither side sufficiently injuring the other through spear thrusts and sword blows to force it to yield.

[Events in Syria]

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabari]: In this year, there was severe drought in Syria, so severe that they were unable to campaign.

In this year, 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān encamped at Buṭnān Ḥabīb in the territory of Qinnasrīn.[479] They were rained on there, and there was so much mud that they called the place "Buṭnān al-Ṭīn."[480] 'Abd al-Malik spent the winter there and then returned to Damascus.

[The Death of 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr]

In this year, 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr was killed.[481]

---

478. Sūlāf was a village in Khūzistān, about 20 miles north of al-Ahwāz, west of the Dujayl river and near the town of Manādhir al-Kubrā. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.; Le Strange, Lands, p. 239.

479. Qinnasrīn is in northern Syria near Aleppo. Buṭnān Ḥabīb [the name means "the lowlands of Ḥabīb," after Ḥabīb b. Maslamah, the Muslim conqueror of the area] is a wādī about 30 kilometers east of Aleppo. See EI^{2}, s.v. Buṭnān; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Buṭnān and Qinnasrīn.

480. I.e., "the lowland of mud."

481. 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr al-Ju'fī: Further information on this Kūfan sharīf-outlaw in Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 243–56, 265–72; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 290–98; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 287–95. On his activity as a poet, see F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 355–6. In 51/671, he witnessed the arrest in al-Kūfah of Ḥujr b. 'Adī (Ṭabarī, II, 135). In 60/680, when Mu'āwiyah died, he was present in al-Kūfah when a group of ashrāf invited al-Ḥusayn to come to the city; but when the governor 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād arrested al-Ḥusayn's agent, Muslim b. 'Aqīl, Ibn al-Ḥurr left al-Kūfah and encamped at Qaṣr Banī Muqātil [in the desert near present-day Ukhaydir]. In 61/681, al-Ḥusayn passed by 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr's camp and called on him to help; Ibn al-Ḥurr refused [Ṭabarī, II, 305, 388–90], but offered al-Ḥusayn a swift horse on which to escape. Later, Ibn al-Ḥurr expressed his grief over the events at Karbalā' in a poem. In 67/686, he fought for Muṣ'ab against al-Mukhtār in the siege of al-Kūfah (Ṭabarī, II, 633–34).

His Death; the Circumstances That Brought It upon Him

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī] —ʿAlī b. Mujāhid: ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr was one of the best of his tribesmen[482] in righteousness, excellence, prayer, and exertion. After ʿUthmān was killed,[483] and conflict erupted between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiyah, he said, "Truly, God knows that I love ʿUthmān and will avenge him, now that he is dead." He therefore went to Syria and was on the side of Muʿāwiyah. [Mālik b. Mismaʿ also went to Muʿāwiyah, being of similar opinion concerning the [766] ʿUthmāniyyah.[484]] ʿUbaydallāh remained with Muʿāwiyah, was present with him at Ṣiffīn, and continued with him until ʿAlī [peace be upon him!] was killed.[485] After ʿAlī was killed, ʿUbaydallāh came to al-Kūfah. He went to his brothers and whoever had been active in the civil strife and said to them, "Men, I do not think anyone's standing aside will benefit him. We have been in Syria, and thus and so has happened in regard to Muʿāwiyah's enterprise." And the people said to him, "Thus and so has happened in regard to ʿAlī's enterprise." So he said, "Men, if we have the opportunity, throw off your restraint and take charge of your own affairs." They said, "We will meet." So they used to meet together concerning the matter.

When Muʿāwiyah died, the conflict erupted in the civil strife [fitnah] of Ibn al-Zubayr. ʿUbaydallāh said, "I do not think that Quraysh is doing the right thing. Where are the sons of free women?" Outlaws[486] of every tribe came to him, so that he had

---

482. The tribe of Juʿfī, to which he belonged, was a Yemeni tribe either allied to or a subdivision of the tribe of Madhḥij.

483. ʿUthmān, the third caliph, was killed in 35/656.

484. The ʿUthmāniyyah was the party that demanded that the murderers of ʿUthmān be punished. Muʿāwiyah, the governor of Syria, emerged as the leader of the party, based on his blood relationship to ʿUthmān (although he was not the next of kin).

485. The Battle of Ṣiffīn was in 38/657; ʿAlī was killed in 40/661.

486. The term khalīʿ referred to a man whose crimes had rendered him an outcast from his family, clan, or tribe. In effect, the tribe served notice that it would no longer protect such a man; if anyone wished to avenge himself on him for his crimes, he would no longer incur the wrath of the tribe for killing one of its members. Since in pre-Islamic Arabia the protection of a man's tribe was essential for survival, the khalīʿ's life was in real danger. He could either seven hundred skilled horsemen with him. "Give us your command," they said.

When 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād fled and Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah died,[487] 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr said to his young men, "Dawn has become visible to anyone who has eyes.[488] So if you want [to act, do it]." He went out to al-Madā'in and left no money that was brought from al-Jibāl province to the government but that he took it and took from it his stipend and the stipends of his companions. Then he said, "You have partners in this money in al-Kūfah, men who have a claim to it; but take the coming year's stipend in advance." To the official in charge of the treasury he wrote a quittance[489] for the money he had collected and began to range the rural districts (kuwar) in a similar manner.

[Al-Madā'inī] said: I asked ['Alī b. Mujāhid], "Was it his practice to help himself to people's money and that of merchants?" He said to me, "You do not know Abū al-Ashras.[490] By God, there [767] was no Arab tribesman in the land more respectful toward free women, or more abstemious from unseemly behavior and wine drinking than he. All that demeaned him in people's eyes was his poetry, for he was one of the young men fondest of poetry."

'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr continued in this way until al-Mukhtār rose to power[491] and was informed of what he was doing in the

---

become a lone brigand, trusting to his own skill in eluding enemies, or he could band together with others in the same predicament.

487. After Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah died in 64/683, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, the Umayyad governor of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah (he had been responsible for the death of al-Ḥusayn and the repression of the Kūfan Shī'īs), was forced to flee to Syria. See EI[1], s.v. 'Ubaid Allāh b. Ziyād.

488. Proverbial for a thing that has become altogether manifest. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 286, s.v. bāna; Freytag, II, 255; Maydānī, II, 39.

489. Barā'ah, a document stating that the person in question had fulfilled his duty and was under no further obligation. See ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CXXX.

490. Abu al-Ashras ("the most ill-natured, harsh, or severe") is the nickname of 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr.

491. I.e., in the events of 66/685 in al-Kūfah. Cf. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 304: "Al-Mukhtār wrote to 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr al-Ju'fī, who was attacking and raiding in the region of al-Jabal, and said to him, 'You rebelled only in anger over al-Ḥusayn. We, too, are among those who are angry on his account. We have devoted ourselves to avenging his blood. Help us in the matter.' When 'Ubaydallāh made no reply, al-Mukhtār rode to 'Ubaydallāh's house in al-Kūfah, destroyed it, and ordered 'Ubaydallāh's wife to be arrested and imprisoned." The sequence of events in Dīnawarī is: arrest and imprisonment of 'Ubaydallāh's wife, 'Ubaydallāh's Sawād. Al-Mukhtār ordered ʿUbaydallāh's wife, Umm Salamah al-Juʿfiyyah, to be imprisoned. Al-Mukhtār said, "By God, I will kill him or kill his companions." When ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr learned of this, he came with his young men, entered al-Kūfah by night, broke the door of the prison, and brought out his wife and every woman and man who was in it. Al-Mukhtār sent some men to fight him, and he fought with them until he had left the city. When he got his wife out of prison, he recited:

Have you not known, Umm Tawbah, that I am the horseman who protects those of Madhḥij he is duty-bound to protect,
And that I came to the prison at the height of the forenoon[492] with young men, each of them a protector of what is inviolable, each of them fully armed?
As soon as the women came out of prison, there appeared to us a forehead like a sunbeam, unwrinkled,
And a smooth cheek, revealing a young woman beloved to us—may every rain cloud that approaches give her drink!
The only life for me is to visit you fearlessly, as was our habit before my warring and my rebelling.
You are the soul's object of solicitude and love: [768]
Peace be upon you from a companion covered with scars!
Because of your imprisonment, I remained imprisoned, downcast, grieved by what you encountered thereafter.
By God, did you ever see a horseman like me, when they stormed the prison from every entry?
[A man] such as I will protect such [a woman] as you;
I hold fast whenever a crisis does not loosen its grip.
For you I will fight them with the sword, that you may return to safety and a life abundant and plentiful.
If they surround me, I will charge them like the father of two lion cubs cornered in a thicket.

---

raid on the estate of ʿAmr b. Saʿīd al-Hamdānī, his rescue of his wife, and his fighting his way out of al-Kūfah.

492. Either there is a disparity between the poem (he came in the forenoon) and the associated prose text (he came by night), as is not uncommon in Arabic sources that cite poems within historical narratives, or (as seems implied in Dīnawarī) ʿUbaydallāh entered al-Kūfah by night and rescued his wife the following day.

I challenged Ibn Kāmil al-Shākirī to fight me, but he turned away, galloping swiftly, not turning aside.
If they call out my name, I turn against them horses generous in battle, most of them with hurting hoofs.[493]
No wonder Salmā, my wife, says,
"Ibn al-Ḥurr, truly you are a man who never withdraws from fighting!
Leave the men; do not fight them. Escape safely;
hasten with the horsemen—God guide you!—and go forth."
I hope, O best of women, to be seen in the best state of one who has hopes; so hope you!
[769] How lovely it was when I said to Aḥmar of Ṭayyi'[494] and to Ibn Khubayb, "The dawn has drawn near; journey forth!"
And when I said to this one, "Travel," to that one, "Depart," and to that one afterwards, "Saddle up!"

He began to harass al-Mukhtār's financial agents and partisans. [The tribe of] Hamdān arose with al-Mukhtār, burned Ibn al-Ḥurr's house, and sacked his estate at al-Jubbah and al-Budāt.[495] When he learned of this, he went to the estates of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays at Māh,[496] caused them to be plundered, and caused everything belonging to [the tribe of] Hamdān there to be plundered. Then he went to the Sawād and left no property belonging to any Hamdānī untaken. Concerning that, he said:

493. I.e., because he has driven them so hard.

494. Aḥmar of Ṭayyi' was one of Ibn al-Ḥurr's companions. See Ṭabarī, II, 388–390, and II, 775, below.

495. Al-Jubbah and al-Budāt (or al-Badāt) are two districts (tassūj) in the sawād of al-Kūfah (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.vv.). The Nahr al-Badāt was a canal that left the Kūfah branch of the Euphrates about a day's journey north of al-Kūfah and flowed south to the Great Swamp. See Le Strange, Lands, 74.

496. Two cities or districts had the name of Māh: Māh al-Baṣrah, the Nihāwand district, whose taxes were used for the support of the military population of al-Baṣrah, and Māh al-Kūfah, the city of Dīnawar in al-Jibāl, whose revenues were applied to the benefit of the citizens of al-Kūfah. Since 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays (who, according to Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 302, had carried out al-Mukhtār's order to sack and destroy 'Ubaydallāh's house) was one of the ashrāf of al-Kūfah, the city of Dīnawar seems more likely. See EI^{2}, s.vv. Dīnawar and Māh al-Baṣra; Le Strange, Lands, 189.

do we bind ourselves with allegiance (bayʿah) to them, when they are no braver than we in battle or wealthier than we? The Messenger of God charged us, "No obedience to a creature that [772] involves disobeying the Creator!" After the four who have passed away,[503] we have seen no righteous imām or pious helper (wazīr); all of them have disobeyed and opposed [God]—strong as to this world and weak as to the next! Why should our honor be violated, when we are veterans of al-Nukhaylah, al-Qādisiyyah, Jalūlāʾ, and Nihāwand?[504] We meet spearheads with our necks and swords with our faces, and then our right and merit go unacknowledged! Then fight for your wives. Whatever happens, there will be advantage in it for you. I hereby turn against them[505] and show them hostility. There is no strength but in God!"

So ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr made war on them and raided. To deal with him, Muṣʿab sent Sayf b. Hānīʾ al-Murādī, who said to ʿUbaydallāh, "Muṣʿab will give you the tax revenue of Bādūrayā,[506] on condition that you swear allegiance and become obedient to him." ʿUbaydallāh replied, "Don't I [already] have the tax revenue of Bādūrayā and other districts? I accept nothing, and on no condition will I trust them. But I see, young man"—Sayf was a young man at the time—"that you are an intelligent young fellow. Wouldn't you like to follow me, and I will make you rich?" Sayf refused.

When he left prison, Ibn al-Ḥurr said:

Kūfah is not my mother, nor is Baṣrah my father;
neither does laziness deflect me from travel.

(Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī] said the authorship of this verse is attributed to Suḥaym b. Wathīl al-Riyāḥī.)

---

strength to seize it by force. The expression is proverbial, see Freytag, II, 677 (Maydānī, II, 219).

503. I.e., the first four caliphs: Abū Bakr, ʿUmar, ʿUthmān, and ʿAlī.

504. Famous battles: At al-Nukhaylah in 41/661, Kūfan forces rescued Muʿāwiyah's Syrians from a band of Khārijites (Ṭabarī, II, 7–9). Al-Qādisiyyah and Jalūlāʾ were both sites of great Muslim victories over the Persians in 16/637. The Muslim victory at Nihāwand, in 21/641, effectively opened the Iranian plateau to Muslim penetration.

505. Literally, "I have turned towards them the outer side of the shield." The expression is a proverb meaning to become hostile to someone after reconciliation. See Freytag, II, 258 (Maydānī, II, 40).

506. Bādūrayā was a village on the west bank of the Tigris later incorporated into greater Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 31.

Ibn al-Zubayr, do not think I am like a drowsy man who, when he alights in a place, sleeps until he is told, "Go away."
If I do not incite to visit you horses that run grimly, carrying their riders, may I not be called a man of judgment and valor.
[773] If you do not see raids against you from every side, so that you speedily repent, O man,
May no chaste woman ever lay off her veil in my household, and may I live only on vain hopes and excuses![507]

This is [part of] a long poem.

Muṣʿab sent al-Abrad b. Qurrah al-Riyāḥī with a band of men to fight him, but he was defeated by Ibn al-Ḥurr, who struck him a blow on the face. Then Muṣʿab sent against him Ḥurayth b. Zayd (or Yazīd), who challenged him to single combat, but ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr killed him. Then Muṣʿab sent against him al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah[508] al-Khathʿamī and Muslim b. ʿAmr, who met him at the Ṣarṣar canal,[509] but ʿUbaydallāh fought them and defeated them. Then Muṣʿab sent him men to offer him safety, gifts, and charge of any country he wanted; but he refused. He went to Narsā;[510] its dihqān,[511] Ṭīzjushnas, fled with the revenue of al-Fallūjah and, pursued by Ibn al-Ḥurr, went to ʿAyn al-Tamr,[512] where he took refuge with the forces of Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah b.

507. An oath to divorce his wife is implied. Such as oath was considered particularly strong.

508. Ms. "Ḥārithah," corrected by ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXIII.

509. A canal that left the Euphrates about 10 miles south of al-Anbār, passed through the town of Ṣarṣar, just south of Baghdad, and flowed into the Tigris about 5 miles north of al-Madāʾin. See Le Strange, Lands, 32, 35, 67.

510. Apparently a variant for the Nars canal (attributed to the Persian Narsā) that left the Sūrā channel of the Euphrates near al-Ḥillah. The districts between the main branch of the Euphrates and the Sūrā channel were called Upper and Lower Fallūjah. See Le Strange, Lands, 73f.

511. A dihqān was a member of the local class of Persian landlords in Iraq who administered subdistricts. See EI^{2}, s.v. Mss. Pet, O and Co give the first syllable of the name as Ṭīr-, but vary in dotting the remaining consonants.

512. ʿAyn al-Tamr was a town in a fertile depression on the border of the desert west of the Euphrates, some 60 miles northwest of al-Kūfah. Since it commanded the approach to al-Kūfah from the Western Desert, governors of al-Kūfah normally maintained a garrison there. See EI^{2}, s.v.; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

Of the bulk of our property neither the liar[497] nor the blue-eyed[498] men of Hamdān have left anything but a remnant.
Is it right that Shākir should plunder my estates, and that Ibn Sa'īd's estate should be safe from me?
Have you not known, Umm Tawbah, that I am not listless when confronting the vicissitudes of fortune?
I tighten my belt for every adversity, and against every affliction I am exceedingly stalwart.
If I do not come to Shākir in the morning with a squadron and cure my sword's thirst with my own two hands—(They destroyed my house and led my wife off [770] to their prison—the Muslims are my witnesses.
They gave her no time to tie her veil.
O the marvel! Will fate avenge me?)
Then I am not Ibn al-Ḥurr,[499] if I do not suprise them with armored horsemen who attack like lions.
My horsemen are not cowards; I have urged them against an army numerous and well equipped.

This is [part of] a long poem.

[Continuing,] he said: He used to come to al-Madā'in and make the rounds of the Jūkhā district financial agents, taking whatever money they had, and then head toward al-Jibāl province. He continued in this manner until al-Mukhtār was killed. After al-Mukhtār had been killed, people said to Muṣ'ab in his second governorship, "Ibn al-Ḥurr split with both ['Ubaydallāh] b. Ziyād and al-Mukhtār. We fear he may attack the Sawād as he used to do." Muṣ'ab therefore imprisoned him. Ibn al-Ḥurr said:

Who will inform the young men that a strong door and its keeper have come between them and their brother,
In a dwelling unpleasing?
Whenever he stands up, fetters creak and respond to him.

497. I.e., al-Mukhtār.

498. In Arabic poetry, blue eyes are considered a defect: either a sign of poor vision (cataracts) or a sign of hostility, See Lane, Lexicon, III, 1228. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 304, reads "the man."

499. Punning on the literal meaning of Ibn al-Ḥurr, "son of the free man."

On the leg above the heel there is something black, mute, and strong; it contracts his steps and shortens them.
This did not happen because of a great crime I committed, but a slanderer spread his lies.
[771] There is a course in the wide world;
for many a man his paths on it have been strait.
For man there is a lesson in fortune, time, and the past, if ever vicissitudes occur.

ʿUbaydallāh [b. al-Ḥurr] asked some men from Madhḥij to go to Muṣʿab on his behalf. He sent to the eminent men of the tribe and said, "Go to Muṣʿab and speak to him by himself, for he has imprisoned me without a crime. Some liars have slandered me and made him afraid of things I would not do and that would not be my business." But he also sent word to some young men from Madhḥij, saying, "Gird on swords and take battle gear. I have sent some men to Muṣʿab to speak to him on my behalf. Stand at the door. If the men come out and he has accepted their intercession, interfere with no one; let your swords be covered by your garments."

The men from Madhḥij came, entered Muṣʿab's presence, and spoke to him. He accepted their intercession and released ʿUbaydallāh. Ibn al-Ḥurr had said to his companions, "If the men come out and Muṣʿab has not accepted their intercession, take the prison by force; I will help you from inside." When Ibn al-Ḥurr came out, he said to them, "Show your swords." They showed them; no one interfered with him, and he went to his home. Muṣʿab regretted having released him, for Ibn al-Ḥurr was openly disobedient. When men came to congratulate him, he said, "This matter[500] is meet only for such men as were your former caliphs. We see no one equal to them or like them among us, that we should allow him to conduct our affairs and grant him our sincere advice.[501] If it is only 'He who overcomes takes the spoil,'[502] why

500. Arabic amr, which means both "command," and "matter, thing," is used like Latin res in the phrase res publica to mean "state or commonwealth," and particularly the caliphate. Cf. Dozy, Supplément, I, 37.

501. The Arabic idiom, "grant sincere advice," is stronger than the English equivalent. It is regularly used by synecdoche to mean the entire loyalty of a man to his superior.

502. I.e., if the caliphate has become merely the prerogative of whoever has the Hubayrah al-Shaybānī, who was in charge of the town. Bisṭām and his forces went out and fought Ibn al-Ḥurr. Bisṭām's cavalry numbered one hundred and fifty horsemen. Challenged by Ibn al-Ḥurr to single combat, Yūnus b. Hāʿān al-Hamdānī from Khaywān[513] said, "The worst that fortune has in store is what it brings in the end. I never thought I would live until a man challenged me to single combat."[514] He met him in single combat, and Ibn al-Ḥurr struck him a blow that knocked the strength out of him; then they grappled, and both fell from their horses. Ibn al-Ḥurr took Yūnus's turban, tied his hands with it, and then rode off.

Al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah al-Khathʿamī came to them. Al-Ḥajjāj attacked him, but ʿUbaydallāh also took him prisoner. Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah challenged al-Mujashshir[515] to single combat; they exchanged blows until each had wearied the other. When Ibn al-Ḥurr saw that Bisṭām was winning, he attacked Bisṭām. Bisṭām grappled with him and both fell on the ground. Ibn al-Ḥurr fell on Bisṭām's chest and took him captive. That day, he took many men captive. One man would say, "I was your companion on such and such a day"; another would say, "I dwelt among you"; and each of them sought to gain favor by what he thought would be to his advantage, so that he would be released. [774]

ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr sent horsemen from among his companions under the leadership of Dalham al-Murādī to seek the dihqān. They found him and took the money before there was any fighting. Ibn al-Ḥurr said:

If I had four men like Jarīr,[516]
I would go to the treasury in the morning and collect.
Muṣʿab and those with him would not frighten me.
How excellent a young man is Ibn Mashjaʿah!

513. Khaywān was a town in Yemen. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v., and Lisān, s.v.

514. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansab, V, 295: "One of Bisṭām's men, Yūnus b. ʿĀhān by name, challenged Ibn al-Ḥurr to single combat. ʿUbaydallāh said—and it became proverbial, 'The worst that fortune has in store is what it brings in the end. I never thought I would live to see a man such as this one challenge me to single combat.'"

515. One of ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr's men.

516. Jarīr b. Kurayb commanded Ibn al-Ḥurr's left wing (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 295).

Then ʿUbaydallāh went to Takrīt. Al-Muhallab's financial agent fled from Takrīt, and ʿUbaydallāh stayed there, collecting the revenue. Muṣʿab sent al-Abrad b. Qurrah al-Riyāḥī and al-Jawn b. Kaʿb al-Hamdānī with a thousand men, and al-Muhallab reinforced the two with Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal with five hundred men to fight him. A man from Juʿfī[517] said to ʿUbaydallāh, "A large number have come upon you; do not fight them," but he replied:

My kinsmen try to make me afraid of being killed:
but I shall die only when the appointed Decree[518] comes.
Perhaps, spears with their points will draw wealth near, and we shall live as generous men; or [it may be that] we shall attack and be killed.[519]

Then he said to al-Mujashshir...,[520] gave him his banner, and [775] sent Dalham al-Murādī forward with him. He fought them for two days, having three hundred men with him. Jarīr b. Kurayb was wounded; ʿAmr b. Jundab al-Azdī and many of his horsemen were killed. At evening the two sides stopped fighting.

ʿUbaydallāh left Takrīt and said to his companions, "I am taking you to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān." So they made ready; but then he said, "I fear I may depart from life without having frightened Muṣʿab and his companions. Let us go back to al-Kūfah." [Continuing,] he said: He went to Kaskar,[521] banished its financial agent, and took its treasury. Then he went to al-Kūfah and encamped at Laḥḥām Jarīr.[522] Muṣʿab sent ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar against him, and he fought with him. Ibn al-Ḥurr then 517. Juʿfī was Ibn al-Ḥurr's own tribe.

518. Al-kitāb al-muʾajjal, literally, "the appointed book," or "the book whose time is appointed," i.e. the divine decree fixing the term of a man's life. The phrase occurs in Qurʾān 3:145.

519. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 296: "...and we shall live as generous men whom men ask for gifts and for whose generosity they hope." The Balādhurī version adds two lines: "Have you not seen that poverty brings contempt upon its people, and that in wealth there is eminence and adornment? If you do not venture upon what is fearful, you will never attain enough wealth to satisfy a friend and provide a surplus."

520. A word such as "Advance!" has apparently dropped out of the text (ed. Leiden, note).

521. See note 342.

522. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 293, reads "Ḥammām Jarīr."

left for Dayr al-A'war.[523] Muṣ'ab sent Ḥajjār b. Abjar against him. When Ḥajjār was defeated, Muṣ'ab heaped abuse on him, sent him back, and had Jawn b. Ka'b al-Hamdānī and 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar join forces with him. So they all fought Ibn al-Ḥurr. Many of Ibn al-Ḥurr's companions were wounded and their horses hamstrung. When al-Mujashshir, who carried Ibn al-Ḥurr's banner, was wounded, he gave the banner to Aḥmar of Ṭayyi'. Ḥajjār b. Abjar was beaten back, but wheeled round and returned to the fight. The two sides fought hard until evening. Ibn al-Ḥurr said:

If I had three men like young al-Mujashshir,
I would attack them [sc. the enemy] by night, not doubting.
He helped me the night of Dayr al-A'war with spear thrust and sword stroke, and at the crossing;
'Umar b. Ma'mar then would perish.

Ibn al-Ḥurr then left al-Kūfah.

Muṣ'ab then wrote to Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ru'aym al-Shaybānī, who was at al-Madā'in, ordering him to fight Ibn al-Ḥurr. Yazīd sent forward his son Ḥawshab, who met 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr at Bājisrā.[524] 'Ubaydallāh defeated him and killed some of his men. Ibn al-Ḥurr went and entered al-Madā'in, and [776] Yazīd's forces took refuge in the stronghold. Then 'Ubaydallāh left. Muṣ'ab dispatched al-Jawn b. Ka'b al-Hamdānī and Bishr b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī against him. Al-Jawn encamped at Ḥawlāyā;[525] Bishr went to Tāmarrā,[526] and encountered Ibn al-Ḥurr. Ibn al-Ḥurr killed him, defeated his forces, and then met al-Jawn b. Ka'b at Ḥawlāyā. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh went out to fight him; Ibn al-Ḥurr attacked him, thrust him with a spear, killed him, and defeated and pursued his forces. Then Bushayr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Bushayr al-'Ijlī went out to fight him. They 523. Dayr al-A'war lay north of al-Kūfah, approximately halfway to Karbalā'. See *EI*², s.v.

524. Bājisrā lay on the Nahrawān Canal, about 35 miles north of al-Madā'in. See Le Strange, Lands, 59.

525. Ḥawlāyā is located in the Nahrawān district (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.).

526. Tāmarrā was the name given to the Nahrawān Canal north of Bājisrā. See Le Strange, Lands, 59f.

met at Sūrā and fought hard. Bushayr then turned away from him, went back to his district ('amal), and said, "I have defeated Ibn al-Ḥurr." When what he had said reached Muṣ'ab, the latter said, "He is one of those who like to be praised for what they have not done."

'Ubaydallāh [b. al-Ḥurr] remained in the Sawād, raiding and collecting the tax revenues. Concerning this, Ibn al-Ḥurr said:

Ask Ibn Ru'aym about how I fight and take my stand at the Hall of Khusraw,[527] not turning my back to them.
Distinguished [in war], I wheel round to charge them, and you see them like goats that take to the rocks for fear of the wolf.
I attacked them by night in the stronghold of Khusraw son of Hurmuz with bright whetted [swords] and dark [spears] from al-Khaṭṭ.[528]
I gave them spear thrusts and sword blows; you see them seeking refuge from us in the middle of the night atop the stronghold.
[777] They seek refuge from me out of timorousness and fear, as doves seek refuge from a hawk.

Then, among other things mentioned, 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr joined 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān. After he had come to him, 'Abd al-Malik sent him with ten men toward al-Kūfah, ordering him to advance toward it until the [Syrian] army joined him. 'Ubaydallāh set out with the men. Having reached al-Anbār,[529] he dispatched people to al-Kūfah to tell his companions of his coming and ask them to come out to him. When the Qays party[530] learned of this,

527. Īwān Kisrā, the great Sasanian ceremonial hall, located on the east bank of the Tigris at al-Madā'in. See *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'in.

528. Al-Khaṭṭ, a place in the Yamāmah (eastern Arabia) was proverbial for producing (or importing) good spears. See Lane, Lexicon, II, 760.

529. Al-Anbār, on the left bank of the Euphrates, is about 12 farsakhs (44.6 miles) in a westerly direction from Baghdad. It was an important crossing place on the Euphrates near the northernmost navigable canal connecting the Euphrates with the Tigris. See *EI*², s.v.

530. Al-Qaysiyyah: On the division of the Arab tribes in Syria and al-Jazīrah into two antagonistic groups, Kalb and Qays, and on the loyalty of the Qays to Ibn they went to al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Rabīʿah, Ibn al-Zubayr's governor for al-Kūfah, and asked him to send an army with them, which he did. When they encountered ʿUbaydallāh, he fought them for a time. Then his horse drowned,[531] and he boarded a ferryboat. A local peasant[532] jumped on him and grabbed his arms; the others struck him with stones and cried out, "This is the man wanted by the Commander of the Faithful." The two men grappled with each other and drowned. They pulled ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr out, cut off his head, and sent it to al-Kūfah and then to al-Baṣrah.[533]

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: Another account of his death has also been given. ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Ḥurr is said to have died for the following reason: He used to visit Muṣʿab in al-Kūfah and saw the latter setting the people of al-Baṣrah ahead of him. He therefore is said to have written ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr a qaṣīdah,[534] reproving Muṣʿab, and threatening to go over to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān. In it he said:

Deliver a message to the Commander of the Faithful, for I am not of an unseemly opinion trying to outwit him:

---

al-Zubayr, see note 11. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 293f., adds that most of Ibn al-Ḥurr's men had gone ahead to raise support in al-Kūfah, leaving Ibn al-Ḥurr vulnerable.

531. Ms. O: "was hamstrung."

532. Literally, "a man from the anbāṭ," i.e. a Nabatæan, any of the Aramaic-speaking peasantry of Iraq.

533. Cf. the more detailed account in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 294 (summarizing Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 297): "They surrounded him, put his companions to flight, and tried unsuccessfully to take him prisoner. He allowed his companions to leave; they did so, and no one hindered them. He began to fight alone. A man from Bāhilah named Abū Kudyah attacked him, but Ibn al-Ḥurr hit him with a spear. They began to shoot arrows at him and crowded around him, but could not come near him. 'Are these arrows,' he would say, 'or are they spindles?' When the wounds had weakened him, he waded into a ferry there; he entered it, but his horse would not enter it. He boarded the boat, and the shipman took him to the middle of the Euphrates. The horsemen caught sight of him. There were some Nabatæan peasants with the shipman in the boat. The horsemen said to them, 'The man wanted by the Commander of the Faithful is in the boat. If he gets away from you, we will kill you.' Ibn al-Ḥurr jumped up to fling himself into the water, but a powerful man jumped him and grabbed his arms (his wounds were dripping blood). The rest of the men struck him with oars. When he saw that they wanted to take him to the Qays, he grabbed the man with him and threw himself with him into the water. Both of them drowned."

534. I.e., a long ode involving a stylized sequence of themes. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ḳaṣīda.

[778] Is it a matter of right that I be turned away and that Muṣ'ab take as his two helpers men I have been battling?
How, when I have sworn you my true allegiance, is my right turned aside when I demand it?
I bestowed on you such a thing as is not to be disregarded;
I did good to you, when the rugged parts of the affair were difficult.
But when the kingdom shone brightly and enemies had submitted, and when he had obtained his desire of the wealth of Iraq, Muṣ'ab turned away from me. Had it been anyone else,
I would not reproach him for what happened between us.
What has made me have an evil opinion of Muṣ'ab is the fact that Muṣ'ab has shown himself the friend of all who bear malice toward us.
If you drive me away, I will not drink when the water has been muddied, after [another] drinker has been favored with the clear!
A man receives only what God sends to him and what the Writer has inscribed in the Book.
When I stand by the door, Muslim[535] is allowed in, but the gatekeeper prevents me from entering the door.

This is [part of] a long poem.

He composed the following addressed to Muṣ'ab when he was in his prison. 'Aṭiyyah b. 'Amr al-Bakrī had been imprisoned with him. When 'Aṭiyyah was released, 'Ubaydallāh said:

I say to him, "Patience, 'Aṭiyyah;
it is prison only until God makes a way out."
[779] I see my fate as two kinds of day:
one day a wandering fugitive, one day crowned among kings.
Will you speak ill of my religion when I come to you, but draw al-Bāhilī and Ḥashraj near because of religion?
Have you not seen that the face of the kingdom has been marred 535. I.e., Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī, the father of Qutaybah b. Muslim. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 291.

and the nab' trees of God's earth have become 'awsaj trees?[536]

This is [part of] a long poem.

The following was also composed to reprove Muṣ'ab. He mentions how Muṣ'ab took as a companion Suwayd b. Manjūf, who had a scanty beard.

For which deed of endurance[537] and which favor [they bestowed] are Muslim and al-Muhallab made to go ahead of me?
And Ibn Manjūf is summoned ahead of me, as if he were a gelding come to water when the asses go off to pasture.
The shaykh of Tamīm has a head like thaghāmah,[538] and [the tribesmen of] 'Aylān are afraid of us, watching.
I have made the strongholds of Azd, stretching between Manbij[539] and the ghāf[540] trees of the valley of Oman, Lands from which our swords have banished the foe, from which Ṣufrah[541] dwells remote, and to which he is a stranger.

He also composed a qaṣīdah in which he satirized [the tribe of] Qays 'Aylān. In it he said:

I am a son of the Banū Qays; if you ask [780] about Qays, you will find them uppermost among the tribes.
Have you not seen how the Qays, Qays 'Aylān,[542] have veiled their beards and sold their arrows for spindles?
I continued to have hope in the Azd,[543] until I saw that they fell short of their haughty houses.

---

536. The hard wood of the nab' tree was used for arrows; the soft wood of the 'awsaj (boxthorn) was used for women's spindles (Lane, Lexicon, V, 2042).

537. For a discussion of balā' ("steadfastness, deed of endurance, manly deed") see Bravmann, The Spiritual Background of Early Islam, 83ff.

538. Thaghāmah, a mountain plant, perhaps wormwood or hyssop, was proverbial for its whiteness. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 339.

539. Manbij is about 50 miles northeast of Aleppo in Syria.

540. The ghāf tree, which is said to be large, grows in sand, and has sweet fruit, is particularly associated with Oman, the original home of the Azd tribe. See Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2318.

541. I.e., al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah.

542. Qays, the purported ancestor of the tribe of Qays, received the nickname 'Aylān, either from his father or because his horse was no named (Lisān).

543. The Azd were a group of South Arabian tribes, some of whom migrated Zufar b. al-Ḥārith then wrote to Muṣ'ab, saying, "I took care of fighting Ibn al-Zarqā'[544] on your behalf, and now Ibn al-Ḥurr is satirizing Qays!"

Then a group of the Banū Sulaym took Ibn al-Ḥurr and made him a prisoner. For his part, he said, "I merely said:

Have you not seen how the Qays, Qays 'Aylān, have come to us and brought spears and parties of horsemen?"

One of their men, named 'Ayyāsh, killed him. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith[545] said:

When I saw that men were sons by a stepmother,[546] and every speaker slandered us beyond measure,
Our going with our swords toward death spoke for us, and the wrinkling of the vein of the places where one kicks the mount [to make it gallop].
Had Ibn al-Ḥurr asked, he would have been told that they[547] are Yemeni and that they are not bartered for spindles.
He would have been told that our swords are acquainted with necks from the top to the backbone.

---

to Iraq from Oman. See *EI*², s.v. Ṭabarī, II, 463, quotes these lines in connection with the tribal conflicts of 64/783 in al-Baṣrah. After Yazīd's death, the Umayyad governor of Iraq, 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād, was forced to flee to Syria. Before leaving, he appointed the leader of the Azd, Mas'ūd b. 'Amr, to serve as his deputy. Mas'ūd was subsequently assassinated (by a Khārijite, but the Azd suspected the Banū Tamīm of having engineered the affair). Violence erupted between the Azd (and their ally, the Rabī'ah tribe of Bakr b. Wā'il) and Tamīm (with its Muḍar ally, Qays 'Aylān). After many deaths on both sides, the Azd agreed to accept blood money (diyah) from the Tamīm. Although such payments were an accepted way of ending tribal violence, they laid a group open to the charge of not being bold enough to exact vengeance in blood. The following additional lines in Ṭabarī, II, 463, make this explicit:

Shall Mas'ūd be killed, and they not avenge him?
The swords of Azd have become like sickles.
What good is there in blood-money that has bestowed humiliation upon the Azd, so that their clans are reviled in gatherings.

544. This pejorative epithet ("son of the blue-eyed woman") refers to Marwān b. al-Ḥakam. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 295; Ibn Ḥajar, Tabṣīr, 1469. On blue eyes as evil, see note 498.

545. On the poetry of the Qaysi leader Zufar b. al-Ḥārith al-Kilābī, see F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 339–40.

546. I.e., when they turned away from us and mistreated us.

547. I.e., our arrows.

ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥammām[548] said: [781]

Ibn al-Ḥurr, you chanted alone by yourself the words of a man inebriated or tottering.
Do you remember tribesmen whose spears hurt you, who protected their relations on the battlefield?
[The tribe of] Rabīʿah weeps because of what they encountered at their hands;
moreover, you are not the best among the kinsmen of Bakr.
Why did you not seek revenge for them with a Juʿfī, since they are your people closely related, in previous years?
On the day of the multitude,[549] we left them humiliated, taking refuge from our swords in the mimosa trees.
On the day of al-Nukhayl, ʿUmayr with his troops mixed with you, and you did not rejoice over him when he did so.
On the day of Sharāḥīl, we cut off your noses;
on that day he did not act injuriously against us.
With the blade of the sword, we struck the crown of his head, which had but recently known the services of the hairdresser.
If noses of Madhḥij have thereby been rubbed in the dust,[550] so may hateful noses be humiliated and hated.

[Four Separate Banners at the Pilgrimage]

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, four banners came to ʿArafāt.[551]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—Shuraḥbīl b.

548. ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥammām al-Salūlī lived mostly in al-Kūfah. Ṭabarī, II, 636–42, shows him as having been originally unsympathetic to the Shīʿah and as writing a panegyric of al-Mukhtār more or less to save his skin. Later, he became loyal to the Umayyads. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 324.

549. Possibly, "on the day (i.e., battle) of al-Tharī (a place name)."

550. "To rub someone's nose in the dust," means to humiliate him, the nose held high in the air being, in Arabic as in English, a sign of haughtiness. See Lane, Lexicon, III, 1113.

551. I.e., four separate groups of pilgrims, led by four standard-bearers, gathered at ʿArafāt for the wuqūf ("standing," or "station") that climaxes the Ḥajj (pilgrimage). In 68, the day of the wuqūf, 9 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, fell on July 15, 688. See EI^{2}, s.vv. ʿArafa and Ḥadjdj.

[782] ʿAwn—his father, who said: In the year 68, four banners stood at ʿArafāt: Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah with his companions stood with a banner at Jabal[552] al-Mushāt; Ibn al-Zubayr stood with a banner at the present standing place of the imām; then Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah led his companions forward so that they stood opposite Ibn al-Zubayr; behind these two was Najdah, the Ḥarūrī,[553] and the banner of the Banū Umayyah was to the left of the two. The first banner to return [from ʿArafāt] was that of Muḥammad b. al-Ḥanafiyyah; he was followed by Najdah, then by the banner of the Banū Umayyah, and then by the banner of Ibn al-Zubayr, with the people following it.

According to Muḥammad [b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī]—Ibn Nāfiʿ—his father, who said: That evening, Ibn ʿUmar had begun to hurry back [from ʿArafāt] with Ibn al-Zubayr's party; but when Ibn al-Zubayr went slowly, after Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah, Najdah, and the Banū Umayyah had gone past, Ibn ʿUmar said, "Ibn al-Zubayr is waiting, as was the custom of pre-Islamic times."[554] Then he rushed forward, and Ibn al-Zubayr rushed after him.

According to Muḥammad [b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī]—Hishām b. ʿUmārah—Saʿīd b. Muḥammad b. Jubayr—his father, who said: Fearing there would be strife (fitnah), I went on foot to all of them. I went to Muḥammad b. ʿAlī at al-Shiʿb[555] and said, "Abū al-Qāsim, fear God; we are in a place of sacred rites and sacred territory, and the people are ambassadors of God to this house.[556]

---

552. For jabal ("mountain"), one should read ḥabl ("large sand dune"), as in the parallel text in Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 75 (and note).

553. I.e., the Khārijite. Because the Khārijites gathered at the town of Ḥarūrāʾ (ca. 2 miles from al-Kūfah) when they "seceded" (kharaja) from ʿAlī's army in opposition to the plan for arbitration between ʿAlī and Muʿāwiyah, they were called "Ḥarūriyyah" (sing. Ḥarūrī). See *EI*², s.v. Ḥarūrāʾ. Najdah's followers controlled large areas of al-Yamāmah (central Arabia) at this time. See note 385.

554. Pilgrims depart from ʿArafāt after sunset on the ninth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah and rush back to Mecca without delay. The parallel text in Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 76, makes it clear that Ibn ʿUmar left as soon as the sun set, according to what he considered to be the Prophet's Sunnah; Ibn al-Zubayr, on the other hand, was waiting for darkness to fall. On the jāhiliyyah, "time of ignorance," or pre-Islamic paganism, see *EI*², s.v. Djāhiliyya.

555. Al-Shiʿb ("the path between two mountains") was a watering place between al-ʿAqabah and al-Qāʿ, three miles from Mecca on the Mecca-Medina road (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.).

556. The term ambassadors (wafd, pl. of wāfid) normally has the sense of persons coming to a great man to bring gifts or ask assistance (Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2955). "This house" refers to the Kaʿbah.

Do not spoil their pilgrimage for them." He replied, "By God, I do not want that. I will not stand in the way of anybody seeking to approach this house, and no pilgrim will be harmed by me. However, I am a man defending myself from Ibn al-Zubayr and what he seeks from me. I seek this thing[557] only so that two men may not oppose me in it. But go to Ibn al-Zubayr, and speak to him; and go to Najdah." Muḥammad [b. Jubayr] continued: I went to Ibn al-Zubayr and spoke to him as I had spoken to Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah. He said, "I am a man on whom the people have agreed and to whom they have sworn allegiance. These men are people of dissent." I said, "I think restraint would be best for you." He said, "I will do it." [783]

Then I went to Najdah al-Ḥarūrī. I found him among his companions and found ʿIkrimah, the lad (ghulām) of Ibn ʿAbbās, with him. I said, "Ask permission for me to go in to see your master." Muḥammad [b. Jubayr] continued: ʿIkrimah went in, and he admitted me without delay. I entered, greeted him with respect, and spoke to him as I had spoken to the two other men. He said, "As for initiating fighting against anyone, no; but I will fight anyone who begins to fight." I said, "I think the two men do not want to fight you." Then I went to the party of the Banū Umayyah and spoke to them as I had spoken to the other men. They said, "Our position is that we will not fight anyone, unless he fights us." Among those banners, I saw no men more tranquil or peaceful in their return [to Mecca] than Ibn al-Ḥanafiyyah.

[Those in Office during the Year]

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, Ibn al-Zubayr's governor in charge of Medina was Jābir b. al-Aswad b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī. Ibn al-Zubayr's brother Muṣʿab was in charge of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah. Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. Masʿūd was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī was in charge of Khurāsān, and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān was in Syria.

557. Amr, see note 500.

The Events of the Year 69

(JULY 6, 688–JUNE 24, 689)

[The Revolt and Death of 'Amr b. Sa'īd in Damascus]

According to al-Wāqidī, 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān went out to 'Ayn Wardah[558] this year and made 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ[559] his deputy over Damascus. The latter fortified himself there. When word of this reached 'Abd al-Malik, he returned to Damascus and besieged him.

Thus said al-Wāqidī. It is also said that 'Amr b. Sa'īd went out

---

558. 'Ayn Wardah ("Rose Spring") is another name for the city of Ra's 'Ayn ("Spring-Head") in al-Jazīrah province on the upper Greater Khābūr River near the present Syrian-Turkish border. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Ayn al-Warda; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

559. Abū Umayyah 'Amr b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ b. Umayyah al-Umawī, known as al-Ashdaq, was an Umayyad governor and general. Governor of Mecca when Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah became caliph (60/680), he was appointed governor of Medina the same year. Upon the death of Yazīd, 'Amr was mentioned as a possible successor to Marwān; he was the caliph's nephew through his mother and was also related to him on his father's side. Marwān, however, manipulated his own sons into the succession. 'Amr's resentment came out in his attempted coup under Marwān's successor. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Amr b. Sa'īd al-Ashdaq.

with ʿAbd al-Malik, and that when the latter was at Buṭnān Ḥabīb, ʿAmr returned to Damascus and fortified himself there, whereupon ʿAbd al-Malik returned to Damascus.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—ʿAwānah b. al-Ḥakam, who said: After ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān returned from [784] Buṭnān Ḥabīb to Damascus, he remained in Damascus for a time and then set out for Qarqīsiyā',[560] where Zufar b. al-Ḥārith al-Kilābī was. ʿAmr b. Saʿīd was with ʿAbd al-Malik. While at Buṭnān Ḥabīb, ʿAmr b. Saʿīd devised treachery, turned back by night—Ḥumayd b. Ḥurayth b. Baḥdal al-Kalbī and Zuhayr b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī were with him—and reached Damascus, where ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam al-Thaqafī was in charge as ʿAbd al-Malik's deputy. When he learned of ʿAmr b. Saʿīd's return, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān fled and left his district; ʿAmr entered the city and took control of it and its treasuries.

Someone other than the two previously mentioned authorities said that this episode took place in the year 70. He also said that ʿAbd al-Malik's journey from Damascus was toward Iraq, aimed at Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr. ʿAmr b. Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ said to ʿAbd al-Malik, "Behold, you are going out to Iraq. Your father promised this thing[561] to me after him. On that basis, I exerted myself for him; and my effort on his behalf is not hidden from you. Then grant this thing to me after you." ʿAbd al-Malik gave him no response, so ʿAmr left him and returned to Damascus. ʿAbd al-Malik returned on his heels and reached Damascus.

Resumption of the account according to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—ʿAwānah, who said: Having taken control of Damascus, ʿAmr looked for ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam, but did not find 560. Qarqīsiyā, was in al-Jazīrah province, at the confluence of the Greater Khābūr and the Euphrates. See Yāqūt Muʿjam, s.v. ʿAbd al-Malik's intention would have been to campaign against the pro-Zubayrid leader of the Qays, Zufar b. al-Ḥārith.

561. Amr, i.e., the caliphate. For the agreement reached at al-Jābiyah in 64/683 between the leaders of the Umayyad family and their supporters, proclaiming Marwān b. al-Ḥakam caliph on condition that his successors would be Khālid b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and ʿAmr b. Saʿīd al-Ashdaq, see Ṭabarī, II, 474–76, summarized by Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 19. After his victory at Marj Rāhiṭ, Marwān maneuvered his son ʿAbd al-Malik into the succession and excluded Khālid and ʿAmr. See Dixon, 124ff., for this episode; also Buhl, "Die Krisis der Umajjadenherrschaft in Jahre 684," 50–64.

him. He therefore gave orders and had his house destroyed. The people gathered; ʿAmr ascended the pulpit, praised and extolled God, and said: "No one from Quraysh ever stood on this pulpit before me without asserting that his were a heaven and a hell, and that he would cause whoever obeyed him to enter the heaven, and whoever disobeyed him to enter the hell. But I tell you that heaven [785] and hell are in the hand of God; nothing of that belongs to me, save that you have a claim to equal treatment[562] and a good stipend (ʿaṭiyyah) from me." Then he descended.

ʿAbd al-Malik arose in the morning, and ʿAmr b. Saʿīd was missing. He asked about him and was told what had happened. ʿAbd al-Malik therefore returned to Damascus; and behold, ʿAmr b. Saʿīd had covered [the wall of] Damascus with coarse haircloths.[563] ʿAbd al-Malik fought him there for several days. When ʿAmr b. Saʿīd sent out Ḥumayd b. Ḥurayth al-Kalbī in command of cavalry, ʿAbd al-Malik sent out Sufyān b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī against him. When ʿAmr b. Saʿīd sent out Zuhayr b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī, ʿAbd al-Malik sent out Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal al-Kalbī against him.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—ʿAwānah: One day, the two groups of horsemen stood facing each other. On the side of ʿAmr b. Saʿīd there was a man from [the tribe of] Kalb named Rajāʾ b. Sirāj. Rajāʾ said, "ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym, come out for single combat." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, who was on the side of ʿAbd al-Malik, said, "He who vies with al-Qārah in archery has done them justice,"[564] and came forward to engage Rajāʾ in single combat. The two thrust at each other with spears. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's stirrup

562. Muʾāsāh, "treating as an equal," implies generosity in sharing one's possessions with others. See Lane, Lexicon, I, 60. Parallel accounts say that ʿAmr's generosity drew the people of Damascus to his side. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 443 (authority of Abū Mikhnaf).

563. I.e., in preparation for a siege by ʿAbd al-Malik. The parallel text in Balādhurī (authority of Abū Mikhnaf and others) makes this clear: "He placed upon the wall of Damascus coarse haircloths, wood, coarse cotton cloth, and stuffed bedding and prepared for a siege" (Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 443).

564. Proverbial, see Freytag, II, 257 and Lisān, s.v. qārah (root q-w-r). According to the most likely explanation, the Qārah were a tribal group known as skilled archers. The saying originated when one of them gave his opponent choice of a contest in wrestling, running, or archery. When the opponent chose archery, the man, before hitting his opponent's heart with an arrow, replied with the saying, which became proverbial.

snapped, and Ibn Sirāj escaped from him. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said, "By God, had the stirrup not snapped, you would have cast forth the figs[565] in your stomach." So there was no truce between ʿAmr and ʿAbd al-Malik.

When their fighting had gone on a long time, the women of Kalb came with their children and wept, saying to Sufyān b. al-Abrad [al-Kalbī] and [Ḥumayd b. Ḥurayth] b. Baḥdal al-Kalbī, "Why will you slay yourselves for the ruler of Quraysh?" Each of them swore he would not go back until his fellow went back. When they all had agreed to go back, they looked and found that Sufyān was older[566] than Ḥurayth. So they asked Ḥurayth, and he went back. ʿAbd al-Malik and ʿAmr then made peace and drew up a written document between them. ʿAbd al-Malik gave ʿAmr a promise of safety. This took place on the eve of Thursday.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—ʿAwānah: Armed with a [786] black bow, ʿAmr b. Saʿīd went out with horsemen. He went forward and made his horse trample the ropes of ʿAbd al-Malik's tent. The ropes broke, and the tent fell. ʿAmr dismounted and sat down. ʿAbd al-Malik was furious and said to ʿAmr, "Abū Umayyah, armed with this bow, you resemble this tribe of Qays." "No," he replied, "I resemble someone better than they: al-ʿĀṣ b. Umayyah."[567] Then he rose up in anger, and the horsemen with him, until he entered Damascus.

ʿAbd al-Malik entered Damascus on Thursday and sent to ʿAmr, saying, "Give the men their provisions."[568] ʿAmr sent word to him, saying, "This is no city of yours; leave it." When Monday came—four days, that is, after ʿAbd al-Malik's entry into Damascus—he sent to ʿAmr, saying, "Come to me." [ʿAmr was at the home of his wife from the tribe of Kalb.] Now ʿAbd al-Malik had summoned Kurayb b. Abrahah b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Ḥimyarī[569] and consulted him in the matter of ʿAmr b. Saʿīd. Kurayb said to

565. Ed. Cairo emends to "straw."
566. Mss. O and Co, "greater."
567. ʿAmr's grandfather.
568. Arabic arzāq, plural of rizq, from Middle Persian rōzik, "daily allowance."
569. Kurayb b. Abrahah b. al-Ṣabbāḥ al-Ḥimyarī, a companion of the Prophet, was the chief of the Yemeni tribe of Ḥimyar in Syria during the days of Muʿāwiyah. He witnessed the Battle of Ṣiffīn, served in Egypt under the governor ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān, and lived to see al-Ḥajjāj's governorship of Iraq. He died in 75/694. See Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 641–43.

him, "In this matter,[570] Ḥimyar has been reduced to naught. I have no opinion for you on it. Neither my female nor my male camel is involved in this affair."[571] When ʿAbd al-Malik's messenger came to summon ʿAmr, the messenger found ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah at ʿAmr's house. ʿAbdallāh said to ʿAmr b. Saʿīd, "Abū Umayyah, you are dearer to me, by God, than my hearing and sight. I see that this man has sent word for you to go to him. My opinion is that you should not do it." ʿAmr said to him, "Why?" He replied, "Because Tubayʿ, the son of Kaʿb al-Aḥbār's wife,[572] said, 'Behold, a great descendant of Ismāʿīl shall return. He shall shut the gates of Damascus and go forth from it. Shortly thereafter he shall be killed.'" ʿAmr said to him, "By God, even if I were asleep, I would not fear that Ibn al-Zarqāʾ[573] would wake me. He is not the sort of person who would embolden himself to do that to me. Also, ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān came to me [787] last night in a dream and clothed me with his shirt." Now ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd was the husband of Umm Mūsā, the daughter of ʿAmr b. Saʿīd. ʿAmr said to the messenger, "Greet ʿAbd al-Malik, and tell him I will come to him this evening, God willing."

When it was evening, ʿAmr put on a sturdy coat of mail between a linen tunic[574] and a linen shirt and girded on his sword. At his home were his wife from the tribe of Kalb and Ḥumayd b. Ḥurayth b. Baḥdal al-Kalbī. As he rose to leave, he tripped on the carpet.

---

570. Parallel in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 298: "in such a matter as this."

571. A proverb meaning, "I have nothing at stake in the affair." See Freytag, II, 499 (Maydānī, II, 144).

572. Tubayʿ, who settled in Ḥimṣ in Syria, is said to have passed on the lore of his stepfather, Kaʿb al-Aḥbār. The latter, a learned Yemeni Jew (his name means "Kaʿb of the scholars"), introduced many stories of Jewish origin into Islam and often appears as a foreteller of future events. He is said to have predicted the death of ʿUmar. The following anecdote illustrates his reputation, which apparently rubbed off on his stepson: "When the head of al-Mukhtār was brought to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, he said, 'Nothing has happened under my rule but that Kaʿb told me about it. He mentioned, however, that a man from the tribe of Thaqīf would kill me; yet here lies the man's head before me!' Ibn al-Zubayr did not realize that al-Ḥajjāj, also from Thaqīf, lay in wait for him." (Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, V, 650) See ibid., I, 377, on Tubayʿ; Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 452; and *EI*², s.v. Kaʿb al-Aḥbār.

573. A derogatory name for ʿAbd al-Malik ("son of the blue-eyed woman"). See notes 498 and 544.

574. Qabāʾ: "a kind of tunic, resembling the qafṭān, generally reaching to the middle of the shank, divided down the front, and made to overlap over the chest" (Lane, Lexicon, VIII, 2984).

Ḥumayd said to him, "By God, if you obey me, you will not go to him." His wife said the same to him, but he paid no attention to what they said and went out with a hundred of his mawālī. ʿAbd al-Malik had sent to the sons of Marwān, and they had gathered at his home. When ʿAbd al-Malik was informed that ʿAmr was at the gate, he ordered that those with him be barred; ʿAmr himself was admitted and entered. Thus, ʿAmr's companions remained barred at each gate, and ʿAmr entered the courtyard[575] of the house, having only a servant of his with him. ʿAmr turned his eyes toward ʿAbd al-Malik, and behold, around him were the sons of Marwān, and with them were Ḥassān b. Mālik b. Baḥdal al-Kalbī and Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb al-Khuzāʿī.[576] Seeing their assembly and sensing evil, ʿAmr turned to his servant and said, "Go quickly—alas for you!—to Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd[577] and tell him to come to me." Not having understood what he had said, the servant [788] said to him, "At your service!" So ʿAmr said to him, "Go away from me into God's burning and fire!"

ʿAbd al-Malik said to Ḥassān and Qabīṣah, "If you wish, arise and meet with ʿAmr in the house." Then ʿAbd al-Malik said to them, as if jesting, so that ʿAmr b. Saʿīd might feel at ease, "Which of you two has been longer [in office]?" Ḥassān said, "Qabīṣah, O Commander of the Faithful, has been longer in office than I." (Qabīṣah was in charge of the seal.) ʿAmr then turned to his servant and said, "Go quickly to Yaḥyā and command him to come to me." Not having understood what he had said, the servant said to him, "At your service!" So ʿAmr said, "Go away from me!"

After Ḥassān and Qabīṣah had gone out, ʿAbd al-Malik ordered the doors shut. ʿAmr entered. ʿAbd al-Malik greeted him, said, "Here, please,[578] Abū Umayyah," seated him on the couch with him, and began talking to him at length. Then he said, "Lad, take the sword from him." ʿAmr said, "We belong to God, O Commander of the Faithful!"[579] ʿAbd al-Malik said, "Do you desire to

575. The older sense of qāʿah is the courtyard of a house; later it comes to mean the main salon. It is not clear which meaning is intended here.

576. Qabīṣah was ʿAbd al-Malik's secretary (kātib); see below, Ṭabarī, II, 837.

577. Yaḥyā was ʿAmr's brother.

578. Literally, "God be merciful to you." But the English suggests something sinister; the Arabic has overtones of affection and intimacy.

579. Here, this expression is said in suprise and as a protest of good intentions.

sit with me wearing your sword?"—and he took the sword from him. They spoke for a time, and then ʿAbd al-Malik said to him, "Abū Umayyah!" He replied, "At your service, Commander of the Faithful!" ʿAbd al-Malik said, "When you threw off your allegiance to me, I swore an oath that if I laid eyes on you and had power over you, I would put you in shackles."[580] The sons of Marwān said to him, "Then will you release him, O Commander of the Faithful?" ʿAbd al-Malik replied, "Then I will release him. What [else] might I possibly do to Abū Umayyah?" The sons of Marwān said, "Carry out the oath of the Commander of the Faithful." ʿAmr said, "God has made your oath come true, O Commander of the Faithful." ʿAbd al-Malik took out a set of shackles from under his couch, tossed them toward ʿAmr, and said, "Lad, bind him in them." The servant lad got up and bound him in them. ʿAmr said, "For God's sake, Commander of the Faithful, do not make me go out in them before the chiefs of the people." ʿAbd al-Malik replied, "Craftiness, Abū Umayyah, even at the point of death?[581] No, by God; we would not make you go out in shackles before the chiefs of the people. And we will remove them from you in no other wise than upwards."

Thereupon, ʿAbd al-Malik gave ʿAmr a pull that made his mouth hit the couch, breaking his front tooth. ʿAmr said, "For God's sake, O Commander of the Faithful, may what moves you [789] to break a bone of mine not be the commission of something even worse than that!" ʿAbd al-Malik said to him, "By God, if I knew that you would spare me if I spared you and that Quraysh would prosper, I would release you. But never have two men come together in a city in a situation like ours but one expelled the other." When ʿAmr saw that his tooth had been broken and realized what ʿAbd al-Malik planned to do, he said, "Will you commit treachery, Ibn al-Zarqāʾ?"

It has been said [by another authority]: When ʿAbd al-Malik

---

580. Jāmiʿah: a neck shackle to which were attached thongs to bind the hands to the neck. See Lane, Lexicon, II, 458.

581. A proverb, see Freytag, II, 680 (Maydānī, II, 220). ʿAbd al-Malik's allusion to ʿAmr's craftiness is clarified by the parallel in Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 445: "ʿAmr wanted to make a show of not wanting to go out only in order to entice ʿAbd al-Malik into sending him out. ʿAmr's supporters surrounding the palace would then free him."

pulled 'Amr so that his tooth fell out, 'Amr began to rub it. 'Abd al-Malik said to him, "I see that your tooth is so important to you that you will never again be well disposed toward me." So he gave orders, and 'Amr was beheaded.

Resumption of 'Awānah's account: The muezzin announced the afternoon prayer. 'Abd al-Malik went out to lead the people in worship and commanded 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān to kill 'Amr. When 'Abd al-'Azīz approached with the sword, 'Amr said, "For the sake of God and kinship, do not carry out my murder yourself; let someone more distantly related than you take charge of it. So 'Abd al-'Azīz threw away the sword and sat down. 'Abd al-Malik, having prayed a quick prayer, entered [the palace again], and the doors were shut. People saw that when 'Abd al-Malik came out, 'Amr was not with him. They mentioned this to Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd, and he came with men and alighted at the gate of 'Abd al-Malik; a thousand of 'Amr's slaves were with him and many of his companions afterwards. Those who were with him began to shout, "Let us hear your voice, Abū Umayyah!" With Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd, [790]
Ḥumayd b. Ḥurayth and Zuhayr b. al-Abrad came forward, broke the door of the enclosure (maqṣūrah),[582] and attacked the men with swords. A slave of 'Amr b. Sa'īd named Maṣqalah struck al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik a blow on the head. Ibrāhīm b. 'Arabī,[583] the official in charge of the dīwān,[584] carried [al-Walīd] away and brought him into the room where documents were kept.[585]

Having prayed, 'Abd al-Malik came in and found 'Amr alive. He said to 'Abd al-'Azīz, "What prevented you from killing him?" He replied, "His beseeching me for the sake of God and kinship prevented me, so that I softened to him." 'Abd al-Malik said to him, "God shame your piss-on-her-heels mother! You take

582. This term has several meanings. It is "the enclosure in a mosque where the prince sits" (Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2536). In Damascus, the public treasury was also called maqṣūrah; and any gatehouse or railing could also be given the name. A subsequent reference in 'Awānah's account indicates that the maqṣūrah in the mosque is meant. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 366; Ṭabarī, II, 794.

583. Ms. Pet: "b. 'Adī"; Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 448: "Ibn Arqam."

584. Dīwān, apparently from Middle Persian, meant a list or register, and, by extension, the administrative department or office in charge of maintaining such a register. See EI^{2}, s.v.

585. Bayt al-qarāṭīs: from qirṭās, papyrus (later, paper) or a rolled document. See Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2517; EI^{2}, s.v. Ḳirṭās.

after no one but her." ('Abd al-Malik's mother was 'Ā'ishah bint Mu'āwiyah b. al-Mughīrah b. Abī al-'Āṣ b. Umayyah; 'Abd al-'Azīz's mother was Laylā.[586] As Ibn al-Ruqayyāt said:[587]

That is Laylā's son, 'Abd al-'Azīz: at Bābilyūn[588] his food bowls are full to overflowing.)[589]

'Abd al-Malik then said, "Lad, bring me the lance." He brought it.
[791] 'Abd al-Malik brandished it and thrust at 'Amr with it. When it did not penetrate, he did it again. It did not penetrate. He put his hand on 'Amr's arm and felt the coat of mail. Laughing, he said, "And wearing mail, too! Abū Umayyah, you really came prepared! Lad, bring me the sword that will not bend." He brought him his sword. 'Abd al-Malik gave orders: 'Amr was thrown down, and 'Abd al-Malik sat on his chest and cut his throat, saying:[590]

'Amr, if you do not cease reviling me and speaking contemptuously of me,
I will strike you so that the owl will cry, "Give me drink!
Give me drink!"[591]

'Abd al-Malik shook with trembling, as has been said to befall a man if he kills a relative. 'Abd al-Malik was carried from 'Amr's chest and laid on his bed. He said, "Never have I seen the like of 586. Full name: Laylā bint Zabbān b. al-Aṣbagh al-Kalbī (Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 448).

587. 'Ubaydallāh b. Qays al-Ruqayyāt (nicknamed "al-Ruqayyāt" because he wrote love poetry to three women, each named Ruqayyah), a Qurayshi poet, was originally a partisan of Ibn al-Zubayr, but went over to the Umayyads after the death of Muṣ'ab and 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr and became a panegyrist for them. These lines are from a qaṣīdah praising 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān. See Aghānī, IV, 162.

588. Often known as Babylon, this was the Roman fortress still to be seen at Old Cairo. Because the Arab garrison city of Fusṭāṭ was nearby, Bābilyūn (or Bābalyūn) could be used as a name for the capital of Arab Egypt. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān was governor of Egypt under Marwān and 'Abd al-Malik. See EI[2], s.v. Bābalyūn; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v.

589. I.e., he is a generous host. The line is quoted in the Lisān.

590. The line is from a qasīdah by Dhū al-Iṣba' al-'Adwānī, a pre-Islamic poet. See Aghānī, III, 9.

591. According to pre-Islamic folklore, if a slain man was not avenged, his spirit became an owl that hovered at his grave and continued to cry "Give me drink!" until vengeance was taken. See Lisān, s.v. hāmah.

this: he was killed by someone who possessed this world and did not seek the hereafter."

Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd and those with him came into the house into the presence of the sons of Marwān. They reviled the sons of Marwān and their mawālī who were with them, and the latter fought with Yaḥyā and his companions. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam al-Thaqafī came. The head was given to him, and he threw it to the people. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān arose, took money in purses, and started throwing them to the people. When the people looked at the money and saw the head, they grabbed the money and dispersed.

It has been said that when 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān went out to prayer, he commanded his servant lad Abū al-Zu'ayzi'ah[592] to kill 'Amr. The latter did so, and threw his head to the people and [792] 'Amr's companions.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—'Awānah: It was related to me that 'Abd al-Malik ordered the money that had been thrown to the people to be collected; thus it all returned to the treasury.

On that day, Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd was hit on the head with a rock. 'Abd al-Malik ordered his bed taken out into the mosque. He left [the house] and sat down on it. Al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik was missing, and 'Abd al-Malik started saying, "Woe unto you! Where is al-Walīd? By their father, if they have killed him, they have attained their revenge." Ibrāhīm b. 'Arabī al-Kinānī came to him and said, "Behold, al-Walīd is in my house. He has received a wound, but has not been harmed."

Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd was brought to 'Abd al-Malik, who ordered him killed. But 'Abd al-'Azīz [b. Marwān] stood before him and said, "May God make me your ransom, Commander of the Faithful! Will you kill [all] the Banū Umayyah in a single day?" So he ordered Yaḥyā to be imprisoned. Then 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd was brought, and he ordered him killed. But 'Abd al-'Azīz stood before him and said, "I ask you to remember God, Commander of the Faithful, in the matter of extirpating and destroying the Banū Umayyah." So he ordered 'Anbasah to be imprisoned. Then 'Āmir b. al-Aswad al-Kalbī was brought in. 'Abd al-Malik struck his head with a cane rod he had, and said, "Will you fight against me on the side of ʿAmr? Will you take his side against me?" ʿĀmir said, "Yes, because ʿAmr honored me, and you despised me; he drew me close, and you drove me away; he brought me near, and you made me distant; he treated me well, and you wronged me. Therefore I took his side against you." ʿAbd al-Malik ordered him to be killed; but ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz stood up and said, "I ask you to remember God, Commander of the Faithful, concerning this my maternal uncle." So ʿAbd al-Malik gave him into his hands and ordered the sons of Saʿīd to be imprisoned.

592. See below, Ṭabarī, II, 837, where Abū al-Zu'ayzi'ah is identified as a mawlā in charge of 'Abd al-Malik's correspondence bureau.

Yaḥyā [b. Saʿīd] remained in prison for a month or more. Then [793] ʿAbd al-Malik ascended the pulpit. Having praised and extolled God, he asked the people's advice about putting him to death. One preacher among the people stood up and said, "Do snakes bear anything but snakes? By God, we think you should kill him, because he is a hypocrite, an enemy." Then ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿadah al-Fazārī stood up and said, "Commander of the Faithful, Yaḥyā is the son of your paternal uncle. You know how closely he is related. They did what they did, and you did to them what you did; and you do not feel safe with them. Yet, I do not think you should kill them. Make them go to your enemy: if they are killed, their affair will have been taken care of for you by the hand of others; if they return safely, you will consider what to do with them." ʿAbd al-Malik took his advice. He sent out the family of Saʿīd and had them go to Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr. When they came to him, Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd went before him. Ibn al-Zubayr said to him, "You escaped, but your tail was plucked."[593] "By God," replied Yaḥyā, "the tail still has its hair!"

ʿAbd al-Malik sent to ʿAmr's wife from the tribe of Kalb, saying, "Send me the peace agreement I wrote for ʿAmr." She said to his messenger, "Go back and tell him that I wrapped that agreement in his shrouds with him so that with it he might call you to task before his Lord."

ʿAmr b. Saʿīd and ʿAbd al-Malik both traced their descent to Umayyah. ʿAmr's mother, Umm al-Banīn, the daughter of al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ, was ʿAbd al-Malik's paternal aunt.

---

593. Proverbial for someone who narrowly escapes death; see Freytag, II, 201 (Maydānī, II, 14); Lisān, s.v. ḥ-ṣ-ṣ.

According to Hishām [b. al-Kalbī]—ʿAwānah: What happened between ʿAbd al-Malik and ʿAmr was an old feud. The mother of the two sons of Saʿīd was Umm al-Banīn. ʿAbd al-Malik and Muʿāwiyah were the two sons of Marwān. When they [all] were lads, they constantly used to go to Umm Marwān b. al-Ḥakam al- [794] Kināniyyah[594] and talk at her home. With ʿAbd al-Malik and Muʿāwiyah, one of their black servant lads used to go out also. Whenever they came to her, Umm Marwān used to prepare food for them and bring it to them, placing a bowl in front of each man separately. She was continually stirring up quarrels between Muʿāwiyah b. Marwān and Muḥammad b. Saʿīd, and between ʿAbd al-Malik and ʿAmr b. Saʿīd. As a result, they used to fight with each other and cut each other, sometimes not talking with each other. Umm Marwān used to say, "If these two have no intelligence, those two have." Such was her custom, whenever they came to her, until she had implanted rancor in their hearts.

It has been mentioned [by another authority] that ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd al-Qasrī [Abū Khālid] was with Yaḥyā b. Saʿīd when he entered the mosque, broke the door of the enclosure, and fought with the sons of Marwān. When ʿAmr was killed and his head brought out to the people, ʿAbdallāh and his brother Khālid rode away and reached Iraq. He remained with the sons of Saʿīd who were with Muṣʿab, until unity[595] was established under ʿAbd al-Malik. ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd's eye had been put out at the Battle of Marj [Rāhiṭ];[596] he had been on the side of Ibn al-Zubayr, fighting the Banū Umayyah. After the establishment of unity, he went before ʿAbd al-Malik, and [the latter] asked, "How are you, family of Yazīd?" ʿAbdallāh replied, "Disgrace! disgrace!"[597] ʿAbd al-

---

594. I.e., Marwān's mother, who was from the tribe of Kinānah.

595. Jamāʿah: "a gathering together," especially the unity or concord of the Islamic community after civil strife (ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CLXX; Dozy, Supplément, I, 215). The reference is to the year 73/692, the restoration of a single caliphal authority over all Muslims after the death of Ibn al-Zubayr.

596. Fought in 64/683, between Marwān and the supporters of Ibn al-Zubayr, it ended with a complete defeat for the latter. See *EI*², s.v.

597. Accepting the emendation khizyan khizyan proposed by ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CLXXXVII. Mss. O and Co read ḥizban ḥizban ("party by party"); C reads ḥarban ḥarban ("war! war!"); and the editor's original emendation was ḥurabāʿa ḥurabāʿa ("despoiled! despoiled!").

Malik said, "That is for what your hands have forwarded: God is never unjust unto His servants."[598]

According to Hishīm [b. al-Kalbī]—'Awānah: The sons of 'Amr b. Sa'īd came before 'Abd al-Malik after the establishment of [795] unity. They were four: Umayyah, Sa'īd, Ismā'īl, and Muḥammad. When he beheld them, 'Abd al-Malik said to them, "You are men of a noble family.[599] You have always seen yourselves as having some preeminence over all your kin, albeit one that God has not given you. What took place between your father and me was nothing new; it was inveterate in the souls of your ancestors against our ancestors in pre-Islamic times." Umayyah b. 'Amr, who was their eldest, found himself unable to speak; he was the noblest and most intelligent of them. So Sa'īd b. 'Amr, the middle in age, stood up and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, now that God has brought Islam and destroyed former things, promising Paradise, and warning of the Fire, why do you reproach us with something that happened in pre-Islamic times? As for what transpired between you and 'Amr, 'Amr was your paternal cousin, and you know best what you did. 'Amr has arrived before God—'and God suffices for a reckoner.'[600] By my life, if you punish us for what happened between him and you, the interior of the earth were better for us than its surface!" 'Abd al-Malik was much softened toward them, and said, "Your father made me choose between his killing me or my killing him; so I chose his death over my own. But you—how I long for you! How linked I am to you in kinship, and how mindful of your right!" So he rewarded them well, showed them favor, and drew them close.

It has been mentioned: One day, Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah said to 'Abd al-Malik, "The strange thing about you and 'Amr b. Sa'īd is how you took him off guard and killed him." 'Abd al-Malik said:

I drew him near me, that his mind might be calm, and that I might leap upon him with the assault of a man firm and masterful, 598. Qur'ān 22:10. If the reading khizyan khizyan is correct, 'Abd al-Malik is answering an allusion to Qur'ān 22:9 with an allusion to the following verse.

599. Arabic, ahlu baytin: "people of a [distinguished, noble] household."

600. Qur'ān 4:6 and 33:39.

In anger and in defense of my religion:
the bungler's way is not like the way of the man who does things right!

According to 'Awānah: A man met Sa'īd b. 'Amr b. Sa'īd in Mecca and said to him, "By the Lord of this House,[601] there was no one like your father among the kinsmen![602] But he attempted to wrest from his kin what they had in their hands, and so he perished." [796]

Al-Wāqidī says that only the siege between 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān and 'Amr b. Sa'īd took place in the year 69. 'Amr b. Sa'īd fortified himself in Damascus; 'Abd al-Malik returned from Buṭnān Ḥabīb and besieged him, but his killing of 'Amr took place in the year 70.

[A Khārijite Killed at the Pilgrimage]

During this year, at al-Khayf of Minā,[603] a Khārijite proclaimed the slogan, "Judgment belongs to none but God!"[604] He was killed at al-Jamrah.[605]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. Dīnār—his father, who said: I saw him draw his sword at al-Jamrah. They were a group, but God restrained their hands. He came forward from among them and proclaimed, "Judgment belongs to none but God!" The people turned upon him and killed him.

---

601. I.e., the Ka'bah.

602. I.e., the Umayyad family.

603. Literally, "the sloping land [between the mountains and the bottom of the valley] at Minā": At Minā the pilgrims gather from the tenth to the thirteenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah. On the first day, the 'Īd al-Aḍḥā sacrifice is performed; the following days are days of visiting and social relations before returning to Mecca. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥadjdj.

604. The slogan of the Khārijites when they rejected mediation between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah by two men, Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī and 'Amr b. al-'Āṣ; see note 40.

605. Al-Jamrah, literally, "the heap of pebbles," is a construction called "Jamrat al-'Aqabah" near the western exit from the valley of Minā. Pilgrims throw seven stones, now interpreted as stoning the Devil. See *EI*², s.vv. Ḥadjdj and al-Djamra.

[Those in Office during the Year]

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the pilgrimage this year. His governor in charge of the garrison cities of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah this year was his brother Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr. Shurayḥ [b. al-Ḥārith al-Kindī] was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah. Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim was in charge of Khurāsān.

The Events of the Year 70

(JUNE 25, 689—JUNE 14, 690)

[ʿAbd al-Malik and the Byzantines]

In this year, the Byzantines arose and gathered an army against the Muslims in Syria. For fear of what he might do to the Muslims, ʿAbd al-Malik made peace with the Byzantine emperor, on terms that every Friday he would deliver a thousand dīnārs to him.[606]

[Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr Visits Mecca]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]: During this year, Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr went to Mecca, bringing a great deal of money, which he divided among his kinsmen and others. He brought many horses and camels and much baggage. He sent much money to ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣafwān, Jubayr b. Shaybah, and ʿAbdallāh b. Muṭīʿ, [797] and he slaughtered many fattened camels.

606. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 299–300.

[Those in Office during the Year]

ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the pilgrimage this year. His governors in charge of the garrison cities during this year were his agents of the previous year in charge of finances[607] and the judiciary.

607. Maʿāwin seems here to be used generally for "financial matters, taxes." See Dozy, Supplément, II, 192; and note 446, above.

The Events of the Year 71

(JUNE 15, 690–JUNE 3, 691)

Among these events was ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān's going to Iraq to fight Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr. According to what some have said, ʿAbd al-Malik used to continue drawing closer to Muṣʿab until he arrived at Buṭnān Ḥabīb, while Muṣʿab would go out to Bājumayrā.[608] When winter set in, each of them would go back to his encampment; then they would return [to the war]. As ʿAdī b. Zayd b. ʿAdī b. al-Riqāʿ al-ʿĀmilī said:[609]

By my life, our horsemen took to the desert in the vicinity of the Tigris because of Muṣʿab.
When the hypocrite of the people of Iraq

608. ʿAbd al-Malik encamped at Buṭnān Ḥabīb, near Qinnasrīn, in Syria; Muṣʿab at Bājumayrā, near Takrīt, at the southern border of al-Jazīrah (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v. Bājumayrā).

609. ʿAdī b. Zayd b. [Mālik] b. ʿAdī b. al-Riqāʿ al-ʿĀmilī: Syrian poet and panegyrist of the Umayyad caliphs Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah and al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. Lines of the poem, with variants, are found in Aghānī, XVII, 165; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 342; and Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 317; see also F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 321f.

was reproved, but was not made to return [from his evil ways],
We advanced toward him under a man possessing might to repel his enemies, who gives little thought to those who are absent.
They brandish [spears], each of them long-shafted, the blade and the tip of the shaft close-fitted.
[798] Their shouts as they advance seem like the crying of the sand grouse of a fruitful land.
Before us went one whose face was bright, and whose character and origins were noble.
He was aided by us, and we were helped by him:
he whom God helps will not be overcome.

[Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh Raises Support for ʿAbd al-Malik in al-Baṣrah]

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī], who said: ʿAbd al-Malik came from Syria intending to fight Muṣʿab. (This happened prior to this year, in the year 70.) With him was Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd. Khālid said to ʿAbd al-Malik, "If you send me to al-Baṣrah and have a few horsemen follow me, I hope to subdue it for you." ʿAbd al-Malik sent him. Khālid arrived there clandestinely with his mawālī and close associates, and stayed at the home of ʿAmr b. Aṣmaʿ al-Bāhilī.

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—Abū al-Ḥasan [ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Maslamah b. Muḥārib: ʿAmr b. Aṣmaʿ gave Khālid protection and sent a message to ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn, who was in charge of Ibn Maʿmar's police. (Whenever Muṣʿab left al-Baṣrah, he made ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar his deputy over the city. ʿAmr b. Aṣmaʿ hoped that ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn would pledge allegiance to him.) The message was as follows: "I have given Khālid protection, and would like you to know it so that you can back me." ʿAmr's messenger reached ʿAbbād as the latter was dismounting from his horse. ʿAbbād said to [the messenger], "Tell him, 'By God, before I even take off my horse's saddlecloth, I will come to [take] you with horsemen!'" ʿAmr therefore said to Khālid, "I will not deceive you: ʿAbbād will be upon us at any moment. No, by God; I cannot protect you. Stay, instead, with Mālik b. Misma'."

According to Abū Zayd ['Umar b. Shabbah]—Abū al-Ḥasan ['Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]: It is also said that Khālid stayed at the home of 'Alī b. Aṣma', and that 'Abbād was informed of this. 'Abbād then sent word to him, saying, "I am coming to [take] you." [799]

According to 'Umar [b. Shabbah]—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—Maslamah and 'Awānah: Khālid galloped out of the house of Ibn Aṣma', with a thin linen shirt on him, his thighs uncovered, and his feet out of the stirrups. When he reached Mālik, he said, "I have been forced to turn to you. Give me protection." He said yes. He went out with his son and sent messengers to the Bakr b. Wā'il and Azd. The first banner that came to him was that of the Banū Yashkur.[610] 'Abbād came with horsemen; the two sides stood facing each other, but there was no fighting between them. The next morning, they went to Jufrat Nāfi' b. al-Ḥārith [it later came to be known as Jufrat Khālid].[611] With Khālid were men from the Banū Tamīm who had come to him; among them were Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Mu'āwiyah, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Bishr, and Murrah b. Maḥkān, with a number of their tribesmen. Khālid's forces were known as "Jufriyyah," referring to al-Jufrah; Ibn Ma'mar's forces were known as "Zubayriyyah." Among the Jufriyyah were 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah, Ḥumrān [b. Abān], and al-Mughīrah b. al-Muhallab. Among the Zubayriyyah was Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī, who used to hire men to fight on his side. Once, when a man demanded his salary from him, he said, "Tomorrow I will give it to you." Therefore, Ghaṭafān b. Unayf, one of the Banū Ka'b b. 'Amr,[612] said:

O little bells,[613] how badly you have decided!
The cash is a debt [due later], while the fighting is [due] right now;

610. The Banū Yashkur were affiliated with the tribe of Bakr b. Wā'il.

611. Jufrah means a wide, round hole in the ground. Jufrat Nāfi' means "the jufrah of Nafi'"; Jufrat Khālid means "the jufrah of Khālid. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Jufrah, mentions such a place in al-Baṣrah, but gives no exact location.

612. The Banū Ka'b b. 'Amr were affiliated with the tribe of Tamīm.

613. Besides the explanation given below, there is an ironic reference to the

And you are at the gate, passing the night in pleasant conversation and delaying.[614]

(Qays used to caparison the neck of his horse with little bells.)
[800] The commander of the horsemen of the Banū Ḥanẓalah[615] was ʿAmr b. Wabarah al-Quḥayfī.[616] He had slaves whom he used to hire out at thirty [dirhams] a man each day; he in turn would give them ten apiece. So someone said to him:

How badly you have decided, O Ibn Wabarah!
You are given thirty, and you give ten.

Al-Muṣʿab sent Ẓahr b. Qays al-Juʿfī to reinforce Ibn Maʿmar with a thousand men. To reinforce Khālid, ʿAbd al-Malik sent ʿUbaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān, but the latter was unwilling to enter al-Baṣrah and sent Maṭar b. al-Taw'am as a messenger. When the latter came back to him and told him that the men had dispersed, he rejoined ʿAbd al-Malik.

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]—Abū al-Ḥasan [ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—a shaykh from the Banū ʿArīn[617] —al-Sakan b. Qatādah, who said: They fought with each other twenty-four days. Mālik [b. Mismaʿ's] eye was hit, and he wearied of battle. Envoys went between them [Yūsuf b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ [was one of them]],[618] and Ibn Maʿmar made peace with Mālik on condition that he would make Khālid leave al-Baṣrah and would be guaranteed safety. Mālik therefore made Khālid leave al-Baṣrah. Fearing, however, that al-Muṣʿab would not approve ʿUbaydallāh [b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar's] promise of safety, Mālik went to Tha'j.[619] Speaking about Mālik proverbial expression, "He hangs bells on his neck," meaning "He imperils or endangers himself, and is a bold man." See Lane, Lexicon, II, 438, s.v. juljul.

---

614. Ms. Pet: "while you are fat, delaying." Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 468 (also on authority of al-Madā'inī): "and you are stingy of giving, miserly."

615. The Banū Ḥanẓalah were affiliated with the tribe of Tamīm.

616. The name is given thus in Mss. O, B and Co; Pet "al-Juʿayfī"; C "al-ʿUjayfī" (agreeing with Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 468).

617. The Banu ʿArīn were affiliated with the tribe of Tamīm.

618. The bracketed words are from the parallel text in Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 469.

619. Tha'j (or Thāj) was "a village of the Bakr b. Wā'il tribe in the Yamāmah" (Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 464, on authority of Abū Mikhnaf). Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v., places it in Baḥrayn, which included the mainland area opposite the island. The and about how the Tamīmiyyah[620] had joined him and Khālid,[621] al-Farazdaq said:[622]

I marvel at tribesmen whose father was Tamīm, and the places where their camels kneel are great among the Banu Sa'd.[623]
They were the most powerful of men, before they went to the Azd, with their beards yellow, and to Mālik.
What do you think of Muṣ'ab, the son of the Apostle [of the Prophet],[624] [801] when he bares his teeth, not laughing?
We banished Mālik from his lands,[625] and we put out his eye with short spears.

According to Abū Zayd ['Umar b. Shabbah]—Abū al-Ḥasan ['Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī]—Maslamah: When 'Abd al-Malik returned to Damascus, Muṣ'ab's only concern was al-Baṣrah.[626] He hoped to overtake Khālid there, but he found that the latter had already left and that Ibn Ma'mar had guaranteed the safety of the men, most of whom had stayed, though some of them, fearing Muṣ'ab, had left. Muṣ'ab therefore became angry with Ibn Ma'mar, swore he would never confer favor upon him, name survives in a town about 90 miles northwest of Dhahrān in Saudi Arabia. At the time of Mālik's flight, it was under the control of the Khārijite Najdah b. 'Āmir, thus out of the reach of Ibn al-Zubayr (See Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 146).

---

620. Tamīmiyyah means "party of Tamīm."

621. The poem can be found in the Dīwān of al-Farazdaq (ed. Boucher, 157; ed. Dār Ṣādir, Beirut, II, 57).

622. Al-Farazdaq (Abū Firās Hammām b. Ghālib b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah) was a poet of the Banū Dārim clan of the tribe of Tamīm. He was born in al-Baṣrah ca. 20/641 and died there in 110/738. See *EI*², s.v. al-Farazdaḳ.

623. The Banū Sa'd were a division of the Tamīm.

624. Muṣ'ab's father, al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, was known as al-Ḥawārī (from Ethiopic ḥawaryā, "apostle") because of his closeness to Muḥammad (first-cousin) and because he had been one of the early converts to Islam who took refuge for a time in Ethiopia to escape persecution. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥawārī.

625. Dīwān, "our lands."

626. Cf. parallel in Balādhurī, Ansāb, IV/1, 470 (on authority of al-Madā'inī): "After allegiance had been sworn to Muṣ'ab, and 'Abd al-Malik had returned to Damascus because of 'Amr al-Ashdaq, Muṣ'ab's only concern was al-Baṣrah." Similarly, in the Abū Mikhnaf account (Balādhurī, loc. cit., 463–464), 'Abd al-Malik's preoccupation with the revolt of 'Amr in Damascus freed Muṣ'ab from worry about the north and allowed him to turn his attention to al-Baṣrah.

and sent a messenger to the Jufriyyah, abusing and rebuking them.

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]: Al-Madāʾinī and other Baṣran relaters of historical narratives assert that [Muṣʿab] sent for them and they were brought to him. Turning to ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah, he said, "Son of a stray![627] You are nothing but the son of a bitch that the dogs mounted one after another, so that she whelped ruddy, and black, and blond—from each sire a pup resembling it. Your father was nothing but a slave who came to the Messenger of God from the stronghold of al-Ṭāʾif.[628] Then you gave testimony, claiming that Abū Sufyān[629] whored with your mother. By God, if I live, I will indicate your correct ancestry!" Then he summoned Ḥumrān, and said, "Son of a Jewess! You are nothing but a Nabataean peasant brought as a captive from ʿAyn al-Tamr." Then he said to al-Ḥakam b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd, "Son of a knave! Do you know who you are and who al-Jārūd was? Al-Jārūd was nothing but a peasant on Ibn Kāwān Island,[630] a Persian who crossed over to the [Arabian] coast and [802] affiliated with the ʿAbd al-Qays. No, by God; I know of no tribe harboring more evil than they. Then he married his sister to al-Mukaʿbir,[631] the Persian, and he never obtained any honor greater than that. These, O son of Qubādh, are her children." Then ʿAbdallāh b. Faḍālah al-Zahrānī was brought. Muṣʿab said, "Are you not descended from the people of Hajar, and then from the people of Samāhīj?[632] By God, I will sent you back to your 627. See Ibn Qutaybah, Maʿārif, ed. Wüstenfeld (Göttingen, 1850), 147 [ed. Leiden note].

628. The city of al-Ṭāʾif lies in the mountains about 40 miles southeast of Mecca. See EI[1], s.v.; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

629. Abū Sufyān was the head of the Banū Umayyah during the lifetime of Muḥammad. An opponent of Islam for most of his life, he was not converted until very late. See EI[2], s.v.

630. Ibn Kāwān Island is the large island now known as Qeshm, off the coast of Fārs Province, north of the Strait of Hormuz. See EI[2], s.v. Ḳishm.

631. In Ṭabarī, I, 985 this nickname is explained as meaning "the Cutter." It was given to one of the agents of the Sasanian monarch Khusraw Anūshirwān (ruled 531–79), the son of Qubādh I (ruled 498 or 499–531), because of his habit of cutting off arms and legs among the Arabs.

632. Hajar was the main city of al-Baḥrayn (but on the Arabian mainland, since al-Baḥrayn in earlier times included the area on the mainland now known as al-Ḥasā); Samāhīj was an island between al-Baḥrayn and the Oman coast. See EI[2], s.v. Baḥrayn; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.vv. On the people of Hajar as descended from prostitutes brought from al-Ahwāz and the Sawād, see the story in Ṭabarī, I, 985f.

relatives!" Then ʿAlī b. Aṣmaʿ was brought. Muṣʿab said, "Sometimes a slave of the Banū Tamīm, and sometimes claiming relation to Bāhilah?" Then ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Bishr b. Ḥannāṭ was brought. Muṣʿab said, "Son of a man reviled! Didn't your uncle steal a she-goat during the time of ʿUmar, who ordered him taken to have [his hand] cut off? But, by God, the only person who has been roughly treated is the one who married your sister!" (His sister was married to Muqātil b. Mismaʿ.) Then Abū Hāḍir al-Asadī was brought. Muṣʿab said, "Son of a woman from Iṣṭakhr! What have you to do with the ashrāf? You are merely descended from people of Qaṭar, an interloper among the Banū Asad, with not a relative or kinsman among them." Then Ziyād b. ʿAmr was brought. Muṣʿab said, "Son of a man from Kirmān! You are nothing but a peasant from the people of Kirmān. You crossed into Fārs and became a sailor. What do you have to do with fighting? You are more adept at pulling hawsers." Then ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUthmān b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ was brought. Muṣʿab said to him, "Will you say all sorts of things against me, when you are a peasant from the people of Hajar? Your father went to al-Ṭāʾif—they take in anyone who flocks to them and take pride in him. But, by God, I will send you back to those from whom you came originally." Then Shaykh b. al-Nuʿmān was brought. Muṣʿab said, "Son of a knave! You are nothing but a peasant from the people of Zandaward.[633] Your mother ran away, and your father was killed; his [803] sister was married by a man from the Banū Yashkur and gave birth to two lads, and the two of them incorporated you into their family tree."

Then he beat them a hundred strokes each, shaved their heads and beards, razed their houses, exposed them to the sun three days, forced them to divorce their wives, and kept their children away on expeditions. He paraded the men around al-Baṣrah and made them swear not to marry free women.

Muṣʿab sent Khidāsh b. Yazīd[634] al-Asadī to seek those companions of Khālid who had fled. He overtook Murrah b. Maḥkān[635] and seized him. Murrah said:

633. Zandaward was a town in Iraq near the site of Wāsiṭ (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.).
634. Mss. O, B, and Co read: "b. Marthad."
635. Murrah b. Maḥkān al-Saʿdi was a poet of the Saʿd clan of the tribe of Tamīm. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 402.

Banū Asad, if you kill me, you will make war with Tamīm, when war, having broken out, spreads rapidly.
Banū Asad, do you have any leniency, to excuse me if the shoe made me slip?
Let enemies not think that if I become absent from them and little fire can be elicited from me, my war has abated, [And that] you will walk the ways safely, Khidāsh,
When the spears have drunk once of my [blood] and drunk again.

But Khidāsh had him brought near and killed him. (Khidāsh was in charge of Muṣʿab's police at the time.) Also, Muṣʿab ordered Sinān b. Dhuhl, one of the Banū ʿAmr b. Marthad, to raze the house of Mālik b. Mismaʿ. Muṣʿab took what was in Mālik's house; among the things he took was a slave girl who bore him ʿUmar b. Muṣʿab.

[ʿAbd al-Malik Attacks Muṣʿab; the Death of Muṣʿab][636]

[804] [Continuing,] he said: Muṣʿab stayed in al-Baṣrah until he went to al-Kūfah. He remained in al-Kūfah until he went out to fight ʿAbd al-Malik. ʿAbd al-Malik encamped at Maskin.[637] ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to the people of Iraq who had been partisans of his father Marwān;[638] all of them responded to him, and as a condition each one asked him for the governorship of Iṣbahān, which he conferred upon all of them. Among them were: Ḥajjār b. Abjar, al-Ghaḍbān b. al-Qabaʿtharā, ʿAttāb b. Warqāʾ, Qaṭan b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥārithī, Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays, Zaḥr

636. Additional material can be found in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 331–355; Aghānī, XVII, 161–67; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 323–336.

637. Maskin was a district along the Dujayl canal, north of Baghdad, and west of the Tigris River (Le Strange, Lands, 51, 81; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.).

638. Arabic, al-Marwāniyyah. Aghānī, XVII, 162, preserves a fuller text of al-Madāʾinī's account: "Then ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to the Kūfan and Baṣran ashrāf, inviting them to him, and raising their hopes. They responded to him, stipulated conditions for him, and asked for governorships. When forty of them asked for the governorship of Iṣbahān, ʿAbd al-Malik said to his companions in amazement, 'Alas, what is this Iṣbahān?'" One should compare a series of reports in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 232–33, where Iraqi ashrāf take the initiative in inviting ʿAbd al-Malik to come to Iraq.

b. Qays, and Muḥammad b. ʿUmayr.[639] Muḥammad b. Marwān was in charge of ʿAbd al-Malik's vanguard, ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah was in charge of his right wing, and Khālid b. Yazīd was in charge of his left wing. Muṣʿab, whom the people of al-Kūfah had failed to aid, advanced toward him.

According to ʿUrwah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah, who said: Muṣʿab came marching out. He was leaning on the mane of his horse, looking right and left at the men. His eye fell on me. "ʿUrwah," he said, "come to me." I went over to him. "Tell me about al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī," he said, "how he acted in refusing to submit to the judgment of Ibn Ziyād and in resolving to fight." And he said:[640]

They who are in al-Ṭaff,[641] of the family of Hāshim, shared their property, and so set the example, to the generous, of the sharing of property.

[Continuing,] he said: So I knew he would not turn away until he was killed.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Qurrah—Isḥāq b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Farwah—Rajāʾ b. Ḥaywah, who said: After he had killed ʿAmr [805]
b. Saʿīd, ʿAbd al-Malik put his hand to the sword and killed those who opposed him. When he decided to go to fight Muṣʿab, Syria and its people having become his possession, he addressed the people and commanded them to make ready to march against Muṣʿab. The chiefs of the Syrians came to him one after the other; while not opposing what he wanted to do, they wanted him to remain and send the armies forward: if they won, well and good; if they did not win, he would aid them with the armies; for they feared for the people that if he were killed in his encounter with Muṣʿab, there would be no king after him.[642]

639. Ms. Pet adds: "b. ʿUṭārid." From Ṭabarī, II, 806f. and Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 341, it appears that these men went over to ʿAbd al-Malik during the fighting.

640. The verse is attributed to Sulaymān b. Qattah (Aghānī, XVII, 165). It is quoted and translated in Lane, Lexicon, I, 87.

641. Karbalāʾ, where al-Ḥusayn was killed, was located in the region known as al-Ṭaff. See note 213 (Ṭabarī, II, 686).

642. An alternate translation: "there would be no kingdom after him."

They said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you should stay where you are and send a man from your family as commander of these armies, dispatching him to fight Muṣʿab." ʿAbd al-Malik said, "This affair can be handled only by a man from Quraysh who has good judgment. I might perchance send someone who has bravery, but not good judgment. But I find in my soul that I am discerning in war, and brave with the sword, if I am forced to use it. Muṣʿab is with[643] a family of bravery. His father was the bravest of Quraysh. He, too, is brave, but he has no knowledge of war and likes ease. With him there are men who will oppose him; with me there men who will give me sincere advice."

So ʿAbd al-Malik went and encamped at Maskin, and Muṣʿab went to Bājumayrā. ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to his supporters among the people of Iraq. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar took ʿAbd al-Malik's letter, sealed and unread, and gave it to Muṣʿab, who asked, "What is in it?" Ibrāhīm replied, "I have not read it." Muṣʿab read it: ʿAbd al-Malik was inviting Ibn al-Ashtar to his side and offering him the governorship of Iraq. Ibn al-Ashtar said to Muṣʿab, "From no one has he had less to hope for than from me. He has written to all your companions as he has written to me. Heed me concerning [806] them, and cut off their heads!" "Then," said Muṣʿab, "their tribesmen will not be loyal to us." Ibn al-Ashtar said, "Then load them with irons, send them to the White [Palace] of Khusrāw,[644] and imprison them there. Put in charge of them someone who will cut off their heads if you are defeated. If you are victorious, you can bestow them on their tribesmen as a favor." "Abū al-Nuʿmān," said Muṣʿab, "I am too preoccupied to attend to that. God have mercy on Abū Baḥr:[645] as if foreseeing our present plight, he warned me about the treachery of the people of Iraq."

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—Muḥammad b. Sallām [al-

643. Alternate reading in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 323: "from."

644. The White Palace was the old Sasanian royal residence at al-Madāʾin. It was located about a mile to the north of the Great Ceremonial Hall (Īwān Kisrā). See Le Strange, Lands, 34; EI[2], s.v. al-Madāʾin.

645. Abū Baḥr is al-Aḥnaf b. Qays. According to Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 324, the leader of the Tamīm in al-Baṣrah accompanied Muṣʿab's army to al-Kūfah, where he died. Cf. the fuller version of al-Aḥnaf's words (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 337–38): "Do not meet any foe while relying on the people of Iraq; for, like a prostitute who wants a new lover every day, they want a new commander every day."

Jumaḥī][646]—ʿAbd al-Qāhir b. al-Sarī, who said: The people of Iraq intended to betray Muṣʿab. But Qays b. al-Haytham said, "Woe unto you! Do not cause the Syrians to come among you. By God, if they taste your life, they will expropriate your dwellings from you. By God, I have seen the chief of the Syrians at the gate of the caliph, rejoicing if the latter sent him on a mission. I have seen us on summer expeditions, one of us in charge of a thousand camels, while each of their chieftains went raiding on his horse, with his provisions behind him."[647]

[Continuing,] he said: When the two armies drew near to each other at Dayr al-Jāthalīq,[648] in the Maskin district, Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar advanced and attacked Muḥammad b. Marwān, making him give way. Then ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān sent out ʿAbdallāh b. Yazīd b. Muʿāwiyah, who drew near to Muḥammad b. Marwān. The fighters closed with each other. Muslim b. ʿAmr al-Bāhilī was killed.[649] Also killed were Yaḥyā b. Mubashshir, one of the Banū Thaʿlabah b. Yarbūʿ, and Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar. ʿAttāb b. Warqāʾ, who was in charge of the horsemen on the side of Muṣʿab, fled.[650] Then Muṣʿab said to Qaṭan b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥārithī, "Abū ʿUthmān, forward with your horsemen!" "I do not think it advisable," he replied. "Why?" said Muṣʿab. Qaṭan said, "I do not want [the tribesmen of] Madhḥij killed for nothing." Then Muṣʿab said to Ḥajjār b. Abjar, "Abū Usayd, forward with your banner!" "Toward this dirty crowd?" he replied. "By God," said Muṣʿab, [807]

646. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. Sallām al-Jumaḥī was a literary historian who died in 231/845 or 232 in Baghdad; see *EI*², s.v. Ibn Sallām al-Djumaḥī.

647. The wealth of Iraq and the poverty of Syria are being compared. Cf. the reading in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 244–45: "I have seen us on summer expeditions; the provisions of one of us were on many camels, while one of them [i.e., the Syrians] would go raiding with his provisions behind him [i.e., on the saddle of his own horse]."

648. Dayr al-Jāthalīq means "the monastery of the Catholicos" (the head of the Nestorian Christians). See *EI*², s.v. Dayr al-Djāthalīḳ.

649. He was in charge of Ibn al-Ashtar's right wing. According to Aghānī, XVII, 164, and Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 341–42, he was carried away wounded and managed to obtain a guarantee of safety for his children from ʿAbd al-Malik before he died. His son, Qutaybah b. Muslim, served the Umayyads loyally and greatly extended Muslim territory in Central Asia.

650. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 338, the flight was intentional. ʿAttāb had sworn allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik and had promised to betray Muṣʿab. Suspecting treachery, Ibn al-Ashtar asked Muṣʿab not to rely on ʿAttāb, but Muṣʿab disregarded the warning.

"your hesitating to go toward it smells worse and is more vile!" Then he made a similar request of Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Saʿīd b. Qays, who replied, "I do not see that anyone has done it, so that I should do it!" Muṣʿab said, " O Ibrāhīm! And today I have no Ibrāhīm!"

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]—Muḥammad b. Sallām, who said: When Ibn Khāzim was told of Muṣʿab's going to fight ʿAbd al-Malik, he said, "Is ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar with him?" The response was, "No, he has made him his agent in charge of Fārs." Ibn Khāzim said, "Then is al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah with him?" The response was, "No, he has made him his agent in charge of al-Mawṣil."[651] Ibn Khāzim said, "Then is ʿAbbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn with him?" The response was, "No, he has made him deputy in charge of al-Baṣrah." Ibn Khāzim then said, "And I am in Khurāsān":

Take me and drag me away, O she-hyena; rejoice over the flesh of a man whose helper was not present today.

Muṣʿab said to his son, ʿĪsā b. Muṣʿab, "Mount, my son, and ride with your companions to your uncle in Mecca. Tell him what the people of Iraq have done. Leave me, for I am a dead man." His son said, "By God, never will I [go to] tell Quraysh about you. If you wish, go to al-Baṣrah, for they are in a state of unity (jamāʿah); or go to join the Commander of the Faithful." Muṣʿab said, "By God, let Quraysh not say that I fled because of what Rabīʿah did when they failed to help, so that I entered the sanctuary of Mecca [808] in defeat. Rather, I will fight. If I am killed, the sword is no shame, and flight is neither my habit nor my nature. But if you want to go back, go back and fight." So he went back and fought until he was killed.

---

651. Similarly in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 345. See below (Ṭabarī II, 821), where al-Muhallab receives the news of Muṣʿab's death while he is campaigning against the Khārijites in Khūzistān. One report in Balādhurī states that Muṣʿab wanted al-Muhallab (who was governor of al-Mawṣil) to help fight ʿAbd al-Malik, but the people of al-Baṣrah refused to march unless al-Muhallab were recalled from al-Mawṣil and sent to Khūzistān fight the Khārijites and prevent them from making incursions into Iraq. (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 332, 335–36; ibid., XI, 123–24; cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 332.)

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī]—Yaḥyā b. Ismāʿīl b. Abī al-Muhājir—his father: ʿAbd al-Malik, by way of his brother Muḥammad b. Marwān, sent a message to Muṣʿab, saying, "Your cousin will give you a guarantee of safety." Muṣʿab said, "A man like me leaves this place either victor or vanquished."

According to al-Haytham b. ʿAdī—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAyyāsh—his father, who said: As we were standing with ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān during his fight with Muṣʿab, Ziyād b. ʿAmr [al-ʿAtakī][652] came up to him and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, Ismāʿīl b. Ṭalḥah was a good protector[653] to me; rarely did Muṣʿab intend me harm but he warded it from me. If you think it good, grant him safety despite his offense." ʿAbd al-Malik said, "He is safe." Ziyād, who was an extremely large man, went between the two battle lines and shouted, "Where is Abū al-Bakhtarī Ismāʿīl b. Ṭalḥah?" The latter having come forward, Ziyād said, "I want to say something to you." So he drew near until the necks of their horses touched. (Men [going into battle] used to use doubled up garment edges as belts.)[654] Ziyād put his hand into Ismāʿīl's belt and plucked him—he was a thin man—from his saddle. Ismāʿīl said, "Abū al-Mughīrah, I beseech you; this is not loyalty to Muṣʿab." Ziyād said, "I would rather have this than see you slain tomorrow."

After Muṣʿab had refused to accept the guarantee of safety, Muḥammad b. Marwān called to ʿĪsā b. Muṣʿab and said to him, "O son of my brother, do not cause your own death. You have a guarantee of safety." Muṣʿab, too, said to him, "Your uncle has guaranteed your safety; go to him." But he said, "Let the women of Quraysh not say that I delivered you to be slain." "Then go forward before me," said Muṣʿab, "and I will reckon upon obtain- [809]

652. Tribal nisbah from Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 341.

653. Jāru sidqin, implying faithful carrying out of the obligations of jiwār (the granting of protection).

654. The meaning of bi-al-ḥawāshī al-maḥshuwwah is unclear. Most likely, a man going into battle gathered up the bottom of his shirt and tucked it under a belt of doubled material. See Dozy, Supplément, I, 292. Cf. Ṭabarī, II, 629: "Ibn al-Ashtar took the bottom of his tunic (qabāʾ), lifted it up, tucked it under a red belt he was wearing made of the edges of cloaks, and tightened the belt over it—he had covered his coat of mail with the tunic." The suggestion of ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. DXVIII, that in the time of ʿAbd al-Malik, "stuffed intestines" were used as belts, seems farfetched.

ing [a reward from God] through you."[655] So he fought before him until he was killed.

Muṣ'ab was wounded by an arrow shot. Zā'idah b. Qudāmah saw him and attacked. Crying "Vengeance for al-Mukhtār," he struck him with a spear, and threw him to the ground. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān dismounted by him and cut off his head, saying, "He killed my brother, al-Nābi' b. Ziyād." 'Ubaydallāh brought the head to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, who rewarded him with a thousand dinars. These he refused to take, saying, "I did not kill him out of obedience to you; I killed him to avenge what he did to me. I do not take money for carrying a head." And he left it with 'Abd al-Malik.[656]

The vendetta that 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān mentioned as the reason for his killing Muṣ'ab was as follows: In one of his terms as governor, Muṣ'ab appointed Muṭarrif b. Sīdān al-Bāhilī, a member of the Banū Ji'āwah, to be in charge of his police.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Abū al-Ḥasan al-Madā'inī and Makhlad b. Yaḥyā b. Ḥāḍir: Al-Nābi' b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān and a man of the Banū Numayr were brought to Muṭarrif, after the two had committed highway robbery. Muṭarrif killed al-Nābi', and flogged the Numayrī and released him. Then 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān gathered a group of men (this was after Muṣ'ab had removed Muṭarrif from al-Baṣrah and set him in charge of al-Ahwāz) and went out to attack Muṭarrif. The two sides met and took their stand with a river between them. Muṭarrif crossed over to 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Ẓabyān, and the latter gave him a quick spear thrust and killed him. Muṣ'ab then sent Mukram b. Muṭarrif to pursue Ibn Ẓabyān. Mukram went as far as 'Askar
[810] Mukram,[657] which therefore took its name from him, but did not

655. The expression aḥtasib-ka, "I reckon you for myself," is explained by Lane, Lexicon, II, 565: "Iḥtasaba waladahū. . . is said when one has lost by death an adult child or son or daughter; meaning 'He prepared, or provided, in store for himself, a reward, by his patience on the occasion of his being afflicted and tried by the death of his adult child.'"

656. Cf. the report in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 333 (repeated 340): "As 'Ubaydallāh placed the head before 'Abd al-Malik, the latter bowed down. Later, 'Ubaydallāh used to say, 'Never have I regretted anything as much as I regret not having cut off 'Abd al-Malik's head at that time, thereby giving people relief. I would have killed the two kings of the Arabs in a single day.'" 'Abd al-Malik's reaction when these words were reported to him is given in Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 202.

657. 'Askar Mukram (the name means Mukram's Camp, but Yāqūt says this find Ibn Ẓabyān. After his brother had been killed, Ibn Ẓabyān joined ʿAbd al-Malik. Mentioning this, al-Baʿīth al-Yashkurī said after the death of Muṣʿab:[658]

When we saw that the leaders of the enterprise (amr) were spiritless, and that necks were about to become hindquarters,[659]
We held steadfast to God's command (amr), until He should set matters right;
and we approved of no governor but one from Umayyah.
We killed Muṣʿab and the son of Muṣʿab:
the clansman of Asad[660] and al-Nakhaʿī the Yemenite.[661] Death's eagle passed by Muslim[662] from us;
it sank its tooth[663] into him, and he was slain.
We made [Muṭarrif] Ibn Sīdān drink an overflowing cup that satisfied us: the best part of the matter is what gives satisfaction.

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī], who said: Ibn Ẓabyān passed Muṭarrif's daughter in al-Baṣrah. Someone said to her, "This is the man who killed your father." She said, "For the sake of God, my father [met his death]." But Ibn Ẓabyān said:

Not for the sake of God did your father meet his end, but for the sake of money.

---

alludes to another Mukram) was a city in Khūzistān province, about 35 miles northeast of Ahwāz, where the Dujayl River was joined by the waters of the Masruqān Canal. See *EI*², s.v.; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v., and Le Strange, Lands, 237.

658. Verses three and four can be found in Aghānī, XVII, 164, where they are attributed to Yazīd b. al-Riqāʿ, the brother of ʿAdī b. al-Riqāʿ, with a note that some attribute them to al-Baʿīth al-Yashkurī.

659. The metaphor is drawn from horsemanship. The leaders of the state are compared to the chest (ṣadr, pl. ṣudūr) of a spiritless horse that holds its head low and is about to turn tail (i.e., turn its neck in the direction of its hindquarters). Cf. Lane, Lexicon, I, 314, s.v. tawālī.

660. Muṣʿab and his brother ʿAbdallāh were members of the Banū Asad b. ʿAbd-al-ʿUzzā b. Quṣayy (a clan of Quraysh). See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 254.

661. I.e., Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar al-Nakhaʿī.

662. I.e., Muslim b. ʿAmr al-Bāhilī (Aghānī, XVII, 164; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 341–42).

663. Variant in Aghānī, XVII, 164: "talon."

[811] After Muṣʿab had been killed, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān summoned the people of Iraq to allegiance, and they swore allegiance to him. Muṣʿab was killed at a canal called al-Dujayl,[664] at Dayr al-Jāthalīq. After he was killed, ʿAbd al-Malik ordered him and his son ʿĪsā to be buried.

According to al-Wāqidī—ʿUthmān b. Muḥammad—Abū Bakr b. ʿUmar—ʿUrwah, who said: When Muṣʿab was killed, ʿAbd al-Malik said, "Bury him: by God, of old there was respect between us and him, but this kingdom is a barren thing."[665]

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]—Abū Nuʿaym [al-Faḍl b. Dukayn]—ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr Abū Abī Aḥmad—ʿAbdallāh b. Sharīk al-ʿĀmirī, who said: As I was standing beside Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr, I took a letter out of my tunic for him, and said to him, "This is ʿAbd al-Malik's letter." He said, "[Do] what you want." [Continuing,] he said: Then one of the Syrians came, entered his camp, and took out a slave girl. She shouted, "Alas my humiliation!" Muṣʿab looked at her and then paid no further attention to her.

[Continuing,] he said: Muṣʿab's head was brought to ʿAbd al-Malik. He looked at it and said, "When will Quraysh nourish the like of you?" And two [men] in Medina were talking to Ḥubbā,[666] when someone told them that Muṣʿab had been killed. She said, "May his slayer perish!" Told that ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān had killed him, she said, "My father [as ransom] for the slayer and the slain!" [Continuing,] he said: Later, when ʿAbd al-Malik made 664. The Dujayl Canal left the Euphrates at the village of al-Rabb (north of al-Anbār), watered the districts of Maskin and Qatrabbul, and flowed into the Tigris at Baghdad. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

665. "Barren" (ʿaqīm) is applied not only to things that bring forth no offspring, and are therefore unprofitable, but also to things that destroy. Thus, in Qurʾān 51:41, the tribe of ʿĀd is destroyed by a wind that is called ʿaqīm. Lane, Lexicon, V, 2117, quotes this saying of ʿAbd al-Malik, together with the paraphrase given by various Arabic lexicographers, as follows: "Dominion is a condition in which, or in the seeking of which, relationship profits not, nor friendship: for a man will slay his son, if he fear him, and his father, for dominion; or because, in seeking it, the father will be slain, and the son, and the brother, and the paternal uncle; or because, in it, the ties of relationship are severed by slaughter and by undutiful conduct." See also Freytag, II, 685 (Maydānī, II, 222).

666. Ḥubbā al-Madīniyyah was a society woman from Medina. Her home was a gathering place for young men of Quraysh. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 186.

the pilgrimage, Ḥubbā approached him and said, "Did you kill your fellow tribesmen Muṣ'ab?" He replied: [812]

Whoever tastes war, finds its taste bitter, and it leaves him in a rough country.[667]

And Ibn Qays al-Ruqayyāt said:[668]

A slain man resting at Dayr al-Jāthalīq has bequeathed shame and humiliation to the two garrison cities.
Bakr b. Wā'il was not loyal to God, neither was Tamīm steadfast in the encounter.
Had he been a tribesman of Bakr,[669] there would have gathered round him squadrons whose ardor rises to the boil and lasts.
But the obligation to defend was neglected; [813] on that day there was no generous Muḍar tribesman among [the squadrons].
God reward with infamy any Kūfan there and any Baṣran of them: whoever does what is blameworthy is to be blamed.
Sons [of one father with us, but] of different mothers, they left our backs uncovered, though we were of pure and genuine stock among them.
If we are destroyed, they will not remain after us;
[only] for someone who possesses honor is there inviolable territory among the Muslims.

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: It has been said that the events I have mentioned—Muṣ'ab's death, and the war between him and 'Abd al-Malik—took place in the year 72, and that the affair of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd and his going to al-

667. The verse is by the pre-Islamic poet Abū Qays b. al-Aslat and is quoted in Aghānī, XV, 160, 161. For "leaves him," the variants "imprisons him," and "makes him kneel down," are recorded.

668. Lines of this elegy for Muṣ'ab are quoted in various other sources; cf. Aghānī, XVII, 165; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 342; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 319; Dīwān, 300ff.

669. For "a Bakrī," the version quoted in Yāqūt, Mu'jam, s.v. Dayr al-Jāthalīq, reads, "with Qays"; another version reads, "a Qaysī" [ed. Leiden note].

Baṣrah on behalf of ʿAbd al-Malik took place in 71.[670] Muṣʿab was killed in [the month of] Jumādā II.[671]

[ʿAbd al-Malik Enters al-Kūfah]

According to al-Wāqidī, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān entered al-Kūfah this year and distributed the districts[672] of Iraq and the garrison cities of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah among his financial agents. However, Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī] mentions that this took place in the year 72.

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī], who said: Muṣʿab was killed on Tuesday, the thirteenth day of Jumādā I or II, of the year 72.[673]

[814] When ʿAbd al-Malik came to al-Kūfah, according to what has been mentioned, he encamped at al-Nukhaylah. Then he called on the people to swear allegiance. Quḍāʿah[674] came. When he saw a small number, ʿAbd al-Malik said, "People of Quḍāʿah, how did you remain safe from Muḍar, in spite of your small number?" ʿAbdallāh b. Yaʿlā al-Nahdī said, "We are stronger than they and more able to defend ourselves." "By means of whom?" he asked. "By means of those of us who are on your side, Commander of the Faithful," he replied. Then Madhḥij and Hamdān[675] came. ʿAbd al-Malik said, "With these men there, I think no one will accomplish anything in al-Kūfah." Then Juʿfī[676] came. When ʿAbd al-Malik looked at them, he said, "People of Juʿfī, you have covered and hidden the son of one of your tribeswomen." [He

670. This is the chronology of al-Madāʾinī and of Abū Mikhnaf. See Aghānī, XVII, 161 (al-Madāʾinī), and Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 26 (Abū Mikhnaf).

671. Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 134, gives reasons for preferring 72. Jumādā II of 72 began on October 30, 691. Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 319, reads: "on Thursday, the middle day of Jumādā I, 72."

672. Aʿmāl, pl. of ʿamal, "units of fiscal administration for collecting taxes" (Morony, Iraq, 528).

673. 13 Jumādā I corresponds to October 12, 691; 13 Jumādā II corresponds to November 11, 691. There is a problem in that neither date fell on a Tuesday, according to the Wüstenfeld-Mahler tables.

674. Quḍāʿah (of which the Banū Kalb were the most prominent subdivision) was usually placed among the Yemeni tribes, although some genealogists placed it among the northern tribes. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳuḍāʿa.

675. Madhḥij and Hamdān were both Yemeni tribes; see *EI*², s.vv.

676. Juʿfī was a Yemeni tribe related to Hamdān or to Madhḥij (Lisān).

meant Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ.) They said, "Yes." "Hand him over," he said. "When he is safe!" they said. "And you make conditions, too?" he said. One of them said, "By God, it is not out of ignorance of your right that we make conditions; rather, we presume upon you as a child presumes upon his father." "By God," he said, "how excellent a tribe you are! Truly, you have been skilled horsemen in pre-Islamic times and in Islam. He is safe." They brought him. (His kunyah was Abū Ayyūb.) Looking at him, 'Abd al-Malik said, "Abū Qabīḥ![677] Having thrown off allegiance to me, with what face will you look toward your Lord?" "With the face He created," he said, and swore allegiance. Then he turned to go. Looking at the back of his head, 'Abd al-Malik said, "What a man he is! What a knower he is!" (He meant of the Arabic language.)[678]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī]—al-Qāsim b. Ma'n and other(s)—Ma'bad b. Khālid al-Jadalī, who said: Then we tribesmen of 'Adwān[679] came forward to him. [Continuing,] he said: We put forward a handsome, comely man, and I remained in the rear. (Ma'bad was ugly.) 'Abd al-Malik said, "Who [are they]?" The scribe said, "'Adwān." 'Abd al-Malik said:[680]

Bring an excuse for the tribe 'Adwān: [815] they were the serpents of the earth,[681]
But they acted wrongfully against each other and were not regardful of each other.[682]

677. As a nickname, "Abū Qabīḥ" means "man with an ugly [face]," or, "doer of an ugly [deed]."

678. For the expression ibn zawmalah, "one who is knowledgeable, expert in a matter," see ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCLXXIX. Addenda, p. DCLXXIV, indicates that one should read 'arabiyyah (Arabic language), rather than gharībah (strange, i.e., a knower of strange things). If one accepts the emendation, this is one of the earliest examples of the the word 'arabiyyah in this sense. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 353, and note.

679. The tribal genealogy is 'Adwān b. 'Amr b. Qays 'Aylān b. Muḍar (Lisān).

680. The verses are by the poet Dhū al-Iṣba' al-'Adwānī. See Aghānī, III, 2, 4; and F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 297f.

681. "Serpents of the earth," meaning "cunning, guileful, malignant, or mischievous, and strong, not neglecting to take blood-revenge." See Lane, Lexicon, V, 1986, where the first two lines of the poem are explained.

682. The tribe of 'Adwān was rent by internal wars in which Dhū al-Iṣba' took part. In the Aghānī version, the next verse, not quoted by 'Abd al-Malik, is: "So they became subjects of talk, with [people] raising and lowering their voices."

Of them were chieftains and those who fully repay actions.[683]

Then he went up to the handsome man and said, "Go on!" "I don't know," he replied. So I said from behind him:

And of them is an arbiter who decrees, and what he decrees is not annulled.
And of them are those who give the pilgrimage the signal to proceed,[684] according to custom and obligation.
From the time they are born, they grow up with the best of pure lineage.[685]

[Continuing,] he said: Leaving me, 'Abd al-Malik turned to the handsome man and said, "Who is it [who composed the lines]?" "I don't know," he said. So I said from behind him, "Dhū al-Iṣba'!" [Continuing,] he said: Turning to the handsome man, 'Abd al-Malik said, "And why was he called Dhū al-Iṣba'?"[686] "I don't know," he said. So I said from behind him, "Because a snake bit his toe and he cut it off."[687] Then he turned to the handsome man and said, "What was his [real] name?" "I don't know," he said. So I said from behind him, "Ḥurthān b. al-Ḥārith!" Then 'Abd al-Malik turned to the handsome man and said, "From which [clan] of you was he?" "I don't know," he said. So I said from behind him, "Banū Nājī!" 'Abd al-Malik said:

683. Qarḍ, literally "loan," is to be taken here in the figurative sense of any good or bad act for which men reward or requite each other. See Lane, Lexicon, VII, 2516, and Lisān, s.v.

684. The line is explained in Aghānī, III, 4: "Giving permission, or a signal, for the pilgrimage to pass on [from 'Arafāt] belonged to the tribe of Khuzā'ah; but then the tribe of 'Adwān took it from them, and it came into the hands of one of their tribesmen called Abū Sayyārah, of the Banū Wābish b. Zayd b. 'Adwān.... Abū Sayyārah used to give the pilgrims the signal to proceed by going in front of them on his donkey, and addressing them...."

685. The Aghānī and Mss. C and Pet give a different text: "When they beget, they produce noble sons, with the best of pure lineage."

686. Dhū al-Iṣba' means "the man with the finger, or toe."

687. The text in Aghānī reads, "and it [i.e., the toe or finger] dried up."

Away with the Banū Nājī and your creating discord among them![688] and do not make your eyes follow what is perishing.
Whenever I say a kind word, to create harmony among them, [816]
Wuhayb says, "I will not make peace with that one."
So he became like the back of an ass, his hump cut off;
the children surround him, humpbacked, kneeling.[689]

Then he turned to the handsome man and said, "How much is your military stipend ('aṭā')?" "Seven hundred [dirhams]," he said. 'Abd al-Malik said to me, "At how much are you?" "Three hundred," I said. Turning to the two scribes, he said, "Deduct four hundred from this one's stipend and add it to this one's." So I came back at a stipend of seven hundred, and he at three hundred!

Then Kindah[690] came. 'Abd al-Malik looked at 'Abdallāh b. Isḥāq b. al-Ash'ath and commended him to his brother Bishr [b. Marwān], saying, "Make him one of your companions." Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham came with two hundred tribesmen from Bakr b. Wā'il, wearing Davidic tunics (after his name).[691] He sat down with 'Abd al-Malik on his couch,[692] and 'Abd al-Malik turned to him. Then he arose, and they arose with him. Following them with his gaze, 'Abd al-Malik said, "Those evildoers! By God, had their leader not come to me, not one of them would have given me obedience."

Then, as some have said, he put Qaṭan b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥārithī in charge of al-Kūfah for forty days; then he removed him and appointed Bishr b. Marwān. 'Abd al-Malik ascended the pulpit of al-Kūfah and preached, saying: "If 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr were

688. Alternate reading: "As for the Banū Nājī, do not mention them . . ." (Aghānī, III, 3).

689. Aghānī: "So he became like the back of a stallion; he goes slowly toward the enemy, humpbacked, kneeling."

690. Kindah was a tribal group of South Arabian origins that had led a powerful confederation in pre-Islamic times. The grandfather of the 'Abdallāh mentioned here was the Kindi chief al-Ash'ath b. Qays, who had led his tribe's delegation to Medina to accept Islam and had later fought at Ṣiffīn on the side of 'Alī. See *EI*², s.v. Kinda.

691. Aqbiyah (pl. of qabā') dāwūdiyyah, i.e., chain mail: according to Qur'ān 343:10–11, David was the inventor of mailed coats.

692. Sarīr is also used for a throne.

a caliph, as he asserts, he would come out and share his substance equally [with his supporters];[693] he would not plant his tail[694] in the sanctuary of Mecca." Then he said, "I have appointed Bishr b. Marwān your governor, and have commanded him to deal well with those who are obedient, but severely with those who dis-[817] obey. Heed him and obey." He appointed Muḥammad b. 'Umayr as his governor ('āmil) in charge of Hamadhān, and Yazīd b. Ruwaym in charge of al-Rayy.[695] He distributed governors, but he did not keep his promise to anyone who had imposed upon him as a condition the governorship (wilāyah) of Iṣbahān. Then he said, "Bring me those evildoers who spoiled Syria and corrupted Iraq." Someone said, "The heads of their tribes have granted them protection." "Does anyone," he replied, "grant protection against me?" Now 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. Asad had taken refuge with 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās, with whom Yaḥyā b. Ma'yūf al-Hamdānī had also taken refuge. Al-Hudhayl b. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith and 'Amr b. Yazīd al-Ḥakamī took refuge with Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. 'Abd al-Malik guaranteed their safety, and they came out of hinding.

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah and Ḥumrān b. Abān contended with each other for leadership (riyāsah) in al-Baṣrah.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad [al-Madā'inī], who said: When al-Muṣ'ab was killed, Ḥumrān b. Abān and 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah arose and contended with each other for the governance (wilāyah) of al-Baṣrah. Ibn Abī Bakrah said, "I am wealthier than you: I expended [my wealth]

693. Āsā bi-nafsihī, "share equally with himself," i.e., he would share the lot of his supporters. The words "with his supporters," are supplied from Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 29f. Cf. the words of 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr's son refusing to flee to save himself: "What a bad son I should be if I did not make myself share equally with you, so that what befalls you will befall me." (Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 74).

694. The metaphor is taken from the locust, which inserts its tail into the ground to lay its eggs. The expression means "to remain fixed in a place" (Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2246).

695. Hamadhān and Rayy are both in Jibāl province. Hamadhān is the modern Hamadān; Rayy is only a few miles from modern Tehran. See Le Strange, Lands, 215–17. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 354, argues that Ḥawshab b. Yazīd b. Ruwaym must have been appointed governor of Rayy, since Yazīd was killed before the death of Muṣ'ab.

for Khālid's forces at the battle of al-Jufrah." Someone said to Ḥumrān, "You lack strength against Ibn Abī Bakrah. Seek help from ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ahtam; if he helps you, Ibn Abī Bakrah will not have strength against you." Ḥumrān did so, and prevailed over al-Baṣrah, with Ibn al-Ahtam in charge of its police. Ḥumrān had standing in the eyes of the Banū Umayyah.

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]—Abū ʿĀṣim al-Nabīl, who said: A man spoke to me and said that a bedouin Arab shaykh arrived and, seeing Ḥumrān, asked, "Who is that?" They said, "Ḥumrān." He said, "I once saw him when his cloak[696] had slipped from his shoulder, and Marwān and Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ hastened to him, each striving to be the first to straighten it."

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]—Abū ʿĀṣim [al-Nabīl], who said: I told this to one of the sons of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir, and he said, "My father told me that Ḥumrān put out his [818] leg, and Muʿāwiyah and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir each strove to be first to massage it."

[Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh Becomes Governor of al-Baṣrah]

In this year, ʿAbd al-Malik sent Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh as governor of al-Baṣrah.

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī], who said: Ḥumrān remained in charge of al-Baṣrah a short while. Ibn Abī Bakrah left and went to ʿAbd al-Malik in al-Kūfah after the death of Muṣʿab. Then ʿAbd al-Malik appointed Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd to be in charge of al-Baṣrah and its fiscal districts. Khālid sent ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah as his deputy in charge of al-Baṣrah. When ʿUbaydallāh came to Ḥumrān, the latter said, "Have you come? Would that you had not come!" So Ibn Abī Bakrah was in charge of al-Baṣrah until Khālid arrived.

According to what al-Wāqidī asserts, ʿAbd al-Malik returned to Syria this year.

---

696. Ridāʾ, a single piece of cloth worn draped over the shoulders (Lane, Lexicon, III, 1072).

[Ibn al-Zubayr's Governors during This Year]

[Continuing,] he said: In [this year], Ibn al-Zubayr removed Jābir b. al-Aswad b. ʿAwf from Medina and made Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAwf his governor there.

[Continuing,] he said: Ṭalḥah was Ibn al-Zubayr's last governor of Medina. [He remained] until Ṭāriq b. ʿAmr, ʿUthmān's mawlā, arrived there. Ṭalḥah then fled, and Ṭāriq stayed in Medina until ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to him [confirming him as governor].

[The Pilgrimage]

According to al-Wāqidī, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr led the pilgrimage this year.

[Ibn al-Zubayr's Sermon after the Death of Muṣʿab][697]

According to Abū Zayd [ʿUmar b. Shabbah]—Abū Ghassān Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—Muṣʿab b. ʿUthmān, who said: When news of Muṣʿab's death reached ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, he arose among the people and said: "Praise be to God! His are the creation and the command.[698] He gives the kingdom to whom He will, and withdraws the kingdom from whom He will; He exalts whom [819] He will, and abases whom He will.[699] Verily, God does not abase him on whose side is the right, though he were but a single man; neither does He exalt him whose friend is Satan and his party, though all mankind were on his side. Truly, there has come to us from Iraq a report that has both saddened us and made us rejoice. The death of Muṣʿab—God's mercy upon him!—has been reported to us. What caused us to rejoice was our knowledge that his death was a testimony[700] on his behalf. What saddened us was 697. Parallel accounts can be found in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 347–48, and Aghānī, XVII, 166. Both accounts note that Ibn al-Zubayr refrained from mentioning his brother's death for several days after it had become common knowledge in Mecca, and that when he finally spoke, deep emotion was visible on his face.

698. Qur'ān 7:54.

699. Cf. ibid., 3:26.

700. Shahādah, which also means "martyrdom."

the fact that separation from a beloved kinsman brings a pang of grief that the lover feels at the time of affliction. Afterwards, however, the man of judgment turns to a fitting patience and noble endurance. If I have been afflicted by the death of Muṣʿab, I have been afflicted by that of al-Zubayr previously; neither am I free of affliction in regard to ʿUthmān. Muṣʿab was only one servant among God's servants, one helper among my helpers. Verily, the people of Iraq, people of treachery and hypocrisy, handed him over and sold him for a very low price. If he has been slain, we, by God, do not die in our beds[701] like the sons of Abū al-ʿĀṣ, none of whom died in war either in pre-Islamic times or in Islam. We die a sudden death by spears or under the shadow of swords. The present world is but a loan from the Supreme King, whose authority does not pass away, and whose dominion does not perish. If it turns its face toward me, I do not take it like a man whose head is turned and who exults immoderately; if it turns its back, I do not weep over it like an abject man confounded by fear. I say this, and ask God's forgiveness for myself and for you."

[ʿAbd al-Malik's Banquet at al-Khawarnaq]

[ʿUmar b. Shabbah] also mentions that ʿAbd al-Malik, having killed Muṣʿab and entered al-Kūfah, ordered a great deal of food [820] prepared and brought to al-Khawarnaq,[702] and issued a general invitation. So the people entered and took their seats. When ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth al-Makhzūmī[703] entered, ʿAbd al-Malik said, "Come to me, and sit on my couch." And he seated him with him. Then he said, "What food that you have eaten do you like best and think most delicious?" "Roast young kid," he said, "nicely seasoned and well cooked." "That's nothing!" said ʿAbd al-Malik. "What do you think of a suckling lamb, carefully scalded and well cooked, [so tender that when] you pull its hind leg toward you, you make its front leg follow, one that has been nourished on equal parts of milk and butter?" The tables were brought, and they ate. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān said, "How pleasant our life is! If only anything lasted![704] But, as the ancient poet said:

701. Cf. the vivid touch added in the version given in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 348: "We do not die in our beds of indigestion (ḥabajan)." The unusual word refers to the fatal indigestion camels suffer when they graze too much on a certain plant, and alludes to the gluttony and hedonism of the Banū Marwān. Cf. ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXIV.

702. See note 466.

703. He had been Muṣʿab's deputy for al-Kūfah while Muṣʿab was fighting at Maskin. He had apparently gone over to ʿAbd al-Malik under the influence of his letters. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 351.

Everything new, O Umaymah, goes toward decay;
and every man will some day become a has-been.

When he finished eating, ʿAbd al-Malik toured the palace. He said to ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth, "Whose is this house?" and "Who built this house?"[705] ʿAmr told him, and ʿAbd al-Malik said:

Everything new, O Umaymah, goes toward decay;
and every man will some day become a has-been.

Then he went to his sitting place and reclined, saying:

[821] Work with deliberation, for you are mortal;
and toil [only] for yourself, O man.
What was, now that it has past, seems as if it had never been;
and what is seems as if it had already passed away.

---

704. A similar conversation on the theme of mutability is reported to have taken place between al-Nuʿmān, the original builder of al-Khawarnaq, and his vizier. One day, al-Nuʿmān, who was a cruel and evil ruler, looked out from his palace at the lush gardens and plentiful waters. He asked his vizier whether he had ever seen such a sight. The vizier replied, "No, if it only were to last!" Surprised, al-Nuʿmān asked, "And what lasts?" "What is in God's presence in the hereafter," replied the vizier. "And how can one obtain it?" asked al-Nuʿmān. "By your leaving the world, worshiping God, and seeking what is His." Al-Nuʿmān, it is said, left his palace and became an ascetic that very night. See Ibn al-Faqīh, Kitāb al-buldān, 177–78. The story is said to have been told to ʿAbd al-Malik's son Hishām at al-Khawarnaq. See Aghānī, II, 35–36, where ʿAdī b. Zayd's poem on the Ubi Sunt! theme is quoted.

705. Cf. the parallel in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 352, where ʿAbd al-Malik can see the various mansions of al-Kūfah from al-Khawarnaq and asks about them. However, since Arabic bayt can mean either a separate house or a chamber within a larger building (Lane, Lexicon, I, 280), he may have been asking about who added various rooms to the palace. Cf. the report in Ibn al-Faqīh, Kitāb al-buldān, 178 (on the authority of al-Haytham b. ʿAdī), that any governor who came to al-Kūfah would expand or renovate the palace of al-Khawarnaq. In Balādhurī, ʿAbd al-Malik apparently asks about both subjects.

According to al-Wāqidī, 'Abd al-Malik conquered Qaysāriyyah[706] in this year.

706. Qaysāriyyah (Caesarea) is about 25 miles south of Haifa on the Mediterranean coast. Umayyad preoccupation with Ibn al-Zubayr had given the Byzantines an opportunity to attack and damage Qaysāriyyah and 'Asqalān. Once secure in power, 'Abd al-Malik rebuilt and fortified the two places, along with other coastal points such as Acre and Tyre. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ḳaysāriyya; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 143.

The Events of the Year 72

(JUNE 4, 691–MAY 22, 692)

According to Abū Ja'far [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: Among these events were those involving the Khārijites and those involving al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd.

['Abd al-Malik and the Khārijites]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad [al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥaṣīrah b. 'Abdallāh [b. al-Ḥārith al-Azdī] and Abū Zuhayr [al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ] al-'Absī: After eight months of extremely hard fighting between the Azāriqah and al-Muhallab at Sūlāf, it was reported to them that Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr had been killed. The news reached the Khārijites before it reached al-Muhallab and his forces. The Khārijites therefore called to them, saying, "Will you not tell us what you say about Muṣ'ab?" They replied, "An imām of right guidance!" The Khārijites said, "Then he is your friend in the present world and the world to come?" "Yes," they replied. The Khārijites said, "And you are his friends while you are alive and when you are dead?" They replied, "And we are his friends alive and dead." The Khārijites said, "Then what do you say about ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān?" "He is the son of the Accursed One," they replied. "We are quit of him, leaving him to God. In our sight, shedding his blood is more licit than shedding yours." The Khārijites said, "Then you are quit of him in the present world and the world to come?" "Yes," they replied, "just as we are quit of you." The Khārijites said, "And you are his enemies while you are alive and when you are dead?" "Yes," they said, "we are enemies of him, even as we are enemies of you." The Khārijites said, "Your imām Muṣʿab has been killed by ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, and we think that tomorrow you will make ʿAbd al-Malik your imām, although now you declare yourselves quit of him and curse his father." "You lie," they said, "you enemies of God!" [822]

On the morrow, when the death of Muṣʿab became evident to them, al-Muhallab had the men swear allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān. The Khārijites then came to them and said, "What say you about Muṣʿab?" "You enemies of God," they said, "we will not tell you what we say about him." For they did not want to give the lie to themselves before them. The Khārijites said, "You told us yesterday that he was your friend in the present world and the world to come, and that you were his friends alive and dead. Then tell us what you say about ʿAbd al-Malik." "He is our imām and caliph," they said, for having sworn allegiance to him, they found no way to avoid saying this. The Azāriqah said, "Enemies of God! Yesterday you were asserting that you were quit of him in the present world and the world to come and claimed that you were his enemies alive and dead, and today he is your imām and caliph! Now that your imām whom you used to declare your friend has been killed, which of the two is the legitimate one? Which is the rightly guided one, and which is the one that strays?" "You enemies of God," they said, "we were satisfied with the former, while he was the manager of our affairs; and we are satisfied with the latter, even as we were with the former." The Khārijites said, "No, by God; but you are brothers of the devils, friends of the evildoers, and slaves of the present world."

ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān sent Bishr b. Marwān to be in charge of al-Kūfah and Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd to be in charge of al-Baṣrah. When Khālid arrived, he established al-Muhallab in charge of the taxes (kharāj) and special revenue (maʿūnah) of al-

Ahwāz,[707] and sent ʿĀmir b. Mismaʿ to be in charge of Sābūr, Muqātil b. Mismaʿ to be in charge of Ardashīr Khurrah,[708] Mismaʿ b. Mālik b. Mismaʿ to be in charge of Fasā and Darābjird,[709] and al-Mughīrah b. al-Muhallab to be in charge of Iṣṭakhr.

Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh sent to Muqātil and dispatched him with an army to the area of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz [b. ʿAbdallāh]. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz went out seeking the Azāriqah. The latter descended upon him from the direction of Kirmān, until they reached Darābjird, and [823] he traveled toward them. Qaṭarī [b. al-Fujāʾah] sent nine hundred horsemen with Ṣāliḥ b. Mikhrāq, who marched with them until he met ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, who was traveling with his men by night, not in battle array, and put the men to flight. Muqātil b. Mismaʿ dismounted and fought until he was killed. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh fled, and his wife, the daughter of al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd, was taken. She was offered to the highest bidder, and her price reached one hundred thousand [dirhams], for she was beautiful. One of her kinsmen, a Khārijite leader named Abū al-Ḥadīd al-Shannī, feeling that his honor was at stake, said, "Step aside! So I see this idolatress[710] has indeed tempted you." And he beheaded her. People claim that he then went to al-Baṣrah and was seen by the family of al-Mundhir, who said, "By God, we do not know whether we should praise you or blame you." He used to say, "I did it only out of zeal and indignation."

ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz made his way to Rāmhurmuz.[711] Someone went and informed al-Muhallab about him, and the latter sent one of 707. Cf. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 342: "When Khālid arrived [in al-Baṣrah], al-Muhallab was fighting the Azāriqah. [Khālid] put him in charge of the taxes and special revenues of al-Ahwāz, and sent his own brother, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh, to fight the Khārijites; and [Khālid] sent Muqātil b. Mismaʿ with him." The motive behind Khālid's decision to take matters into his own hands is not clear; it may have been personal jealousy of al-Muhallab (Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 176).

---

708. Ardashīr Khurrah (Shīrāz was later its chief town) was one of the five districts into which the province of Fārs was divided. See Le Strange, Lands, 248.

709. Darābjird was the chief town of the southeastern district of Fārs, to which it gave its name. Fasā lay about 30 miles west of Darābjird.

710. Mushrikah, literally, "[woman] who associates [other beings with God]," hence a polytheist or idolater, one outside the Islamic community. There may be an allusion to Qurʾān 2:221, "Do not marry idolatresses."

711. Rāmhurmuz lay in Khūzistān province, about 70 miles (three days' march) east of Ahwāz. See Le Strange, Lands, 243, 247.

the shaykhs from among his tribesmen,[712] a horseman of his, to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, saying, "Go to him; if he has retreated in defeat, console him, and tell him he has done nothing that men before him have not done. Tell him that the armies will soon reach him, and that God will strengthen and help him." The man came and found ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz encamped with about thirty men,[713] downcast and sad. The Azdī greeted him, informed him that he was al-Muhallab's messenger, told him what he had been commanded to say, and proposed that he mention to him whatever need he had. Then he returned to al-Muhallab and told him the news. Al-Muhallab said to him, "Go now to Khālid in al-Baṣrah, and tell [824] him the news." "Am I to go to him," he said, "and tell him that his brother has been routed? By God, I will not!" Al-Muhallab said, "By God, no one but you shall go to him: you were the one who saw him face to face, and you were my messenger to him." The man said, "Then he will guide you, O Muhallab, if he goes to him this year and then departs."[714] Al-Muhallab said, "As for you, by God, you feel safe from me; but, by God, if you were with anyone else, and he sent you on a march, you would leave in a hurry!" The man turned to him and said, "You think you are doing us a favor by your forbearance! By God, we more than repay you! Do you not know that we expose ourselves to death on your behalf and protect you from your enemies? By God, if we were with someone who behaved foolishly[715] toward us and sent us to march off on his affairs, and then needed our fighting and aid, we would put him between ourselves and our enemy and protect ourselves by means of him." Al-Muhallab said, "You are right; you are right." Then he called a young man from Azd who was with him, and sent him to tell Khālid the news about his brother. The young Azdī tribesman came to Khālid, who was surrounded by men and who was wearing a green coat (jubbah) and a green 712. As mentioned below, the man was from the tribe of Azd.

713. Mss. O, B, and Co: horsemen.

714. The meaning is not clear, and there are a number of textual variants. The word translated, "he will guide you," can, with a change of vowels, mean "he will bestow a gift on you." For, "if he goes," Ms. O reads, "if you go."

715. Yajhalu, from jahila, to be ignorant, behave with foolishness (jahl), is the opposite of behaving with forbearance (ḥilm), and implies roughness, even violent disregard for the right.

bordered shawl (miṭraf), and greeted him. Khālid returned the greeting and asked, "What has brought you?" "May God make you prosper!" he said. "Al-Muhallab has sent me to report to you what I have seen with my own eyes." "And what have you seen?" asked Khālid. "I saw ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz at Rāmhurmuz," he said, "defeated." "You are lying," said Khālid. "No," he said, "by God, I have not lied or said anything but the truth to you. If I am a liar, take my life; but if I am telling the truth, give me—God make you prosper!—your coat and scarf!" Khālid said, "Alas! What an easy thing you have asked! You have contented yourself, despite [825] the great stake if you are lying, with a small stake, if you are telling the truth." Khālid imprisoned him, but ordered him to be treated well; finally, it became clear to him that the men had been defeated. Khālid then wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik, as follows:

> To proceed: I am informing the Commander of the Faithful—may God grant him honor!—that I sent ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh to seek the Khārijites. They met him in Fārs. The two sides fought very hard, and ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was defeated when the men abandoned him. Muqātil b. Mismaʿ was killed, and the remnants of the army went to al-Ahwāz. I have wanted to inform the Commander of the Faithful about this, that I may receive his opinion and command, and may make myself subject to it, God willing. Peace be with you, and the mercy of God!

ʿAbd al-Malik then wrote to him:

> To proceed: Your messenger has brought your letter in which you inform me of your having sent your brother to fight the Khārijites and of the defeat of those who were defeated and the death of those who were killed. I asked your messenger where al-Muhallab was, and he told me that he was your agent in charge of al-Ahwāz. What bad judgment it is when you send your brother, a rustic[716] from the people of Mecca, to fight, and retain by your side, collecting taxes, al-Muhallab, who is fortunate in judgment, good in management, skillful and experienced in war—a man of war, and the son of men of war! See that he[717] hastens with the men, so that you meet them in al-Ahwāz and beyond al-Ahwāz. I have sent to Bishr to have him reinforce you with an army of Kūfans. When you encounter your enemy, deal with them according to no plan until you take it to al-Muhallab and consult him about it, God willing. Peace be with you, and the mercy of God!

716. Aʿrābī, usually means bedouin, as opposed to sedentary, but as ed. Leiden, Glossarium, p. CCCLV, notes, it is often used abusively ("rustic"). Cf. Ṭabarī, II, 590: mā ahlu Makkata illā aʿrāb ("The people of Mecca are nothing but rustics").

Khālid was distressed that ʿAbd al-Malik had faulted his judgment in sending his brother and neglecting al-Muhallab, and that, not approving of his independent judgment, he had said, "Submit it to al-Muhallab and ask his advice about it." [826]

ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to Bishr b. Marwān:

To proceed: I have written to Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh commanding him to hasten toward the Khārijites. Dispatch five thousand men to him, and send as their commander one of your men that you approve of. When they have completed this campaign of theirs, you are to send them off to al-Rayy to fight their enemies, man their frontier garrisons (masāliḥ), and collect their tribute (fayʾ), until their tour of duty ends and you recall them and send others in their place.

Bishr ordered the Kūfans to furnish five thousand troops and sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath in command of them, saying, "When you complete this campaign of yours, go to al-Rayy." And he wrote him a writ of appointment for the place.

Khālid led out the Baṣrans and arrived in al-Ahwāz; ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad came with the Kūfan contingent and met them in al-Ahwāz. The Azāriqah approached the city of al-Ahwāz and the camp of the troops. Al-Muhallab said to Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh, "I see many boats here. Gather them for yourself, for I think the enemy will surely burn them." Indeed, it was only a short time before a group of Khārijite horsemen quickly advanced toward them and burned them. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh sent al-Muhallab to command his right wing, and Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham of the Banū Qays b. Thaʿlabah to command his left wing. Passing by ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad, who had not dug a trench, al-Muhallab said to him, "Brother, what is preventing you from digging a trench?" "By God," he replied, "they are more insignificant to me than a camel's fart!"[718] [Al-Muhallab] said, "Do not think them insignificant, son of my brother; they are the beasts of prey of the [827] Arabs. I will not leave until you make a trench for yourself." He did so. When the Khārijites learned of what ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad had said about them, that they were "more insignificant to him than a camel's fart," their poet said:

717. The Leiden editor suggests amending to "you," to maintain consistency of pronouns, but this shift of persons is not uncommon.

O seeker of the right, do not be lured[719] by hope:
separating you from what you desire is the limit of the term [of your life].
Work on behalf of your Lord, and ask Him for His reward; know that the fear of Him is the best deed.
Attack the effeminate ones who caparison themselves in mail of Median steel, that they may be saluted tomorrow morning with a camel's fart.

They remained encamped for about twenty nights. Then Khālid advanced his men toward the enemy. The latter, seeing something that frightened them—the number of men and their state of preparation—started to withdraw. Khālid's men became emboldened against them: the horsemen charged them, and he advanced toward them. The enemy withdrew, as if on the defensive, turning away, and thinking they did not have strength to fight the entire force. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh had Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham follow them with an army of Baṣrans. Khālid returned to al-Baṣrah, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad went to al-Rayy, and al-Muhallab remained in al-Ahwāz. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik:

718. Proverbial, see Freytag, II, 891 [Maydānī, II, 303–4].
719. The unusual verb istahwā recalls Qurʾān 6:71: "Like one lured to bewilderment in the earth by Satans...."

> To proceed: I am informing the Commander of the Faithful—may God make him prosper!—that I went out to fight the Azāriqah, who have turned away from the faith and withdrawn from the governance of the Muslims. We met at the city of al-Ahwāz, hastened toward each other, and fought as hard as men have ever fought. Then God sent down His help upon the believers and Muslims and made His enemies retreat. The Muslims followed them, killing them, while the enemy could neither prevent it nor find safety. God made what was in their camp [828] > booty (fay') for the Muslims. Then I made Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham follow them. If God so wills, He will destroy them and uproot them. Peace be with you!

When this letter reached ʿAbd al-Malik, he wrote to Bishr b. Marwān:

> To proceed: Send from you a brave man skilled in war, with four thousand horsemen, and let them go to Fārs in search of the renegades; for Khālid has written to me, informing me that he has sent Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham to seek them. Command the man you send not to disobey Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham, if the two of them meet, for the disagreement of men among themselves is help to the enemy against them. Peace be with you!

Bishr b. Marwān sent ʿAttāb b. Warqāʾ with four thousand Kūfan horsemen. They went out, met Dāwūd b. Qaḥdham in the territory of Fārs, and followed in pursuit of the enemy, until the horses of most of the men perished, and they themselves were overcome by fatigue and hunger. The bulk of the two armies returned on foot to al-Ahwāz.

Concerning the defeat of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz and his abandonment of his wife, Ibn Qays al-Ruqayyāt of the Banū Makhzūm said:[720]

ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, you disgraced your entire army, and left them lying on every road:

720. Dīwān (ed. Rhodokanakis), 293–94.

Either dying of thirst, or cut to pieces and slain among the men.
Why didn't you remain steadfast, fighting beside the martyr, Muqātil [b. Misma'][721]?
For you came back, your strength undone, in the evening;
[829] You left your army with no commander over them (return with lasting shame in life!);
And you forgot your wife, when she was led away a captive, making eyes weep as she cried aloud and wailed.

There occurred in this year the rebellion of the Khārijite Abū Fudayk from the Banū Qays b. Tha'labah, who seized al-Baḥrayn and killed Najdah b. 'Āmir al-Ḥanafi.[722] Faced by both the affair of Qaṭarī [b. Fujā'ah's] descent upon al-Ahwāz and the affair of Abū Fudayk, Khālid b. 'Abdallāh sent his brother, Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh, in command of a large army to fight Abū Fudayk. Abū Fudayk, however, defeated him, took a slave girl of his, and made her his own. Umayyah rode one of his horses and reached al-Baṣrah in three days. Khālid wrote to 'Abd al-Malik about his condition and that of the Azāriqah.

['Abd al-Malik Sends al-Ḥajjāj to Fight Ibn al-Zubayr]

In this year, 'Abd al-Malik sent al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf to Mecca to fight 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr. The following reason is given for his sending al-Ḥajjāj, rather than someone else, against him:[723] When 'Abd al-Malik was about to return to Syria, al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf stood before him and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I dreamed I had taken 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr and flayed him; so send me to him and put me in charge of fighting him." 'Abd al-Malik therefore sent him with a large army of Syrians, and he went and arrived at Mecca. ʿAbd al-Malik had written to the Meccans offering a guarantee of safety if they became obedient to him.

721. The line plays on the literal meaning of the name Muqātil, "a fighting [person]."

722. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 142ff. for further accounts of the downfall of Najdah and the rise of Abū Fudayk b. Thawr.

723. Cf. the report in Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 319, that while at al-Kūfah, 'Abd al-Malik placed Qudāmah b. Maẓ'ūn in charge of the army sent to attack Ibn al-Zubayr but replaced Qudāmah with al-Ḥajjāj upon his return to Syria.

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad][724]—Muḥammad b. Saʿd[725]—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—Muṣʿab b. Thābit[726] [830] —Abū al-Aswad[727]—ʿAbbād b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr, who said: When Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr was killed, ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān sent al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf against Ibn al-Zubayr in Mecca. Al-Ḥajjāj left with two thousand men from the Syrian army during Jumādā of the year 72.[728] He did not turn toward Medina, but traveled along the Iraq road[729] and encamped at al-Ṭāʾif.[730] He kept sending detachments to ʿArafah in the area outside the sacred territory (ḥaram);[731] Ibn al-Zubayr also sent a detachment, and the two sides fought there. Ibn al-Zubayr's horsemen were always defeated, while al-Ḥajjāj's horsemen returned victorious. Al-Ḥajjāj then wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik, asking his permission to besiege Ibn al-Zubayr and enter the sacred territory against him. He told ʿAbd al-Malik that the vehemence of Ibn al-Zubayr's strength had abated and that most of his forces had dispersed, leaving him. He 724. Al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad b. Abī Usāmah Abū Muḥammad al-Tamīmī, a Baghdadi muḥaddith and historian (b. 186/802, d. 282/895), was a pupil of al-Wāqidī and a teacher of al-Ṭabarī. See F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 160, 300.

725. Abū ʿAbdallāh Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Manīʿ al-Baṣrī al-Zuhrī, called "Kātib al-Wāqidī" ("al-Wāqidī's secretary") was born in al-Baṣrah in 168/784, and died in Baghdad in 230/845. A pupil of al-Wāqidī, his monumental Kitāb al-ṭabaqāt al-kabīr contains biographies of the Prophet, his companions, and their descendants to the year 230. See ibid., I, 300f.

726. Muṣʿab b. Thābit b. ʿAbdallāh al-Asadī d. 157/773. See ibid., I, 285.

727. Abū al-Aswad Muḥammad b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nawfal b. al-Aswad al-Asadī, d. 131/748 or 137, was the foster-son of ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr (the brother of ʿAbdallāh and Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr). See ibid., I, 248f.

728. In the year 72, Jumādā I began on September 30, and Jumādā II on October 30, 691. The parallel account in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 357, notes that other authorities placed the number of men at 3,000 or 5,000.

729. The pilgrim roads from Iraq to Mecca began at al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah and came together at Dhāt ʿIrq. Medina was reached by a branch road going west from the main route. See Le Strange, Lands, 83–4.

730. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 257 (from ʿAwānah), where ʿAbd al-Malik explicitly commands al-Ḥajjāj to avoid any attack that would endanger the Kaʿbah; instead, he was to block the roads and starve out Ibn al-Zubayr.

731. Mecca and its immediate environs are a ḥaram, sacred territory in which no fighting is permitted. ʿArafah, to which the pilgrims proceed on the 9th of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, lies outside the Meccan ḥaram. See *EI*², s.v. ʿArafa.

asked ʿAbd al-Malik to reinforce him with men. Al-Ḥajjāj received ʿAbd al-Malik's reply.[732] ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to Ṭāriq b. ʿAmr, commanding him, with the soldiers of the army he had with him, to join al-Ḥajjāj. Ṭāriq marched with five thousand of his men and joined al-Ḥajjāj. Al-Ḥajjāj's arrival in al-Ṭāʾif took place in Shaʿbān of the year 72.[733] At the beginning of Dhū al-Qaʿdah,[734] al-Ḥajjāj left al-Ṭāʾif, encamped at Biʾr Maymūn,[735] and besieged Ibn al-Zubayr. Al-Ḥajjāj led the pilgrimage this year, since Ibn al-Zubayr was besieged.

Ṭāriq [b. ʿAmr's] arrival in Mecca took place on the new moon of Dhū al-Ḥijjah.[736] Al-Ḥajjāj[737] did not circumambulate the Kaʿbah, nor did he go to it in pilgrim's garb (iḥrām).[738] He wore a sword, but did not approach women or use perfume until ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr was killed. Ibn al-Zubayr sacrificed camels in Mecca on the day of sacrifice, but neither he nor his companions performed the pilgrimage that year, because they did not stand at ʿArafah.

[831] According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—Saʿīd b. Muslim b. Bābak—his father, who said: I made the pilgrimage in the year 72. We came to Mecca and entered it from the upper part of the city. We found the forces of al-Ḥajjāj and Ṭāriq between al-Ḥajūn[739] and Biʾr Maymūn. We circumambulated the Kaʿbah and [went between] Ṣafā and Marwah.[740] Then al-Ḥajjāj led the 732. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 358 (from ʿAwānah), ʿAbd al-Malik at this point told al-Ḥajjāj to do whatever he thought best. Al-Ḥajjāj proceeded to set up a trebuchet and bombard Mecca. Another report in Balādhurī (from Wāqidī) states that the bombardment was halted during the pilgrimage only at the pleading of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar and resumed immediately afterwards (ibid., 360). Ṭabarī's brief account of the siege omits many details to be found in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 358ff.

733. Shaʿbān of 72 began on December 28, 691.

734. Dhū al-Qaʿdah of 72 began on March 25, 692.

735. Yāqūt locates Biʾr Maymūn ("Maymūn's Well") in the higher part of the city of Mecca. There is evidence placing it between the Great Mosque and Minā, on the main road to Iraq. See *EI*², s.v.; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

736. Dhū al-Ḥijjah of 72 began on April 24, 692.

737. The parallel in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 360, makes it clear that al-Ḥajjāj is meant. The sentence about Ṭariq's arrival is parenthetical.

738. For a description of the garment worn by pilgrims, see *EI*², s.v. Iḥrām.

739. Al-Ḥajūn is a hill in Mecca where a cemetery was located (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.).

740. After circumambulating the Kaʿbah seven times upon arrival in Mecca, pilgrimage: I saw him making the station at the hills of ʿArafah, on horseback, wearing a coat of mail and a neck protector.[741] Then he went back. I saw him turn off toward Biʾr Maymūn. He did not circumambulate the Kaʿbah. His men were armed. I saw that they had a great deal of food, and I saw a caravan coming from Syria carrying food: biscuit, barley meal, and flour. I saw that his forces had plenty to eat. We bought biscuit from some of them for a dirham, and it satisfied us—we were a party of three—until we reached al-Juḥfah.[742]

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—Muṣʿab b. Thābit—Nāfiʿ, a mawlā of the Banū Asad, who was knowledgeable about the civil strife (fitnah) of Ibn al-Zubayr, who said: Ibn al-Zubayr was besieged the night of the new moon of Dhū al-Qaʿdah in the year 72.

[ʿAbd al-Malik and ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim]

In this year, ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to [ʿAbdallāh] Ibn Khāzim al-Sulamī, summoning him to swear allegiance, and assigning him Khurāsān as a means of subsistence (ṭuʿmah) for seven years.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad [al-Madāʾinī]—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad, Yaḥyā b. Ṭufayl, and Zuhayr b. Hunayd (some of whom report more than the others): Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr was killed in the year 72, while ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim was at Abrashahr,[743] fighting Baḥīr b. Warqāʾ al-Ṣuraymī of Ṣuraym[744] b. al-Ḥārith. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān then wrote to Ibn Khāzim by [832] way of Sawrah b. Ashyam al-Numayrī, saying, "Khurāsān is yours for seven years, provided that you swear allegiance to me." Ibn Khāzim replied to Sawrah, "But for the fact that I would thereby pilgrims traverse the distance between the hills of Ṣafā and Marwah in a rite called saʿy. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥadjdj.

---

741. Mighfar: a piece of mail that is worn under the helmet and that hangs down to protect the neck. See Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2274f.

742. Al-Jūḥfah was a large town, the fourth stage on the road between Mecca and Medina (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.).

743. Abrashahr was an alternate name for Naysābūr (Persian, Nīshāpūr), one of the major cities of Khurāsān, now located in northeastern Iran. See Le Strange, Lands, 383.

744. Also vocalized Ṣarīm, this was a subdivision of Tamīm. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 345.

stir up trouble between the Banū Sulaym and the Banū ʿĀmir, I would kill you! Now eat this page!" So he ate it. [Continuing,] he said: Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. Wāsiʿ said it was Sawādah b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Numayrī who delivered ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim's writ of appointment. Another person said that ʿAbd al-Malik sent Sinān b. Mukammil al-Ghanawī to Ibn Khāzim, and wrote to him, saying, "Khurāsān is yours as an assigned means of subsistence (ṭuʿmah)." Ibn Khāzim said to him, "'Abū al-Dhibbān'[745] only sent you because you are from Ghanī, and he knows I will not kill a man from Qays. Now eat his letter!"

[Continuing,] he said: ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to Bukayr b. Wishāḥ, a member of the Banū ʿAwf b. Saʿd (he was Ibn Khāzim's deputy in charge of Marw), appointing him to the governorship of Khurāsān, making him promises, and raising his hopes. So Bukayr b. Wishāḥ threw off his allegiance to ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr and propagandized for ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān. The people of Marw responded favorably to him. When Ibn Khāzim learned of this, he feared that Bukayr would lead the people of Marw against him, and that the people of Marw and of Abrashahr would join forces against him. He therefore left Baḥīr and went toward Marw, intending to go to his son in Tirmidh.[746] Baḥīr followed him and overtook him at a village called in Persian Shāhmīghad, eight farsakhs from Marw. [Continuing,] he said: Ibn Khāzim fought with Baḥīr. A mawlā of the Banū Layth said: "I was in a dwelling close to the place where the men fought. When the sun rose, the two armies rushed at each other, and I began to hear sword blows.
[833] As the day advanced, the sounds became softer—because of the advancing of the day, I thought. When I had prayed the noon prayer—or a little before noon—I went out. A man from the Banū Tamīm met me. I said, 'What is the news?' He said, 'I have killed the enemy of God, Ibn Khāzim. Here he is!' Behold, he was being carried on a mule; they had tied a rope to his loins and a stone, and had balanced him with it on the mule."

745. The epithet, meaning, "man of flies," was applied to a man with foul breath, from which ʿAbd al-Malik was said to suffer. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 152–53.

746. Tirmidh (modern Termez, on the Soviet-Afghan border), lay on the Oxus River (modern Amu Darya), about 300 miles east of Marw, and was the most important town of the Ṣaghāniyān district. See Le Strange, Lands, 440–41; EI[1], s.v.

[Continuing,] he said: The man who killed Ibn Khāzim was Wakīʿ b. ʿUmayrah al-Qurayʿī, called Ibn al-Dawraqiyyah.[747] Baḥīr b. Warqāʾ, ʿAmmār b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz al-Jushamī, and Wakīʿ fought Ibn Khāzim by turns, thrust him with spears, and threw him down. Wakīʿ sat on his chest and killed him. A certain governor asked Wakīʿ, "How did you kill Ibn Khāzim?" He replied, "I subdued him with the end of the spear shaft. After he was thrown down, I sat on his chest. He tried to get up but could not. I said, 'Vengeance for Dawīlah!'" (Dawīlah was a full brother of Wakīʿ who had been previously killed in some other fighting.) "He spat out phlegm in my face, and said, 'God curse your father! Will you kill the leader[748] of Muḍar to avenge your brother, a peasant not worth a handful of date pits?' (He may have said, '[a handful of] earth.') I never saw anyone with more spirit[749] than he when at the point of death." [Continuing,] he said: One day, Ibn Hubayrah mentioned this report and said, "That, by God, is courage!"

[Continuing,] he said: As soon as Ibn Khāzim was killed, Baḥīr sent a man from the Banū Ghudānah to inform ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān of Ibn Khāzim's death, but did not send the head. Bukayr b. Wishāḥ, with the people of Marw, came to Baḥīr and his men after Ibn Khāzim had been killed. Bukayr wanted to take Ibn Khāzim's head, but Baḥīr forbade him; Bukayr therefore hit him with a stick, took the head, and bound and imprisoned Baḥīr. [834] Bukayr sent the head to ʿAbd al-Malik, and wrote informing him that it was he who had killed Ibn Khāzim. When the head was brought before him, ʿAbd al-Malik summoned the Ghudānī tribesman, Baḥīr's messenger, and asked, "What is this?" "I don't know," he replied. "I did not leave the men until Ibn Khāzim had been killed."

A man from the Banū Sulaym said:

O night we spent in Naysābūr! Give back to me the morning—woe unto you!—or brighten.

747. I.e., son of the woman from Dawraq (a town in Khūzistān). See Le Strange, Lands, 242.

748. Literally, "the ram (kabsh) of Muḍar." The ram, as leader of the flock, was used figuratively for the leader of an army, a tribe, etc. See Lane, Lexicon, VI, 2588f.

749. Literally, "with more saliva (rīq)." See Lane, Lexicon, III, 1203.

Its stars were slow-moving, languid;
as if its firmament had been in the hands of a cupbearer.
Umm Zayd reviles time's accidents:
but have you any way of changing [time's] accidents?
[Time's accidents] have ignored my honor; they have turned away from me for the present world's brief term.
Had horsemen from Sulaym been present the morning the wounded lion was surrounded, Generous men would have taken the field around him, and grave would the vengeance have been in the search for retaliation.
Now barking dogs remain:
after you there is no [lion's] roar on earth.

[Those in Office during the Year]

Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf took charge of leading the pilgrimage this year. The governor of Medina for ʿAbd al-Malik was Ṭāriq [b. ʿAmr], the mawlā of ʿUthmān; and of al-Kūfah, Bishr b. Marwān. ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah b. Masʿūd was in charge of its judiciary. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd was governor of al-Baṣrah, and Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of its judiciary. Some say that ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī was governor of Khurāsān; others say it was Bukayr b. Wishāḥ. Those who say that ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim was in charge of Khurāsān in the year 72 [835] assert that ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim was killed only after ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr had been killed; that ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim, summoning him to obedience, and offering him Khurāsān as an assigned means of subsistence (ṭuʿmah) for ten years, only after ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr had been killed, and that ʿAbd al-Malik sent Ibn al-Zubayr's head to him. When ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr's head arrived, ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim swore he would never render obedience to ʿAbd al-Malik; calling for a basin, he washed the head of Ibn al-Zubayr, anointed it with spices, shrouded it, prayed over it, and then sent it to the family of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr in Medina; and he made the messenger eat ʿAbd al-Malik's letter, saying, "If you were not a messenger, I would kill you." Some say he cut off the man's arms and legs and beheaded him.

A Chapter in Which We Mention the Secretaries since the Beginning of Islam[750]

Hishām [b. al-Kalbī] and others relate that the first Arab who wrote[751] in Arabic was Ḥarb b. Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams, and that the first person to write in Persian was Bīwarasb,[752] who lived in the time of Idrīs.[753] The first person who distinguished the orders of secretaries and elucidated their ranks was Luhrasb b. Kāwghān b. Kaymūs.[754]

It is related that Abarwīz[755] said to his secretary, "Language consists of four divisions: asking for something, asking about something, commanding something, and informing about something. These are the four supports of discourses. If one seeks a fifth, it will not be found; if one of the four is subtracted, [the supports] will not be complete. If you seek, be gentle; if you ask, be brisk;[756] if you command, be firm; and if you inform, be precise." [836]

Abū Mūsā al-Ashʿarī said: "The first who said, 'To proceed,'[757]

---

750. The following section, which is inserted in Mss. O, B, and Co, is not found in Mss. Pet and C, or in Ibn al-Athīr. In Ms. Co, a marginal note reads: "An addition which [is not] from the original." At the end of the section, there is a note: "[Here ends] the chapter; one returns [to the words of] Abū Jaʿfar [al-Ṭabarī]"—(ed. Leiden, note). The material can be found fleshed out with many anecdotes in the Kitāb al-wuzarā' wa-al-kuttāb, by al-Jahshiyārī (d. 331/942; German translation by J. Latz, Das Buch der Wezire).

751. Kataba, "he wrote," can also mean, "he was a kātib," i.e. a scribe or secretary (in the professional sense).

752. Bīwarasb or Bēwarasb (the name means "Myriad Horses"), also known as al-Azdahāq or Zahhāk, was a legendary king of Iran, a monstrous tyrant said to have reigned a thousand years. See Ṭabarī, I, 201–10.

753. A prophet named Idrīs is mentioned in Qur'ān 19:56 and 21:85. Islamic tradition identifies him with the Biblical Enoch. See EI^{2}, s.v.; Bell and Watt, Introduction to the Qur'ān, 28 and note.

754. Luhrasb/Luhrasp was the fourteenth king to rule over Iran in the Shāhnāma. He was the father of Gushtasp, during whose reign Zoroaster appeared. See Ṭabarī, I, 645ff.

755. The Persian form is Aparwēz (older) or Parvīz (modern). Ed. Leiden vocalizes, Abrawīz. He was Khusraw II, ruled 590–627.

756. Variant in al-ʿIqd: be clear.

757. Ammā baʿdu, literally, "As for afterwards." In letters, homilies, and other formal compositions, this formula marks the end of the introductory matter (usually an elaboration of the praise of God and the Prophet) and the beginning of the subject proper.

was David. This is the 'separation of the speech'[758] God mentions in reference to him." Al-Haytham b. 'Adī said: "The first who said, 'To proceed' was Quss b. Sā'idah al-Iyādī."[759]

Those who were secretaries to the Prophet: 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib and 'Uthmān b. 'Affān used to write down the revelation. If they were absent, Ubayy b. Ka'b and Zayd b. Thābit wrote it. Khālid b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ and Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān used to write in his presence concerning his affairs. 'Abdallāh b. al-Arqam b. 'Abd Yaghūth and al-'Alā' b. 'Uqbah used to write among the people concerning their affairs. 'Abdallāh b. al-Arqam often wrote to kings from the Prophet.

'Uthmān, Zayd b. Thābit, 'Abdallāh b. al-Arqam, 'Abdallāh b. Khalaf al-Khuzā'ī, and Ḥanẓalah b. al-Rabī' were secretaries to Abū Bakr.

Zayd b. Thābit and 'Abdallāh b. al-Arqam were secretaries for 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. 'Abdallāh b. Khalaf al-Khuzā'ī, father of Ṭalḥah al-Ṭalḥāt, was in charge of the dīwān of al-Baṣrah. Abū Jabīrah b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Anṣārī was 'Umar's secretary in charge of the dīwān of al-Kūfah. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb said to his secretaries and governors:[760] "Power to perform an office lies in your not putting off today's task until tomorrow; for if you do, tasks will come at you from every direction, and you will not know which [837] one you should take up first. He was the first who drew up dīwān registers among the Arabs in Islam.

Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was secretary to 'Uthmān. 'Abd al-Malik was his secretary for the dīwān of Medina; Abū Jabīrah al-Anṣārī was in charge of the dīwān of al-Kūfah. Abū Ghaṭafān b. 'Awf b. Sa'd b. Dīnār of the Banū Duhmān of Qays 'Aylān also was 758. Faṣl al-khiṭāb: In Qur'ān 38:20, David is said to have been given wisdom and faṣl al-khiṭāb. The phrase is usually translated in a more general sense—"speech decisive" (Arberry), "decisive speech" (Pickthall)—but Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī apparently thought it meant quite literally the formula used to separate the preliminary invocations of God from the body of a speech.

759. Quss b. Sā'idah was a legendary figure of Arab antiquity said to have been the greatest orator among all the tribes. He is always said to have been a monotheist, sometimes to have been a Christian, or even a bishop of Najrān. The youthful Muḥammad is supposed to have heard him at the fair of 'Ukāẓ. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳuss b. Sā'ida; Nicholson, Literary History, 135–56.

760. 'Ummāl, pl. of 'āmil, "[fiscal] agent, governor."

secretary to him, as were Ahyab, his mawlā, and Ḥumrān [b. Abān], his mawlā.

Sa'īd b. Nimrān al-Hamdānī, who later was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah for Ibn al-Zubayr,[761] was secretary to 'Alī. 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd was also his secretary. It is said that 'Abdallāh b. Jubayr was his secretary. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Rāfi' was also his secretary. (There is disagreement about Abū Rāfi''s name; some say it was Ibrāhīm, some Aslam, some Sinān, and some 'Abd al-Raḥmān).

Mu'āwiyah's secretary in charge of correspondence was 'Ubayd b. Aws al-Ghassānī. His secretary in charge of the tax bureau (dīwān al-kharāj) was Sarjūn b. Manṣūr al-Rūmī.[762] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Darrāj, a mawlā of Mu'āwiyah, also was secretary to him. 'Ubaydallāh b. Naṣr b. al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Alā' al-Sulamī was in charge of one of his *dīwān*s.

Al-Rayyān b. Muslim was secretary to Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd.[763] His secretary in charge of the dīwān was Sarjūn. It is said that Abū al-Zu'ayzi'ah was also his secretary.

Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb b. Ḥalḥalah al-Khuzā'ī, whose kunyah was Abū Isḥāq, was secretary to 'Abd al-Malik. His secretary in charge of the correspondence bureau (dīwān al-rasā'il) was his mawlā, Abū al-Zu'ayzi'ah.

Al-Qa'qā' b. Khālid (or Khulayd) al-'Absī was secretary to al-Walīd.[764] His secretary for the tax bureau was Sulaymān b. Sa'd al-Khushanī; his mawlā Shu'ayb al-'Umānī was in charge of the registry department (dīwān al-khātam); his mawlā Janāḥ was [838] in charge of the correspondence department; and his mawlā Nufay' b. Dhu'ayb was in charge of income-yielding properties (mustaghallāt).[765]

Sulaymān b. Nu'aym al-Ḥimyarī was secretary to Sulaymān.[766]

---

761. See Ṭabarī, II, 537.

762. The father of St John of Damascus. See Hitti, History of the Arabs, 245–46.

763. Note the omission of the reign of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah. Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah ruled briefly in 64/683.

764. Al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik ruled from 86/705 to 96/715.

765. Mustaghall, pl. mustaghallāt, included any income-generating property: cultivated land, houses, markets, mills, etc. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 220; Shaban, Islamic History, II, 17.

766. Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik ruled from 96/715 to 99/717.

The secretary of Maslamah [b. ʿAbd al-Malik][767] was his mawlā Samīʿ. Al-Layth b. Abī Ruqayyah, the mawlā of Umm al-Ḥakam bint Abī Sufyān, was in charge of the correspondence department; Sulaymān b. Saʿd al-Khushanī was in charge of the tax bureau; Nuʿaym b. Salāmah, a mawlā of Yemenites from Palestine, was in charge of the registry department. [Some say that Rajāʾ b. Ḥaywah was in charge of the seal.]

Al-Mughīrah b. Abī Farwah[768] was secretary to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab.[769]

Al-Layth b. Abī Ruqayyah, the mawlā of Umm al-Ḥakam bint Abī Sufyān, and Rajāʾ b. Ḥaywah were secretaries to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz.[770] Ismāʿīl b. Abī Ḥakīm, the mawlā of al-Zubayr, was also secretary to him. In charge of the tax bureau was Sulaymān b. Saʿd al-Khushanī, who was succeeded by Ṣāliḥ b. Jubayr al-Ghassānī (some say al-Ghudanī) and ʿAdī b. al-Ṣabāḥ b. al-Muthannā, whom al-Haytham b. ʿAdī mentioned as being one of his chief secretaries.

Before Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik[771] became caliph, his secretary was a man named Yazīd b. ʿAbdallāh. Then he made Usāmah b. Zayd al-Salīḥī secretary.

Saʿīd b. al-Walīd b. ʿAmr b. Jabalah al-Kalbī, [called] al-Abrash,[772] and having the kunyah Abū Mujāshiʿ, was secretary to Hishām.[773] Naṣr b. Sayyār was in charge of the Khurāsān tax bureau for Hishām. Among [Hishām's] secretaries at al-Ruṣāfah[774] was Shuʿayb b. Dīnār.

---

767. Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik was a great military leader. Under Sulaymān, he besieged Constantinople (98/716–17). During the reign of Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik (101–5/720–24), he suppressed a major revolt by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab in Iraq and became its governor. See *EI*², s.v.

768. Read "b. Abī Qurrah." See Latz, Das Buch der Wezire, 97, note.

769. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was appointed governor of Iraq by Sulaymān in 96/715. Two years later, the governorship of Khurāsān was also given to him.

770. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz ruled from 99/717 to 101/720.

771. Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik ruled from 101/720 to 105/724.

772. Speckled, or perhaps, freckled.

773. Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik ruled from 105/724 to 125/743.

774. Al-Ruṣāfah ("the Causeway," according to Le Strange; Yāqūt calls the derivation of the name unclear) was the desert palace Hishām built 4 leagues from al-Raqqah in al-Jazīrah province to escape from the plague. See Le Strange, Lands, 106; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

Bukayr b. al-Shammākh was secretary to al-Walīd b. Yazīd.[775] Sālim, the mawlā of Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, was in charge of the correspondence department. Also among his secretaries was ʿAbdallāh b. Abī ʿAmr (some give his name as ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Abī ʿAmr). ʿAmr b. ʿUtbah was in charge of the caliphal residence.[776] [839] ʿAbdallāh b. Nuʿaym was secretary to Yazīd b. al-Walīd, [called] "the Reducer."[777] ʿAmr b. al-Ḥārith, a mawlā of the Banū Jumaḥ, was in charge of his registry department; Thābit b. Sulaymān b. Saʿd al-Khushanī (some say al-Rabīʿ b. ʿArʿarah al-Khushanī) was in charge of his correspondence department; and al-Naḍr b. ʿAmr, a Yemeni, was in charge of taxes and the bureau of the small seal for him.

The secretary of Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd[778] was Ibn Abī Jumʿah, who was in charge of the dīwān in Palestine for him.[779] The people swore allegiance to Ibrāhīm (b. al-Walīd), except the inhabitants of Ḥimṣ, who swore allegiance to Marwān b. Muḥammad al-Jaʿdī.

The secretaries of Marwān [b. Muḥammad][780] were ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Yaḥyā, mawlā of al-ʿAlāʾ b. Wahb al-ʿĀmirī, Muṣʿab b. al-Rabīʿ al-Khathʿamī, and Ziyād b. Abī al-Ward. ʿUthmān b. Qays, mawlā of Khālid al-Qasrī, was in charge of the correspondence department. Also among his secretaries were Makhlad b. Muḥammad b. al-Ḥārith, called Abū Hāshim, and Muṣʿab b. al-

775. Al-Walīd b. Yazīd ruled from 125/743 to 126/744.

776. For this meaning of ḥaḍrah, "presence," see Dozy, Supplément, I, 298.

777. Al-Nāqiṣ: Yazīd b. al-Walīd ruled for six months in 126/744. "His first act was to abolish the increase of the stipends to the Syrian troops granted by his predecessor" (Shaban, Islamic History, I, 155). He also curtailed large-scale public works—therefore the epithet.

778. Ibrāhīm b. al-Walīd succeeded his brother Yazīd and reigned for four months in 126/744, though his rule was not acknowledged by all factions. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 160.

779. A name appears to have fallen out of Ṭabarī's text. Al-Jahshiyārī reads: "The secretary of Ibrāhīm was Ibrāhīm b. Abī Jumʿah. Thābit b. Nuʿaym al-Judhāmī was in charge of the dīwān of Palestine." If the text of Ṭabarī was originally similar, one can explain why in the next sentence Ibrāhīm is identified as "b. al-Walīd," i.e., the caliph, not Ibrāhīm b. Abī Jumʿah, his secretary. See Latz, Das Buch der Wezire, 118–19.

780. Marwān b. Muḥammad succeeded to the throne in 127/744 and ruled until the fall of the Umayyad line in 132/750.

Rabīʿ al-Khathʿamī, called Abū Mūsā. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. Yaḥyā had a distinguished reputation for eloquence. Among his poetry that has been anthologized is the following:[781]

Something that will not return has departed; something that will not go away has taken its place.
How I grieve for the successor who has taken up its abode!
How I grieve for the predecessor who has departed!
I weep much over the one, and for the other I weep like a despondent woman bereft:
She weeps much because of a son of hers who has cut [the bond of relationship], and she weeps for a son of hers that has tied it fast.[782] [840] In her innermost heart she never ceases from tears and weeping.
The errors of youth's intoxication have come to an end;
fear of God has driven away falsehood's deviation.

The secretary of Abū al-ʿAbbās[783] was Khālid b. Barmak. Abū al-ʿAbbās entrusted his daughter Rayṭah to Khālid b. Barmak so that the latter's wife, Umm Khālid bint Yazīd, might nurse her while she was breast-feeding a daughter of Khālid's named Umm Yaḥyā; and Umm Salamah, the wife of Abū al-ʿAbbās, nursed Umm Yaḥyā, the daughter of Khālid, while she was breast-feeding her daughter Rayṭah. Ṣāliḥ b. al-Haytham, a mawlā of Rayṭah bint Abī al-ʿAbbās, was in charge of the correspondence department.

The secretary of Abū Jaʿfar al-Manṣūr[784] was ʿAbd al-Malik b. Ḥumayd, the mawlā of Ḥātim b. al-Nuʿmān al-Bāhilī, a Khurāsānian. Hāshim b. Saʿīd al-Juʿfī and ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. Abī Ṭalḥah of the Banū Tamīm were his secretaries in Wāsiṭ. It is said that 781. The first four lines are quoted in Ibn Nubātah, Sarḥ al-ʿuyūn, 241, where the second line has an interesting variation: "How I grieve for one who, having progeny, arrives! How I grieve for one preceding who has departed!" The metaphor of gray hair or old age as "having progeny" is powerful, but is not in the line as given in al-Ṭabarī.

782. I.e., one son who by departing has cut the ties and another who by remaining has tied them fast.

783. Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad, known as al-Saffāḥ, the first caliph of the ʿAbbāsid line, ruled from 132/749 to 136/754.

784. Abū Jaʿfar, known as al-Manṣūr, ruled from 136/754 to 158/775.

Sulaymān b. Makhlad was a secretary to Abū Ja'far. Among [the verses] that Abū Ja'far used to quote was the following:

Nothing relieves the mind like a firm decision, when some matter has been present too long in the mind.

Also among his secretaries were al-Rabī', and 'Umārah b. Ḥamzah, who was among the most distinguished men. The following is by him:

Never complain about a time when you enjoyed sound health:
in bodily health there is wealth!
Suppose you were the imām:[785] could you profit from the present world's ease if you were sick?

And he used to quote the words of the slave of the Banū al-Ḥasḥās:

Is the eye's tear shed because of Umayyah?
If only that had been known of you before today!
Let your eye not weep: time is full of change;
in it, friend from friend departs.

The secretary of al-Mahdī[786] was Abū 'Ubaydallāh; Abān b. Ṣadaqah was in charge of his correspondence department, and [841] Muḥammad b. Ḥamīd the Secretary was in charge of his military dīwān [dīwān al-jund]. There was also Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd, whom he appointed to be in charge of his vizierate and affairs. The following is by him:

I marvel greatly at the changing of affairs—now what one likes, now what one dislikes!
Time plays with men;
to it belong turns that run their course.

The following is by [Ya'qūb b. Dāwūd's] son, 'Abdallāh b. Ya'qūb, whose [sons] Muḥammad and Ya'qūb were both excellent poets:

Gray hair checked my vehemence and passion;
from my eyelids it drew a copious flow of tears.
Desiring to hide its visible appearance

785. I.e., the caliph, in his capacity as leader of the Islamic community.
786. Al-Mahdī, the third 'Abbāsid caliph, ruled from 158/775 to 169/785.

from my eyes, I tried something hopeless:
I colored what time had colored.
My coloring did not last, but time's coloring lasted.
Do not go so far away, O proud vigor of youth, from which I departed in years gone by!
What I have retained from those days is but as dreams that come by night.

The following is by his father:

Divorce the present world with a threefold divorce,[787] and take to wife another.
The world is an unfaithful wife who cares not who comes to her.

After him, al-Mahdī appointed al-Fayḍ b. Abī Ṣāliḥ vizier. He was a generous man.

The secretaries of Mūsā al-Hādī[788] were 'Ubaydallāh b. Ziyād b. Abī Laylā and Muḥammad b. Ḥamīd. One day, al-Mahdī asked 'Ubaydallāh's father about the poems of the Arabs; so he compiled [842] them for him. And he said, "The wisest of them is the saying of Ṭarafah b. al-'Abd":[789]

I see that the grave of the avaricious man, stingy with his property, is like the grave of the erring man who wastes [his property] in idleness.
You see two heaps of dirt on which there are mute slabs of hard stone.
I see that death chooses the generous, and selects the best of the tenacious niggard's property.
I see life as a treasure that diminishes each night:
and what the days and time diminish becomes spent.

787. In Islamic law, the formula of divorce must be repeated three times before witnesses. Hence, the expression, "a threefold divorce," came to be applied to anything done irrevocably.

788. Al-Mahdī's son, Mūsā b. Muḥammad, took the throne name of al-Hādī, and ruled from 169/785 to 170/786.

789. Ṭarafah b. al-'Abd was a pre-Islamic poet. The lines are from his Mu'allaqah (see Dīwān, 31–32), one of a collection of seven long pre-Islamic poems made by Ḥammād al-Rāwiyah, a famous reciter of ancient poetry who died ca. 156/772.

By your life, [I swear that] death, even when it does not hit the young man, is like a tether that has been left loose, but its end is in hand!

Also, his saying:

I see both of us: each one's friend wishes that what has slipped away from us might come back.
Thing was [joined] to thing; but time, which returns to separate what it joined, has separated it.

Also, the saying of Labīd:[790]

Indeed, you ask a man what he seeks:
whether it is a serious matter that must be accomplished, or error and vanity.
Verily, everything but God is vanity, and every pleasure must inevitably pass away.
I see that men know not what is destined for them:
yea, every man of sound judgment makes entreaty to God.

Also, the saying of al-Nābighah al-Ja'dī:[791]

Long was my acquaintance with youthful vigor and those who have it; and I encountered fearful things that turn one's locks white.
But I never found brothers to be other than companions, and I never found kin to be other than places of abode.
Do you not know how I have been afflicted by the loss of Muḥārib,[792] and how today neither I nor you have anything of him?

Also, the saying of Hudbah b. Khashram:[793]

---

790. Labīd b. Rabī'ah, the latest of the Mu'allaqāt poets, is said to have abjured poetry after his conversion to Islam and to have died early in the reign of Mu'āwiyah. See Nicholson, Literary History, 119–21; F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 126–27.

791. Al-Nābighah al-Ja'dī (Ḥibbān b. Qays) was born before Islam, but lived most of his life as a Muslim and died in 65/684. The last line of the poem is found in the Ḥamāsah of Abū Tammām, a famous early anthology of pre-Islamic and early Islamic poetry. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 245–47; M. Nallino, Le Poesie di an-Nābiġah al-Ğa'dī (Rome, 1953), 122, 124.

792. Muḥārib was the poet's son. The line is addressed to his wife.

793. Hudbah b. Khashram was a poet from the tribe of 'Udhrah, known for

I am not overly joyful if time gladdens me, nor am I impatient of its shifting changes.
[843] I do not seek evil when evil[794] leaves me alone, but when I am forced to do evil, I do it.
People do not know the truth about destiny:
Destiny will never offer them relief from what they dislike.
Destiny has a share in a young man's family and inherited possessions, like the notching of the cutter that separates.

Also, the saying of Ziyādah b. Zayd,[795] which 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān used to quote:

He remembered Umaymah from afar and returned to her after copious and long weeping.
Truly, the man who has experienced destiny and who does not fear the shifting of its mornings and evenings lacks understanding.
Are not destiny and the days as you see [them to be]:
loss of wealth, or parting from a beloved?
Of all that is to come you are the kinsman;
but you are no kinsman of anything that has gone away.
Something remote, while it is coming, is not like something [rapidly] approaching; neither is a past joy nearby.[796]

Also, the saying of Ibn Muqbil:[797]

When she saw how youth's vigor had altered, she wept for it:
and gray hair is the worst of these alterations.
Men's care is life; but I think its "chaste" love poetry. See Ibn Qutaybah, al-Shi'r wa-al-shu'arā', 434–38; F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 265–66.

---

794. Sharr, meaning both "evil" and "violence."

795. Another poet from the tribe of 'Udhrah. See F. Sezgin, GAS, II, 266.

796. Another possible translation: "There is nothing far that does not come, as if it were rapidly advancing; neither is a past joy nearby." The version in Ibn Qutaybah, al-Shi'r wa-al-shu'arā', 437–38, reads: "All that is coming and going to occur is not remote; neither is a past joy nearby."

797. The lines are also attributed to al-Akhṭal, cf. al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, 3:14.

long life only increases weariness.
If you are in need of treasures, you will find no treasure like good works.

Yaḥyā b. Khālid [b. Barmak] served as [al-Hādī's] vizier; his son, Ja'far b. Yaḥyā b. Khālid, served as al-Rashīd's[798] vizier. Among his attractive sayings is: "Writing is the badge of wisdom; by it, wisdom's beads are separated and its scattered parts are strung together." Thumāmah said: "I said to Ja'far b. Yaḥyā, 'What is clarity (bayān)?' He said, 'That the word encompass your meaning, communicate your intention, be free of ambiguity, and not require that one call on the aid of thought to gather its intention.'" Al-Aṣma'ī[799] said: "I heard Yaḥyā b. Khālid say, 'The present world is vicissitude; wealth is a loan. We have an example in those who were before us; and in us there will be a lesson to those who come after us.'"

We will name the remaining secretaries of the 'Abbāsids when we reach the 'Abbāsid dynasty, God willing!

---

798. Hārūn al-Rashīd ruled from 170/786 to 193/809.

799. Al-Aṣma'ī (d. 213/828) was a philologist active at the court of Hārūn al-Rashīd. See EI^{2}, s.v.; Nicholson, Literary History, 345.

[844]

The Events of the Year 73

(MAY 23, 692–MAY 12, 693)

Among major events was the death of ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr.

A Description of [the Death of Ibn al-Zubayr]

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Muḥammad b. Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā—ʿUbaydallāh b. al-Qibṭiyyah, who said: The war between Ibn al-Zubayr and al-Ḥajjāj took place for six months and seventeen nights in the hollow[800] of Mecca.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—Muṣʿab b. Thābit—Nāfiʿ, a mawlā of the Banū Asad knowledgeable about the civil unrest (fitnah) of Ibn al-Zubayr, who said: Ibn al-Zubayr was besieged the night of the new moon of Dhū al-Qaʿdah in the year 72; he was killed on the seventeenth of Jumādā I in the year

800. Baṭn, the central part of the valley in which Mecca is built. See EI^{2}, s.v. Makka.

73.[801] Al-Ḥajjāj besieged Ibn al-Zubayr for eight[802] months and seventeen nights.

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Muḥammad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā—Yūsuf b. Māhak, who said: I saw the trebuchet (manjanīq)[803] with which [stones] were being hurled. The sky was thundering and lightning, and the sound of thunder and lightening rose above that of the stones, so that it masked it. The Syrians considered this ominous [845] and withheld their hands. But al-Ḥajjāj, having lifted the skirt of his tunic and tucked it into his belt, picked up the trebuchet stone and loaded it. "Shoot," he said; and he himself shot with them. [Continuing,] he said: During the morning, a thunderbolt struck and was followed by a second, killing twelve of his men. The Syrians became discouraged, but al-Ḥajjāj said, "Men of Syria, do not consider this extraordinary. I am a native of Tihāmah:[804] these are the thunderbolts of Tihāmah. Behold, victory has come! Rejoice; the enemy will be afflicted even as you have been." The next day, there was lightning, and a number of Ibn al-Zubayr's men were struck. Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Don't you see that they are being hit? You are in a state of obedience; they are in a state of disobedience."[805]

Thus, the war between Ibn al-Zubayr and al-Ḥajjāj continued until shortly before Ibn al-Zubayr's death, by which time the latter's companions had separated themselves from him and most 801. I.e., the siege began on March 25, 692, and Ibn al-Zubayr was killed on October 4, 692.

802. Thus in the text, despite the fact that the period from Dhū al-Qa'dah to Jumādā I is only six months. The parallel passage in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 368, reads: "He was killed on a Tuesday in Jumādā II in the year 73. The siege lasted six months and seventeen nights. . . . Ibn al-Zubayr was killed when he was seventy-three years old." Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 321 has: "Tuesday, the seventeenth of Jumādā II in the year 73."

803. For a description of the siege engine, a traction trebuchet, see *EI*², s.v. Manḏjanīḳ.

804. Tihāmah is the Red Sea coastal plain of the Arabian peninsula.

805. Cf. the account in Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 362 (from 'Awānah), where al-Ḥajjāj not only gives the naturalistic explanation that thunderstorms are frequent in Tihāmah, but adds: "Let what you see not frighten you. When the ancients used to sacrifice, a fire would be sent down to consume it; and that was a sign that the sacrifice had been accepted."

of the people of Mecca had gone out to al-Ḥajjāj under a promise of safety.

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—[Muḥammad] b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Isḥāq b. 'Abdallāh—al-Mundhir b. Jahm al-Asadī, who said: I saw Ibn al-Zubayr the day he was killed. His companions had separated themselves from him, and those on his side had abandoned him in large numbers and had started going out to al-Ḥajjāj: finally, about ten thousand went out to him. It is also mentioned that Ibn al-Zubayr's two sons, Ḥamzah and Khubayb, were among those who left him and went out to al-Ḥajjāj. They received a promise of safety for themselves from [al-Ḥajjāj].

Then Ibn al-Zubayr went to see his mother, Asmā'.[806] According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Abū al-Zinād—Makhra-[846] mah b. Sulaymān al-Wālibī: When he saw how the people were forsaking him, Ibn al-Zubayr went to see his mother. "Mother," he said, "the people have forsaken me, even my two sons and my family. With me there remain only a few people who do not have the endurance to defend themselves more than a short time. The enemy, however, will grant me whatever I desire from this present world. What is your advice?" She said, "You, my son, know yourself best. If you know you are right and have been advocating what is right, persevere for it, for your companions have been killed while in the right. Do not enable the young men [ghilmān] of the Banū Umayyah to make sport of you.[807] But If you only desire the present world, what a bad servant [of God] you are!—you have undone yourself and undone those who were killed fighting on your side. For you to say, 'I was right, but when my companions grew feeble, I became weak,' is not what free men or men of religion do. How long is your stay in this world? Death is better!"

Ibn al-Zubayr approached and kissed her head, saying, "This, by God, is what I think. I swear by Him to Whom I have been sum-

806. She was the daughter of Abū Bakr.

807. Cf. another version of this scene (Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 364), in which Ibn al-Zubayr spells out his fear that after killing him, the Syrians may mutilate his body and crucify it. Al-Ḥajjāj is reported to have exposed the headless body of Ibn al-Zubayr on a cross (ibid., 368–70).

moning men until this very day, I have not inclined to the present world or loved life in it. Only indignation on behalf of God, that His sacred territory not be profaned, moved me to come out [to do what I did].[808] But I wanted to know your mind; and you have increased my firmness of belief. Behold, mother, I shall be killed this very day. Let your grief not be great. Submit to God's command. For your son intended to do nothing dishonorable or indecent: he did not act unjustly in applying God's ordinance, he betrayed no trust, and he intended to wrong no Muslim or confederate.[809] When informed of wrongdoing on the part of my agents, I never approved; rather, I disapproved of it. I have never preferred [847] anything to the approval of my Lord. O God, I do not say this to justify myself by myself—Thou knowest me best! I say it to comfort my mother, that she may endure my loss with patience." His mother said, "I pray God that I may endure your loss with good patience, if you precede me; and if I precede you, may there be [patient endurance] of my loss. Go out, that I may see how your cause proceeds." He said, "God grant you a good reward, mother. And do not cease praying for me before and after." She said, "I will never cease. Whoever may have been killed while in error, you will have been killed while in the right!" Then she said, "O God, have mercy on this long night vigil, this weeping and thirst in the midday summer heat of Medina and Mecca, and on his piety toward his father and me. O God, I have yielded him to Thy command concerning him, and am content with what Thou hast decreed; reward me for 'Abdallāh with the reward of those who are patient and thankful." According to Muṣ'ab b. Thābit: She survived him by only ten days—some say five.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Mūsā b. Ya'qūb b. 'Abdallāh—his paternal uncle, who said: When Ibn al-Zubayr went before his mother, he was wearing a mailed coat and a protective head covering (mighfar). He stood and greeted her, then drew near, took her hand, and kissed it. She said, "This is farewell; do not be far away!"[810] Ibn al-Zubayr said, "I have come

808. Khurūj ("coming out") also has the sense of "rebel."

809. Mu'āhid: a non-Muslim who has a treaty of protection from the Muslims. See Lane, Lexicon, V, 2184.

810. Ba'uda, "to be/go far away," is used in elegies as a euphemism for "die."

to say farewell. I think this is the last day that will pass for me of this world. Know, mother, that if I am killed, I am only flesh; what is done to me will not harm me." She said, "You are right, my son. Persevere in your firm belief, and do not give Ibn Abī 'Aqīl[811] power over you. Come near me, so that I can bid you [848] farewell." He came near her, kissed her, and embraced her. When she felt[812] the chain mail, she said, "This is not the action of someone who intends what you intend." He said, "I put on this chain mail only to give you strength." The old woman said, "It gives me no strength." So he took it off. Then he rolled up his sleeves, gathered up the bottom of his shirt (there was a coat [jubbah] of mixed silk and wool[813] under the shirt), and tucked the bottom of it into his belt, while his mother said, "Put on your garments with the skirts tucked up!"[814] Then Ibn al-Zubayr left, saying:

I, when I know my day [has come], bear it with patience;
others, when they know [theirs has come], find fault.

Hearing what he had said, the old woman said, "Be steadfast, by God, God willing! Your [fore]father[s] are Abū Bakr and al-Zubayr, and your [grand]mother Ṣafiyyah bint 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib."[815]

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Thawr b. Yazīd—a shaykh from Ḥimṣ who was present at Ibn al-Zubayr's battle with the Syrians, who said: I saw him on Tuesday. We men of Ḥimṣ would go up against him in groups of five hundred by a gate that was ours, which we would enter, and which no one but us would enter. He

---

The fuller version of the scene given by Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 364, implies another meaning: "Be/go not far away, save from the fire [of hell]." I.e., may you be close to heaven.

811. I.e., al-Ḥajjāj, so named after his grandfather.

812. Cf. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 365 (from Abū Mikhnaf). She was blind and therefore was not aware of the chain mail until she embraced her son.

813. Khazz refers to a mixture of silk and wool, sometimes to (coarsely woven?) silk. See Lane, Lexicon, II, 731.

814. I.e., "Be ready to act with vigor." See Lane, Lexicon, IV, 1595.

815. Through his mother, Asmā' bint Abī Bakr, 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr was the grandson of Abū Bakr, the first caliph. Through his father, al-Zubayr b. al-'Awwām, he had as his grandmother the Prophet's aunt, Ṣafiyyah bint 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib.

came out to meet us by himself, coming after us when we were retreating from him. I have not forgotten a rajaz poem of his:

I, when I know my day [has come], bear it with patience—only the free man knows his two days!
Others, when they know [theirs has come], find fault.

I said, "By God, you are a man free and noble!" I have seen him standing in the lowest part of the hollow. No one would approach him, so that we thought he would not be killed.

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Muṣ'ab b. Thābit—Nāfi', a mawlā of the Banū Asad, who said: I saw the gates[816] filled with Syrians on Tuesday, and Ibn al-Zubayr's forces gave up the watch stations.[817] The enemy outnumbered them and set men, a commander, and troops from one country at every gate: troops from Ḥimṣ held the gate facing the door of the Ka'bah; troops from Damascus held the Banū Shaybah Gate; troops from the Jordan held the Ṣafā Gate; troops from Palestine held the Banū Jumaḥ Gate; and troops from Qinnasrīn held the Banū Sahm Gate. Al-Ḥajjāj and Ṭāriq b. 'Amr were together between the lowest part of the hollow (al-Abṭaḥ) and al-Marwah. Ibn al-Zubayr would attack sometimes in one area, sometimes in another: it was as if he were a lion in a thicket, the men not venturing to attack him. He would assault the troops holding a gate and would dislodge them, while reciting the rajaz verse: [849]

I, when I know my day [has come], bear it with patience—
only the free man knows his two days!

Then he would shout, "Abū Ṣafwān![818] What a victory, if only there were men for it!

If my opponent were one man, I would take care of him!"[819]

Ibn Ṣafwān said, "Yes, by God, and a thousand, too!"

---

816. I.e., the gates of the Great Mosque.
817. Maḥāris, pl. of maḥras, see Dozy, Supplément, I, 270.
818. Abū Ṣafwān is 'Abdallāh b. Ṣafwān b. Umayyah al-Jumaḥī. For his death in the fighting, see below, Ṭabarī, II, 852.
819. The verse is by Duwayd b. Zayd. See Ibn Sallām, Ṭabaqāt al-shu'arā', 32.

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar [al-Wāqidī]—Ibn Abī al-Zinād and Abū Bakr b. 'Abdallāh b. Muṣ'ab—Abū al-Mundhir,[820] and also according to Nāfi', a mawlā of the Banū Asad, both of whom said: The morning of Tuesday, the seventeenth of Jumādā I, in the year 73, al-Ḥajjāj [850] seized the gates from Ibn al-Zubayr. Ibn al-Zubayr had spent most of the night praying. Then he sat with his legs braced against his belly with the shoulder belts of his sword[821] and slept lightly. He awoke at dawn and said, "Give the call to prayer, Sa'd." The latter thereupon gave the call to prayer beside the Maqām.[822] Ibn al-Zubayr performed the ablutions and prayed the two prostrations of the morning (fajr) prayer. Then he came forward. The muezzin gave the second call to prayer.[823] Ibn al-Zubayr led his companions in prayer, and recited the Sūra of the Pen,[824] word by word. Then, having pronounced the salutation,[825] he stood up, praised and extolled God, and said, "Uncover your faces, so that I can look [at you]." (They had on neck protectors [mighfar] and turbans.) When they had uncovered their faces, he said, "Family of al-Zubayr, if you give yourselves up willingly for me, we shall be people of a distinguished house among the Arabs. We shall have been extirpated for the sake of God, but no calamity will have afflicted us. And now, O family of al-Zubayr, let sword blows not frighten you. Whenever I have been present at a battle field, I have been carried away wounded from among the slain; and I have found the treatment of sword wounds to be worse than the pain of the sword's blow. Guard your swords as you guard your faces. I know of no man who ever broke his sword and saved his life. If a man loses his sword, he is as defenseless as a woman. Pay no attention to the glittering swords; let each man engage his adversary. Let no question about me distract you, and do not say, 'Where is 'Abdal-

820. Abū al-Mundhir is Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī (ed. Leiden, Addenda, p. DCLXXV).

821. For a description of this posture, called iḥtibā', see Lane, Lexicon, II, 507.

822. On the Station (Maqām, or Maqām Ibrāhīm), see note 239.

823. The iqāmah, which is given just before the commencement of public prayer. See Dozy, Supplément, II, 432.

824. Sūra 68 of the Qur'ān.

825. Each of the five daily prayers ends with a twofold salutation ("Peace be upon you, and the mercy of God") addressed to the guardian angels.

lāh b. al-Zubayr?' But if anyone asks about me, I am in the front ranks:[826]

The time has come for Ibn Salmā not to remain, but to meet destiny, whichever way he turn.
I will not buy life at the cost of disgrace, nor climb a ladder for fear of death.[827]

Attack, with God's blessing!" then he attacked [the enemy] and got as far as al-Ḥajūn. A brick was hurled at him and struck him [851] in the face; he was shaken by it, and his face began bleeding. When he felt the warmth of the blood flowing on his face and beard, he said:[828]

Not on our heels do our wounds bleed:
on the front of our feet the blood is visible!

Then [the enemy] gathered together against him.

[Continuing,] both said: An insane freedwoman (mawlāh) of ours cried out, "Alas for the Commander of the Faithful!" [Continuing,] both said: She had seen him where he fell. She pointed him out to them, and so he was killed. He was wearing garments of a mixture of silk and wool.

When the news reached al-Ḥajjāj, he prostrated himself. Together with Ṭāriq b. 'Amr, he went and stood over him. Ṭāriq said, "Women have borne none manlier than he." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Will you praise one who disobeys the Commander of the Faithful?" "Yes," said Ṭāriq, "he has freed us from blame; were it not for this, we would have no excuse.[829] We have been besieging him for

826. The lines, from a poem by al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥumām, can be found in the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt (no. 12), 230–31, where the first line reads: "There restrains Ibn Salmā [from love of this world] the fact that he will not remain, but will meet destiny...."

827. Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 367 (from Abū Mikhnaf and 'Awānah) reports that Ibn al-Zubayr's remaining supporters suggested that he climb onto the roof of the Ka'bah while they fought around the building to the death in his defense—hence the reference to "climbing a ladder."

828. The line, part of a qaṣīdah by the pre-Islamic poet al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥumām, can be found in the Ḥamāsah, 93. It puns on the fact that in Arabic "heel" ('aqib) has the same root as "to turn on one's heels, retreat" (a'qaba), while "foot" (qadam) shares the same root as "To go forward, be bold" (aqdama).

829. The idea is that by his bravery, Ibn al-Zubayr has made praise of him allowable even for the followers of 'Abd al-Malik.

seven months. He had no defensive trench,[830] no fortress, no stronghold; yet he held his own against us as an equal, and even got the better of us whenever we met with him." Their words were reported to ʿAbd al-Malik, who declared Ṭāriq right.

According to ʿUmar [b. Shabbah]—Abū al-Ḥasan [al-Madāʾinī]—his authorities, one of whom said: It is as if I could still see Ibn al-Zubayr when he had killed a young black lad. He struck him, hamstringing him, and as he continued his attack on him, he said, "Patience, son of Ham! In such situations the noble endure patiently."

According to al-Ḥārith [b. Muḥammad]—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar [al-Wāqidī]—ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. ʿUmārah—ʿAbd-[852] allāh b. Abī Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm, who said: Al-Ḥajjāj sent the heads of Ibn al-Zubayr, ʿAbdallāh b. Ṣafwān, and ʿUmārah b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm to Medina, where they were displayed; then they were taken to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān. Al-Ḥajjāj entered Mecca and received the oath of allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān from the [members of] Quraysh there.

According to Abū Jaʿfar [sc. al-Ṭabarī]: In this year, ʿAbd al-Malik appointed Ṭāriq, the mawlā of ʿUthmān, governor of Medina. He served as its governor for five months.

Bishr b. Marwān died this year, according to al-Wāqidī. Others say that his death took place in the year 74.

[ʿAbd al-Malik and the Khārijites]

Also in this year, according to what is mentioned, ʿAbd al-Malik sent ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar to fight Abū Fudayk, ordering him to call up anyone he wanted from the two garrison cities to go with him. ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh went to al-Kūfah and called up its people; ten thousand answered his call. Then he went to al-Baṣrah and called up its people; ten thousand answered his call.[831] Having issued them their provisions and given them their stipends, ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh marched forth with them. He placed the Kūfans, led by Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah, on the right wing; he placed the Baṣrans, led by his brother's son, ʿUmar b. Mūsā b. ʿUbaydallāh, on the left wing; and he placed

830. Mss. O, B, and Co read, "army," instead of "defensive trench."
831. This sentence is omitted in Mss. O, B, and Co.

his horsemen in the middle. When they reached al-Baḥrayn, ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh lined up his forces. He put the foot soldiers in front: they held short lances (rimāḥ) that they set in the ground, and they shielded themselves with saddle pads. Abū Fudayk and his forces attacked like a single man and routed ʿUmar b. ʿUbay- [853] dallāh's left wing, so that all scattered except al-Mughīrah b. al-Muhallab, Maʿn b. al-Mughīrah, Mujjāʿah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, and the most skillful fighters. The latter turned to the ranks of the Kūfans, who held fast. ʿUmar b. Mūsā b. ʿUbaydallāh was left wounded. He was among the slain and had been badly wounded. When the Baṣrans saw that the Kūfans had not fled, they felt ashamed and returned to the fight, although they had no commander. When they reached the wounded ʿUmar b. Mūsā b. ʿUbaydallāh, they carried him, until they brought him into the camp of the Khārijites. There was a great deal of straw there. They set fire to it, and the wind turned against the Khārijites. The Kūfans and Baṣrans attacked, plundered their camp, killed Abū Fudayk, and besieged them in al-Mushaqqar.[832] The Khārijites submitted to judgment. According to what has been mentioned, ʿUmar b. ʿUbaydallāh put about six thousand of them to death and took eight hundred captive. They found Umayyah b. ʿAbdallāh's slave girl pregnant by Abū Fudayk. Then they returned to al-Baṣrah.

[Bishr b. Marwān Becomes Governor of al-Baṣrah]

In this year, ʿAbd al-Malik removed Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh from al-Baṣrah and appointed his [own] brother, Bishr b. Marwān, its governor. Thus, the governorship of both it and al-Kūfah came to be his. When Bishr was appointed governor of al-Baṣrah in addition to al-Kūfah, he went to al-Baṣrah and left ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth as his deputy in charge of al-Kūfah.

[Campaigns against the Byzantines]

In this year, Muḥammad b. Marwān campaigned during the summer and defeated the Byzantines. ʿUthmān b. al-Walīd's attack on the Byzantines in the region of Armenia is said to have taken place in this year. He had four thousand men, the Byzantines sixty thousand, but he defeated them and killed many of them.

832. Al-Mushaqqar was an ancient fortress in al-Baḥrayn. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, s.v.

[Those in Office during the Year]

During this year, the pilgrimage was led by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, [854] who was in charge of Mecca, Yemen, and al-Yamāmah. According to al-Wāqidī, Bishr b. Marwān was in charge of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah; others say that Bishr b. Marwān was in charge of al-Kūfah, and that Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd was in charge of al-Baṣrah. Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah, and Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah. Bukayr b. Wishāḥ was in charge of Khurāsān.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXII

The Marwānid Restoration

TRANSLATED BY EVERETT K. ROWSON

The Events of the Year [854]

74

(MAY 13, 693–MAY 1, 694)

The Important Events of This Year

Among the events of this year: 'Abd al-Malik dismissed Ṭāriq b. 'Amr[1] from Medina and appointed as its governor al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf.[2] It is reported that the latter came to Medina, stayed there a month, and then left to perform the lesser pilgrimage ('umrah).[3]

In this year, it is reported, al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf dismantled the structures of the Ka'bah that Ibn al-Zubayr had put up. The latter had incorporated the Ḥijr inside the Ka'bah and given the Ka'bah two doors; al-Ḥajjāj restored it to its original form.[4] He then went

1. Governor since 72 (691–692) or 73 (692–693), after taking the city from the governor of the rival caliph Ibn al-Zubayr in Mecca; see text above, II, 834, 852.

2. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh (Najaf), 294, 298; Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 67f., 188f.; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdjādj b. Yūsuf; J. Périer, La vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj ibn Yousof (Paris, 1904), 54ff. As commander of the Umayyad forces, al-Ḥajjāj had, the previous year, with the assistance of Ṭāriq b. 'Amr, successfully besieged Ibn al-Zubayr in Mecca, and been appointed governor there; he was now given the governorship of Medina as well. See text above, II, 844–52, 853–54.

3. The "lesser pilgrimage" to Mecca can be performed at any time of year; see SEI, s.v. 'umra.

4. The Ḥijr is a semicircular area adjoining the Ka'bah wall, whose special back to Medina, in Ṣafar (June-July), and stayed there three months, treating the people of Medina harshly and arbitrarily. He built a mosque there, in the area of the Banū Salimah, which is still known by his name.[5] He treated the companions of the Messenger of God with contempt, forcing them to wear seals around their necks.[6]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar[7]—Ibn Abī Dhi'b: Someone saw Jābir b. 'Abdallāh[8] with a seal on his hand. According to Ibn [855] Abī Dhi'b: Isḥāq b. Yazīd saw Anas b. Mālik[9] with a seal around his neck; al-Ḥajjāj did that to humiliate him.

According to Ibn 'Umar—Shuraḥbīl b. Abī 'Awn—his father: I was there when al-Ḥajjāj sent for Sahl b. Sa'd[10] and asked him, "What was it that prevented you from supporting the Commander of the Faithful 'Uthmān b. 'Affān?" He replied, "But I did!" Al-Ḥajjāj said, "You are lying!" Then he ordered a lead seal put on his neck.

In this year, according to al-Wāqidī, 'Abd al-Malik appointed Abū Idrīs al-Khawlānī as judge.[11] sanctity is variously explained; most often it is identified as the burial place of Ishmael and Hagar. See EI², s.v. Ka'ba. On Ibn al-Zubayr's construction, see text above, II, 592. On al-Ḥajjāj's reconstruction, see also Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah (Leipzig), 145f.; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 268; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Leiden), 47; Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl (Leiden), 321; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh (Leiden), II, 325; Theophanes, Chronographia, A. M. 6183; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil (Leiden), IV, 365; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah (Cairo, 1932), IX, 2–3.

---

5. The Banū Salimah b. Sa'd were a clan of the Khazraj; see 'U. Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab (Damascus, 1949), II, 537. Later geographical writers do not mention this mosque.

6. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 68: al-Ḥajjāj put seals on the hands of Jābir b. 'Abdallāh and others, "as is done with the dhimmah." On the use of seals to indicate payment of taxes among *dhimmī*s, and corresponding practices among Byzantines and Sasanians, see M. Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest (Princeton, 1984), 112f.

7. Abū 'Abdallāh Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī, d. 207 (823); see EI¹, s.v. al-Wāḳidī.

8. D. 78 (697); see F. Sezgin, GAS, I, 85; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 22.

9. D. c. 91 (708); see EI², s.v. Anas b. Mālik. In 65 (684) he had led the prayer in al-Baṣrah at the behest of Ibn al-Zubayr; see text above, II, 465. According to Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd (Cairo, 1940), V, 36–41, al-Ḥajjāj's further abuse of Anas two years later, in al-Baṣrah, prompted the latter to write a letter of complaint to 'Abd al-Malik, who was furious with al-Ḥajjāj and forced him to apologize; a variant of this story appears also in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 385–87.

10. D. 88 (706–707) or 91 (709–710); see Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb (Hyderabad), IV, 252.

11. In Damascus; see EI², s.v. al-Khawlānī.

In this year, according to some reports, Bishr b. Marwān left al-Kūfah for al-Baṣrah, to become governor there.[12]

In this year, al-Muhallab was entrusted by 'Abd al-Malik with the war against the Azraqites.[13]

Al-Muhallab and the War against the Azraqites

When Bishr had arrived in al-Baṣrah, 'Abd al-Malik sent him the following letter, according to Hishām[14]—Abū Mikhnaf[15]—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq—his father:

> Send forth al-Muhallab against the Azraqites with the men of his garrison and have him select from among them the best horsemen and the most distinguished, capable and experienced among them, for he knows them best. Let him follow his own judgment in conducting the campaign, for I have total confidence in his experience and his concern for the welfare of the Muslims. Send out also a large force of Kūfans, and appoint as their leader a well-known and respected man, of pure and noble lineage, someone known for his strength, courage, and experience in battle. Mobilize the men of these two garrisons against the Azraqites and have them pursue them wherever they go, until God annihilates and exterminates them. Peace. [856]

Bishr summoned al-Muhallab, gave him the letter to read, and

---

12. Bishr was 'Abd al-Malik's brother. He had been governor of al-Kūfah for three years. According to some reports, his move to al-Baṣrah, or at least his additional appointment as governor there, replacing Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, occurred in 73 (692–693); see text above, II, 852–54. See also Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ (Hyderabad), VI, 313f.; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 268, 294; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 178, and XI, 26; EI², s.v. Bishr b. Marwān.

13. The Azraqites were extremist Khārijites, originally followers of Nāfi' b. al-Azraq (d. 65 [685]); at this time they were led by Qaṭarī b. al-Fujā'ah. They had been defeated at al-Ahwāz and driven back to Fārs by Khālid b. 'Abdallāh in 72 (691–692); earlier, al-Muhallab had fought against them for both Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr and 'Abd al-Malik. See text above, II, 583ff., 765, 822ff. See also Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VI, 314–19; Mubarrad, Kāmil (Leipzig), 662ff.; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 365–67; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 3; EI¹, s.v. al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufra; EI², s.v. Azāriḳa.

14. Hishām b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī, d. c. 204 (819); see EI², s.v. al-Kalbī.

15. D. 157 (774); see EI², s.v. Abū Mikhnaf; U. Sezgin, Abū Miḥnaf (Leiden, 1971).

ordered him to select whomever he wished. Al-Muhallab sent Juday' b. Sa'īd b. Qabīṣah b. Sarrāq al-Azdī, who was the maternal uncle of his son Yazīd, ordering him to go to the military roll (dīwān)[16] and select the men. Bishr was annoyed that the command had been given to al-Muhallab by 'Abd al-Malik, so that he was unable to send out someone else;[17] this caused him as much resentment against al-Muhallab as if the latter had done him a personal injury. Bishr b. Marwān then summoned 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf[18] and sent him to the Kūfans, ordering him to select the best horsemen and the most distinguished, capable and courageous of the men.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—men of the tribe—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf: Bishr b. Marwān summoned me and said: "You know the position you enjoy with me and the preferment I have shown you. Now I have decided to put you in charge of the army, basing my decision on what I know of your courage, capability, nobility, and boldness. I expect you to live up to my good opinion of you. See that such-and-such happens to al-Muhallab; take over his command completely, accepting neither his advice nor his opinion; belittle his abilities and make much of his shortcomings." He neglected to give me any counsel about the troops, fighting the enemy, or seeing to the welfare of the Muslims, but kept on trying to incite me against my clansman[19]—as if I were a dunce or someone who could be treated like a child or a fool! Never have I seen someone make an appeal to a respectable man of my appearance and position like the appeal this boy made to me! 'Amr has outgrown the neck-ring![20] When Bishr saw that I [857] did not respond with alacrity, he said, "What is the matter?" I replied, "May God be good to you! Do I have any choice but to carry out your orders, whether willingly or reluctantly?" "Go, 16. See EI², s.v. dīwān.

17. Mubarrad, Kāmil, 663, names Bishr's preference as 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar, who had recently defeated the Khārijite Abū Fudayk; see text above, II, 852f.

18. Great-uncle of Abū Mikhnaf; see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 225, n. 128; Kh. Ziriklī, al-A'lām (Cairo, 1953–59), IV, 111.

19. Both men belonged to the tribe of Azd.

20. I.e., "How childish of him!" See Maydānī, Majma' al-amthāl (Cairo, 1342), II, 75; Tha'ālibī, Thimār al-qulūb (Cairo, 1908), 505.

then," he said, "and have a safe trip." I bade him farewell and withdrew.

Al-Muhallab then set out with the Baṣran forces and proceeded as far as Rāmhurmuz, where he found the Khārijites; he then entrenched himself there. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf set out with the Kūfans, accompanied by the following commanders: Bishr b. Jarīr, in charge of the quarter of the Medinese; Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays, in charge of the quarter of the Tamīm and Hamdān; Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, in charge of the quarter of the Kindah and Rabī'ah; and Zaḥr b. Qays, in charge of the quarter of the Madhḥij and Asad.[21] 'Abd al-Raḥmān marched out and encamped about a mile (mīl)[22] or a mile and a half from al-Muhallab, so that the two armies were within sight of each other at Rāmhurmuz. But then, only ten days later, word came to the men of the death of Bishr b. Marwān in al-Baṣrah, and many from the forces of both al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah deserted.[23] Bishr was replaced by Khālid b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd,[24] whose deputy over al-Kūfah was 'Amr b. Ḥurayyith.[25]

Among the Kūfan deserters were Zaḥr b. Qays, Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf sent his son Ja'far after them. Ja'far brought back Isḥāq and Muḥammad—Zaḥr b. Qays eluded him—and confined them for two days, then charged them not to part from him. But they stayed only one day before leaving again, taking a different route. They were pursued without success, and kept moving until they caught up with Zaḥr b. Qays in al-Ahwāz, where many of the men who were heading for al-

---

21. Mubarrad, Kāmil, 664, specifies a force of two thousand men from each quarter, but garbles the names of two of the commanders. For the division of the Kūfan army into quarters, see text above, II, 131, 644, 701; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 245.

22. A mīl is a third of a farsakh, or about two kilometers. See W. Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte (Leiden, 1970), 63.

23. According to al-Wāqidī, Bishr died in 73 (692–693); see text above, II, 852.

24. An Umayyad (Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah [1948], 104), he had already been governor of al-Baṣrah, until replaced by Bishr; see text above, II, 818, and notes 12, 13 above.

25. He retained this position, having already been deputized by Bishr when the latter transferred to al-Kūfah; see text above, II, 853. 'Amr had earlier served as deputy in al-Kūfah for Ziyād b. Abīhi and his son 'Ubaydallāh as well; see text above, II, 115, 459ff.

[858] Baṣrah came together. When word of this reached Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, he wrote a letter to the men and sent an emissary to bring them to their senses and make them return. One of his clients brought the letter and read it out to the men, who had been assembled to hear it:

> In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. From Khālid b. 'Abdallāh to those Muslims and believers whom this letter of mine reaches. Greetings. To you I offer praise of God; there is no god but He. The matter: God has imposed the duty of jihād on His servants, and required obedience to those who govern them. He who participates in jihād does so only to his own benefit, but he who gives up jihād for God will be forsaken by God. Moreover, he who defies the governors and rightful authorities brings down God's wrath on himself, merits corporal punishment, and makes himself liable to confiscation of his property as spoil, cancellation of his stipend ('atā'),[26] and exile to the most remote and evil of lands. O Muslims! Know who it is whom you have so boldly defied! It is 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, the Commander of the Faithful, a man with no weaknesses, from whom rebels can expect no indulgence! On the one who defies him falls his whip, and on the one who opposes him falls his sword! I spare no pains to warn you! Do not pave the way to your own destruction! Servants of God! Return to your assigned places[27] and to the obedience of your caliph, and persist no longer in your defiance and opposition, lest you be afflicted with what you would avoid. I swear by God that after this letter of mine any rebel that I find I will surely slay, God willing. Peace and God's mercy be upon you.

As Khālid's client read out this letter to them, every line or two Zaḥr interrupted to say, "Get to the point!" He replied, "By God, I hear the words of a man who does not want to understand what he hears! I bear witness that he has not the slightest interest in [859] what is in this letter!"[28] Zaḥr then said to him, "Read, then, what

---

26. See EI², s.v. 'aṭā'.

27. Maktab; see Dozy, Supplément, s.v.; WKAS, s.v. Some MSS read amkinah, "places."

28. Lā ya'īju bi-shay' mimmā fī hādhā al-kitāb. Other MSS read lā tahīju fitnah you were commanded to, you pale-faced slave, and then go back to your own people. You have no idea how we feel." The client finished reading the letter, but the men paid no attention to what was in it. Zaḥr, Isḥāq b. Muḥammad, and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān set off and camped at a village belonging to the Ash'ath clan, near al-Kūfah. They sent the following letter to 'Amr b. Ḥurayyith:

> When the men heard of the death of the amīr—may God have mercy on him—they dispersed, not one remaining with us. We have come now to the amīr and to our garrison, but prefer not to enter al-Kūfah without informing the amīr and receiving his permission.

'Amr b. Ḥurayyith wrote back:

> You have abandoned your assigned places and come here in rebellion and disobedience. You have from us neither permission nor safe conduct.

When they received this reply, they waited until night, then entered their lodgings, and remained there until the arrival of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf.

In this year, 'Abd al-Malik dismissed Bukayr b. Wishāḥ from Khurāsān and appointed as governor there Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd.[29]

The Reason for the Dismissal of Bukayr and Appointment of Umayyah

According to Abū al-Ḥasan,[30] Bukayr b. Wishāḥ ruled as governor illā kunta ra'sahā—"whenever there is internal strife, you are always at the head of it!"

---

29. See Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VI, 288–90; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 297 (year 73 [692–693]); Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 416, and Ansāb, IVB, 152–54, 164–66; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 324, and Buldān, (BGA, VII), 299; Gardīzī, Zayn al-akhbār (Tehran, 1374 solar), 108f. (year 72 [691–692], but very garbled); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 367f.; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 3; EI², s.v. Bukayr b. Wishāḥ. C. E. Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs (Rome, 1968), 49, notes a dirham minted by Umayyah in Sijistān, dated 73 (692–693).

30. Abū al-Ḥasan 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī, d. c. 228 (843); see EI², s.v. al-Madā'inī.

of Khurāsān for two years until Umayyah arrived to take over the post; for Ibn Khāzim was killed in the year 72 (691–692), and Umayyah arrived in the year 74 (693–694). The reason Bukayr was dismissed from Khurāsān was as follows: 'Alī[31]—al-Mufaḍ-[860] ḍal:[32] Baḥīr was imprisoned by Bukayr b. Wishāḥ because of his role in the business I mentioned previously about Ibn Khāzim's head; that is, when the latter was killed,[33] Baḥīr remained Bukayr's prisoner until 'Abd al-Malik appointed Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd governor. When Bukayr heard of this, he sent to Baḥīr with an offer of reconciliation, but the latter refused, saying, "Bukayr thought that Khurāsān would remain his without opposition."[34] Messengers shuttled between them, but Baḥīr continued to refuse. Then Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ḍabbī came to see him, saying, "It seems to me that you are being very foolish. Here your clansman[35] sends you an apology, when you are his captive and the sword is in his hand, and if he killed you a goat wouldn't fart over you[36]—yet you will not accept it from him! This is hardly in your own interest! Accept this truce and regain your freedom!" Baḥīr yielded to his advice and made peace with Bukayr. Bukayr then sent him forty thousand dirhams, on the condition that he not take up arms against him.[37]

Now the Tamīm in Khurāsān were at odds: Muqā'is and the Buṭūn sided with [Baḥīr, while 'Awf and the Abnā' took Bukayr's side].[38] The forces of Khurāsān feared that war would resume and

---

31. Al-Madā'inī.

32. Al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī (d. c. 170 [786]), the noted philologist and compiler of the Mufaḍḍaliyyāt; see GAL I, 116.

33. See text above, II, 833: Baḥīr had led the forces that defeated and killed the Zubayrid governor Ibn Khāzim. However, when Baḥīr refused to give up the latter's head to Bukayr, who was Ibn Khāzim's former deputy but had accepted 'Abd al-Malik's appointment as governor, Bukayr struck him and took the head, and then imprisoned him. The remainder of this paragraph seems anticipatory, and the reason for Bukayr's dismissal follows in the next; Ibn al-Athīr in his summary (Kāmil, IV, 367) reverses them.

34. Ẓanna Bukayr anna Khurāsān tabqā lahu fī al-jamā'ah; see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, glossarium, s.v. jamā'ah.

35. Both men belonged to the tribe of Tamīm; see next paragraph.

36. For the proverb, see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 157; Tha'ālibī, Thimār, 304.

37. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VI, 288–90, gives a fuller account of Ḍirār's intercession.

38. The addition is from Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 367. Baḥīr belonged to the clan of Ṣuraym b. Muqā'is b. 'Amr b. Ka'b b. Sa'd, and Bukayr to the 'Awf b. Ka'b b. Sa'd.

that the region would be devastated, and that their enemies among the polytheists would then overpower them. So they wrote to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, saying that Khurāsān would only recover from its disarray under the direction of a man of Quraysh, one who would be the object of neither their envy nor their partisanship. 'Abd al-Malik said, "Khurāsān is the frontier of the East. It has had its troubles under the governance of this Tamīmī, and the troops have broken into factions. Fearing that they will return to the factionalism of the past, and that the region and its people will then be destroyed, they have asked me to appoint as governor over them a man of Quraysh, whom they would heed and obey." To this Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, send out to them a man from your own family." 'Abd al-Malik said, "Were it not for your retreat from Abū Fudayk, you would be that man!"[39] Umayyah pro- [861] tested, "By God, O Commander of the Faithful, I retreated only when I could no longer fight, the men having deserted me. Then I thought it would be better for me to fall back to a rear echelon[40] than to expose a small remaining band of Muslims to annihilation. Marrār b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Bakrah knows about this, and Khālid b. 'Abdallāh also wrote to you that he had been informed of my excuse." Khālid had indeed written to him with Umayyah's excuse, informing him that the men had deserted him; and Marrār also confirmed Umayyah's statement, saying, "O Commander of the Faithful, he held out until he could no longer put up a fight, the men having deserted him." 'Abd al-Malik then made Umayyah governor of Khurāsān.

'Abd al-Malik loved Umayyah and used to say, "He is from the same brood as I"—that is, they were born at the same time. The people said, "We have never seen anyone compensated for a de-

---

Ka'b b. Sa'd and 'Amr b. Sa'd constituted the Buṭūn, while the Abnā' were descendants of Sa'd's other sons; but the 'Awf b. Ka'b joined the Abnā' rather than the Buṭūn. See W. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab: Das Genealogische Werk des Hišām ibn Muḥammad al-Kalbī (Leiden, 1966), I, 75, II, 135, 230; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 204–8; Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, I, 3, II, 860, III, 1131.

39. Abū Fudayk was a Khārijite rebel; see *EI*², s. v. Abū Fudayk. For Umayyah's defeat at his hands, see text above, II, 829; Balādhurī, Ansāb, IVA, 459.

40. Fi'ah; see Lane, Lexicon, s. v.: "a company of soldiers who fight in the rear of an army, and to whom the latter has recourse in the case of fear or defeat."

feat the way Umayyah was compensated: he fled from Abū Fudayk and then was made governor of Khurāsān!"

A man from Bakr b. Wā'il, who was being held in prison by Bukayr b. Wishāḥ, recited these verses:[41]

The red-white camels, snorting through their nose-rings, their saddlecloths pushed back from their shoulders,
With the places of their saddle-girths looking like spotted doves perched in churches, Brought you a noble man from Umayyah, impeccable, like a great white hawk, with a countenance gleaming like a polished sword.

At this time Baḥīr was in al-Sinj.[42] He asked about Umayyah's progress, and when he heard that he was approaching Abarshahr,[43] he spoke with a man named Razīn, or Zarīr, from the [862] Persians of Marw, saying, "Show me a shortcut, so that I may meet the amīr before he arrives, and I will give you such-and-such and reward you generously." This man did know the way, and he set out with him from al-Sinj, proceeding as far as the Sarakhs region in a single night. He then took him on to Nishapur, and Baḥīr reached Umayyah when he came to Abarshahr.[44] Meeting Umayyah there, he informed him about Khurāsān and what would be best as regards its people, so as to ensure their willing obedience and make them easier for the governor to deal with. Baḥīr also accused Bukayr of ill-gotten gains and warned Umayyah of his treachery.

Baḥīr then accompanied Umayyah to Marw. Umayyah was a man of noble and generous character and made no move against Bukayr or his functionaries. He proposed to Bukayr that the latter take charge of his security force (shurṭah),[45] but Bukayr refused 41. Vv. 1, 3 appear in Aghānī[1], XII, 72, in quite a different context, attributed to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥakam and addressed to Mu'āwiyah.

42. One day's march west of Marw; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam (Leipzig), II, 161; Le Strange, Lands, 400.

43. Official name of the city of Nishapur; see EI[2], s.v. Abarshahr.

44. It was normally six days from Marw to Sarakhs, and another six from Sarakhs to Nishapur; see Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 279.

45. The troops responsible for internal order, or police. See EI[1], s.v. shurṭa; N. Fries, Das Heereswesen der Araber zur Zeit der Omaijaden nach Ṭabarī (Tübingen, 1921), 22.

this, so he gave to the post to Baḥīr b. Warqā'. Then some of Bukayr's men reproached him, saying, "You refused the post, so he gave it to Baḥīr—and you know what is between the two of you." But Bukayr replied, "Yesterday I was governor of Khurāsān, with javelins[46] carried before me. Shall I now become head of the security force and carry a javelin myself?"

Then Umayyah said to Bukayr, "Choose any district of Khurāsān you wish!" He replied, "Tukhāristān," whereupon Umayyah said, "It is yours." Bukayr spent a great deal of money preparing for his departure, but then Baḥīr said to Umayyah, "If Bukayr goes to Tukhāristān, he will rebel against you." He kept on warning Umayyah until the latter was convinced and ordered Bukayr to remain with him.

In this year the leader of the pilgrimage was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf.[47] He had put 'Abdallāh b. Qays b. Makhramah in charge of the judiciary in Medina before setting off there himself, according to the report of Muḥammad b. 'Umar.[48] Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf was governor of Medina and Mecca; Bishr b. Marwān of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah; and Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd of Khurāsān. Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith was in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah,[49] [863] and Hishām b. Hubayrah was in charge of the judiciary in al-Baṣrah.[50] According to some reports, 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān performed the lesser pilgrimage in this year, but we are uncertain of the truth of this.

---

46. Ḥarbah. See Ṭabarī, glossarium, s.v.; Fries, Heereswesen, 51.

47. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 268, 301; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 336.

48. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 294, 299; Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 68, 188f.

49. On Shurayḥ b. al-Ḥārith (d. at an advanced age in 78 [697]), see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt (Leiden), VI, 90–100; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-a'yān (Beirut, 1968–72), II, 460–63; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 22–26.

50. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 298. On Hishām b. Hubayrah (d. 75 [694]), see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, i, 109f.; Ziriklī, A'lām, IX, 88f.

The Events of the Year 75

(MAY 2, 694–APRIL 20, 695)

The Events of This Year

Among the events of this year: Muḥammad b. Marwān's summer expedition when the Byzantines attacked near Mar'ash.[51]

In this year, 'Abd al-Malik appointed Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ governor of Medina.[52]

In this year, 'Abd al-Malik appointed al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf governor of Iraq, excluding Khurāsān and Sijistān.[53] Al-Ḥajjāj proceeded to al-Kūfah.

---

51. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 269f., the Byzantines advanced to al-'Amq or al-A'māq in the environs of Mar'ash in Jumādā I 75 (August–September 694), where they suffered a defeat; see also Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 186; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 337; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 374; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 7. Muḥammad was 'Abd al-Malik's brother.

52. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 294ff., 299; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 160–63, and XI, 69, 188f.; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 7. Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam was 'Abd al-Malik's paternal uncle.

53. See Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 1–3; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 295f.; Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 69, 266f., 269f.; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 326f.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Paris, 1861–77), V, 291f.; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 374–79; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 7; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 65ff. The dramatic accounts in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī and

According to Abū Zayd[54]—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā Abū Ghassān—'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Ubaydah b. Muḥammad b. 'Ammār b. Yāsir: Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf left Medina when he received the letter from 'Abd al-Malik appointing him governor of Iraq, after the death of Bishr b. Marwān. He left with a party of twelve riders on thoroughbred camels. They reached al-Kūfah, unannounced, at midday. Al-Muhallab had been sent off by Bishr against the Ḥarūriyyah.[55] Al-Ḥajjāj went directly to the mosque, entered it, and ascended the pulpit, his face covered by a red silk turban. He called out, "Summon the men!" They thought that he and his companions were Khārijites, and came ready to attack them. But when the men were assembled, he rose, uncovered his face, and said:[56] [864]

I am the son of splendor, who scales the heights;
when I remove the turban, you will know me.[57]

By God! I take full accounting of wickedness, match it in return, and pay it back in kind! I see heads ripe and ready for harvest, and blood ready to flow between turbans and beards!

She has tucked up her skirts in readiness.[58]

The time for attack has come, so drive hard, war, to whom night has brought a violent driver.

Mas'ūdī place al-Ḥajjāj at 'Abd al-Malik's court in Damascus at the time of his appointment.

54. Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah, d. 264 (877); see Sezgin, GAS, I, 345.

55. The Ḥarūriyyah are the Khārijites, so called from their assembling against 'Alī at Ḥarūrā', near al-Kūfah; see text above, I, 3387–89; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 450; EI², s. v. Ḥarūrā'.

56. This most famous of all Umayyad orations is reproduced in a wide range of sources, with considerable variation in its order and structure; some authorities assign parts of it to a later parallel oration in al-Baṣrah. Relatively early versions include Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 5–10; Jāḥiẓ, Bayān (Cairo, 1956), II, 347–50; Ibn Qutaybah, 'Uyūn al-akhbār (Cairo, 1925), II, 243; Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 266ff.; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 326f.; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 215ff.; Ibn 'Abd Rabbih, 'Iqd, V, 17–19; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V. 292–302; Aghānī¹, XI, 266ff. See also A. Ṣafwat, Jamharat rasā'il al-'arab (Cairo, 1937), I, 274; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 70ff.

57. Verse by Suḥaym b. Wathīl al-Riyāḥī, d. c. 40 (661); see Sezgin, GAS, II, 202f. Further verses in Aṣma'ī, Aṣma'iyyāt (Cairo, 1964), 17–20, and Aghānī¹, XII, 13f. See also Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 5; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 215; Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 28.

58. A version of this proverb appears in Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 35, where "she" is glossed as "disaster" (dāhiyah).

No ordinary herder of sheep or camels he, nor a butcher working at his slaughter-board![59]

Night has brought them a harsh driver, mettlesome, well traveled in the desert, but a settled man, no bedouin he.[60]

It is not the time to despise the mixed herds that she has brought, or the young unbridled she-camels that scurry along like racing sand-grouse.[61]

By God, O people of Iraq, I cannot be squeezed like a fig, or abashed by rattling old waterskins at me.[62] I have been proven to be at the height of my vigor and have run the longest races. The Commander of the Faithful, 'Abd al-Malik, has emptied out his quiver and tested the wood of his arrows; [865] he found me the strongest and least likely to break, and thus aimed me at you. Long have you pursued a course of faction and followed the path of waywardness; but now, by God, I will bark you as one does a tree, hack you as one does a mimosa,[63] and beat you as one does a camel not of the herd at the watering-hole. By God, I do not make promises without fulfilling them, and I do not measure without cutting. I will see no more of these gatherings, with "it was said" and "he said" and "what does he say?"—what does all this have to do with you? By God, you will stay on the straight paths of the right, or else I will leave every man of you preoccupied with the state of his body. If I find any man from al-Muhallab's expedition still here after three days, I will spill his blood and seize his property.

---

59. Attributed variously to Ruwayshid b. Rumayḍ al-'Anazī, al-Ḥuṭam al-Qaysī, and Abū Zughbah al-Khazrajī. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'arab, s.vv. ḥuṭam, waḍam; Aghānī[1], XIV, 44; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 215f. My translation conforms to the glosses given in the text below.

60. No attribution in the sources. Ibn Manẓūr, s.v. 'aṣlab, glosses "them" as camels.

61. No attribution in the sources. For sābiq, "racing," some MSS read sā'iq, "driver" (of a sand-grouse).

62. As is done to make camels run; see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 191.

63. For the phrase, see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 191.

Then he went into his residence, without saying anything more.

Another account: When al-Ḥajjāj stood a long time silently before speaking, Muḥammad b. 'Umayr[64] took some pebbles and was going to pelt him with them, saying, "May God oppose him! Not only tongue-tied, but ugly, too; and I expect that what he has to say will match his appearance!" But when al-Ḥajjāj spoke, the pebbles began to spill from his hands without his even noticing. Al-Ḥajjāj said in his oration:

> Faces scowl because God has coined "a similitude: a village which was safe and secure, its sustenance coming to it in abundance from every side; but they were ungrateful for God's blessings, and God made them taste the garment of hunger and fear, because of what they had been doing."[65] You are like them, just the same! Obey your herdsman, and go straight, for, by God, I will make you taste abasement until you learn how, and hack you as one does a mimosa until you consent to be led. I swear by God, you shall embrace justice and leave off this seditious talk, with your "It was thus and thus," and "I was informed by So-and-so on the authority of So-and-so," and "The Cutting; what is the Cutting?"[66] I will give you a Cutting with the sword which will leave your [866] > women widows and your children orphans—and that until you leave off these gossamer fantasies and give up all this "See here! See here!" Let me see no more of these gatherings. No man among you shall ride except alone. If rebels were allowed to get away with their insubordination, no spoil[67]

---

64. Presumably Muḥammad b. 'Umayr b. 'Uṭārid al-Tamīmī, a former supporter of al-Mukhtār; see text above, II, 635. In the version of Mubarrad, Kāmil, 215, and others, however, the subject of this anecdote is 'Umayr b. Ḍābi' al-Burjumī, who was subsequently al-Ḥajjāj's first victim in al-Kūfah, as related below, II, 869ff.

65. Qur'ān 16:112.

66. Al-habr wa-mā al-habr, perhaps imitating Qur'ānic phraseology (e.g., 101:1–2: al-qāri'ah mā al-qāri'ah), although habr does not occur in the Qur'ān. Habr refers to the cutting up of meat; Ṭabarī, glossarium, s.v., notes Ibn Manẓūr (Lisān, s.v.): wa-fī ḥadīth al-shurāh fa-habarnāhum bi-l-suyūf ("and in the ḥadīth [?] of the Khārijites, 'we sliced them up with swords.'").

67. Fay', originally meaning "booty," but quickly shading off to "revenue." See *EI*², s.v. fay'; F. Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period (Copenhagen, 1950), 38ff.

would be collected and no enemy fought, and the frontiers would be unmanned; and were they not compelled by force to go out and fight, they would never do so voluntarily. I have heard how you defied al-Muhallab and came back to your garrison, mutinous rebels! I swear to you by God, if, after three days, I find any of you here, I will cut off his head!

Then he summoned the marshals ('urafā')[68] and said to them, "Take the men to join al-Muhallab and bring me the vouchers of their arrival;[69] and let the gates of the bridge remain open night and day until this has been accomplished."

Commentary on the oration:[70] "Son of splendor" is the morning, because its splendor chases away the darkness. The "heights" are small promontories among the mountains. Fruit "ripens" when it reaches maturity. Where he says, "Drive, ziyam," ziyam is a word for war.[71] A "violent" person is one who destroys everything he encounters. A "slaughter-board" is what protects meat from touching the ground. A "harsh driver" is a severe one. The "desert" is a desolate land where one can hear the sound of the camels' steps. An "unbridled" camel is one without a head-rope, as in this line reported by Abū Zayd al-Aṣma'ī:[72]

Umm al-Fawāris rode the feisty, unbridled camel bareback, spurring it on to a trot and a gallop.

"Shinan" is the plural of "shannah," meaning a worn-out, dried-up waterskin, as in this verse:[73]

You are like one of the camels of the Banū Uqaysh,

---

68. Sg. 'arīf, officials responsible for pay and discipline of small units of men (originally ten). See *EI*², s.v. 'arīf; Dozy, Supplément, s.v.; Fries, Heereswesen, 17f.

69. Barā'āt; see Ṭabarī, glossarium, s.v.; Dozy, Supplément, s.v.

70. This commentary is missing in some MSS, but appears, abridged, in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 377. Mubarrad, Kāmil, 217ff., supplies rather different glosses.

71. Mubarrad glosses ziyam as (the name of) a horse or camel.

72. An error (?) for Abū Sa'īd al-Aṣma'ī, the famous philologist, d. 213 (828) (see *EI*², s.v. al-Aṣma'ī), perhaps conflated here with his contemporary, Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī, d. 214–215 (830–831) (see *EI*², s.v. Abū Zayd al-Anṣārī). The following verse is by Abū Du'ād al-Ru'āsī, fl. c. 81 (700); see Sezgin, GAS, II, 414; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. 'uluṭ.

73. Verse by al-Nābighah al-Dhubyānī, d. c. 602 A. D.; see Sezgin, GAS, II, 110f.; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 376; W. Ahlwardt, The Divans of the Six Ancient Arabic Poets (London, 1870), 30.

whom they frighten by rattling an old waterskin at its rump.

He "tested" ('ajam) the wood means he bit it; 'ajam also means "grape-stone," as in this half-verse by al-A'shā:[74] [867]

Their new-cast young were like grape-stones scattered on the ground (?).

By the "strongest" wood he means the hardest; one says a rope is "strong" if it is tightly twisted. "I will hack you as one does a mimosa": "hacking" is cutting, and the mimosa is a kind of thorny tree. "I do not measure without cutting": "measuring" (khalq) is projecting, as in God's words, "From a sperm-drop, measured and not measured,"[75] that is, projected and not projected, meaning those which come to term and those which miscarry. Al-Kumayt[76] said, describing a waterskin:

Which no women measuring undertook to cut out, and from whose interior no stream of water poured.

Here he is actually describing the gizzards of birds, saying they are not like such a waterskin. Also, a "measured" (khalqā') stone is a smooth one, as in this verse:[77]

And a broad chest above swaying legs, like a measured stone used as a sliding area for children to play on.

One says "I cut (faraytu) the hide" if he makes something of it; but if one uses the fourth form of the verb "cut" (afraytu), he means he spoils it. "Gossamer fantasies" means what is untrue. Abū 'Amr al-Shaybānī[78] said this word originally meant what the

---

74. Al-A'shā Maymūn, d. after 5 (625); see EI², s. v. al-A'shā. Variants of this verse appear in Mubarrad, Kāmil, 219; Al-A'shā, Dīwān (ed. Geyer, GMS, n. s. VI), no. IV, line 25.

75. Qur'ān 22:5. "Projecting" is taqdīr.

76. D. 126–127 (743–744); see EI², s. v. al-Kumayt. For the verse (with variant), see Die Hāšimijjāt des Kumait, ed. and trans. J. Horovitz (Leiden, 1904), no. III, line 123.

77. Verse by Imru' al-Qays, d. c. A.D. 550; see EI², s. v. Imru' al-Qays b. Ḥudjr. The verse, with variants, is in Ahlwardt, Divans, 118.

78. D. c. 213 (828); see EI¹, s. v. al-Shaibānī.

common people call "Satan's snot," that is, the "sun's drool" or gossamer, which appears at midday. Abū al-Najm al'Ijlī[79] said:

The sun's drool flowed and covered things, and the balance of time stood in equilibrium.

"Gatherings" are groups of people. End of commentary.

[868] According to Abū Ja'far[80]—'Umar—Muḥammad b. Yaḥyā—'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Ubaydah: On the third day, al-Ḥajjāj heard "God is Great" (takbīr)[81] pronounced in the market, and went out and took his seat in the pulpit and said:

> O people of Iraq! O people of faction and hypocrisy, and of vicious morals! I have heard a takbīr—not a takbīr meant to inspire devotion to God, but rather a takbīr meant to inspire fear; and I know that this is a dust cloud with a violent wind behind it. Sons of slatterns! Slaves of the rod![82] Scions of husbandless women! Is there not a man among you who will take into account his lameness,[83] value his life, and watch his step? I swear by God, I am on the point of dealing you a blow that will serve as a punishment for those who come before and an example for those who come after!

When he says a "violent wind" he means a strong gale. A "slattern" is a foolish woman, that is, a brutish servant girl. "Lameness" is weakness and fatigue from too much walking.

In the line "Which scurry along like racing sand-grouse," ghuṭāṭ, with a u, is a kind of bird.[84] On the other hand, al-Aṣma'ī said that the ghaṭāṭ, with an a, is a kind of bird, citing this line by Ḥassān b. Thābit:[85]

---

79. D. after 105 (724); see EI², s. v. Abū al-Nadjm al-'Idjlī.

80. Al-Ṭabarī.

81. The expression Allāhu akbar ("God is great!"), enunciated at the beginning of prayer, but also as a call to attack; see A. Noth, Quellenkritische Studien zur Themen, Formen und Tendenzen frühislamischer Geschichtsüberlieferung (Bonn, 1973), I, 128f.

82. For the story behind this proverbial expression of contempt, see Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 424.

83. That is, acknowledge his limitations; see Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 268.

84. The commentary reverts here to al-Ḥajjāj's previous speech.

85. D. c. 40 (659); see EI², s. v. Ḥassān b. Thābit. The Diwan of Ḥassān b. Thābit (ed. 'Arafat, GMS, n. s. XXV), no. 13, line 12, reads sawād, "crowd," for ghaṭāṭ.

They are visited so often that their dogs do not whine; they are undisturbed by a hubbub of approaching sand-grouse—with ghaṭāṭ with an a. Then he said that ghuṭāṭ with a u is the mixture of light and darkness at the end of the night, as in this [869] rajaz verse:

He rose and went to a dusky lady at daybreak, walking along with what looked like a tent-upright.

End of commentary.

Then 'Umayr b. Ḍābi' al-Tamīmī al-Ḥanẓalī[86] came to al-Ḥajjāj and said, "May God be gracious to the amīr! I am a member of this expedition, but I am an old man, and sick. Here is my son; he has more vigor than I." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "And who are you?" He said, "I am 'Umayr b. Ḍābi' al-Tamīmī." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Did you hear what I said yesterday?" He said, "Yes." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Was it not you who attacked the Commander of the Faithful 'Uthmān?" He said, "Yes, it was." Al-Ḥajjāj asked, "What impelled you to do that?" He said, "He had imprisoned my father, who was an old man." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "And wasn't it he who said this verse:

I meant to do it, but I didn't—I was about to—and would that I had!— left 'Uthmān's wives weeping over him!

It seems to me that killing you would be a service to the two garrisons. Take him, guards, and strike off his head!" One of the men approached and struck off his head. His property was also seized.[87]

According to one account, 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd[88] said to al-Ḥajjāj, "Do you know who this is?" He said, "No." 'Anbasah said, "This

---

86. Ḥanẓalah is a clan of Tamīm. In the variant of this story given below, the man is called al-Burjumī; the Barājim were a subclan of Ḥanẓalah. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 211f.

87. On this incident, see text above, I, 3033–36, 3048; Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 11–14; Balādhurī, Ansāb, IVA, 575–77, and XI, 272, 274f.; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 217, 219f., 665f.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 298; Aghānī[1], XIII, 42; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 377–79; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 9.

88. An intimate of al-Ḥajjāj; see Balādhurī, Ansāb, IVA, 453, and XI, 274f.

is one of the murderers of the Commander of the Faithful 'Uthmān." Then al-Ḥajjāj said, "O enemy of God, you did not [870] send a substitute on your expedition against the Commander of the Faithful, did you?" and ordered his head struck off. Then he ordered a herald to proclaim through the town, "Hear ye! 'Umayr b. Ḍābi', having heard the proclamation, has come after the third day, and we have ordered his execution. Hear ye! God's protection is withdrawn from any member of al-Muhallab's forces who spends this night in the town." At this, the men began to move out, and there was soon a crowd at the bridge. The marshals went to al-Muhallab, who was at Rāmhurmuz, and took from him letters vouching for their arrival. Al-Muhallab said, "Today a real man has come to Iraq, and from today the enemy will see what battle is."

According to the account of Ibn Abī 'Ubaydah, four thousand men of the tribe of Madhḥij crossed the bridge that night. Then al-Muhallab said, "Today a real man has come to Iraq."

According to 'Umar—Abū al-Ḥasan: When al-Ḥajjāj had 'Abd al-Malik's letter read out to the men, the reader began, "After a greeting of peace, I praise God to you." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Stop! O slaves of the rod, when the Commander of the Faithful gives you a greeting of peace, does no one among you return the greeting? These are the manners of Ibn Nihyah![89] By God, I swear I will teach you better manners than these! Start the letter again!" This time, when he reached the words "After a greeting of peace," every one of them without exception responded, "And upon the Commander of the Faithful be peace and God's mercy!"

According to 'Umar—'Abd al-Malik b. Shaybān b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Misma'—'Amr b. Sa'īd: When al-Ḥajjāj arrived in al-Kūfah, he addressed the men and said, "You are deserters from al-Muhallab's army! Let not a single man from his forces remain here after three days!" After the three days had passed, a man came to him with blood dripping from his head. Al-Ḥajjāj asked him, "Who did this to you?" He said, "'Umayr b. Ḍābi' al-Bur-[871] jumī. I ordered him to go out to his camp, but he was incensed and struck me."[90] Al-Ḥajjāj sent for 'Umayr b. Ḍābi', and he was brought in, an old man. Al-Ḥajjāj asked him, "What kept you away from your camp?" He said, "I am an old man, without vigor; so I sent my son as a substitute, since he is both stronger and younger than me. Ask around to see if what I say is true; if it is not, then punish me." But 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd said, "This is the man who went up to 'Uthmān's corpse and slapped his face, then jumped on it and broke two of his ribs." Al-Ḥajjāj then ordered him executed, and this was carried out.

89. According to a gloss on Mubarrad's Kāmil, 216, Ibn Nihyah was a former head of the shurṭah in al-Baṣrah; see also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 298.

90. Fa-ḍarabanī wa-kadhaba 'alayhi.

'Amr b. Sa'īd said: By God, while I was on my way between al-Kūfah and al-Ḥīrah, I heard the chant of some Muḍarite camel-drivers.[91] I turned to meet them and asked, "What news?" They said, "A man came to us from the foulest of the tribes of the Arabs, that tribe descended from Thamūd.[92] He had spindly legs, and no flesh on his buttocks, and he was bleary-eyed.[93] He took the chief of the tribe, 'Umayr b. Ḍābi', and he struck off his head."

When al-Ḥajjāj executed 'Umayr b. Ḍābi', Ibrāhīm b. 'Āmir, who was one of the Banū Ghāḍirah of the Banū Asad, met 'Abdallāh b. al-Zabīr[94] in the market and asked him about the news. Ibn al-Zabīr said:

Meeting Ibrāhīm, I say to him,
'I see things have become difficult and complicated.
Get ready, get going, and catch up with the army! I see no alternative to the army but perdition.
Take your choice! You must either visit Ibn Ḍābi' [872]
'Umayr, or else visit al-Muhallab.

---

91. Sami'tu rajazan Muḍariyyan; see Ṭabarī, glossarium, s.v. rajaz. The Muḍar tribal grouping included Tamīm.

92. That is, the tribe of Thaqīf, frequently derided for their uncertain ancestry. For traditions linking Thaqīf to the semi-legendary Thamūd, whose destruction by God is described in the Qur'ān, see I. Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien (Halle, 1888–90), I, 99f. Al-Ḥajjāj is reported to have responded to such accusations by appealing to Qur'ān 53:51, wa-Thamūda fa-mā abqā, misinterpreting this as "Thamūd, and what (of them) He preserved" and arguing that only the best of them would have been so preserved; al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, however, countered with the correct interpretation, "Thamūd, and He did not preserve (them)." See Aghānī[1], IV, 74; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 266; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 2.

93. Compare the unflattering descriptions in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 289, 327f.

94. On this poet, see Sezgin, GAS, II, 329f.; the following verses, with numerous variants, appear also in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 13f.; Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 272; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 217, 666; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 300f.; Aghānī[1], XIII, 42; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 379.

Faced with these two disagreeable courses, your only salvation is to ride off on a snowy-gray one-year-old.'
In such circumstances, were he required to ride to Khurāsān, it would seem as near as the market, or yet nearer!
And how many a flabby man you see now, forced to ride, who has become so intimate with the bend of the saddle that he is hunch-backed.

It is reported that al-Ḥajjāj's arrival in al-Kūfah was in the month of Ramaḍān of this year (December 694–January 695).[95] He sent out al-Ḥakam b. Ayyūb al-Thaqafī as amīr in charge of al-Baṣrah and ordered him to treat Khālid b. 'Abdallāh harshly.[96] When word of this reached Khālid, he left al-Baṣrah before al-Ḥakam entered it, and went to al-Jalḥā'.[97] The men of al-Baṣrah turned out to see him off, and Khālid did not leave his place of prayer (muṣallā) until he had distributed a million dirhams among them.[98]

[873] According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—anonymous—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.[99] In this year, Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam went to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, leaving Abān b. 'Uthmān as his deputy in charge of Medina; but 'Abd al-Malik ordered Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam to continue in his position as governor of Medina.[100] Al-

95. This statement is contradicted by the text below, II, 874, 944, which implies that al-Ḥajjāj arrived in Rajab (October–November 694), as stated explicitly by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 295f., and Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 269f.

96. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 295; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 179; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 379; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 9. Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 275, however, puts al-Ḥakam's appointment after al-Ḥajjāj's own arrival in al-Baṣrah.

97. A place on the pilgrim road from al-Kūfah, some 140 miles south of the latter; see A. Musil, Northern Neǧd (New York, 1928), 206f., 210, 235, and references there.

98. A muṣallā is a large open space reserved for collective prayers on certain formal occasions; see EI[1], s.v. muṣallā. On Khālid's muṣallā, see text above, II, 628, and below, II, 1704; L. Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kufa," Mélanges Maspéro, III (1935–40), 336, places it on the western edge of the town. Khālid apparently distributed the local treasury to the populace or resident troops, before it could fall into the hands of al-Ḥajjāj; perhaps the intention of this assertion is to justify al-Ḥajjāj's subsequent rescinsion of the troops' pay increase (see below). This anonymous report is not confirmed by other sources.

99. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 301; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 327, 336; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 9.

100. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 294, 299. On Abān b. 'Uthmān, son of the third

Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf was in charge of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah; Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh was in charge of Khurāsān; Shurayḥ was in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah; and Zurārah b. Awfā was in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah.[101]

In this year, al-Ḥajjāj left al-Kūfah for al-Baṣrah, appointing Abū Ya'fūr 'Urwah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah as his deputy over al-Kūfah;[102] the latter remained in this position until al-Ḥajjāj returned to al-Kūfah after the battle of Rustaqubādh.

In this year, the men rebelled against al-Ḥajjāj in al-Baṣrah.

The Revolt of the Baṣran Troops against al-Ḥajjāj

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Zuhayr al-'Absī: Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf left al-Kūfah immediately after arriving and having Ibn Ḍābi' executed, and went on to al-Baṣrah. There he gave an oration like the one he had given to the Kūfans, threatening them in the same way. A man of the Banū Yashkur[103] was brought to him, accused of desertion. The man said, "I have a hernia, and Bishr saw it and exempted me; and you will find that my stipend has been returned to the treasury." But al-Ḥajjāj did not accept his excuse and had him killed. This alarmed the [874]
Baṣrans, and they began to pour out of the town, descending in throngs on the reviewer[104] at the bridge at Rāmhurmuz. Then al-Muhallab said, "A real man has come to the troops."

Al-Ḥajjāj went out to Rustaqubādh, where he arrived at the beginning of Sha'bān 75 (late November 694).[105] Led by 'Abdallāh b. al-Jārūd, the men rebelled against al-Ḥajjāj. Al-Ḥajjāj had caliph, see Balādhurī, Ansāb, IVA, 617f.; EI², s.v. Abān b. 'Uthmān. He was appointed governor the following year; see text below, II, 940.

---

101. Zurārah b. Awfā al-Ḥarashī, d. 93 (711–712); see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, i, 109 (reading 93 for 73).

102. Other reports in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 296, make the deputy Ḥawshab b. Ruwaym al-Shaybānī, who was head of the shurṭah, according to the text below, II, 918; see also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 380.

103. His name was Sharīk b. 'Amr; see Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 275f.; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 381. He is called Dhū al-Kursufah ("man with the eye-patch") by Mubarrad, Kāmil, 666.

104. 'Āriḍ; see EI², s.v. isti'rāḍ.

105. Rustaqubādh is the later 'Askar Mukram, some ninety miles northeast of al-Baṣrah and sixty-five miles northwest of Rāmhurmuz; see EI², s.v. 'Askar Mukram; Le Strange, Lands, 237.

'Abdallāh b. al-Jārūd killed and sent eighteen heads to be set up before the men in Rāmhurmuz. This stiffened the backs of the Muslims, and the Khārijites, who had been hoping that there would be conflict and factionalism among the men, were disappointed. Then al-Ḥajjāj returned to al-Baṣrah.

The reason behind this affair with 'Abdallāh b. al-Jārūd is as follows:[106] When al-Ḥajjāj ordered the troops in al-Baṣrah to join al-Muhallab, and they set off, al-Ḥajjāj himself went as far as Rustaqubādh, which is near Dastawā;[107] this was at the end of Sha'bān (late December 694). He had with him the elite of the Baṣran forces. He and al-Muhallab were about eighteen farsakhs[108] apart. Then al-Ḥajjāj stood before the men and said, "The increase in your stipends that Ibn al-Zubayr granted you is the increase of a sinner and hypocrite,[109] and I will not sanction it." Then 'Abdallāh b. al-Jārūd al-'Abdī[110] approached him and said, "It is not the increase of a sinner and hypocrite, but the increase of the Commander of the Faithful 'Abd al-Malik, who confirmed that we should have it." When al-Ḥajjāj called him a liar and threatened him, Ibn al-Jārūd rebelled against him, followed by the elite of the forces. Severe fighting broke out, and al-Ḥajjāj killed Ibn al-Jārūd and a group of his companions. He sent Ibn al-Jārūd's head and those of ten of his companions to al-Muhallab, and himself went back to al-Baṣrah.[111] He then wrote

106. This is a different version of the rebellion from that just given, as is clear from variants in detail.

107. A town in the district of al-Ahwāz; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 574.

108. A farsakh is about six kilometers; see EI², s.v. farsakh.

109. Fāsiq munāfiq. These are specific theological terms, the status of the fāsiq being one of the primary points of contention among various groups at this time; to Khārijites a fāsiq was an unbeliever (kāfir), while the view that he was a hypocrite is attributed to al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī. See EI², s.v. fāsiḳ; Watt, Formative Period, 17, 80.

110. 'Abdallāh b. al-Jārūd (Bishr) belonged to the tribe of 'Abd al-Qays of Rabī'ah; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 141, 169, and II, 109.

111. Much more detailed than these two brief accounts of Ibn al-Jārūd's rebellion is that of Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 277–94. According to the latter, when al-Ḥajjāj's first proposal to cancel Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr's doubling of the men's stipends met resistance, he temporized for some months before attempting again to impose it. The rebellion broke out only in Rabī' II 76 (July–August 695), and al-Ḥajjāj was very hard pressed until dissension arose among the rebels and appreciable numbers returned to his side. Balādhurī agrees with Ṭabarī's first account that Ibn al-Jārūd and eighteen others were killed. See also Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 269; to al-Muhallab and to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, saying: "When this letter reaches you, move against the Khārijites. Peace." [875]

In this year, al-Muhallab and Ibn Mikhnaf expelled the Azraqites from Rāmhurmuz.

Al-Muhallab and the War against the Azraqites

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Zuhayr al-'Absī: Al-Muhallab and Ibn Mikhnaf moved against the Azraqites in Rāmhurmuz, in accordance with the letter of al-Ḥajjāj to them, on Monday, 19 Sha'bān 75 (December 13, 694).[112] They ejected them from Rāmhurmuz without much fighting, advancing slowly against them and driving them off. The Azraqite forces retreated as if they were the rearguard of a defeated army, and moved to a region of Sābūr called Kāzarūn.[113] Al-Muhallab and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf then set out after them and encamped opposite them on 1 Ramaḍān (December 25). Al-Muhallab had a defensive trench dug. According to the Baṣrans, al-Muhallab said to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, "If you think you should dig a defensive trench, then do so;" but 'Abd al-Raḥmān's forces disdained to do so, saying, "Our trench is our swords." The Azraqites crept up on al-Muhallab by night, hoping to take him by surprise, only to find that he had taken precautions. They then turned instead to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, and, discovering that he had not dug a trench, attacked him. As his forces were driven back, he joined in the fray with a group of them, but was killed together with those around him. The Khārijite poet said:

Whose camp is this, adorned with fallen men, a mass of corpses?

Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif (Cairo, 1969), 338f.; Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 271, 280 (Muṣ'ab's decision to pay the stipends twice a year), and Futūḥ, 281; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 298–302; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 380–86; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 10; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 81–86; A. A. Dixon, The Umayyad Caliphate (London, 1971), 143–47; R. Sayed, Die Revolte des Ibn al-Aš'aṯ und die Koranleser (Freiburg, 1977), 129f.

112. Sunday.

113. In Fārs, some sixty miles west of Shīrāz. Kāzarūn town supplanted Sābūr town (Shāpūr, Bishāpūr), for which the district was named, in the fourth (tenth) century. See EI², s.v. Kāzarūn; Le Strange, Lands, 262, 266f.

See how the wind scatters coarse sand over them, they who had trailed their garments in their pride!

[876] The account of the Kūfans: Al-Ḥajjāj's letter came to al-Muhallab and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf, saying: "Move against the Khārijites when my letter reaches you." They moved against them on Wednesday, 20 Ramaḍān 75 (January 12, 695),[114] and met them with fighting as intense as any between them previously. This was shortly after midday. The Khārijites threw all their strength against al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah and drove him back into his camp. He hurriedly sent off some of his trusted men to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, and they came to him and said, "Al-Muhallab says to you: Our enemy is one, and you can see what the Muslims are up against; so send reinforcements to your brethren, God's mercy on you." 'Abd al-Raḥmān began to send him reinforcements of both cavalry and infantry, a group at a time. By late afternoon, the Khārijites, seeing the cavalry and infantry coming from 'Abd al-Raḥmān's camp to al-Muhallab's camp, and surmising that 'Abd al-Raḥmān's forces would be depleted, put five or six detachments[115] opposite al-Muhallab's camp, while the rest went off all together to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf. When the latter saw them drawn up against him, he went out to oppose them, having with him the Qur'ān-reciters,[116] led by Abū al-Aḥwaṣ,[117] the companion of 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd,[118] and Khuzaymah b. Naṣr,[119] the father of Naṣr b. Khuzaymah al-'Absī, who was killed with Zayd b. 'Alī and gibbeted with him in al-Kūfah.[120] Also with 'Abd al-Raḥmān were seventy-one of his own picked men.

---

114. Tuesday.

115. Sg. katībah. See WKAS, s.v.; Fries, Heereswesen, 41.

116. Qurrā', here translated according to the traditional interpretation. For the controversies over the identity of this political interest group, and M. A. Shaban's reinterpretation of the term as "villagers," see M. A. Shaban, Islamic History (Cambridge, 1971), I, 50ff., 67f., 103ff., EI², s.v. ḳurrā'; R. Sayed, Die Revolte des Ibn al-Aš'aṯ, ch. V (arguing for the traditional interpretation); and further literature cited in these discussions.

117. On him, see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VI, 126.

118. The famous Companion and Qur'ān-reader, d. 32 (652–653); see EI², s.v. Ibn Mas'ūd.

119. A former supporter of al-Mukhtār; see text above, II, 625f. He belonged to the Banū 'Abs of Ghaṭafān of Qays 'Aylān; see EI², s.v. Ghaṭafān.

120. In 122 (740); see text below, II, 1703–11.

The Khārijites attacked them and engaged them in heavy fighting. But 'Abd al-Raḥmān's forces fell back, leaving him with a [877] small band of stalwart men who held their ground with him. His son Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who had been among those he had sent to al-Muhallab, called on the forces to follow him to his father's aid, but only a few did; he approached his father, but the Khārijites kept him from reaching him, and he fought until the Khārijites wounded him and he was forced to withdraw from the battle. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf and those with him fought on, on a commanding hill, through some two-thirds of the night, until he was killed amidst his companions.[121]

The next morning, al-Muhallab came and found him, and buried him and prayed over him. He wrote to inform al-Ḥajjāj of his death, and al-Ḥajjāj wrote to inform 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, who received the news at Minā[122] and blamed the Kūfans. Al-Ḥajjāj then sent out 'Attāb b. Warqā'[123] to take command of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf's forces, and ordered him, if he joined with al-Muhallab in battle, to heed and obey him. 'Attāb was unhappy about this but saw no alternative to obeying al-Ḥajjāj, being unable to get him to reconsider. He went to join the army and fought the Khārijites as al-Muhallab's subordinate, but proceeded to act virtually without consulting al-Muhallab on anything. Seeing this, al-Muhallab picked out some men from among the Kūfans, one of whom was Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah, and incited them against 'Attāb.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd: 'Attāb came to al-

---

121. Other sources do not reflect the sharp conflict here between Baṣran and Kūfan accounts of this battle. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 17, reports that al-Muhallab marched from Rāmhurmuz to Arrajān, where he spent three days, and then on to Sābūr, where he spent three years; and although he gives a far more detailed account of the fighting in Sābūr than does Ṭabarī (see text below, II, 1003ff.), he does not mention 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf. Mubarrad, Kāmil, 667–70, combines elements of both of Ṭabarī's accounts, mentioning first a day battle in which al-Muhallab received reinforcements from 'Abd al-Raḥmān, and then a night attack on the latter, who had refused to entrench himself. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 388f., essentially summarizes Ṭabarī.

122. Outside Mecca, site of pilgrimage rites; see *EI*², s.v. ḥadjdj. 'Abd al-Malik performed the pilgrimage in this year; see text above, II, 873, and below, II, 881.

123. At this time governor of Iṣfahān, where he had already fought the Azraqites; see text above, II, 762–64. He belonged to the Banū Riyāḥ b. Yarbū' b. Ḥanẓalah of Tamīm; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 68, II, 205.

Muhallab to ask him to provision his men. Al-Muhallab seated 'Attāb next to himself;[124] but when 'Attāb asked him to provision [878] his men, he did so in a brusque and frowning manner. Al-Muhallab retorted, "Remember where you are, you son of an uncircumcised woman!" The Banū Tamīm assert that 'Attāb returned the insult, while Yūsuf b. Yazīd and others maintain that he said, "By God, she is a woman of noble lineage on both sides, and I rejoice that God has made a distinction between you and me." They exchanged words until al-Muhallab went to raise his staff against him; at this, his son al-Mughīrah jumped up and seized the staff, saying, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! This is one of the noble and eminent figures among the tribesmen. If you hear something from him that displeases you, put up with it from him, for indeed he merits that from you." Al-Muhallab heeded him.

'Attāb rose and left him, but was then confronted by Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah, who assailed him with insults and slander. In view of all this, 'Attāb wrote to al-Ḥajjāj to complain of al-Muhallab, informing him that he had incited against him some insolent men from the garrison, and requesting that he recall him. This came at a time when al-Ḥajjāj was in need of him because of the troubles the notables of al-Kūfah were encountering with Shabīb; so he sent to him, saying, "Come, and leave the command of that army to al-Muhallab." Al-Muhallab then put Ḥabīb b. al-Muhallab in command of it.[125]

---

124. Ajlasahu al-Muhallab ma'ahu 'alā majlisihi.

125. The tribal rivalries behind this story are rather clearer in the somewhat divergent version in Mubarrad, Kāmil, 675–77. According to the latter, it was al-Ḥajjāj who sent 'Attāb to al-Muhallab, stipulating that the supreme command should depend on whether the Kūfans or Baṣrans had originally conquered the area of operations; because Baṣrans had conquered Sābūr, al-Muhallab retained ultimate authority. When al-Ḥajjāj recalled 'Attāb to face Shabīb (see text below, II, 940), he ordered al-Muhallab to provision the armies, but the latter refused provisions to the Kūfans. In the subsequent quarrel, the Tamīm of al-Baṣrah supported 'Attāb, their tribesman, while the Azd of al-Kūfah supported the Azdī al-Muhallab, as did their allies the Bakr. Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah was a Shaybānī (see text above, II, 773—the Banū Shaybān were a tribe of Bakr); Yūsuf b. Yazīd and Abū Mikhnaf belonged to the Banū Azd. Mubarrad states explicitly that al-Muhallab relented and provisioned the Kūfans, after his son al-Mughīrah intervened. Mubarrad's account dates 'Attāb's stay with al-Muhallab from one of the Jumādās 76 (August–October 695) into 77 (696–697), placing it after that of al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah Verses by Ḥumayd b. Muslim,[126] elegizing ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf:

If they killed you early in the morning, Abū Ḥakīm, many a valiant man had you attacked and killed in your time.
And if they have deprived us of a true chief chosen by his people, a man of noble character, bountiful and generous,
A murder like this has crushed your people, all of them—
one who used to bear their burdens for them,
One who used to settle their obligations, and their fighting, on a day when the fighting was close and fierce.
I swear, he received no mortal wound until he had already donned a breastplate of blood.
Under his banner the heroes exchanged blows, [879] their Mashrafī swords in their hands,
Through a long day, and on to the end of the night, when they saw a crescent moon appear in the sky;
Then the lines of infantry and his cavalry were driven back from him,
And there the spears found him and he faltered.

Verses by Surāqah b. Mirdās al-Bāriqī:[127]

Be generous, my eyes, with your flowing tears, like a torn old waterskin carried by a rider,
Over Azd, the best of whom have been struck down—wail for a miserable existence after that!
We try to go on after losing them, but are hindered by the obstacles of death and clashing detachments.
Before Ibn Mikhnaf was killed, our condition was good, but every man one day must meet his fate some way.
He has brought tears to the eyes of the white-haired old men of his garrison,

---

(see text below, II, 1004) and al-Jarrāḥ b. ʿAbdallāh (not mentioned by Ṭabarī in this context). Ibn Aʿtham al-Kūfī does not mention ʿAttāb at all.

126. This man appears frequently in Ṭabarī as an authority for Abū Mikhnaf's authorities, but is otherwise unknown; see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 218.

127. D. c. 80 (699); see Sezgin, GAS, II, 327f. The poet was an Azdī.

and brought white to the locks of the young men before its time.
He fought on until he died the noblest of deaths, and fell to the dust on a noble cheek and brow.
Fighting off the rebels around him was a band of men of Azd, brandishing sharp swords.
May no woman ever give birth, and may no absent one return to his people, so long as he cannot return.
[880] So weep, my eye, for Mikhnaf and Ibn Mikhnaf, and for the horsemen of my people, my relatives near and distant.

Another elegy of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf by Surāqah:

The chief of the two Azds, Azd Shanū'ah and Azd 'Umān, has found his last rest, the pledge of a grave in Kāzir.[128]
He fought on until he died the noblest of deaths, with a keen, cutting sword, flashing like lightning.
And about that hill, under his banner, were felled those of a noble company who nobly fought.
Ibn Mikhnaf lost his life on the day of that encounter, when all the weak and uncaring abandoned him.
He sent support, but did not receive it; and he went to God with his robe tucked up for battle, not dressed in the garb of a traitor.

Al-Muhallab remained at Sābūr, fighting the Khārijites, for about a year.[129]

In this year, Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ, one of the Banū Imru' al-Qays,[130] revolted openly. He held the opinions of the Ṣufriyyah, and it is said that he was the first of the Ṣufriyyah to rebel.[131]

---

128. On the two Azds, who united in al-Baṣrah, see EI², s.v. Azd. Kāzir is poetic license for Kāzirūn (or Kāzarūn).

129. Three years in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (see note 121 above); eighteen months in Mubarrad, Kāmil, 677.

130. The Banū Imru' al-Qays were a subtribe of Tamīm.

131. The beginnings of the Ṣufriyyah, and the origin of their name, are unclear. Among Khārijite subsects they are considered moderates, in particular for their rejection of isti'rāḍ (indiscriminate massacre of their enemies; see note 157 below) and of condemnation of the children of unbelievers, both in contrast to the Azraqites. Al-Ash'arī, Maqālāt al-islāmiyyīn (Wiesbaden, 1963), 101, 118, makes them

The Rebellious Activities of Ṣāliḥ during This Year

Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ, one of the Banū Imru' al-Qays, made the pilgrimage in the year 75 (March–April 695), accompanied by Shabīb b. Yazīd, Suwayd, al-Baṭīn, and others like them. In this same year, 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān made the pilgrimage,[132] and Shabīb determined to assassinate him. 'Abd al-Malik received some indication of their plans and wrote to al-Ḥajjāj after his departure, ordering him to hunt them down. Ṣāliḥ used to come to al-Kūfah for a month or so at a time, meeting his companions to put them in readiness;[133] but when al-Ḥajjāj began searching for him, al-Kūfah became uncongenial to Ṣāliḥ, and he avoided it. [881] the source of all doctrinal subbranches of the Khārijites except for the Azraqites, Najdites, and Ibāḍites. See also EI[1], s.v. al-Ṣufrīya; Watt, Formative Period, 25–34. Al-Ash'arī mentions Ṣāliḥ as a purported adherent of the Ṣufriyyah but remarks that he had no distinctive doctrines of his own. He otherwise refers to him only in the context of a schism not reflected in Ṭabarī's account (Maqālāt, 118, 120–22).

---

132. See text above, II, 873, 877.

133. I.e., for revolt: li-yu'iddahum; much less likely, li-ya'idahum, "to make promises to them." Some MSS read li-yu'idda mā yaḥtāju ilayh, "to prepare what he needed (for revolt)."

The Events of the Year 76

(April 21, 695–April 9, 696)

The Events of This Year

One of these was the rebellion of Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ.[134]

The Rebellion of Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ and the Reason for It

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Alqa-

134. Ṣāliḥ's "rebellious activities" began at the end of the previous year with the abortive assassination plot against 'Abd al-Malik, but his rebellion itself broke out only in this year. Three and a half months later Ṣāliḥ was killed, and the leadership of the movement taken over by Shabīb, who proved far more formidable. The next hundred pages of Ṭabarī's text are devoted almost exclusively to a detailed account of this revolt, based mainly on Abū Mikhnaf's K. Shabīb al-Ḥarūrī wa-Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ (see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 82f., 109f.), with occasional supplementary information from other sources. Most of the other early sources available to us on Shabīb's rebellion ignore its beginning under Ṣāliḥ; for brief references to the latter, see Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 272; Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 410; Baghdādī, Farq (Cairo, 1910), 89 (two accounts, one dating the rebellion to the governorship of Bishr b. Marwān). Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 393–96, reproduces Ṭabarī. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 109–15; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 182ff.

mah[135]—Qabīṣah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Khathʿamī: The reason for his rebellion is as follows: Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ al-Tamīmī was an humble and pious man, sallow of mien,[136] and conscientious about his religious duties. He resided in Dārā[137] and the region of Mosul and the Jazīrah, where he had associates to whom he taught recitation of the Qurʾān and its interpretation[138] and delivered admonitory sermons.[139] Qabīṣah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, who was one of those who subscribed to these people's opinions, told our companions[140] that he had possession of the sermon of Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ; so they requested him to send them the text,[141] and [882] he did so. This is his sermon:

"Praise be to God, who created the heavens and the earth, and made the darkness and the light. Yet those who have disbelieved ascribe rivals to their Lord."[142] O God! We ascribe no rivals to You, we serve none but You, and none but You do we worship. Yours is the Creation and the Command, from You comes all benefit and harm, and to You is our destiny. We testify that Muḥammad is Your servant, whom You chose, and Your messenger, whom You selected and approved to convey Your messages and Your counsel for Your servants. We testify that he conveyed the message and counseled the community, summoned to the truth and acted equi-

135. D. 87 (706), the last of the Companions to die in al-Kūfah; see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 191.

136. Muṣfarr al-wajh, perhaps rather "gaunt," in either case possibly because of an ascetic diet; see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. ṣafar, where one of the etymologies suggested for the Ṣufriyyah is the sallowness (ṣufrah) of their complexions.

137. Between Mardin and Nisibis; see EI², s.v. Dārā; Le Strange, Lands, 96.

138. Yufaqqihuhum; see EI², s.v. fiḳh.

139. Yaquṣṣu ʿalayhim; "sermon" below is qaṣaṣ. On the qaṣaṣ in medieval Islam see EI², s.v. ḳāṣṣ, and J. Pedersen, "The Islamic Preacher: wāʿiẓ, mudhakkir, qāṣṣ," Ignace Goldziher Memorial Volume I (Budapest, 1948), 226–51, especially 239, where Ṣāliḥ's qaṣaṣ is partly translated. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 110f., and, on the oratory for which the Khārijites were famed, C. E. Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 38ff.

140. Aṣḥābanā; the speaker is probably Abū Mikhnaf, referring to his own authorities, including ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlqamah. Abū Mikhnaf's account of the following rebellion gains much from drawing on Khārijite authorities, such as Qabīṣah, as well as others from the government forces.

141. Kitāb.

142. Qurʾān 6:1.

tably, supported religion and strove against the polytheists, until God took him. I commend to you the fear of God, austerity in this world, desire for the afterlife, frequent recollection of death, avoidance of the sinners, and love for the believers. For austerity in this world encourages God's servant to desire what is with Him and frees his body for obedience to God; frequent recollection of death inspires the servant with fear of his Lord, so that he cries out for His succor and submits humbly to Him. Avoidance of the sinners is a duty for the believers, as God said in His book: "Do not pray over any of them who dies, ever, nor stand by his grave; they disbelieved in God and His messenger, and died as sinners."[143] Love for the believers is recommended because it is in this way that one obtains God's grace and mercy and His Paradise—may God cause us and you to be among the sincere and patient!

Indeed, it is a blessing from God on the believers that He [883] sent to them a messenger from among themselves, who taught them the Book and the wisdom, purified and sanctified them, and led them aright in their religion; he was kind and merciful to the believers until God took him away, God's blessings be upon him! Then, after him, authority was taken by the God-fearing Veracious One,[144] with the approval of the Muslims. He followed the right guidance of the messenger and continued in his way[145] until he joined God, God's mercy be upon him. He designated 'Umar as his successor, and God entrusted him with the authority over this flock. 'Umar acted in accordance with the Book of God and kept to the way[146] of the messenger of God. He begrudged his flock none of their rights and feared the reproach of no one before God, until he joined Him, God's mercy be upon him. After him, the Muslims were ruled by 'Uthmān. He expropriated the spoils, failed to enforce the Qur'ānic punishments, rendered unjust judgments, and treated the believer with

143. Qur'ān 9:84.
144. Al-Ṣiddīq, epithet of the caliph Abū Bakr; see EI², s.v. Abū Bakr.
145. Sunnah.
146. Aḥyā sunnah.

contempt and the evildoer with esteem.[147] The Muslims went to him and killed him, and God, His messenger and the upright among the believers were quit of him. After him, the people were governed by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. He did not hesitate to give men authority to judge in the affairs of God; he vacillated with regard to the people of error, and appeased and blandished them. We are quit of 'Alī and his supporters.[148]

Prepare, then—God's mercy upon you—to strive against these fractious parties and unjust leaders of error, and to go out from the abode of transience to the abode of eternity and join our believing, convinced brethren, who sold the present world for the afterworld and expended their wealth in quest of God's good pleasure in the final reckoning.[149] Be not anxious about being killed for God's sake, for being killed is easier than dying naturally. Natural death comes upon you unexpectedly, separating you from your fathers, sons, wives, [884] and this world; if your anxiety and aversion to this is too strong, then, indeed, sell your souls to God obediently, and your wealth, and you will enter Paradise in security and embrace the black-eyed houris. May God make you and us among the grateful and mindful "who are guided by the truth and by it act justly."[150]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah: During the

147. The first three of these accusations (ista'thara bi-al-fay' wa-'aṭṭala al-ḥudūd wa-jāra fī al-ḥukm) are repeated below (II, 984, and see II, 993); all are standard Khārijite complaints. See Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 40f.; Watt, Formative Period, 9–12; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 471, 477; G. R. Hawting, "The significance of the slogan lā ḥukm[a] illā lillāh and the references to the ḥudūd in the traditions about the Fitna and the murder of 'Uthmān," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 41 (1978), 453–63; and, for similar accusations against the deposed Khārijite leader Najdah b. 'Āmir, Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 173. On the Qur'ānic punishments, see EI², s.v. ḥadd.

148. The references here are to events at Ṣiffīn and afterward, when 'Alī agreed to arbitration of his dispute with Mu'āwiyah; see Watt, Formative Period, 12–20.

149. The language here is Qur'ānic and quasi-technical: "strive" is jihād, "go out" is khurūj. "Selling" (bā'ū) this world for the other paraphrases Qur'ān 4:74: "Let those fight in the way of God who sell (yashrūna) the life of this world for the other"; echoed both here and below is also Qur'ān 2:207: "And of men there is he who sells (yashrī) his soul out of desire for God's good pleasure." It is from these passages that the Khārijites took their name Shurāh, "sellers"; see R. Brünnow, Die Charidschiten unter den ersten Omayyaden (Leiden, 1884), 28f.

150. Qur'ān 7:159; see also 9:111.

time when Ṣāliḥ's associates used to come frequently to see him, he said to them one day, "I know not what you are expecting or how long you will abide. You see how injustice has become the rule and justice has been effaced. These governors only increase in their excesses and arrogance toward the people, their remoteness from right, and their effrontery before the Lord. Ready yourselves, then, and send for your brethren who desire, as you do, to reject the wrong and summon to the right. Let them come to you, and then we will meet and consider what we are going to do, and, if we are going to revolt, when we should revolt."

Ṣāliḥ's associates sent out letters and met to discuss these plans. While they were engaged in this, al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il al-Yashkurī came to them with a letter from Shabīb[151] to Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ, which read as follows:

> I have learned that you are wanting to set out; you have summoned me to that, and I am responding to you. If you are ready to do so now, you will be the shaykh of the Muslims, and we will hold no one among us as equal to you. But if you want to postpone that day, inform me of that; people die in the morning and the evening, and I cannot be sure that fate > [885] will not cut me off before I can strive against the evildoers—what a cheat that would be, and what benefit lost! May God make you and us among those whose deeds are performed for the sake of God and His good pleasure, the blessing of gazing at His face, and the companionship of the righteous in the Abode of Peace. Peace be upon you.

When al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il came to Ṣāliḥ with this letter from Shabīb, Ṣāliḥ wrote back to him as follows:

> Your letter with your news was slow in reaching me, to the point that I had become concerned; for a man from among the Muslims had informed me that you had set out and were on your way. Now we praise God for the decree of our Lord, for your messenger has brought me your letter, and I have understood all that is in it. We are equipped and fully prepared to take the field; I have not done so until now only because I was waiting for you. Come to us, then, and let us then begin the revolt whenever you please; for you are one of those whose opinion is indispensable and without whom things cannot be decided. Peace be upon you.

151. For full references on Shabīb, see note 178 below.

When this letter reached Shabīb, he sent to a number of his associates to come join him. These included his brother, Muṣād[152] b. Yazīd b. Nu'aym, al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il al-Yashkurī, al-Ṣaqr b. Ḥātim of the Banū Taym b. Shaybān, Ibrāhīm b. Ḥujr Abū al-Ṣuqayr of the Banū Muḥallim, and al-Faḍl b. 'Āmir of the Banū Dhuhl b. Shaybān.[153] Then he set out and came to Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ in Dārā. When he met him, he said, "Let us begin the revolt, may God have mercy on you, for, by God, the right path[154] only becomes more obliterated, and the evildoers only become more tyrannical." Ṣāliḥ sent his messengers abroad among his associates, setting the time of the revolt for the night of Wednesday, 1 Ṣafar 76 (May 21, 695).[155] They began to assemble, to equip and prepare themselves to raise the revolt on that night; and on that night they all assembled with him as appointed. [886]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ al-Azdī: By God, I was with Shabīb in al-Madā'in[156] when he told us that they were going to revolt. When we were ready to raise the revolt, we all assembled with Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ on the night he set out. My opinion was that we should slaughter the people indiscriminately,[157] because of all the sin, oppression, and corruption in the earth that I saw. I went to Ṣāliḥ and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, how do you intend to proceed with these evildoers? Will 152. Or Maṣād; see Ibn Ḥajar, Tabṣīr (Cairo, 1964–67), 1293.

153. All of these men, with the exception of al-Muḥallil, belonged to clans of Shaybān b. Tha'labah; see Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 302. Shabīb and his brother were of the Dhuhl b. Shaybān; see the genealogy in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 454. If al-Muḥallil belonged to the Yashkur b. Bakr (see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 1265), then they were all members of the Bakr b. Wā'il confederation, which included the Banū Shaybān.

154. Sunnah.

155. Friday.

156. The old Sasanian capital of Ctesiphon on the Tigris, about eighty miles northeast of al-Kūfah, still at this time an important administrative center. See EI², s.v. al-Madā'in.

157. Isti'rāḍ al-nās. This term has clearly here its developed meaning of "massacre" rather than the earlier one of "interrogation"; see EI², s.v. isti'rāḍ, and note 131 above.

we kill them before summoning them to the faith, or will we summon them before fighting them? Let me give you my opinion about them before you give me yours. I think that we should kill everyone who disagrees with us, near and far; for we are taking up arms against people who wander in error, tyrants and oppressors who have abandoned the command of God and fallen completely under the control of Satan."

But he said, "No, on the contrary, we will summon them. By my life, it is only those who hold your opinions who will respond, while those who condemn you will surely fight you. Summoning them will silence their argument and strengthen ours against them." Then I asked him, "And what is your view on those we fight and overcome? What do you say about their lives and property?" He replied, "If we kill them and despoil them, that is our right; but if we forgo doing so and let them be, that is also our right and we will be rewarded." He spoke well and truly, God's mercy upon him and upon us!

According to Abū Mikhnaf—a man from the Banū Muḥallim: On the night they set out, Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ said to his associates:

> Fear God, you servants of God, and be not overhasty to fight any one of the people, unless they be hostile people who intend you harm. You are rebelling only out of wrath for God, because His ordinances have been flouted, the earth filled > [887] with disobedience, blood spilled unjustly, and property taken wrongfully. Do not reproach people for deeds and then do them yourselves; for you are yourselves responsible for all that you do. Now most of you are on foot, but there are riding beasts belonging to Muḥammad b. Marwān here in this district. Start here, then, and raid them, so that you may mount your footsoldiers and thereby strengthen yourselves against the enemy.

They set out, and in that same night seized the riding beasts and mounted their foot upon them, so that their footsoldiers became horsemen. They remained in the area of Dārā for thirteen nights, and the people of Dārā, Nisibis, and Sinjar fortified themselves against them. On the night Ṣāliḥ set out, he set out with 120 men, or, according to some, 110.

Word of this revolt came to Muḥammad b. Marwān, who was at that time the amīr of the Jazīrah.[158] He minimized the problem, and sent against them 'Adī b. 'Adī b. 'Umayrah of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. Mu'āwiyah b. Thawr,[159] with five hundred men. 'Adī said to him, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! Would you send me against the man who has been at the head of the Khārijites for twenty years, and who is accompanied in his rebellion by men from the Rabī'ah[160] who came up against me[161] in the past and used to test their strength against us? Against such as these, one of whose footsoldiers is worth more than a hundred horsemen, would you send me with five hundred men?" Muḥammad replied, "Well, then, I will give you another five hundred, and you can go against them with a thousand."

'Adī set out from Ḥarrān with a thousand men. This was the first army that marched against Ṣāliḥ. 'Adī marched toward him as if he were being driven to his death. 'Adī was a pious man. He proceeded as far as Dawghān,[162] where he stopped the men, and sent ahead secretly to Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ a man of the Banū Khālid of the Banū al-Wirthah named Ziyād b. 'Abdallāh.[163] This man [888] said to Ṣāliḥ, "'Adī has sent me to you to ask you to leave this land and go to another land and fight the people there; for 'Adī is reluctant to engage you." Ṣāliḥ replied, "Return to him and tell him: If you subscribe to our opinions, give us an indication of that which we will recognize, and we will set out this very night, leaving this land to you and going to another. But if you subscribe to the opinions of the tyrants and the evil imāms, we will see what we decide to do; if we wish, we will attack you, and if we wish, we will turn to someone else."

The messenger went to 'Adī and reported this message to him. 'Adī said, "Return to him and tell him: By God, I am not of your opinion, but I am reluctant to fight you or anyone else; so fight 158. See Balādhurī, Ansāb, V, 186.

159. Thawr is the Southern tribe of Kindah; see EI², s.v. Kinda.

160. The Northern tribal confederation of which Bakr b. Wā'il was the leading component; see EI², s.v. Bakr b. Wā'il.

161. Reading samaw li- for text summū li-, "were named to me"; see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. samā.

162. A market town between Ra's al-'Ayn and Nisibis; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 621.

163. According to the Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 100, the Banū al-Wirthah were a subdivision of Dhuhl b. Shaybān; this man was thus a clansman of Ṣāliḥ's men.

someone other than me." Then Ṣāliḥ said to his associates, "Mount!" and they mounted; he held the man captive with him until they had set out, and then let him go. Ṣāliḥ proceeded with his associates until he came to 'Adī b. 'Adī b. 'Umayrah in the market of Dawghān, while the latter was performing the forenoon prayer. Without warning, the Khārijite cavalry were bearing down on his men, and when they saw him coming, they began to shout to one another.

Ṣāliḥ put Shabīb with a detachment of his forces on his right and sent Suwayd b. Sulaym al-Hindī of the Banū Shaybān with a detachment to his left; he himself stood with a detachment in the center. As they approached 'Adī's men, he saw that they were not formed in ranks, but running around in confusion, whereupon he ordered Shabīb to attack them. Then Suwayd attacked them as well, and this finished them; they would not fight. 'Adī b. 'Adī had his mount brought to him while he was praying, and he mounted [889] it and rode off blindly. Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ proceeded on to 'Adī's camp and took possession of what was there.

The remnants of 'Adī's men, and his leading commanders, went back to Muḥammad b. Marwān, who was furious. Muḥammad summoned Khālid b. Jaz' al-Sulamī and sent him off with fifteen hundred men, and summoned al-Ḥārith b. Ja'wanah of the Banū Rabī'ah b. 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah and sent him off with another fifteen hundred men.[164] To the two of them he said, "March against this foul little group of Khārijites, and do so quickly. Quicken the march, for whichever of you gets there first will have the command over the other."

They took their leave of him and marched out quickly. They made inquiries about Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ and were told that he had set out toward Āmid.[165] They marched in pursuit and reached him at Āmid, where he was quartered with the people. They arrived at night and dug defensive trenches. When they arrived, they were still two separate forces, each commander by himself, with his men. Ṣāliḥ directed Shabīb against al-Ḥārith b. Ja'wanah

164. The Banū Sulaym and Banū 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah both belonged to Qays 'Aylān, one of the two major subgroups of Muḍar, which with Rabī'ah constituted the Northern tribes; see EI², s.v. Ḳays 'Aylān.

165. Modern Diyarbakr; see EI², s.v. Diyār Bakr.

al-ʿĀmirī with half his forces and rode himself against Khālid b. Jaz' al-Sulamī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Muḥallimī: They reached us at the beginning of the afternoon prayer time. Ṣāliḥ led us in performing the afternoon prayer, then set us in battle array against them. We fought as hard as any people have ever fought, and, by God, it began to look as if we would win. One of our men would attack ten of theirs and overcome them, or he would attack twenty, with the same result; and their cavalry began to lose ground to ours. Seeing this, their two commanders dismounted, ordering most of their men to dismount as well. Then we began to have trouble achieving our objectives with them. When we attacked them, their infantry met us with lances and their archers rained arrows upon us, their cavalry charging us all the while. We fought them until evening, when the darkness finally separated us. They had wounded many of us, and we of them; they had killed about thirty of our men, while we had killed more than seventy of theirs. By God, by the time evening arrived, we were sick of them, [890] as were they of us, and we maintained our positions before them, neither side advancing against the other; with evening, they withdrew to their camp, and we to ours. We prayed, rested, and ate some of our bread. Then Ṣāliḥ summoned Shabīb and his leading commanders, and said, "My dear friends, what do you think we should do?" Shabīb said, "My opinion is that we have encountered these men and fought them, and now that they have taken refuge behind their trench, I do not think we should continue with them." Ṣāliḥ said, "That is my opinion, also." Accordingly, they set out under cover of darkness, traveling across the land of the Jazīrah until they reached the Mosul region. They then crossed through it as well and continued on until they had come into al-Daskarah.[166]

When word of this reached al-Ḥajjāj, he sent against them al-Ḥārith b. ʿUmayrah b. Dhī al-Mishʿār al-Hamdānī[167] with three thousand Kūfans, one thousand from the regular forces and two thousand from the troops that al-Ḥajjāj had hired.[168] Al-Ḥārith 166. A district and town on the Diyālā River, northeast of al-Madā'in; see EI², s.v. Daskara; Le Strange, Lands, 62, 80.

167. Hamdān was a Southern tribe; see EI², s.v. Hamdān.

168. Al-muqātilah al-ūlā and al-farḍ alladhī faraḍa lahum al-Ḥajjāj respec-set out, but when he drew near al-Daskarah, Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ withdrew toward Jalūlā'[169] and Khāniqīn.[170] Al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah pursued him as far as a village called al-Mudabbaj[171] in the Mosul region, on the border between it and the Jūkhā region.[172] Ṣāliḥ at this time had ninety men with him. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah arranged his forces, putting Abū al-Rawwāgh al-Shākirī[173] on his right and al-Zubayr b. al-Arwaḥ al-Tamīmī on his left, and then, after the afternoon prayer, he attacked. Ṣāliḥ had arranged his forces in three squadrons,[174] one under his own command, one under Shabīb on his right, and one under Suwayd [891] b. Sulaym on his left, each squadron consisting of thirty men.

When al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah charged against them with all his men, Suwayd b. Sulaym was thrown back, but Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ stood his ground and was killed. Shabīb fought until he was knocked from his horse and fell among some infantry. He charged them and they fell back, and he was able to reach Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ's position, where he found him dead. He called, "To me, O company of Muslims!" and they rallied around him. Then he said to his men, "Stand all of you back to back and thrust at your enemies if they advance on you, and let us make our way into that fortress, where we can decide what to do." This they did, and Shabīb entered the fortress with seventy men.

Al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah surrounded them. It was now evening, and he said to his men, "Burn down the gate until it is reduced to tively. On farḍ, troops not on the muster roll and paid contractually, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, glossarium, s.v. farḍ, and Fries, Heereswesen, 24; they tended to be younger men, as is clear from the incident below.

---

169. An important town about thirty miles northeast of al-Daskarah; see EI², s.v. Djalūlā'.

170. A town about thirty miles again northeast of Jalūlā'; see EI², s.v. Khāniḳīn.

171. Or al-Mudabbij. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 448, records it without vowels and apparently knows of it only from this incident.

172. East of the Tigris, stretching from Khāniqīn south to Khūzistān; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 143.

173. Or Abū al-Ruwā' (see Ibn Ḥajar, Tabṣīr, 612). See text above, II, 46–54, for the alternative spelling and for this man's previous experience combating the Khārijites. The Banū Shākir b. Rabī'ah were a branch of Hamdān; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 524.

174. Sg. kurdūs; see WKAS, s.v. According to the lexicographers, a kurdūs was smaller than a katībah (note 115 above), but see text below, II, 959, where the terms seem to be synonyms, and Fries, Heereswesen, 42.

burning embers, and then leave it; they will not be able to get out until we come to them in the morning and kill them." They burned the gate and then went off to their camp. Shabīb was looking down on them, with a group of his men, when one of the men from the hired troops said, "You sons of whores, has God not abased you?" They replied, "Indeed He has not, you sinners; you fight us back when we fight you because God has blinded you to the truth that we possess. What then is your excuse to God for slandering our mothers?" But to this the more temperate among them said, "This is just talk by some foolish youth among us, by God, and we neither like it nor consider it acceptable."

Then Shabīb said to his men, "What are you all waiting for here? By God, if these men come back to you early in the morning, it will be the end of you." They said, "Give us your orders." He said, "Night veils calamities.[175] Render the oath of allegiance to me or to whomever you wish among yourselves; then let us go out and attack them in their camp, since they are feeling secure [892] against any such thing from you. I pray that God may give you victory over them." They said, "Extend your hand, so that we may render you the oath of allegiance," and they did so.[176]

When they were about to go out, they found that their gate had been reduced to burning embers; but they managed to get across them by taking felt saddle-blankets, soaking them in water, and then throwing them over the embers. Al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah and the troops in his camp were taken completely by surprise to find Shabīb and his men laying about them with their swords in the heart of their camp. Al-Ḥārith fought until he fell and was carried by his men as they retreated, leaving the camp and everything in it to the Khārijites. Then they returned to al-Madā'in. This army was the first one to be defeated by Shabīb.

Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ fell on Tuesday, 17 Jumādā I of this year [September 2, 695].[177]

---

175. For the proverb, see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 127.

176. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 272, Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 410, and Baghdādī, Farq, 89, Ṣāliḥ appointed Shabīb his successor before his death.

177. Thursday. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 272, 17 Jumādā II [October 2, a Saturday]. Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 410, reports that later Khārijites used to shave their heads at his tomb.

In this year, Shabīb entered al-Kūfah, accompanied by his wife Ghazālah.[178]

Shabīb's Entry into al-Kūfah and His Dealings with al-Ḥajjāj There, and Why Shabīb Did This

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah—Qabīṣah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Khath'amī: The reason for this was as follows: When Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ was killed at al-Mudabbaj and Ṣāliḥ's associates rendered the oath of allegiance to Shabīb, the [893] latter went up to the Mosul region, where he met Salāmah b. Sayyār b. al-Maḍā' al-Taymī of the Taym Shaybān and summoned him to rebel along with him. He was already acquainted with Salāmah, as the latter had been registered on the military roll and participated in the expeditions.[179] Salāmah agreed to support him on the condition that he be allowed to pick out thirty of his horsemen, with whom he would then be gone for not more than precisely three nights. Shabīb agreed, and Salāmah selected the thirty horsemen and led them off toward the 'Anazah.[180] His object was to wreak his vengeance on them for murdering his brother Faḍālah.

The story behind this is that Faḍālah had rebelled with eighteen

---

178. Ṭabarī's account of Shabīb's rebellion is by far the most detailed known; it is summarized by Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 396–416, 419–33, and serves as the basis for accounts in Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 115–48, and Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 184–91. A quite different account appears in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 84–92, omitting any reference to Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ and identifying the first two commanders sent out (by al-Ḥajjāj) as 'Ubaydah b. Mikhrāq al-Qaynī and Yazīd b. Hubayrah al-Muḥāribī, neither of whom is mentioned by Ṭabarī. Brief accounts in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 272–75, and Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 328, combine elements of both versions, as does the biography in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 454–58, which draws on other sources as well. See also Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 410f.; Baghdādī, Farq, 89–92 (garbled); EI[1], s.v. Shabīb. Shabīb's genealogy back to the clan of Dhuhl b. Shaybān is given by Ibn al-Sikkīt, Iṣlāḥ al-manṭiq (Cairo, 1956), 324f., and his kunyah by Baghdādī, Farq, 89, as Abū al-Ṣahārā (or al-Ṣaḥārī) (confirmed by text below, II, 1633f.). Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (followed by Baghdādī) precedes his account with a report that Shabīb had gone earlier to Damascus and attempted to get a farḍ from 'Abd al-Malik through the intercession of Rawḥ b. Zinbā'; when 'Abd al-Malik refused, saying he did not know him, Shabīb replied, "I hope, God willing, he will know me in the future!"

179. Maghāzī, against non-Muslim territory. Why this implied prior acquaintance is not clear.

180. A Rabī'ah tribe; see EI[2], s.v. 'Anaza.

men and stopped at a well called al-Shajarah in the region of al-Jāl.[181] There was a great tamarisk tree there, and there were 'Anazah. When the 'Anazah saw him, they said to one another, "Let us kill them, and in the morning take them to the amīr; we will receive a generous reward." They agreed on this, but the Banū Naṣr, who were Faḍālah's mother's clan, said, "By God's life, we will not aid you in killing our son!" Nevertheless, the 'Anazah rode out against Faḍālah's men, fought them and killed them, and brought their heads to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān. As a reward, 'Abd al-Malik let them move into Bāniqiyā[182] and assigned them stipends, something they had rarely had before.[183]

Salāmah b. Sayyār recited these verses on the murder of his brother Faḍālah and the failure of his maternal kin to defend him:

I would not have imagined that a young man's maternal kin would deliver him over to the fall of a blade, until Naṣr did what it did.

The rebellion of Salāmah's brother Faḍālah preceded that of Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ and Shabīb; therefore, when Salāmah rendered the oath of allegiance to Shabīb, he imposed on him this condition. He rode out with the thirty horsemen until he reached the 'Anazah and began killing them in one settlement after another [894] until he came to a party of them that included his maternal aunt. She was bent over a son of hers, a boy in his adolescence; and she bared her breast to Salāmah and said, "I adjure you by the blood ties of this, Salāmah!" He replied, "No, by God! I have not seen Faḍālah since he halted at the great tree of al-Shajarah"—meaning his brother—"Now stand away from him, or I will take my lance to your withered dug." At that, she stood aside from her son, and Salāmah killed him.

---

181. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 10, mentions two places with this name, one in Ādharbayjān and the other, pronounced al-Jāl or al-Gēl, about four farsakhs south of al-Madā'in. The latter, if either, seems the more likely to be meant here; but if the al-Jāl mentioned directly below is the same place, one would expect it to be rather somewhere north of the Diyālā River.

182. Anzalahum Bāniqiyā. This was at that time a fertile area on the western branch of the Euphrates below al-Kūfah and al-Ḥīrah; see A. Musil, The Middle Euphrates (New York, 1927), 288f.

183. Faraḍa lahum wa-lam takun lahum farā'iḍ qabla dhālika illā qalīlah; see note 168 above.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Bakr of the Banū Taym b. Shaybān: Shabīb and his companions then turned toward Rādhān.[184] When a group of the Banū Taym b. Shaybān heard of his approach, they withdrew in flight before him, along with a small number of other people, going as far as the monastery of Khurrazād,[185] near Ḥawlāyā,[186] where they stopped. There were about three thousand of them, while Shabīb had only some seventy men or a few more, but when he came among them, they feared him and fortified themselves against him. Then Shabīb set out by night, accompanied by twelve horsemen from among his companions, to go to his mother, who was camped in the foothills of Sātīdamā,[187] staying in one of the large hair-tents of the bedouin. Shabīb said, "I am going to bring my mother and put her in my camp so she will never be parted from me until one of us dies." Meanwhile, two men of the Banū Taym b. Shaybān, fearing for their lives, left the monastery and went out to join a group of their people who were camped at al-Jāl, about an hour's journey from them by day.[188] When Shabīb led out that party of his—there [895] were twelve of them[189]—to meet his mother in the foothills, he unexpectedly ran into a group of the Banū Taym b. Shaybān heedlessly encamped with their herds, not imagining that Shabīb would pass their way, because of where they were, or be aware of them. But Shabīb attacked them with these horsemen of his and killed thirty of their shaykhs, including Ḥawtharah b. Asad and

184. Apparently at this time a district north of the Diyālā and east of the Tigris, although the sources are difficult to harmonize. See J. Markwart, Südarmenien und die Tigrisquellen (Wien, 1930), 277, and J. M. Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne (Beirut, 1965–68), III, 16 (map), 76–81, 257–60.

185. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 422, mentions a town of Khurrazād Ardashīr (unvocalized) in the region of Mosul. Some MSS read Kh.r.dāb.

186. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 366, mentions a village of this name in the Nahrawān (canal) region. At II, 932 below, the Ḥawlāyā is a river (or canal) in Upper Rādhān, in Jūkhā.

187. The modern Jabal Ḥamrīn, which is cut by the Tigris north of Takrīt and extends northwest and southeast from there. See Markwart, Südarmenien, 274–78; EI², s.v. Ḥamrīn; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 16 (map).

188. Fa-laḥiqā bi-jamā'ah min qawmihimā wa-hum nuzūl bi-al-Jāl minhum 'alā masīrat sā'ah min al-nahār.

189. Wa-kharaja Shabīb fī ulā'ika al-raht fī awwalihim wa-hum ithnā 'ashar. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 394, omits in his paraphrase any reference to the two men, and says simply fa-sāra bihim sā'ah, "and (Shabīb) had traveled with (his twelve men) for an hour, (when . . .)"

Wabarah b. 'Āṣim, who had left the monastery and joined those at al-Jāl. Shabīb then went on to fetch his mother from the foothills and brought her back with him.[190]

Meanwhile, one of the men in the monastery, who was of the Bakr b. Wā'il, came out to speak to Shabīb's men from above. Shabīb had left his brother, Muṣād b. Yazīd, in charge of his men; the man who came out to them was named Sallām b. Ḥayyān. He said to them, "You people, the Qur'ān stands between us. Have you not heard God's words, 'And if any one of the unbelievers seeks your protection, then grant it him, so that he may hear the word of God, then convey him to his place of security'?"[191] They said, "Indeed we have." He said to them, "Then leave us alone until morning. We will come out to you then, with a safe-conduct from you so that we may not be subject to any treatment from you to which we object; and you can present this position of yours to us. If we accept it, then you have no rights to our lives and possessions, and we will be your brethren; if we do not accept it, you will return us to our place of security, and then proceed as you please with regard to what is between you and us." They replied, "We will grant you this."

The next morning, they went out to the Khārijites, and Shabīb's men stated their views to them and described their position. They accepted it in its entirety and joined up with them, becoming a full part of their group. When Shabīb came back, his men ex- [896] plained to him how this reconciliation had taken place, and he said, "You have acted well and correctly, and been granted a successful outcome."

Then Shabīb took to the road again, accompanied by one group, while another group remained where they were.[192] Among those who accompanied him on that day was Ibrāhīm b. Ḥujr al-Muḥallimī Abū al-Ṣuqayr, who had been staying with the Banū

190. On Shabīb's mother Jahīzah, see Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 487, and text below, II, 976. Ṭabarī says nothing more about her accompanying Shabīb on his campaigns, but Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 87, and others attest to her presence at the occupation of al-Kūfah; see note 439 below.

191. Qur'ān 9:6. In a similar anecdote in Mubarrad, Kāmil, 528, Wāṣil b. 'Aṭā' appeals to the same verse; he, however, unlike the people here, does not join up in the end.

192. Wa-aqāmat ṭā'ifah jāniḥah; Ṭabarī, glossarium, s.v. janaḥa, suggests "inclined (toward peace)," but perhaps the meaning is rather "on the sidelines."

Taym b. Shaybān. Shabīb passed through the nearer parts of the Mosul region and the borderlands of Jūkhā, then went up toward Ādharbayjān. At this point, Sufyān b. Abī al-'Āliyah al-Khath'amī appeared with some cavalry. He had been ordered to lead them into Ṭabaristān but then ordered to return, and was on his way back with some thousand horsemen, having made a truce with the ruler of Ṭabaristān.[193]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah—Sufyān b. Abī al-'Āliyah al-Khath'amī: I received this letter from al-Ḥajjāj:

> Proceed to al-Daskarah with the men you have with you and wait there until you are joined by the force of al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah al-Hamdānī Ibn Dhī al-Mish'ār, the man who killed Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ, as well as the cavalry scouts.[194] Then go and find Shabīb, and attack him.

Upon receipt of this letter, Sufyān proceeded to al-Daskarah and halted there, while proclamation was made to the army of al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah in al-Kūfah and al-Madā'in that no contractual obligation would protect any man belonging to the army of al-Ḥārith b. 'Umayrah who did not go join Sufyān b. Abī al-'Āliyah in al-Daskarah.

They went out to join him. The cavalry scouts also arrived, five hundred strong under the command of Sawrah b. Abjar al-Tamīmī of the Banū Abān b. Dārim. Altogether, only about fifty men failed to show up. Sawrah sent ahead to Sufyān b. Abī al-'Āliyah, saying, "Do not set out with the army until I come to [897] you." But Sufyān hurried off in pursuit of Shabīb and caught up with him at Khāniqīn, at the foot of a mountain. He put Khāzim b. Sufyān al-Khath'amī of the Banū 'Amr b. Shahrān[195] in charge of his right flank and 'Adī b. 'Umayrah al-Shaybānī[196] in charge of his left. Shabīb showed himself before them but then withdrew

193. The iṣbahbadh, first mentioned in a definite historical context two years later, by Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 329; see EI², s.v. ispahbadh, and note 596 below.

194. Khayl al-manāẓir; see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. manẓarah: "a place on the top of a mountain, where a person observes and watches the enemy."

195. On the Khath'am, associated with southern tribes but sometimes given a northern genealogy, and the Shahrān clan, see EI², s.v. Khath'am.

196. On the basis of the name 'Adī b. 'Adī b. 'Umayrah al-Kindī thumma al-Shaybānī in the text below, II, 921, one may assume that this is the 'Adī b. 'Adī already mentioned, although a clan of the Kindah named Shaybān is unknown.

from them as if avoiding an engagement. He had put his brother Muṣād with fifty men in an ambush party in a depressed area of the terrain, and when Sufyān's men had seen him, he assembled his forces and set off across the foothills heading east. They said, "The enemy of God has fled! After him!" 'Adī b. 'Umayrah al-Shaybānī warned them, "Do not hurry after them, men, before we can travel through the area and explore it. If they have set an ambush for us, our precautions will have been well taken; if not, we will still be able to pursue them." But the men would not listen, and hurried after them. When Shabīb saw that they had passed the place of ambush, he turned around against them; and when the men in the ambush saw that they had passed them, they sprang out against them as well. Thus Shabīb was attacking them from in front, and the ambush clamoring behind them, and they were defeated before anyone lifted a sword against them. But Ibn Abī al-'Āliyah stood his ground with some two hundred men and offered them a good, stiff fight until he thought that he had extracted his due from[197] Shabīb and his companions.

At this point, Suwayd b. Sulaym asked his companions, "Does any among you know the commander of these men, Ibn Abī al-'Āliyah? By God, if I find out which one he is, I will make every effort to kill him!" Shabīb replied, "Few people know him as well as I. Do you see the man on the horse with the blaze, there beyond the bowmen? That is he. But if it is him you are after, do not go [898] just yet." Then he said, "Qa'nab, you take twenty men and go take them from behind." Qa'nab took twenty men and went up around them, and when they saw that he was intending to come at them from behind, they began to break ranks and slip away. Then Suwayd b. Sulaym attacked Sufyān b. Abī al-'Āliyah. First he thrust at him with his lance, but neither man's weapon found its target. Then they fought with their swords. Then they seized hold of each other and fell wrestling to the ground. Then Sufyān's men held back, and Shabīb attacked them and they were thrown back. A servant boy of Sufyān's named Ghazwān came to him, dismounted from his horse, and said, "Mount, master." Sufyān mounted and was surrounded by Shabīb's men. Ghazwān, who had been carrying his standard, fought to defend him and was killed. Sufyān b. Abī al-ʿĀliyah rode off to Bābil Mahrūdh,[198] where he halted and wrote to al-Ḥajjāj as follows:

197. Intaṣafa min; other MSS read sayaẓharu 'alā or sayaẓfaru bi-, "he would defeat."

> I hereby inform the amīr—may God cause him to prosper!—that I pursued these heretics and caught up with them at Khāniqīn. I engaged them in battle, and God smote their faces and granted us the victory over them. Then, while we were still enjoying our victory, there came to us men who had not been with them before, and attacked our men and routed them. I, however, with some men of religious conviction and fortitude, dismounted and fought them until I fell among the dead and was carried wounded off the field. I was brought to Bābil Mahrūdh, and am there now. The troops which the amīr sent me arrived, except for Sawrah b. Abjar. He did not come to me and was not present there with me; but when I arrived in Bābil Mahrūdh, he came to me saying I know not what, excusing himself with no excuse at all. Peace.

[899] When al-Ḥajjāj read this letter, he said, "Who has done as this man has, or shown such valor? He has done well!" Then he wrote him as follows:

> You have done well when tested and carried out your duty. When you are able to do so without pain, come to your people to receive your reward. Peace.

To Sawrah b. Abjar, al-Ḥajjāj wrote as follows:

> O son of the mother of Sawrah! It was unworthy of you to disregard my order and fail to join my troops. When this letter comes to you, send one of your stalwart men to the cavalry that is in al-Madā'in to choose five hundred men from it and bring them to you. Then lead them out to meet these heretics. Be resolute and use strategy against your enemy, for the best part of war is good strategy. Peace.

---

198. Mahrūdh was a subdistrict (ṭassūj) east of al-Madā'in, in the same district (kūrah, astān) as al-Daskarah and Jalūlā'; see Le Strange, Lands, 80. Bābil was presumably a town there, distinguished from Bābil al-Kūfah (Babylon); its dihqān, or resident lord, is mentioned below, II, 916, 942.

When Sawrah received the letter of al-Ḥajjāj, he sent 'Adī b. 'Umayrah to al-Madā'in. There were a thousand horsemen there, and he chose five hundred of them. Then he went to see 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Uṣayfīr, who was then amīr of al-Madā'in for his first time. The latter greeted him and gave him a thousand dirhams, a riding mount, and garments. Departing from him, 'Adī set out with his companions and brought them to Sawrah b. Abjar in Bābil Mahrūdh. Sawrah then went out in search of Shabīb. Shabīb was moving about in Jūkhā, while Sawrah tried to track him down. But then Shabīb came to al-Madā'in. The people of al-Madā'in fortified themselves against him and took precautions against the frailty of the ancient buildings in al-Madā'in.[199] Shabīb entered al-Madā'in and seized many of the riding beasts of the troops there; and he killed anyone who appeared and did not stay indoors.

Then word was brought to him that Sawrah b. Abjar was on his [900] way to him, so he and his companions departed and went to al-Nahrawān,[200] where they halted, performed their ablutions, and prayed. Then they visited the places where their brethren had been killed by 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. They asked their brethren for forgiveness and declared themselves quit of 'Alī and his associates; and they wept for a long time. Then they went out and cut the bridge at al-Nahrawān and took up positions on its eastern end. Sawrah, meanwhile, advanced as far as Qaṭrāthā,[201] where his spies came and informed him of Shabīb's position at al-Nahrawān. He summoned his chief officers and said to them:

> Hardly ever have these men been encountered directly or in the open without extracting their due from you and getting the better of you. Now, being informed that they are only a few more than a hundred, I have decided to make a selection among you and march out with three hundred of the strong-

199. Reading taḥadhdharū wahy abniyat al-Madā'in al-ūlā for taḥarrazū wahy (emended by the editors to wa-wahiya) etc.; see Freytag, Lexicon Arabico-Latinum (Halle, 1830–37), s.v. taḥadhdhara.

200. The town of al-Nahrawān was at the bridge over the al-Nahrawān canal, one stage east of the Tigris on the great Khurāsān road; see Le Strange, Lands, 61. On the battle of al-Nahrawān in 38 (658), in which 'Alī inflicted a bloody defeat on the Khārijites, see text above, I, 3367ff.

201. Spelling and location uncertain.

est and bravest of you, and to come upon them now, when they are secure in their assumption that you are spending the night here. By God, I pray that God may strike them down on the spot where their brethren were struck down at al-Nahrawān before.

They replied, "Proceed as you wish!" Leaving Ḥāzim b. Qudāmah al-Khath'amī in charge of his army, he selected from his forces three hundred men noted for their strength, endurance, and courage, and set out with them for al-Nahrawān. But Shabīb, before retiring, had put the guard on alert; and when Sawrah's forces drew near them, they sent warning of them, and the men mounted their horses and arranged their ranks. By the time Sawrah and his forces arrived, they found them alerted and ready.

Sawrah and his forces charged them, but they withstood the attack and fought until Sawrah and his forces gave way. Then [901] Shabīb raised the cry to his men and charged them until they left him the field; and his men charged with him. As he fought, Shabīb recited:

He who fucks a donkey fucks an expert fucker!
Two stones colliding with each other![202]

Sawrah returned to his army, his horsemen and men of strength defeated, and had them break camp and set off toward al-Madā'in; he reached them after having packed up and gained a lead on Shabīb.[203] Shabīb came in pursuit, hoping to catch up with him and attack and defeat his army as he had already defeated him, and he pressed with all speed after them. But Sawra's men reached al-Madā'in and entered it, and when Shabīb reached the houses of al-Madā'in and caught up with them, the men had gone inside. Then Ibn Abī 'Uṣayfīr came out with the people of al-Madā'in, and the people shot at Shabīb's men with arrows and threw stones down on them from the roofs of the houses.

Shabīb then turned away from al-Madā'in with his men and passed through Kalwādhā,[204] where he found many riding beasts

202. That is, you have more than met your match. Both lines are proverbial and do not normally appear together; see Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 160, and II, 232f.

203. Fa-dafa'a ilayhim wa-qad taḥammala wa-ta'addā al-ṭarīq alladhī fīhi Shabīb.

204. Some fifteen miles north of al-Madā'in, just south of Baghdad; see *EI*², s.v. Kalwādhā.

of al-Ḥajjāj's and took them. Leaving Kalwādhā, he traveled through the region of Jūkhā and then went on toward Takrīt.[205] In al-Madā'in, meanwhile, the people threw those troops into a panic, saying to them, "See how Shabīb has drawn near! He is intending to attack the people of al-Madā'in tonight!" When they heard this, most of the troops left and returned to al-Kūfah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah al-Khath'amī: By God, they fled from al-Madā'in, saying, "We will [902] be attacked tonight!" when all the while Shabīb was in Takrīt! Then, when these defeated troops came to al-Ḥajjāj, he sent out al-Jazl b. Sa'īd b. Shuraḥbīl b. 'Amr al-Kindī.[206]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ al-'Absī[207] and Fuḍayl b. Khadīj al-Kindī: When the defeated troops came to al-Ḥajjāj, he said, "May God withhold his blessings from Sawrah! The man has wasted the army and the troops[208] and gone out to attack the Khārijites at night. By God, I shall give him a harsh requital for this!" He did have him imprisoned later, although he was eventually pardoned.[209]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Fuḍayl b. Khadīj: Al-Ḥajjāj summoned al-Jazl, whose real name was 'Uthmān b. Sa'īd, and said to him, "Prepare to take the field against these heretics. When you encounter them, do not be overhasty, like those who act rashly, nor hold back, like the weak and timorous. Do you understand? What a man you are, you brother of the Banū 'Amr b. Mu'āwiyah!"[210] Al-Jazl said, "Yes, may God cause the amīr to prosper, I understand." Then al-Ḥajjāj said, "Go, then, and camp at Dayr 'Abd al-Raḥmān[211] until the men come to you." Al-Jazl said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, please do not send with me

---

205. Another hundred miles up the Tigris, on the borders of the province of Mosul; see Le Strange, Lands, 57.

206. Al-Jazl means "having sound judgment," or "generous." This man's real name was 'Uthmān, as noted below.

207. This is the same man as Abū al-Zuhayr al-'Absī, above, II, 873, 875; see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 214.

208. Al-'askar wa-al-jund. The distinction between the two here is not clear.

209. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 272, mentions Sawrah as Shabīb's first opponent after the death of Ṣāliḥ, but provides no details, and then names the next commander as "Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Kindī," apparently a distortion of al-Jazl's name. Other early authors mention neither name.

210. On this clan of Kindah, see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 836.

211. Placed just north of al-Kūfah by Ṣ. al-'Alī, "Mintaqat al-Kūfah," Sumer 21 (1965), 240; see also EI², s.v. Dayr 'Abd al-Raḥmān.

any men from those broken and defeated troops; fear has entered their hearts, and I am afraid that none of them will be of any use to you and the Muslims." Al-Ḥajjāj replied, "You are granted this; it seems to me that you have considered well and been rightly led."

Then al-Ḥajjāj summoned the officials in charge of the military rolls and said, "Select an expeditionary force from among the troops[212] and call up four thousand of them, a thousand men from each quarter; and be quick about it!" The marshals were assembled, and the officials in charge of the military rolls sat and [903] selected the expeditionary force, calling up four thousand. Then al-Ḥajjāj ordered them to muster. They mustered, the call for departure was proclaimed, and they marched out. Al-Ḥajjāj's crier proclaimed that "No contractual obligation will protect any man we find shirking this expedition."

Al-Jazl b. Sa'īd set out, having placed before him 'Iyāḍ b. Abī Līnah al-Kindī over the vanguard, and he proceeded as far as al-Madā'in, where he halted for three nights. Ibn Abī 'Uṣayfīr sent him a riding horse, a nag, two mules, and two thousand dirhams, and he provided the men with meat and fodder sufficient for three days, until their departure; the men were able to take as much of this meat and fodder provided by Ibn Abī 'Uṣayfīr as they wished.

Then al-Jazl b. Sa'īd led the men out after Shabīb. He pursued him in the Jūkhā region, but Shabīb persisted in fighting shy of him, moving from rustāq to rustāq and from ṭassūj to ṭassūj[213] without making a stand. He was hoping thereby that al-Jazl would divide his forces and hasten to engage him with a small force not in formation; but al-Jazl persisted in marching only in formation and digging a defensive trench for himself whenever he halted. Shabīb finally became impatient, and one night ordered his forces to launch a night attack.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: Shabīb summoned us when we were in Dayr Bayrimmā,[214] 160 men al-

---

212. Iḍrabū 'alā al-nās al-ba'th.

213. These terms, inherited from Sasanian administration, signify, respectively, rural divisions of a district and districts of a province. See E. Yarshater, ed., The Cambridge History of Iran, III (Cambridge, 1983), 676, 727, 732f.

214. A station on the Khurāsān highway, four farsakhs east of al-Nahrawān and eight farsakhs west of al-Daskarah, according to Ibn Rustah, A'lāq (BGA, VII), together. He appointed a man over each group of forty of his forces: he took forty himself, gave his brother Muṣād forty, sent out Suwayd b. Sulaym with forty, and sent out al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il with forty. His spies had come and informed him that al- [904]

Jazl b. Sa'īd was camped at Dayr Yazdajird,[215] and when he heard this, he summoned us and mustered us according to this arrangement. At his order, we gave the riding beasts their nosebags. He said to us, "Make your preparations, and once your beasts have had their grain, mount them. Every one of you is to go with the commander whom we have appointed over him; and every one of you is to heed the orders of his commander and obey him."

Then he summoned our commanders and said to them, "I want to attack this camp tonight." To his brother Muṣād he said, "When you approach them, go around above them so that you approach them from their rear, from the direction of Ḥulwān.[216] I will approach them frontally, from the direction of al-Kūfah. You, Suwayd, approach them from the east; and you, Muḥallil, from the west. Every one of you must come in from the side with which he has been charged; and you are to give them no respite, charging and charging again, and raising the battle cry against them, until you receive orders from me."

We remained in this muster—I was among the forty with Shabīb—until the beasts had eaten. We set out at the beginning of the night, just when eyes begin to relax, and came to Dayr al-Kharārah,[217] where we encountered an advance party[218] under the command of 'Iyāḍ b. Abī Līnah. No sooner had we come upon them than Shabīb's brother Muṣād attacked them with his forty men. He was ahead of Shabīb, having intended to precede Shabīb and go up behind them and attack from the rear, as he had been ordered; but when he encountered these men, he fought them, and they tenaciously fought back for a time. Then we all came up

---

163—text: Dayr Tayrimah; see also Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik (BGA, VI), 18, 197, and al-Muqaddasī, Aḥsan al-taqāsīm (BGA, III), 135.

215. Unidentified in other sources, but apparently further up the Khurāsān highway.

216. The border town between the provinces of Iraq and al-Jibāl on the Khurāsān highway, some seventy-five miles east of al-Daskarah; see *EI*², s.v. Ḥulwān.

217. Spelling and location uncertain. Other MSS have al-Jarārah, al-Jarādah, al-Ḥarārah.

218. Maslaḥah.

on them and attacked them and drove them back. They took to [905] the main road; it was only about a mile back to their camp at Dayr Yazdajird.

Shabīb said to us, "Stay hard on their heels, companies of Muslims, and try to enter the camp with them, if you can!" We pursued them, by God, sticking close to them and pressing them without respite, while they were fleeing with no goal but their camp. When they reached their camp, though, their comrades would not let them enter it, and they rained arrows upon us. They had spies who had come and informed them of our position. Al-Jazl had entrenched himself and been on his guard; and he had sent out the advance party that we encountered at Dayr al-Kharārah, as well as another advance party on the road toward Ḥulwān. When we reached the advance party at Dayr al-Kharārah and pushed them back to their main camp, the other advance parties came back and all joined together. But the men in the camp would not let them enter the camp, saying, "Fight, and defend yourselves with your arrows!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Jarīr b. al-Ḥusayn al-Kindī: Of the other two advance parties, 'Āṣim b. Ḥujr was in charge of the one in the direction of Ḥulwān, and Wāṣil b. al-Ḥārith al-Sakūnī[219] was in charge of the other. When the advance parties came together, Shabīb kept attacking them until he forced them back to the trench; but the men in the camp rained down arrows on Shabīb's men until they drove them back from the men of the advance parties.

When Shabīb saw that he would be unable to get to them, he said to his men, "Come, now, and leave them," and set off on the road to Ḥulwān. When he drew near to the site of the tents of Ḥusayn b. Zafar of the Banū Badr b. Fazārah[220]—but the tents of [906] Ḥusayn b. Zafar were there only after that—he said to his men, "Dismount here, eat, repair your arrows, rest, and pray two prostrations; then remount." They dismounted and did as he said. Then he led them back again to the camp of the Kūfans. He said, "March in the formation in which I mustered you in Dayr Bay-

219. The Banū Sakūn were a clan of Kindah; see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 528.

220. The Banū Badr b. 'Amr were the leading family of the Fazārah tribe of Qays 'Aylān; see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 68.

rimmā at the beginning of the night; then encircle their camp, as I ordered before, and advance."

We advanced with him. The men of the camp had brought their advance parties inside with them and felt secure from us; they were completely unaware of our approach until they heard the hoofbeats of our horses close by. We reached them shortly before morning and surrounded their camp. We raised the war cry against them from every side, and they began to do battle with us from every side and attack us with arrows. Then Shabīb sent to his brother Muṣād, who was fighting them on the al-Kūfah side, saying, "Come to us and leave the way to al-Kūfah open to them." Muṣād came to him, leaving that side open, while we kept fighting them on the other three sides until morning. Morning came without our having broken through at all, so we rode away and left them. They called after us, "Where are you going, dogs of hell? Where, band of heretics? Give us a fight in the morning, and we will come out to you!" We withdrew from them about a mile and a half, dismounted, and performed the morning prayer. Then we set out on the road to Barāz al-Rūz[221] and went on to Jarjarāyā[222] and the surrounding region; and they set out after us.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—a client of ours[223] named Ghāḍirah or Qayṣar: I was working as a merchant with the troops when [907] they were in pursuit of the Ḥarūriyyah. Our commander was al-Jazl b. Sa'īd. As he pursued them, he always marched in formation and never camped without digging a trench. Shabīb was avoiding him and moving around in the region of Jūkhā and elsewhere, cutting off the land revenues.[224] Al-Ḥajjāj wearied of that and wrote to al-Jazl the following letter, which was read out to the men:

> I sent you out with the horsemen of the garrison and the elite troops and ordered you to go after these misguided and misguiding heretics until you find them, and then not to leave off until you have killed them all and exterminated

221. Southeast of the Khurāsān highway, between al-Nahrawān and al-Daskarah; see Le Strange, Lands, 61, 80.

222. A town on the east bank of the Tigris, some fifty miles south of al-Madā'in; see Le Strange, Lands, 37.

223. That is, the Azd.

224. Yaksiru al-kharāj; see WKAS, s.v. kasara, and EI², s.v. kharādj.

them. But I see that you find spending your nights in villages and tenting behind trenches easier than carrying out my orders to confront and fight them. Peace.

This letter was read to us when we were in Qaṭrāthā and Dayr Abī Maryam.[225] Al-Jazl was much distressed; he ordered the troops to march, and they set out in serious pursuit of the Khārijites. Disquieting rumors began to circulate among us about our commander, saying, "He is going to be dismissed."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ismā'īl b. Nu'aym al-Hamdānī al-Namirī:[226] Al-Ḥajjāj sent out Sa'īd b. Mujālid[227] to take command of that army, charging him, "If you encounter the heretics, take the field against them, neither negotiating nor temporizing with them. Confront them, asking God's help against them; do [908] not follow the example of al-Jazl. Pursue them like a lion and turn away from them like a hyena."[228]

Al-Jazl went in pursuit of Shabīb as far as al-Nahrawān, where he caught up with him. He kept to his camp, digging a defensive trench. Then Sa'īd b. Mujālid came to him and entered the camp of the Kūfans as their commander. He stood before them to address them, and after praising and glorifying God, he said:

Men of al-Kūfah! You have shown yourselves to be weak and ineffectual and have brought on yourselves the anger of your amīr. You have been in pursuit of these scrawny bedouin for two months while they have laid waste your land and cut off your land revenues. Yet you remain cautiously behind these trenches, never leaving them unless word comes to you that they have departed and moved on to some land other than yours. Go out, in God's name, against them!

---

225. Unidentified, but apparently near Barāz al-Ṛūz; see text below, II, 910.

226. Text: al-Bursumī. He appears as al-Namirī in the text above, II, 117. Another possible reading in both places is al-Burmī. Both Namirah b. Aslam and Burmah b. Mālik were clans of Hamdān; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 230, 445.

227. Text here and twice below: al-Mujālid, but otherwise, and in other sources, without the article. He was either the father of the important muḥaddith and akhbārī Mujālid b. Sa'īd, or at least his fellow clansman. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 227, II, 418, 500, and note 237 below.

228. Apparently a reference to the hyena's ferocity once it has captured its prey; see EI², Suppl., s.v. ḍabu'.

Then he went out, leading the troops out with him. He mustered the cavalry of the army; when al-Jazl asked him what he intended to do, he replied, "I intend to advance against Shabīb with this cavalry." Al-Jazl said, "You stay with the body of the army, both cavalry and infantry, and I will go show myself to him. By God, he will assuredly advance against you. Do not divide your forces; that way it will be the worse for them and the better for you." But Sa'īd said, "You stay with the ranks!" Al-Jazl replied, "O Sa'īd b. Mujālid, what you do is no decision of mine. I take no responsibility for this decision of yours, in the hearing of God and those Muslims here present!" Sa'īd said, "It is my own decision. If I have decided rightly, it is because God has led me to do so; if I have not decided rightly, you are all quit of any responsibility for it."

Al-Jazl stayed in the ranks of the Kūfans, having brought them out beyond the trench. He put 'Iyāḍ b. Abī Līnah al-Kindī over his right flank, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf Abū Ḥāmid al-Ru'āsī over his left flank.[229] Al-Jazl stayed with the main force while Sa'īd b. Mujālid advanced to the front and set out, leading the troops. [909]
Shabīb, meanwhile, had taken the road to Barāz al-Rūz and stopped at Qaṭīṭiyā;[230] he ordered its dihqān[231] to purchase for them the things they needed and to provide them with a midday meal, which he did. Shabīb entered the enclosure[232] of Qaṭīṭiyā and ordered the gate shut. He had not yet eaten his meal when Sa'īd b. Mujālid arrived with the forces of that army. The dihqān ascended the wall and saw the troops approaching and drawing near his fortress. When he came down, he was pale, and Shabīb asked him why he was so ashen. The dihqān replied, "The troops have come at you from every side." Shabīb said, "Never mind! Is our food ready?" He said, "Yes." Shabīb said, "Then bring it. The gate has been shut." The food was brought and he ate. Then he performed the ablutions and prayed two prostrations. Then he

229. The Banū Ru'ās b. al-Ḥārith were a clan of 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah; see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 450.

230. Spelling and location uncertain.

231. The dihqāns were the Sasanian landed gentry, who controlled the rural districts and collected taxes and often continued to do so under the Islamic regime; see EI², s.v. dihḳān.

232. Madīnah.

called for a mule of his and mounted it. His men assembled at the gate of the enclosure. He ordered the gate opened, and he rode out on his mule and charged the government forces, crying "Judgment belongs only to the Wise Arbiter![233] I am Abū Mudallah![234] Stand if you will!"

Sa'īd collected his troops and cavalry and began to advance them slowly after him,[235] saying, "What are these? Diners on a single head of cattle!"[236] But when Shabīb saw that they had become dispersed and scattered, he turned all his horsemen around, mustered them, and cried, "Slaughter them! And keep an eye on their commander, for, by God, either I will kill him or he will kill me!" Then he attacked them, slaughtering indis-
[910] criminately, and routed them. Sa'īd b. Mujālid stood his ground and called to his forces, "To me! To me! I am Ibn Dhī Murrān!"[237] He took off his skullcap and put it on the pommel of his saddle; but then Shabīb attacked him and crowned him with his sword, cutting through to the brain, and he fell dead.

The army continued to fall back, men falling on every side, until they reached al-Jazl. Al-Jazl dismounted and called out, "To me, men!" 'Iyāḍ b. Abī Līnah called out to them, "Men, if your new commander has perished, your fortunate and blessed commander is still alive and has not died!" Al-Jazl fought hard, until he had to be carried off from amidst the dead and taken to al-Madā'in, wounded. The remnants of that army went back to al-Kūfah. Among the men most severely tested in battle that day were Khālid b. Nahīk of the Banū Dhuhl b. Mu'āwiyah[238] and 'Iyāḍ b. Abī Līnah, who came together to al-Jazl's rescue when he was wounded.

---

233. Lā ḥukm illā lil-ḥakam al-ḥakīm, a paraphrase of the Qur'ānic phrase in al-ḥukm illā lillāh (6:57; 12:40, 67), and the rallying cry of the Khārijites from the beginning; see text above, I, 3339, 3360ff., and Watt, Formative Period, 13ff.

234. This kunyah of Shabīb's seems to be not otherwise attested; see note 178 above.

235. Wa-ja'ala Sa'īd yajma'u qawmahu wa-khaylahu thumma yudlifuhā fī atharihi. The sense of yudlifu here, if that is the correct reading, is unclear; neither the variant yuzliqu, "he causes to slip," nor the proposed emendation yuzlifu, "he brings near," seems more satisfactory.

236. That is, few in number; see Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 44.

237. Dhū Murrān was his grandfather or great-grandfather, of the tribe of Hamdān. See note 227 above.

238. A clan of Kindah; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 233, II, 239, 342.

This is the account of one group of men. According to the other account, the battle was between Dayr Abī Maryam and Barāz al-Rūz. Then al-Jazl wrote to al-Ḥajjāj.[239]

Shabīb advanced and crossed the Tigris at al-Karkh.[240] He sent word to the market of Baghdad, assuring those there of their safety. That day was their market day, and having heard that they were afraid of him he wanted to reassure them, because his companions were wanting to buy some animals, clothing, and other essential items from the market. Then he led them on toward al-Kūfah. They continued until nightfall and halted at 'Aqr al-Malik, near Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah.[241] The next day he hurried on and spent that night between Ḥammām 'Umar b. Sa'd[242] and Qubbīn.[243]

When al-Ḥajjāj was informed of Shabīb's position, he sent to [911] Suwayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Sa'dī[244] and dispatched him with two thousand elite cavalry, saying, "Go out and meet Shabīb. Form right and left wings, then dismount and advance against him with your men.[245] If he falls back in a feint, let him go and do not pursue him." Suwayd went out and camped at al-Sabakhah.[246] He was informed that Shabīb was advancing on him, so

---

239. This is the first of several dislocations in the text. The alternate version of the battle, on the authority of Hishām al-Kalbī, is given below, after an account of Shabīb's advance to al-Kūfah; this is followed in turn by the text of al-Jazl's letter, on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf.

240. Just north of Kalwādhā, on the west side of the Tigris, later a suburb of Baghdad; see EI², s.v. al-Karkh.

241. Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, whose name postdates these events, was the first of three stages from Baghdad to al-Kūfah and not far from the ruins of Babylon; see Le Strange, Lands, 70f.; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 43, 274ff. 'Aqr al-Malik, meaning "the king's palace," is presumably the same as "al-'Aqr in the region of Bābil" mentioned by Mas'ūdī, Tanbīh (BGA, VIII), 321f., but cannot be more precisely identified.

242. That is, the Bath of 'Umar b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ, the son of the founder of al-Kūfah; see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 28. Musil, Middle Euphrates, 245f., 276 (there, as sometimes elsewhere, Ḥammām Ibn 'Umar), locates it a short distance southwest of al-Ḥillah. On the founding of this and other baths, see Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 268–70.

243. Mentioned and vocalized by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 35, but not precisely located.

244. The Banū Sa'd were a clan of Tamīm; for the genealogy, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 76, II, 519. This man had earlier fought against al-Mukhtār; see text above, II, 616, 618.

245. Thumma inzil ilayh fī al-rijāl. See note 249 below.

246. Literally, the salt marsh, just outside the city. See the map in Massignon, he advanced as well, but as if his men were being driven toward death.

Al-Ḥajjāj then ordered 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan[247] to muster the troops at al-Sabakhah. He issued a proclamation, saying, "Hear ye! No contractual obligation will protect any man from these troops who spends this night in al-Kūfah and does not go out to join 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan at al-Sabakhah." Then he ordered Suwayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān to take the two thousand men he had with him and meet Shabīb. Suwayd crossed over with his forces to Zurārah,[248] putting them in battle array and rousing their fighting spirits, because he was told that Shabīb was upon him. He then dismounted, along with most of his forces,[249] put his standard before him, and advanced to the far side of Zurārah. But then he was told that Shabīb had learned of his position and turned away from him; he had found a ford and crossed the Euphrates and was now on his way to al-Kūfah by a route that avoided Suwayd. Then he was asked, "Aren't you going to go after them?" Suwayd called out to his forces, and they rode after them. Shabīb, meanwhile, came to the provision depot[250] and halted. There he was told that the Kūfans were mustering en masse at al-Sabakhah. When they learned of Shabīb's position, they ran around shouting at one another and would have gone back into al-Kūfah, had they not been told that Suwayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān had gone after him and his men and caught up with them, and was fighting them with the cavalry.

[912] According to Hishām—'Umar b. Bashīr:[251] When Shabīb halted at al-Dayr,[252] he ordered sheep to be slaughtered and prepared for him. The dihqān went up to the top of the wall, and when he came back down again he was pale. Shabīb asked him what was

---

"Explication du plan de Kufa," 336, placing it to the northeast, between the city and the Euphrates bridge.

247. On him, see note 288 below.

248. Across from the city on the east side of the Euphrates. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 282; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 921.

249. Fa-nazala wa-nazala ma'ahu jull aṣḥābihi. See note 245 above.

250. Dār al-rizq. Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kufa," 336, places it next to al-Sabakhah, between the city and the bridge.

251. Here begins the alternate version of the battle with Sa'īd b. Mujālid and al-Jazl.

252. Literally, "the monastery," probably Dayr Abī Maryam.

wrong, and he said, "By God, a large force has come against you!" Shabīb asked, "Is the roast done yet?" He said, "No." Shabīb said, "Never mind then." Then the dihqān went up to take another look and said, "By God, they have surrounded the fortress!" But Shabīb said, "Bring on the roast!" and began to eat, showing no concern about the troops outside. When he had finished, performed his ablutions, and prayed with his closest associates, he put on two swords over his coat of mail, grasped an iron mace, and ordered his mule saddled. His brother Muṣād asked him, "Is this a day to saddle a mule?" He replied, "Yes! Saddle it, men!" and mounted it. Then he said, "You, So-and-so, take the right wing, and you, So-and-so, the left." To Muṣād he said, "You take the center." Then he ordered the dihqān to have the gate opened before them.

Thus he set out against the troops, calling out that "Judgment is to God alone." Sa'īd and his forces kept falling back, until there was about a mile between them and al-Dayr. Sa'īd began calling out, "O company of Hamdān! I am Ibn Dhī Murrān! To me! To me!" Then he sent out some small parties with his son, having sensed that they would soon be upon him.[253] Shabīb looked at Muṣād and said, "May God bereave you of me if I do not bereave his son of him!" Then he assailed him with his mace, and he fell dead. His forces retreated, and Shabīb's men suffered only one casualty that day.

Sa'īd b. Mujālid's forces were driven back until they came to al-Jazl. Al-Jazl called out to them, "Men! To me! To me!" 'Iyāḍ b. Abī Līnah called out to them, saying, "Men, if this new commander of yours has perished, here is your other, fortunate commander! Rally to him and fight with him!" Some did rally to him, while others rode off in a rout. Al-Jazl fought very hard until he fell wounded; then Khālid b. Nahīk and 'Iyāḍ b. Abī Līnah fought in his defense until they were able to rescue him. The defeated troops hurried back and entered al-Kūfah. Al-Jazl was brought to al-Madā'in, and from there wrote to al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. [913]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Thābit, the client of Zuhayr: This is the text of the letter:

I hereby inform the amīr—may God cause him to pros-

253. Wa-wajjaha siraban ma'a ibnihi wa-qad aḥassa annahā takūnu 'alayhi.

per!—that I marched out with those troops I had with me, which the amir ordered me to lead against his enemy, following his orders to me and his decision with regard to them. My strategy was to go out against the enemy when I saw an opportunity, but to hold the troops back from them when I feared an awkward entanglement. I adhered to this strategy, and despite all the enemy's efforts to entice me into combat, he found me no fool. Then Sa'īd b. Mujālid—may God have mercy on his soul!—came to me. I ordered him to be circumspect and forbade him to do anything rash, and commanded him to fight them only when he had the entire force assembled together. But he disobeyed me and hurried off against them with the cavalry. I appeal to the men of both garrisons as witnesses against him that I took no responsibility for the decision he made and did not approve of his action. He went out and was struck down, may God grant him forgiveness; the men had to fall back on me, so I took the field, called them to me, and raised my standard for them. I fought until I was struck down, and my companions carried me off from amidst the dead. When I recovered consciousness, I found that they had already carried me a full mile from the battlefield. Today I am in al-Madā'in with a wound worse than some men die from but no worse than some men re-[914] cover from. Let the amīr—may God cause him to prosper!—inquire about the advice I gave for him and his troops, about my strategems with his enemy,[254] and about my stand on the day of battle, and it will be clear to him that I have been true to him and offered sincere advice in his interest. Peace.

Al-Ḥajjāj's reply:

I have received your letter, read it, and understood everything you report in it. I believe all you have to say about yourself, including your sincere advice in your amīr's interest, your prudent concern for the men of your garrison, and your fierceness against the enemy. I also have understood what you have to say about Sa'īd and his rashness against the enemy. I have approved both his rashness and your circumspection; his rashness has taken him to Paradise, and your circumspection has passed up no realistic opportunities for attack, whereas passing up unrealistic opportunities is a form of resolution. You have acted correctly, then, and done well when tested, and earned your reward; I consider you one of my trusted servants and counselors. I have sent Ḥayyān b. Abjar to you to nurse you and treat your wounds; and I have also sent you two thousand dirhams to spend on your needs and daily requirements. Peace.

254. Mukāyadatī 'aduwwahu. One MS has m.kāb.tī, a corruption from Mukābadatī, "my tenacity against," which may be the better reading.

Ḥayyān b. Abjar al-Kinānī of the Banū Firās,[255] who practiced cauterization and other forms of medical treatment, came to him and nursed him. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Uṣayfīr also sent him a thousand dirhams, and visited him often and kept him company, bringing him gifts and presents.

Shabīb, meanwhile, advanced to al-Madā'in, but realized that he had no way of gaining access to its people, within the city,[256] and went on to al-Karkh, crossing the Tigris to reach it. He sent word from al-Karkh to the people of the market of Baghdad, telling them to go ahead with their market without fear; it was their market [915] day, and he had heard that they were afraid of him.[257]

Suwayd went out, putting the residences of Muzaynah and the Banū Sulaym[258] at his back and the backs of his forces. Shabīb launched a fearsome attack against them, in the evening, but was 255. For the Banū Firās b. Ghanm of Kinānah, see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 911f. This physician is mentioned by Ibn Juljul, Ṭabaqāt al-aṭibbā' wa-al-ḥukamā' (Cairo, 1955), 59, and his family as one of physicians in al-Kūfah by Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 66; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah (Cairo, 1328), I, 364, makes him out to have been a Companion of the Prophet. A highly confused report in Ibn Abī Uṣaybi'ah, 'Uyūn al-anbā' (Königsberg, 1884), I, 116, on an "'Abd al-Malik b. Abjar" at the time of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz has misled modern scholars; see Sezgin, GAS, III, 205f., and the literature there. 'Abd al-Malik b. Sa'īd b. Ḥayyān b. Abjar, noted there from Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 394f., is perhaps to be equated with the 'Abdallāh b. Sa'īd b. Ḥayyān b. Abjar in the same author's Iṣābah, I, 364.

256. Lā sabīla lahu ilā ahlihā ma'a al-madīnah.

257. This ends the alternate version of the battle with Sa'īd and al-Jazl, and Ṭabarī reverts to the account of Suwayd's pursuit of Shabīb outside al-Kūfah.

258. On these two Northern tribes, see Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 543ff., 1083f. According to the text above, I, 2489f., the Sulaym were assigned an area in al-Kūfah north of the center, and Muzaynah east of it. See also the map in Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kufa," 336.

unable to achieve anything against them. He then took off through the residential area of al-Kūfah toward al-Ḥīrah,[259] and Suwayd pursued him, keeping to him all the way across the entire residential area of al-Kūfah and on to al-Ḥīrah. There, Suwayd found that Shabīb had cut the bridge at al-Ḥīrah as he passed, so he let him go and halted there until morning.

Al-Ḥajjāj sent orders to Suwayd to pursue Shabīb, and he did.[260] Shabīb continued on down into the Euphrates lowlands, where he found some of his clansmen, then went back up into the desert beyond Khaffān,[261] into a region called al-Ghilẓah.[262] There he encountered men of the Banū al-Wirthah and attacked them, forcing them back to a hard plain in the vicinity. They took stones from the outcroppings around them and threw them at Shabīb and his men until they ran out; then Shabīb was able to get to them and killed thirteen of them, including Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik, Mālik b. Ḥanẓalah, and Ḥumrān b. Mālik, all of the Banū al-Wirthah. This is according to Abū Mikhnaf—'Aṭā' b. 'Arfajah b. Ziyād b. 'Abdallāh al-Wirthī.

Shabīb then continued on until he came to his father's sons at al-Laṣaf,[263] a watering hole of his kin. This watering hole was under the control of al-Fizr b. al-Aswad, one of the Banū al-Ṣulb;[264] he had forbidden Shabīb to promulgate his opinions and [916] corrupt his cousins and other kin, to which Shabīb responded, "By God, if I get hold of seven bridles, I will attack al-Fizr!" When Shabīb came with his horsemen to his kin, he asked about al-Fizr; but al-Fizr paid him off with an unbeatably swift horse, on which he rode out beyond the tents and out across the land, as men fled from him.[265] Having given the desert bedouin a good scare, he

259. About three miles south; see *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥīra; Le Strange, Lands, 75.

260. But how far is unclear, as nothing more is said about this pursuit.

261. On the edge of the desert, but near the marshes, about thirty miles southeast of al-Kūfah; see Musil, Middle Euphrates, 357–60; Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kufa," 356.

262. Spelling and location uncertain. Some MSS have al-'Ulṭah.

263. West of the pilgrimage road from al-Kūfah, some hundred miles southwest of there. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 357; Musil, Northern Neǧd, 14, 195.

264. Text: Banū al-Ṣalt. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 146, II, 247. Shabīb was al-Fizr's second cousin once removed.

265. Fa-ittaqāhu al-Fizr fa-kharaja 'alā faras lā tujārā min warā' al-buyūt fadhahaba 'alayhā fī al-arḍ. For ittaqā in the sense of "to pay off," see Dozy, Supplément, s.v. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 405, has al-Fizr riding the horse, but it is came back and went on to al-Quṭquṭānah[266] and Qaṣr Muqātil,[267] then followed the bank of the Euphrates past al-Ḥaṣṣāṣah[268] and al-Anbār.[269] He proceeded to Daqūqā'[270] and then went off to the nearer parts of Ādharbayjān.

Al-Ḥajjāj let him be and moved to al-Baṣrah, leaving 'Urwah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah as his deputy over al-Kūfah. But the people had hardly caught their breath when 'Urwah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah received a letter from Mādharwāsb, the dihqān and lord of Bābil Mahrūdh, saying, "One of the merchants of al-Anbār, a fellow countryman of mine, came to me and said that Shabīb is planning to enter al-Kūfah at the beginning of the coming month. I wanted to inform you of this so you could make your plans. Then, only shortly later, two of my tax collectors came to tell me that Shabīb had arrived in Khānījār."[271]

'Urwah took this letter, rolled it up, and rushed it off to al-Ḥajjāj in al-Baṣrah. When al-Ḥajjāj read it, he went racing back to al-Kūfah. Shabīb continued his advance until he reached a village called Ḥarbā,[272] on the bank of the Tigris, where he crossed the river. He asked what the name of the village was and was told "Ḥarbā." He said, "War (ḥarb)—may your enemy roast with it—and lamentation (ḥarab)—may you bring it into their houses! Bad [917] omens are only a matter for mantics and augurs."[273] Then he raised his standard and said to his companions, "March!" They not clear with which of the following verbs the subject returns to Shabīb. Musil, Northern Neǧd, 14, takes al-Fizr as the subject of all the following verbs, which seems highly improbable.

---

266. Probably modern al-Ṭuqṭuqānah, thirty miles due west of al-Kūfah. See Musil, Northern Neǧd, 14, 199, 212; Ṣ. al-'Alī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 246f.

267. Identified by Caskel, "al-Ukhaiḍir," Der Islam 39 (1964), 28–37, with the ruins of al-Ukhayḍir, about thirty-five miles north-northwest of al-Ṭuqṭuqānah.

268. Near Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 274; but presumably somewhat north of there, as it also lay on the route from Karbalā' to al-Anbār. See text above, II, 545, and Musil, Middle Euphrates, 41, 351.

269. A major town on the Euphrates, forty miles west of Baghdad; see EI², s.v. al-Anbār.

270. Some 120 miles north of Baghdad; see EI², s.v. Daḳūḳā'; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 41ff.

271. Twenty miles south of Daqūqā'. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 394; Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 60ff.

272. Thirty miles north of Baghdad; see EI², s.v. Ḥarbā'.

273. Man yaqūfu wa-ya'īfu. On qiyāfah (physiognomy or the reading of traces on the ground) and 'iyāfah (ornithomancy), see EI², s.vv. ḳiyāfa, 'iyāfa.

went on, halting at 'Aqarqūf.[274] Suwayd b. Sulaym said to Shabīb, "Commander of the Faithful, would you not have us move away from this village with such an ill-omened name?"[275] Shabīb replied, "Yet again you see bad omens! By God, I will not move from this village until I march from here against my enemy! Its ill omens, God willing, will apply rather to your enemy; here you will attack them, and the wounds ('aqr) will be theirs." Then he said to his companions, "Men, al-Ḥajjāj is not in al-Kūfah, and, God willing, nothing stands in the way between us and there. Let us march, then!" So he set out to get to al-Kūfah before al-Ḥajjāj.

'Urwah wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, saying, "Shabīb has set out and is rapidly approaching al-Kūfah! Hurry!" Al-Ḥajjāj swept past the halting places, racing with Shabīb for the city. Al-Ḥajjāj arrived there at the time of the noon prayer, and Shabīb reached al-Sabakhah at the time of the sunset prayer. After performing the sunset and evening prayers, he and his companions had a little to eat, mounted their horses, and rode into al-Kūfah. Shabīb reached the market, then drove on to the palace and struck its gate with his mace.[276]

According to Abū al-Mundhir: I saw where Shabīb struck the gate of the palace; it left a huge mark.

Then Shabīb came and stood at the platform (maṣṭabah),[277] and said:

Her hoof, whenever she crosses a thicket, is like the measure with which a stingy miser measures out—A slave with a spurious genealogy, who is really from Thamūd; or, rather, it is said their father's father was Yaqdum.[278]

---

274. Text: 'Aqraqūfā. This site was four farsakhs from Baghdad, near the Dujayl canal (which extended to Ḥarbā), according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 697f. It has been identified as the Kassite city Dur Kurigalzu; see EI[2], s. v. 'Aḳarḳūf.

275. 'Aqrā is a form of imprecation, variously explained; see Lane, s.v. Qūf was presumably associated with qiyāfah; see note 273 above.

276. Of published early parallel accounts, only Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 328, mentions this incident (without the accompanying verses).

277. A bench or raised platform, against a wall; see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

278. These anti-Thaqīf verses are attributed (with variants) to Ḥassān b. Thābit; see his Dīwān, 438, and Aghānī[1], IV, 11 and XIV, 141. Yaqdum was a descendant of Iyād b. Nizār, through whom one of the respectable genealogies claimed for Thaqīf was made. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 258; Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, I, 99f.

Then they stormed the great mosque, which was still full of people praying. Shabīb killed 'Uqayl b. Muṣ'ab al-Wādi'ī, 'Adī b. 'Amr [918] al-Thaqafī, and Abū Layth b. Abī Sulaym, the client of 'Anbasah b. Abī Sufyān. His men also killed Azhar b. 'Abdallāh al-'Āmirī. Then they proceeded to the house of Ḥawshab,[279] who was head of the security forces (shuraṭ),[280] and stopped at his door, saying, "The amīr has summoned Ḥawshab." The latter's servant, Maymūn,[281] brought out Ḥawshab's horse for him to ride but seemed to look askance at them; they thought he had become suspicious, and when he began to go back in they said to him, "Stay where you are until your master comes out." Ḥawshab heard this and was incensed at these people, and came out to see them. When he saw the entire group of them, it was clear to him that they were up to no good, and he turned to leave them. They surged toward him, but he went inside and bolted the door. They then killed his servant Maymūn and took his horse, and went on to see al-Jaḥḥāf b. Nubayṭ al-Shaybānī, who was a kinsman of Ḥawshab's. Suwayd said to him, "Come down to us." Al-Jaḥḥāf replied, "What will you do if I do?" Suwayd said, "I will pay you the price of the young she-camel that I bought from you in the desert." Al-Jaḥḥāf said, "What a terrible time and place this is to pay off a debt! Could you not remember your obligation except when the night is dark and you are mounted on your horse? God's plague, O Suwayd, on a debt that cannot be settled and paid up except with the killing of relatives and spilling the blood of this community!"

Then they went on to the mosque of the Banū Dhuhl,[282] where they found Dhuhl b. al-Ḥārith; he had been praying in the mosque of his people, and taken a long time about it, and they caught him just as he was leaving to go home. They pounced on him to kill 279. Ḥawshab b. Yazīd b. al-Ḥārith b. Ruwaym al-Shaybānī; see text above, II, 775, and note 102.

280. Pl. of shurṭah, police; see note 45 above.

281. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 328, he was known as al-'Adhāb ("the chastisement"), or perhaps al-'Adhdhāb (otherwise known only as the name of a famous horse; see Zabīdī, Tāj al-'arūs, s.v.).

282. This mosque has been mentioned previously by Ṭabarī (II, 532), in a context suggesting that these are the Banū Dhuhl b. Mu'āwiyah, a clan of Kindah (so assumed by Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 239), rather than Shabīb's own Banū Dhuhl b. Shaybān or the Banū Dhuhl b. Tha'labah of Bakr (as implied by Ṭabarī, index, 183).

him, and he cried, "O God, I protest to You against these men and their wickedness and ignorance! O God, I am too weak to protect myself from them; come to my aid against them!" But they [919] struck him down and killed him. Then they went on until they left al-Kūfah and headed toward al-Mardamah.[283]

According to Hishām—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh: He was encountered by al-Naḍr b. al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr al-Dhuhlī,[284] whose mother was Nājiyah bint Hāni' b. Qabīṣah b. Hāni' al-Shaybānī,[285] and discomfited him when he looked at him—by "discomfited" he means he frightened him. Al-Naḍr said, "Peace be upon you, O amīr, and God's mercy." But Suwayd interrupted him, saying, "That's 'Commander (amīr) of the Faithful,' damn you!" He said, "Commander of the Faithful"—until they left al-Kūfah and headed toward al-Mardamah.[286]

Al-Ḥajjāj ordered the crier to proclaim, "O cavalry of God! Mount and rejoice!"[287] from above the gate of the palace. There was a lamp placed there, with a servant of his waiting. The first of

283. Location unknown. Ṭabarī's distinction between this first entry by Shabīb into al-Kūfah and a second attack much later (text below, II, 956–68) is not reflected in other early sources, which combine elements of both incidents into one account. Most of them stress the drama of Shabīb's mother and/or wife praying in the Friday mosque, which is mentioned by Ṭabarī only in passing, at the time of the second attack (see note 439 below). Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 328, is closest to Ṭabarī in detail, but omits the second attack entirely; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 272f., follows Ṭabarī's chronology more closely, but differs in detail; Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 87–91, knows only the second attack and diverges considerably. See also Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 410f.; Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 321; Baghdādī, Farq, 89ff.; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 124–26; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 185f.

284. Reading al-Qa'qā' for text Qa'qā'. Al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr of the Banū Dhuhl b. Tha'labah of Bakr b. Wā'il was famed in al-Kūfah for his amicability and generosity; see Ziriklī, A'lām, VI, 48.

285. Hāni' b. Qabīṣah of the Banū Dhuhl b. Shaybān (Shabīb's clan) had led the Bakr b. Wā'il on the day of Dhū Qār; see Ziriklī, A'lām, IX, 52f. His grandson al-Naḍr was clearly a very respectable man, as well as a kinsman to Shabīb.

286. Fa-qāla amīr al-mu'minīn ḥattā kharajū min al-Kūfah mutawajjihīn naḥwa al-Mardamah. The text seems suspect here, as this rather awkwardly tacked-on phrase duplicates the end of the previous paragraph; furthermore, the more coherent variant of this anecdote presented below sets it outside al-Kūfah, at or beyond al-Mardamah. Ibn al-Athīr in his paraphrase (Kāmil, IV, 407) gives only the second version of the story, but at this point in the narrative.

287. Yā khayl Allāh irkabī wa-abshirī, a standard call to arms; see Fries, Heereswesen, 43. Except for the last word, this phrase was considered a prophetic ḥadīth; see Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 16, and Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s. v. khayl.

the men to come to him was 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥuṣayn Dhī al-Ghuṣṣah,[288] accompanied by his clients and some of his kinsmen. He said, "I am 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan. Inform the amir of where I am and let him issue his orders." The servant replied, "Stay where you are until the amīr's orders come to you." Then the men began to come from every direction, and 'Uthmān spent the night there with the men who had assembled with him.

In the morning, al-Ḥajjāj sent out Bishr b. Ghālib al-Asadī of the Banū Wālibah[289] with two thousand men, Zā'idah b. Qudāmah al-Thaqafī with two thousand men, Abū al-Ḍurays, the client of the Banū Tamīm, with a thousand clients, and A'yan, the A'yan of the Ḥammām A'yan and a client of Bishr b. Marwān,[290] with a thousand men.

'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān had sent out Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. [920] Ṭalḥah[291] to take charge in Sijistān, writing him up a formal appointment as governor over it, and writing to al-Ḥajjāj, saying, "When Muḥammad b. Mūsā comes to you, supply him with two thousand men to take to Sijistān and hurry him on his way." 'Abd al-Malik also ordered Muḥammad b. Mūsā to write to al-Ḥajjāj himself. When Muḥammad b. Mūsā arrived, he lingered over his preparations. His advisers urged him, "Hurry, O amīr, to your province, for you do not know what al-Ḥajjāj may be up to or what he may decide to do"; but he remained where he was, and the crisis with Shabīb developed. Then al-Ḥajjāj said to Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, "Please go engage Shabīb and these Khārijites and fight them; then you may go on to your province."

---

288. His great-grandfather al-Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd, known as Dhū al-Ghuṣṣah, was a celebrated horseman, leader of the Banū al-Ḥārith of Madhḥij; and his father Qaṭan was a prominent Umayyad supporter in al-Kūfah and, according to one account, briefly governor there in 71 (690–691), before Bishr b. Marwān. See text above, II, 804, 816, and Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 261, II, 337, 468.

289. For the Banū Wālibah of Asad, of Muḍar, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 52, II, 227.

290. A'yan was a mawlā of Bishr b. Marwān (as reported here), or of the Bakr b. Wa'il (see text below, II, 966f.), or of Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ (Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 281). His bath was across the Euphrates from al-Kūfah; according to Balādhurī he had bought it from the heirs of an 'Ibādī in al-Ḥīrah. See Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 269f.; al-'Alī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 239.

291. Grandson of the famous Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh, from the Banū Taym of Quraysh. See Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 233; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 130.

Al-Ḥajjāj also sent out with these commanders 'Abd al-A'lā b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz al-Qurashī and Ziyād b. 'Amr al-'Atakī.[292]

Shabīb, as we have said, left al-Kūfah and went to al-Mardamah. There was a man from Ḥaḍramawt there in charge of the tithes[293] named Nājiyah b. Marthad[294] al-Ḥaḍramī. When this man entered the bath, Shabīb went in after him, brought him out, and struck off his head. Shabīb also encountered al-Naḍr b. al-Qa'qā' b. Shawr; the latter had been with al-Ḥajjāj when he set out from al-Baṣrah, but al-Ḥajjāj had left him behind when he went racing on to al-Kūfah. When Shabīb, who was with his companions, saw him, he recognized him and said, "O Naḍr b. al-Qa'qā'! Judgment is to God alone!" His intention in saying this was to prompt him,[295] but al-Naḍr did not understand and simply replied, "We are God's, and to him we return."[296] Then Shabīb's [921] companions said, "Commander of the Faithful, it is as if you meant by your words to prompt him!" They set upon al-Naḍr and killed him.

The above-mentioned commanders assembled in the Euphrates lowlands. But then Shabīb turned away from the direction in which these leaders were assembled and set off toward al-Qādisiyyah.[297] Al-Ḥajjāj sent out Zaḥr b. Qays with a company[298] of elite cavalry, eighteen hundred horsemen, saying, "Pursue Shabīb, and wherever you catch up with him, attack him, unless he is on the move elsewhere; if he is, then leave him 292. Veteran leader of the Azd in al-Baṣrah; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 203, II, 606. Al-'Atīk was a clan of Azd.

---

293. 'Ushūr. On the ambiguities of this term and its frequent application in the early period (as perhaps here) to illegal imposts, see P. G. Forand, "Notes on 'Ushr and Maks," Arabica 8 (1961), 137–41.

294. Pointing uncertain. Some MSS have Mazyad, Murayd, etc.

295. Talqīnah. Laqqana means generally to dictate words for someone to repeat, but also, technically, to whisper lā ilāha illā allāh ("there is no god but God") in the ear of the deceased for him to repeat when interrogated by the two angels in the tomb; see Dozy, Supplément, s. v. Shabīb is here giving al-Naḍr a chance to save himself by repeating a phrase (lā ḥukma illā lillāh) that is in itself Qur'ānic and therefore unexceptionable; see the variant of this story given below, 968, and note 454.

296. Qur'ān 2:156. The verse begins, "(Believers) who, when they are struck by calamity, say . . ."

297. Nineteen miles southwest of al-Kūfah; see EI², s. v. al-Ḳadisiyya.

298. Jarīdah; see Lane, Lexicon, s. v.

alone, so long as he does not turn on you or halt and make a stand. If he does that, do not leave him without engaging him."

Zaḥr set out and went as far as al-Saylaḥīn.[299] Shabīb was informed of his progress toward him and set out to meet him. When they met, Zaḥr put 'Abdallāh b. Kannāz al-Nahdī,[300] a very brave man, in charge of his right wing, and 'Adī b. 'Adī b. 'Umayrah al-Kindī al-Shaybānī in charge of his left wing. Shabīb put all his horsemen together in a single compact formation[301] and threw them against the line. The line reeled and broke up, falling back to Zaḥr b. Qays. Zaḥr b. Qays dismounted and fought until he was felled, and his forces fell back. Shabīb's men thought they had killed him, but just before daybreak the cold revived him, and he got up and walked until he came to a village. He spent the night there, and then was conveyed to al-Kūfah. On his face and head were something between ten and twenty wounds, from sword and spear.

A few days later, Zaḥr went to see al-Ḥajjāj, with his face and wounds swathed in cotton. Al-Ḥajjāj sat him next to him on his [922] couch and said to those around him, "Anyone who would like to see a man from the people of Paradise, a martyr walking among men, let him look upon this man!"

Meanwhile, Shabīb's companions, thinking that they had killed Zaḥr, said to Shabīb, "We have defeated a force of theirs and killed one of their great commanders; let us depart, then, satisfied!" But he said, "Our killing this man and defeating this army will have panicked those other commanders and forces that have been sent out in pursuit of us; so let us rather, then, march against them! For, by God, if we kill them, then there will be nothing, God willing, between us and al-Ḥajjāj and the taking of al-Kūfah!" They said, "We hear and follow your decision and are obedient under your hands."

---

299. A town about halfway between al-Ḥīrah and al-Qādisiyyah; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 218f. [Saylaḥūn], and Musil, Middle Euphrates, 105. Al-Saylaḥīn was also the name of a canal, and of a ṭassūj of Bihqubādh al-Asfal [see note 304 below], which included the palace of al-Khawarnaq; see Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 8, 11; Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kufa," 336, 339, 356; al-'Alī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 248f.

300. Kannāz is a conjectural reading; variants in the MSS include K.thār, K.nān, K.nār, K.bār. The Banū Nahd b. Zayd belonged to Quḍā'ah, a tribal group of uncertain genealogy; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 443, and EI², s. v. Ḳudā'a.

301. Kabkabah; see WKAS, s. v.

He came swooping down with them as far as Najrān[302]—this is the Najrān of al-Kūfah, in the area of 'Ayn al-Tamr.[303] There he inquired about the main body of enemy forces and was informed that they were assembled at Rūdhbār in the Euphrates lowlands, in Lower Bihqubādh,[304] at a distance of twenty-four *farsakh*s from al-Kūfah. Word came to al-Ḥajjāj of Shabīb's advance toward them, and he sent out to them 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ghariq, the client of Ibn Abī 'Aqīl,[305] a man highly esteemed by al-Ḥajjāj, and said to him, "Go catch up with their assembled forces—that is, the assembled forces of the commanders—inform them that the heretics are marching against them and tell them that if they join in combat, the commander of the forces is to be Zā'idah b. Qudāmah." Ibn al-Ghariq went to them, informed them of this, and then departed from them.

[923] According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab: When Shabīb came to us, we had seven commanders with us, all under the supreme command of Zā'idah b. Qudāmah. Each commander had mustered his forces by themselves—Ziyād b. 'Amr al-'Atakī was on our right and Bishr b. Ghālib al-Asadī on our left—and every commander was standing with his own forces. Then Shabīb came and stopped on a hill from which he could look out over the men; he was on a bay horse with a blaze. He looked at the way the troops were mustered, went back to his companions, and then advanced at a gallop with three detachments. As he drew near the troops, one detachment, led by Suwayd b. Sulaym, went and took up its position opposite our right; another detachment, led by Shabīb's brother Muṣād, went and took up its position opposite our left; and Shabīb came with a detachment and took up his position opposite our center.

---

302. On this Christian town, tied historically to the Najrān of Yemen, see Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 226ff.; J. S. Trimingham, Christianity among the Arabs in Pre-Islamic Times (London, 1979), 176ff., 195, 307; Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kufa," 336 and note 1.

303. About sixty miles northwest of al-Kūfah; see EI², s. v. 'Ayn al-Tamr.

304. The astān of Bihqubādh al-Asfal was the Euphrates area south of al-Ḥīrah. The location of Rūdhbār within it seems to be unattested, unless it is connected with the ṭassūj of Rūdhmastān; see Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 8, 11; al-'Alī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 251f. Twenty-four *farsakh*s from al-Kūfah would put Rūdhbār almost halfway to al-Baṣrah.

305. The text below, II, 945, has Abū 'Aqīl.

Zā'idah b. Qudāmah went out and passed among the troops, from the right wing to the left, encouraging the men and saying, "O servants of God, you are the virtuous many, afflicted by a wicked few. Hold steadfast—may I be your ransom—for two or three charges against them; then there will be no barrier or obstacle to victory. Take a look at them, by God! They are not even two hundred—diners on a single head of cattle! They are nothing but bandits and renegades, and they have come to you only to spill your blood and take your spoil. Do not let them show themselves more able to take it than you are to defend it! They are few, and you are many; they belong to a sect, while you belong to a community. Lower your eyes and meet them with your spear points; but do not charge them until I order you to." Then he went back to his own position. [924]

Suwayd b. Sulaym charged against Ziyād b. 'Amr, and their line was thrown back; but Ziyād held his position with about half his forces. Suwayd withdrew from them for a bit, then charged them again, and they fought with spears for some time.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: By God, I was one of them that day.[306] We fought with spears for some time, and they held up against us to the point that I thought they would never give up. Ziyād b. 'Amr fought fiercely, calling out "My horsemen!," lunging with his sword, and really fighting very fiercely. I also saw Suwayd b. Sulaym that day; he was the bravest and fiercest of the bedouin, and no one could stand up to him.

Then, finally, we withdrew from them. They thereupon broke formation, and Shabīb's men said to him, "Do you not see how they are breaking formation? Attack them!" But Shabīb replied, "Leave them be until they thin out a bit." They left them be for a little, and then he led a third attack against them, and they fell back. I saw Ziyād b. 'Amr take repeated sword blows, but every one of them glanced off; he was wearing mail. I saw more than twenty swords in turn strike him, and he came through it all unhurt. When he finally fell back, he had one small wound; this was in the evening.

Then we charged against 'Abd al-A'lā b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir and drove him back; he did not put up much of a fight, having been fighting with his sword for some time already, and, as I heard, having been wounded. Then he caught up with Ziyād b. 'Amr, and the two kept falling back until we came to Muḥammad b. Mūsā b.

306. On Shabīb's side; see text above, II, 886, 903.

[925] Ṭalḥah, at sunset, who gave us a good fight and stood up to us.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab and Farwah b. Laqīṭ: Shabīb's brother Muṣād attacked Bishr b. Ghālib, who was on the left wing. Bishr fought bravely and well, by God, and steadfastly. He dismounted, and other steadfast men dismounted with him, some fifty of them, and they fought with their swords until they were killed to a man. One of them was 'Urwah b. Zuhayr b. Nājidh al-Azdī; his mother was Zārah, a woman who had children among the Azd and whose descendants are known as the Banū Zārah.[307]

When they had killed Bishr and his forces had been driven back, they turned and attacked Abū al-Ḍurays, the client of the Banū Tamīm, who was positioned next to Bishr b. Ghālib. They drove him back as well, as far as the position of A'yan. Then they attacked him and A'yan together and drove them back as far as Zā'idah b. Qudāmah. When they got to him, he dismounted and called out, "O people of Islam! Dismount! Dismount! To me! To me! Let not them be more steadfast in their unbelief than you in your faith!" He fought them through the night, until daybreak. Then Shabīb charged against him with a concentrated group of his forces and killed him and his companions, leaving those dedicated men a heap of bodies around him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab: I heard Zā'idah b. Qudāmah raising his voice that night and saying, "Men, 'be steadfast and persevering!' 'You who believe, fight for God, and He will fight for you and plant your feet firmly!' "[308] Then, by God, he did not leave off fighting them, pushing for-[926] ward, and never falling back, until he was killed, God have mercy on him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: Abū al-Ṣuqayr al-Shaybānī claimed that it was he who actually killed Zā'idah b. Qudāmah, but his claim was disputed by another man named al-Faḍl b. 'Āmir.

---

307. Text: Zurārah, but see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 605 (Banū Zārah), 610 (Zuhayr b. Rabī'ah b. Nājid b. al-Akram), and Ibn Durayd, K. al-Ishtiqāq (Cairo, 1958), 491. The details of the genealogy are unclear.

308. Qur'ān 3:200 and 47:7.

When Shabīb killed Zā'idah b. Qudāmah, Abū al-Ḍurays and A'yan retreated into a large fortress. Shabīb said to his forces, "Hold back your swords from the men and summon them to render the oath of allegiance." They did this at dawn.

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab: I was among those who came to him and rendered him the oath of allegiance, as he sat on his horse with his mounted cavalry before him. As each man came to render the oath of allegiance, his sword was taken from his shoulder and his other weapons taken from him; then he was led before Shabīb. He greeted Shabīb as Commander of the Faithful and was left free to go his way.

This was my situation when dawn broke. At this time, Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh was at the far end of the army, with a group of his comrades, and they were still holding out. When dawn broke, he ordered his muezzin to give the call to prayer. Shabīb, hearing the call to prayer, asked, "What is that?" and was told, "That is Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh; he is still making a stand." Shabīb said, "Indeed I thought his foolishness and vanity would make him do that. Now set these men apart from us, and let us dismount and pray."

He dismounted and gave the call to prayer himself, then stood before his companions and led them in prayer. He recited the Qur'ānic *sūrah*s "Woe to every slanderer and backbiter" and "Have you seen him who cries lies to religion?"[309] Then he gave the taslīm,[310] and they mounted their horses and attacked. One group of Muḥammad b. Mūsā's men were driven back, but another group held their ground.

According to Farwah: I will never forget what Muḥammad b. Mūsā was saying as we came up on him; he was fighting with his sword and saying, "Alif. Lām. Mīm. Do men think that they will [927] be left at ease because they say 'We believe,' and will not be tested? We have tested those who were before them, and indeed God knows those who are sincere, and knows those who lie."[311] He fought until he was killed. I heard my companions say that it was Shabīb who killed him. Then we dismounted and took whatever we could find in the camp. Those who had rendered the oath of allegiance to Shabīb fled, and not one of them remained.

309. Qur'ān 104 and 107, identified here by their first verses.

310. The formula al-salāmu 'alaykum, which concludes the prayer; see SEI, s. v. ṣalāt.

311. Qur'ān 29:1–3.

Someone other than Abū Mikhnaf has reported something different with regard to Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah from what I have reported from Abū Mikhnaf, as follows: 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān had appointed Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah governor of Sijistān. Al-Ḥajjāj then wrote to him saying, "You have responsibility for every land you pass through. Now here is Shabīb in your path." So Muḥammad turned to confront Shabīb. Shabīb sent to him, saying, "You have been taken in! Al-Ḥajjāj has used you to protect himself, while you have a claim to protection as my neighbor![312] Go, then, to the place to which you were ordered, and godspeed! I will not harm you." But Muḥammad insisted on fighting him. Shabīb came out to meet him and sent the messenger to him again, but still he insisted on fighting him. He called for single combat, and al-Baṭīn came forward to challenge him, then Qa'nab, then Suwayd; but he refused to fight anyone but Shabīb. They told Shabīb, "He refuses us and insists on you." Shabīb said, "What else would you expect of these notables?" Then he came forward to challenge Muḥammad, but said, "I adjure you by God, spare your life, for you have a claim to my protection!" Still he insisted on fighting him. Shabīb then charged him and struck him with an iron mace weighing twelve Syrian raṭls,[313] smashing his helmet and head, and he fell. Shabīb had him dressed in a shroud and buried, and he bought up the spoils that had been taken from his camp and sent them to his [928] family. He justified himself to his companions, saying, "He was my neighbor in al-Kūfah, and I have the right to bestow the spoil I have taken on the people of apostasy[314] if I so wish."

---

312. Wa-anta jār laka ḥaqq, as also below, laka jiwār ("you are under protection"). For this principle of assuming responsibility for the security of a guest or neighbor, see EI², s. v. djiwār; W. Schmucker, Untersuchungen zu einigen wichtigen bodensrechtlichen Konsequenzen der islamischen Eroberungsbewegung (Bonn, 1972), 13ff.

313. If we calculate from the preserved Umayyad raṭl-weight from Syria, dated 744 A. D., which weighs 337.55 grams, this mace weighed a little over four kilograms. The raṭl varied considerably from city to city; for later periods, we know that the standard Damascus raṭl was 1.85 kg, the Aleppo raṭl 2.28 kg, etc. See Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 3, 30f.

314. Ahl al-riddah, conventionally applied to the Arab tribes that renounced

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Abū 'Ubaydah:[315] Muḥammad b. Mūsā had been with 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar[316] in Fārs. He fought with him in the battle against Abū Fudayk, as commander of his right wing, and distinguished himself for bravery and valor.[317] 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar gave him his daughter Umm 'Uthmān in marriage; his sister[318] had married 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān. 'Abd al-Malik then appointed Muḥammad governor of Sijistān. On his way there he passed through al-Kūfah, when al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf was there. It was suggested to al-Ḥajjāj that "if this man, with his bravery and his marriage ties to 'Abd al-Malik, reaches Sijistān, and anyone you are pursuing takes refuge with him, he will not give him up to you." Al-Ḥajjāj asked what could be done and was told, "You should go to him, greet him, mention his bravery and valor, and how Shabīb is in his path, and has frustrated all your efforts, and that you hope God may relieve you of him through Muḥammad's hand, the fame and glory thereof accruing to Muḥammad himself."

So it happened. Muḥammad b. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh turned aside to confront Shabīb, who came out to meet him.[319] Shabīb said to him, "I know all about al-Ḥajjāj's wiles. He has tricked you and managed to use you to protect himself. It seems to me that if the two rings of the saddle-girth should meet,[320] your companions would abandon you and you would be cut down like your comrades. Do as I say, then, and go off to your own business, for I value you too highly to see you die." But Muḥamtheir Islam after the death of the Prophet. According to Mubarrad, Kāmil, 573, the Khārijites used riddī to mean "someone who knows the truth of what they say, but suppresses it"; but here ahl al-riddah probably means only "non-Khārijite Muslims."

---

315. Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā, the famous philologist, d. 209 (824–825); see EI², s. v. Abū 'Ubayda.

316. On him see Ziriklī, A'lām, V, 214. Like Muḥammad b. Mūsā, he belonged to the Banū Taym of Quraysh. For his governorship in Fārs and battles against the Azraqites there (for Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr), see text above, II, 753ff. According to Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, V, 240, Abū 'Ubaydah was a mawlā of his family.

317. See text above, II, 852f.

318. 'Ā'ishah. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 130.

319. Reading fa-wāqafah (as in the previous account) for text fa-wāqa'ah.

320. That is, if push came to shove; for the proverb, see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 121.

mad b. Mūsā refused, and Shabīb engaged him in single combat and killed him.[321]

Returning to the account of Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān: Among the men who rendered him the oath of allegiance that night was Abū Burdah b. Abī Mūsā al-Ash'arī.[322] When he rendered the oath, Shabīb asked him, "Are you not Abū Burdah?" He [929] said, "Yes." Shabīb said to his companions, "My friends! This man's father was one of the two arbiters!"[323] They replied, "Let us kill him then!" But Shabīb said, "This man bears no blame for what his father did." They said, "Truly."

The next morning Shabīb set out for the fortress in which Abū al-Ḍurays and A'yan had taken refuge, but they attacked him with arrows and fortified themselves against him. He remained confronting them for that day, and then left them.

Then his companions said to him, "There is no one stopping us from going right on to al-Kūfah." But when he saw how many wounds they had sustained, he said, "I will not require of you more than what you have already done." He then led them to Niffar,[324] al-Ṣarāt,[325] and Baghdad, and proceeded on to Khānījār, where he halted.

---

321. Quite divergent from the three versions of Muḥammad b. Mūsā's fate given here is the notice in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 273f., 297, which places his defeat and death at al-Ahwāz, the following year, after Shabīb had entered al-Kūfah the second time and was on his way to Kirmān (see text below, II, 972). Otherwise, Ibn Khayyāṭ follows Ṭabarī's chronology here, if summarily. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 85f., on the other hand, in his list of commanders defeated or killed by Shabīb, puts Zaḥr b. Qays fourth, after 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ash'ath (see text below, II, 930, and, for the first two, note 178 above), is silent on Zā'idah b. Qudāmah and his companions, and mentions Muḥammad b. Mūsā ninth, just before Shabīb's (only) entry into al-Kūfah. Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 410, names Muḥammad b. Mūsā as one of five commanders killed by Shabīb before attacking al-Kūfah, which agrees with Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 408–11; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 127–29; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 185f.

322. Later in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah. See EI², s.v. al-Ash'arī, Abū Burda.

323. Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī was chosen as the arbiter (ḥakam) to represent 'Alī in the conflict with Mu'āwiyah at Ṣiffīn; since the decision to arbitrate led to the secession of the Khārijites from 'Alī's side, he would be held in particular opprobrium by them. See EI², s.v. al-Ash'arī, Abū Mūsā.

324. The ancient Nippur, about fifty-five miles east of al-Kūfah; see EI¹, s.v. Niffar.

325. The Ṣarāt canal, extending east-west between the Euphrates and the Tigris, would be crossed some thirty miles north of Niffar on the route to al-Madā'in or

When al-Ḥajjāj heard that Shabīb was headed toward Niffar, he thought that his objective was al-Madā'in, which is the gateway to al-Kūfah; for he who takes al-Madā'in controls most of the region of al-Kūfah. This panicked al-Ḥajjāj, and he sent for 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan, and summoned him to hurry off to al-Madā'in; he put him in charge of its pulpit and prayer, of the security force (ma'ūnah)[326] of all of Jūkhā, and of the land revenue of the district.[327] 'Uthmān went straight off to al-Madā'in, and al-Ḥajjāj dismissed 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Uṣayfīr.

At this time, al-Jazl had been staying in al-Madā'in for some months, treating his wounds, and Ibn Abī 'Uṣayfīr used to come visit him and treat him generously. But when 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan came to al-Madā'in, he did not come to visit him, frequent his company, or send him any gifts. Al-Jazl's comment was "O God, increase Ibn Abī 'Uṣayfīr in generosity, liberality, and excellence, [930] and increase 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan in tightness and miserliness!"

Then al-Ḥajjāj summoned 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath[328] and ordered him to select a force and go out in pursuit of this enemy; he stipulated a force of six thousand. 'Abd al-Raḥmān made his selection from the horsemen and most prominent fighters, and also led out six hundred of his own men from Kindah and Ḥaḍramawt. Al-Ḥajjāj urged him to hurry with the muster, which he made at Dayr 'Abd al-Raḥmān. When al-Ḥajjāj was ready to send them out, he wrote to them as follows:

> You have made humiliation into a habit, and turned and retreated on the day of advance. This is the behavior of unbelievers. I have forgiven you time after time after time after

---

Baghdad; see Le Strange, Lands, 72. In Ṭabarī al-Ṣarāt often refers to an area, or perhaps to an otherwise unidentified town; see, for example, text above, II, 37, 40.

326. A synonym for shurṭah, the police or internal security forces. See Ṭabarī, glossarium, s.v., and note 45 above.

327. Kharāj al-astān. It is unclear whether this refers to Jūkhā, or to one of the fiscal astāns listed by the geographers (and if so, which one; see Le Strange, Lands, 79ff.). Some MSS read al-Anbār, as does the paraphrase by Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 411 (amīran 'alā al-Madā'in wa-Jūkhā wa-al-Anbār).

328. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. Ma'dīkarib (al-Ash'ath), grandson of the famous general and chief of the Kindah of Ḥaḍramawt, al-Ash'ath b. Qays; see EI², s.v. Ibn al-Ash'ath. He had earlier fought for Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr against al-Mukhtār and for Bishr b. Marwān against the Azraqites; see text above, II, 733, 826f.

time. But now, I swear to you a solemn oath by God, if you act this way again, I will deal you a blow far worse than facing this enemy, from whom you flee through lowland valleys and mountain passes and from whom you hide in river bends and mountain clefts. He who has any sense will fear for himself and not put his life in jeopardy! The warner is excused,[329] and "If you had addressed a living being, you would have been heard"[330]—but those you address have no life! Peace be upon you.

Then al-Ḥajjāj dispatched Ibn al-Aṣamm, his muezzin, to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath. He came to Ibn al-Ashʿath at sunrise and said, "Set out immediately, and proclaim to the men that 'No contractual obligation will protect any member of this expedition whom we find malingering.'" ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath marched out with the men as far as al-Madāʾin and halted there for a day and a night while his forces bought what they needed. Then he gave the call for the [931] men to saddle their mounts, and they did so and began to move out. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān stopped to see ʿUthmān b. Qaṭan and then went to see al-Jazl, asking him about his wounds and sitting to talk with him for a while. Al-Jazl then said to him, "Kinsman,[331] you are marching against the horsemen of the bedouin, sons of war, men never out of the saddle, by God, as if they had been created from their horses' ribs and raised on their backs. They are lions in the thickets, one horseman of theirs worth a hundred: if you do not attack him, he will attack you, and if you yell at him to chase him off[332] he will come at you. I have fought them and seen how they fight. When I showed myself to them in the open, they took their due from me and bested me; but when I put trenches around myself and fought them in narrow places, I got something of what I was after from them and achieved victory. If possible, then, do not encounter them when you are not either in formation or protected by a trench." When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān bade

329. Aʿdhara man andhara; see Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 435.

330. That is, "your words go unheeded," referring to himself; for the proverb, see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 48.

331. Both men belonged to the tribe of Kindah.

332. In hujhija, a word applied specifically to lions (and camels); see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

him farewell, al-Jazl said, "Here is my horse al-Fusayfisā'. Take her; she can outrun all others."

'Abd al-Raḥmān took the horse and led the men out against Shabīb; but when he drew near him, Shabīb withdrew from him to Daqūqā' and Shahrazūr.[333] 'Abd al-Raḥmān pursued him as far as the borders but then halted and said, "He is now in the Mosul region, so let them fight to defend their land, or let him be, as they please." But al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf wrote to him, saying, "Pursue Shabīb and go after him wherever he goes, until you catch him and kill him or expel him. The authority is that of the Commander of the Faithful, and the troops are his troops. Peace."

When he read al-Ḥajjāj's letter, 'Abd al-Raḥmān set out again in pursuit of Shabīb. Shabīb's strategy had been to let 'Abd al-Raḥmān draw near him and then attempt a night attack; but [932] when he found that 'Abd al-Raḥmān had taken precautions and dug a defensive trench, he would withdraw and again let him be, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān would pursue him. When Shabīb heard that he had started up and was on the march, he would advance on him with his cavalry; but when he reached him he would find that he had put the cavalry and infantry in battle array and brought up the archers, never catching him in a moment of negligence or weakness. Then he would again withdraw and let him be.

When Shabīb saw that he could not catch 'Abd al-Raḥmān unawares or find a way to get at him, he began to take his cavalry out when 'Abd al-Raḥmān drew near and would then dismount at a distance of twenty *farsakh*s, halting in a rough and barren area. 'Abd al-Raḥmān would come up, and when he drew near Shabīb, Shabīb would remount and go another fifteen or twenty *farsakh*s and dismount again, in a rough and rugged area. There he would halt until 'Abd al-Raḥmān again drew near.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab: Shabīb subjected that army to torments and agonies, wore down the hooves of their beasts, and put them through every sort of trial; but 'Abd al-Raḥmān kept pursuing him, passing by Khāniqīn, then Jalūlā', then Tāmarrā.[334] Then Shabīb went on and dis-

333. A district, and city, east of Daqūqā' and north of Ḥulwān; see Fiey, Assyrie chrétienne, III, 67ff.

334. A tassūj of the astān of Ḥulwān, in the area where the Diyālā River and the mounted at al-Batt,[335] one of the villages of Mosul, just on the borders of that region, separated from the Sawād[336] of al-Kūfah only by a river called Ḥawlāyā.[337]

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath came and dismounted at the Ḥawlāyā River, in Upper Rādhān,[338] in the region of Jūkhā. He halted at some steep bends in the river; ʿAbd al-Raḥmān halted there where he did, because these bends im-[933] pressed him as being like a natural trench and fortress.

Then Shabīb sent to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, saying, "These days are feast days[339] for both us and you. If you would care to observe a truce for their duration, by all means do so." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān agreed—there was nothing dearer to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān than truces and delays.

But ʿUthmān b. Qaṭan wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, saying, "I hereby inform the amīr—may God cause him to prosper!—that ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad has dug up Jūkhā in its entirety into one great trench while leaving Shabīb to cut off its land revenue and plunder its people. Peace."

Al-Ḥajjāj replied, "I have understood what you have told me about ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, and, by my life, he has indeed done as you say. Go, then, to the men, for you are to be their commander, and hurry out to confront the heretics. God will give you victory over them, God willing. Peace."

Nahrawān Canal (both also sometimes known as Tāmarrā) met. See Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 6; Le Strange, Lands, 59f., 80; Fiey, Assyrie Chrétienne, III, 13.

335. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 488, mentions two towns with this name, one in the district of Baghdad, "near Rādhān," the other near Baʿqūbā. The first of these may be the place intended here, and was perhaps just north of the al-ʿUdhaym River (see note 337).

336. The Sawād ("blackness") is the alluvial plain of Mesopotamia; at this time, the Sawād of al-Kūfah was the entire province between the Sawād of al-Baṣrah to the south and the district of Mosul to the north, constituting with the former the Sawād of Iraq.

337. If Fiey's identification of Rādhān is accepted (see notes 184, 186), this may be the al-ʿUdhaym River, although that would imply administration from Mosul farther down the Tigris than was the case later, when the capital of the Iraq had been moved north from al-Kūfah to Baghdad.

338. Rādhān al-Aʿlā. Wherever Rādhān was, it was administratively divided into two parts, upper and lower; see Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 6, and note 184 above.

339. Presumably, the season of the ʿĪd al-Aḍḥā, or Greater Feast, celebrated on the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah; see EI², s.v. ʿĪd al-Aḍḥā, and next note.

Al-Ḥajjāj sent Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah to al-Madā'in, while 'Uthmān set out and came to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad and the Kūfans with him where they were camped on the River Ḥawlāyā, near al-Batt. This was the evening of Tuesday, the "Day of Watering" (8 Dhū al-Ḥijjah 76 [March 18, 696]).[340] 'Uthmān called to the men, as he sat on a mule, "Men, go out against your enemy!" The men came running to him, saying, "We adjure you by God! Night has fallen, and the men have not put themselves in the proper frame of mind for combat. First pass the night, then take the men out in formation." But he kept saying, "I will go out and engage them, and the lot will fall to my favor or theirs." Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān came to them and seized the bridle of 'Uthmān's mount, pleading with him in God's name [934] until he dismounted. 'Aqīl b. Shaddād al-Salūlī[341] said to 'Uthmān, "The engagement you want right now you can have tomorrow, and tomorrow will be better for both you and the men. There is wind and dust at this hour, and evening has come. Dismount, then, and we will all set out against them early in the morning." He dismounted then. The wind and the dust it raised irritated him, so the revenue collector[342] summoned the local inhabitants[343] to build him a large tent[344] to spend the night in.

The next morning, Wednesday, the people of al-Batt came to Shabīb, who was staying in their church, and said, "May God cause you to prosper! You are merciful to the weak and the people of the jizyah;[345] those you govern can speak to you and complain of their afflictions, and you concern yourself with them and pro-

340. The "day of watering" (yawm al-tarwiyah) is the first day of the pilgrimage rites in Mecca; there are various explanations for the name. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v. tarwiyah, and *EI*², s.v. ḥadjdj. March 18, 696, was a Saturday.

341. Called also "al-Ḥubshī" below; he was a descendant of the Companion Ḥubshī b. Junādah of the Banū Salūl of Hawāzin (of Qays 'Aylān), named after Salūl bint Dhuhl b. Shaybān, wife of Murrah b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah. See Caskel, Ǧamharat annasab, I, 92, 114, II, 327, 509.

342. Ṣāḥib al-kharāj; apparently the person locally responsible, who knew the inhabitants. See also note 375 below.

343. 'Ulūj: according to the lexicographers "brutes" or "infidels," but in this period essentially "peasants" or "non-Arabs"; see Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation, 172.

344. Qubbah; see Dozy, Supplément, s.v.

345. The poll tax, levied on the non-Muslim population; see *EI*², s.v. djizya. The Khārijites were consistently as tolerant of non-Muslims as they were intolerant of non-Khārijite Muslims; see *EI*², s.v. Khāridjites.

tect them. But these people are oppressors; they will not be talked to, and they will accept no excuses. By God, if they hear that you are staying in our church, they will surely kill us once you go, if you are fated to do so. If you would, then, come stay next to the village, so they will have nothing to hold against us." Shabīb agreed to do so, and went out and encamped beside the village.

'Uthmān spent the entire night encouraging the troops. When Wednesday morning came, he led the men out, but they were met by a strong wind and dust, and cried to him, saying, "We adjure you by God, do not take us out today; for the wind is against us." He agreed to wait out that day. Shabīb was planning to fight them, and his forces went out, but when he saw that his opponents did not come out to him, he also waited out the day.

On Thursday eve, 'Uthmān went out and mustered the men by their quarters. He put each quarter on one side of the camp and told them to march out in that formation. He asked them who [935] had been in command of their right wing, and they said Khālid b. Nahīk b. Qays al-Kindī, with 'Aqīl b. Shaddād al-Salūlī in command of their left wing. 'Uthmān summoned the two men and said to them, "Keep the same positions that you have had; I am putting you in command of the two wings. Stand fast and do not flee, for, by God, I shall abide as long as the palms of Rādhān abide on their trunks!" They replied, "And we, by God, other than Whom there is no god, will not flee, but stand until we achieve either victory or death." 'Uthmān said, "May God reward you richly."

'Uthmān waited until he had led the men in the morning prayer, and then set out.[346] He put the quarters of the Medinese and of Tamīm and Hamdān[347] on the left, toward the River Ḥawlāyā, and the quarters[348] of Kindah and Rabī'ah and of Madhḥij and Asad on the right. He himself dismounted and marched with the infantry. Shabīb also went forth, having 181 men with him that day, and crossed the river to meet his opponents. He was in the right wing of his forces, having put Suwayd 346. The day was 10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah, the 'Īd al-Aḍḥā.

347. Reading rub'ay ahl al-Madīnah wa-Tamīm wa-Hamdān for text rub' ahl al-Madīnah Tamīm wa-Hamdān.

348. Reading rub'ay for text rub'.

b. Sulaym over his left wing and his brother Muṣād b. Yazīd in the center. The two armies advanced and bore down on each other.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ al-'Absī: 'Uthmān kept repeating, "'Flight will not avail you if you flee from death or killing; afterward you will not dwell in comfort but a little while.'[349] Where are those who uphold their religion and defend their spoil[350]?" 'Aqīl b. Shaddād b. Ḥubshī al-Salūlī said, "Perhaps I may be one of them—those others were killed on the day of Rūdhbār!"[351]

Then Shabīb said to his men, "I am going to attack their left wing, next to the river. If I defeat them, then the commander of [936] my left should attack their right. But the commander of my center must not move until he receives my order." Then he charged with his right wing, next to the river, against 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan's left, and it was driven back. 'Aqīl b. Shaddād dismounted and fought until he was killed. Also killed that day was Mālik b. 'Abdallāh al-Hamdānī al-Murhibī, the paternal uncle of 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh al-Mantūf.[352] 'Aqīl b. Shaddād recited that day as he fought:

Indeed I strike with my keen sword like a true stalwart scion of Salūl.

While Shabīb plunged into the midst of his opponents' forces, Suwayd b. Sulaym charged with Shabīb's left against 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan's right, commanded by Khālid b. Nahīk b. Qays al-Kindī, and drove them back. Khālid, who was in command of the quarter of Kindah and Rabī'ah that day, as well as being commander of the right wing, dismounted and fought fiercely, but Shabīb attacked him from the rear. Shabīb headed straight for him and came down on him with his sword, killing him. 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan, accompanied by the marshals and the tribal notables and horsemen

349. Qur'ān 33:16.

350. Fay'; see note 67 above.

351. La'allī an akūna aḥadahum qutila ulā'ika yawm Rūdhbār. Other MSS read La'allī an akūna minhum aw aḥadahum wa-in kānū qad qutilū yawm Rūdhbār.

352. Reading 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh for text 'Ayyāsh b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh, which is genealogically impossible. 'Abdallāh b. 'Ayyāsh al-Mantūf of the Banū Murhibah b. Du'ām of Hamdān is cited frequently by Ṭabarī. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 231, II, 106, 432.

among his forces, who had dismounted with him, moved against the enemy center, where Shabīb's brother was positioned with some sixty men on foot. 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan drew up to them and charged them with his notables and stalwart men, and these pounded at them until they broke their ranks; but then Shabīb attacked them from behind with the cavalry, and before they knew it they were speared in the back and pitched forward on their faces. Now Suwayd b. Sulaym turned against them as well, with his cavalry, and Muṣād and his forces came back to the fray, after Shabīb had them dismount. There was a general melee for a [937] time, and 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan fought and fought well; but then the enemy forces pressed his men and surrounded him, and Shabīb's brother Muṣād charged him and delivered a sword blow that spun him around. 'Uthmān said, "'And God's command was fulfilled,'"[353] and the enemy troops killed him. Also killed that day was al-Abrad b. Rabī'ah al-Kindī; he was on a hillock, when he tossed his spear[354] to his weapon bearer (ghulām) and gave him his horse; he then fought until he was killed.

'Abd al-Raḥmān had fallen, but Ibn Abī Sabrah al-Ju'fī,[355] who was mounted on a mule, saw him and recognized him. He dismounted, handed him his spear, and said, "Mount!" 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad asked, "Which of us is to ride behind?" Ibn Abī Sabrah replied, "Glory to God! You are the commander and should be in front!" 'Abd al-Raḥmān mounted and said to Ibn Abī Sabrah, "Call to the men that they are to come to Dayr Abī Maryam." He did so, and the two of them set off themselves. Meanwhile, Wāṣil b. al-Ḥārith al-Sakūnī saw 'Abd al-Raḥmān's horse, the one al-Jazl had given him, wandering about the battlefield; then one of Shabīb's men took it. Wāṣil assumed that 'Abd al-Raḥmān had been killed, and he looked for him among the dead but did not find him. He asked around about him, and was told, "We saw a man dismount from his beast and put him on it; it was probably him, in any case, as he had come this way only shortly before." Wāṣil b. al-Ḥārith set out after him on his nag,

353. Qur'ān 4:47, 33:37.

354. Silāḥ, meaning weapon in general, but perhaps here the spear with which one fights on horseback as opposed to the sword wielded on foot.

355. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Yazīd Abī Sabrah of the Banū Ju'fī b. Sa'd al-'Ashīrah of Madhḥij; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 268, II, 422.

taking his weapon bearer with him on a mule. As they drew near, Muḥammad b. Abī Sabrah said to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, "By God, two horsemen are coming up on us!" 'Abd al-Raḥmān asked, "Are there more than just the two?" Muḥammad said, "No." 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "Well, two can handle two."

'Abd al-Raḥmān continued talking with Ibn Abī Sabrah as if he were paying the two men no mind, until they caught up with them. Then Ibn Abī Sabrah said, "God's mercy on you, the two men have caught up with us." 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "Let us dismount, then." They dismounted and drew their swords, and then [938] went to meet them. When Wāṣil saw them, he recognized them and said, "You did not dismount when it was called for, so do not dismount now!" Then he drew his turban away from his face, and they recognized him and welcomed him. Wāṣil said to Ibn al-Ash'ath, "When I saw your horse wandering about the battlefield, I assumed you were on foot, so I brought you this nag of mine to ride." Ibn al-Ash'ath then left Ibn Abī Sabrah his mule and mounted the nag. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ash'ath then went off to Dayr al-Ya'ār.[356]

Shabīb ordered his men to hold back their swords from the troops, and he summoned the latter to render him the oath of allegiance. Those surviving from the infantry came and rendered the oath to him. Abū al-Ṣuqayr al-Muḥallimī said to him, "I killed seven Kūfans in the middle of the river; the last of them was a man who clung to my robe and screamed and almost succeeded in scaring me off. But then I went for him and killed him." On that day 120 from the Kindah were killed, and either a thousand or six hundred from the rest of the men. Most of the marshals were killed that day.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Qudāmah b. Ḥāzim b. Sufyān al-Khath'amī: I killed quite a number of them that day.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad spent that night at Dayr al-Ya'ār. Two horsemen came to him and went up to see him on the roof, while another stood nearby. One of them closeted himself with 'Abd al-Raḥmān for a long private conversation; then he and his companions came back down. The men were saying to one another that that was Shabīb and that he had written to him.

356. Spelling and location uncertain. Other MSS read al-N.'ār; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 416, has al-B.qār.

[939] At the end of the night, 'Abd al-Raḥmān came out and rode to Dayr Abī Maryam. There he found that Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Sabrah had provided the mounted troops with barley and clover heaped up like castles and slaughtered for them all the meat they could wish for; on that day they ate and fed their beasts. Then the men met with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath and said to him, "If Shabīb hears where you are, he will come to you and you will be easy pickings for him; the men are dispersed and gone, and the best of them have been killed. Get back to al-Kūfah, man!" 'Abd al-Raḥmān set out for al-Kūfah, and the men returned, also. When he arrived, 'Abd al-Raḥmān went into hiding from al-Ḥajjāj, until he was subsequently given safe conduct.[357]

'Abd al-Malik Reforms the Coinage

In this year, 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān ordered dīnārs and dirhams inscribed,[358] according to al-Wāqidī—Sa'd b. Rāshid—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān.

---

357. The campaigns of Ibn al-Ash'ath and 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan (in that order) are mentioned after that of Zā'idah b. Qudāmah by Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 273, who dates 'Uthmān's defeat, like Ṭabarī, to Dhū al-Ḥijjah 76. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 85, makes Ibn al-Ash'ath the third commander defeated by Shabīb, and does not mention 'Uthmān; Baghdādī, Farq, 90, gives a report parallel to Ibn A'tham's, but even briefer. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 413–16; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 129–32; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 186.

358. Naqsh. This apparently refers to 'Abd al-Malik's general monetary reform, in which purely aniconic dīnārs and dirhams, of standard (and redefined) weight, replaced the Byzantine gold and Sasanian silver coinage in circulation, as well as various previous Islamic adaptations of both. The earliest known aniconic dīnārs are in fact dated 77; aniconic dirhams appeared only in 79. The numismatic evidence suggests, however, that 'Abd al-Malik may have first initiated an offical Islamic coinage, with "adapted" iconic issues in both gold and silver, as early as 72, in which case this statement would represent a conflation of this first attempt with his later aniconic reform. ("Naqsh" does not necessarily imply aniconic Arabic inscription as opposed to pictorial representation on earlier issues.) On this thorny question, which is far from resolved, see, most recently, M. Bates, "History, Geography and Numismatics in the First Century of Islamic Coinage," Schweizerische Numismatische Rundschau 65 (1986), 231–63, as well as G. C. Miles in *EI*², s.vv. dīnār, dirham; H. Gaube, "Numismatik," in Grundriss der arabischen Philologie, I (Wiesbaden, 1982), 226–50; and the classic study by P.

According to Ibn Abī al-Zinād—his father:[359] 'Abd al-Malik struck dirhams and dīnārs that year; he was the first to initiate the striking of them.[360]

According to Khālid b. Abī Rabī'ah—Ibn Hilāl—his father: The pre-Islamic units of weight (mithqāls) by which 'Abd al-Malik struck his coins were twenty-two qīrāṭs, minus a ḥabbah; ten weighed seven.[361]

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jarīr al-Laythī—Hilāl b. Usāmah: I asked Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab[362] how much the zakāt[363] should be on dīnārs, and he said, "For every twenty mithqāls in

---

Grierson, "The Monetary Reform of 'Abd al-Malik," Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 3 (1960), 241–64. See also the much fuller (if even more problematical) report in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 465–70.

359. On Abū al-Zinād 'Abdallāh b. Dhakhwān al-Qurashī, d. 131 (748), and his son 'Abd al-Raḥmān, see Sezgin, GAS, I, 396, 405.

360. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 467, 469, cites two versions of this report from Ibn Abī al-Zinād: one from al-Wāqidī stating that 'Abd al-Malik was the first to strike gold and silver coins, after the "year of reconciliation" ('ām al-jamā'ah), usually considered to be 73; and the other from Ibn Sa'd, referring only to gold coins, struck in the year of reconciliation, specified as 74. In either case the statement must refer to experiments with the existing iconic coinage, prior to 'Abd al-Malik's general reform. A further report, in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 240, and other authors, ostensibly referring to the aniconic coinage, attributes 'Abd al-Malik's initiative to a quarrel with the Byzantine emperor over the Islamicization of the previously Christian superscription on papyrus imported by the Byzantines from Egypt; the emperor is said to have threatened to retaliate by putting an anti-Islamic inscription on his dīnārs, and 'Abd al-Malik to have responded by freeing himself from Byzantine coinage altogether. For a full discussion of this story, about which Ṭabarī is completely silent, see A. Fahmī, Fajr al-sikkah al-'arabiyyah (Cairo, 1965), 38–53.

361. For various interpretations of this statement, and others like it in Balādhurī, see the articles by Grierson and Miles cited in note 358, and Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 1f., 12f. The mithqāl was a unit of weight that varied with both geography and commodity; the same is true of the qīrāṭ and the ḥabbah. For monetary purposes, mithqāl was virtually synonymous with dīnār. According to Miles, 'Abd al-Malik's reform dinars and dirhams were both considerably lighter than their respective prototypes, the Byzantine solidus and Sasanian dirham; so if, as seems likely, the mithqāl Jāhilī mentioned here is the weight of the solidus, 'Abd al-Malik cannot have simply struck dinars equal in weight to this mithqāl. From reports in Balādhurī and elsewhere, we know that the mithqāl was subsequently set equal to twenty qīrāṭs; what may be intended here, then, is that 'Abd al-Malik recognized the old mithqāl as equal to 22 qīrāṭs, and, defining a qīrāṭ on this basis, issued new dinars at 20 qīrāṭs. The expression "ten weighed seven" refers to the weight ratio of dirhams to dinars, and, according to Miles, accords well with the reality of early post-reform coins and glass weights.

362. D. 94 (713); see Sezgin, GAS, I, 276.

363. The alms tax on Muslims, assessed on gold (and silver) at 2.5 percent; see SEI, s.v. zakāt.

[940] Syrian weights, a half mithqāl." I said, "Why Syrian rather than Egyptian?" He replied, "It is by the Syrian that dīnārs are struck, and that was the weight of the (old?) dīnārs before the dīnārs were struck; they were twenty-two qīrāṭs minus a ḥabbah."[364] Sa'īd said, "I know that, because I had sent some dīnārs to Damascus, and they were struck at that weight."[365]

In this year, Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam went to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, and Abān b. 'Uthmān took charge of Medina; this was in Rajab (October–November 695).[366]

In this year, Nawfal b. Musāḥiq b. 'Amr b. Khudāsh of the Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy was appointed to the judiciary.[367]

In this year, Marwān b. Muḥammad b. Marwān was born.[368]

The pilgrimage was led in this year by Abān b. 'Uthmān, who was amīr over Medina, according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—anonymous—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar; and also according to al-Wāqidī.[369] The governor of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, and the governor of Khurāsān was Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid. Shurayḥ was in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah, and Zurārah b. Awfā was in charge of the judiciary in al-Baṣrah.

---

364. Perhaps this statement can be given some point if we assume that the first mithqāl refers to weighing gold, while the second refers to currency of a half dinar, whatever the weight of a mithqāl may have been in Egypt.

365. A variant of this statement by Sa'īd appears in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 467 (with a different isnād), with "uncoined gold" (tibr) instead of "dīnārs."

366. See text above, II, 873; apparently this time 'Abd al-Malik consented to the change of governors. Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 112f., records only one incident, with 'Abd al-Malik protesting but confirming Abān as Yaḥyā's successor.

367. In Medina. For Nawfal the text has Abān b. Nawfal, a slip; see text below, II, 1085, and Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, V, 113. The Banū 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy were a clan of Quraysh; see Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, I, 4, 27.

368. The later caliph Marwān II; see EI[1], s.v. Marwān II.

369. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 301; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 336.

The Events of the Year 77

(April 10, 696–March 29, 697)

In this year Shabīb killed 'Attāb b. Warqā' al-Riyāḥī and Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah.

Shabīb Kills 'Attāb b. Warqā' and Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah [941]

The reason for that, according to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab and Farwah b. Laqīṭ: When Shabīb defeated the army that al-Ḥajjāj had sent out against him with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, and killed 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan, it was summer and very hot.[370] Because of the heat, he and his companions went to Māh Bihzādhān[371] for the summer, spending three months there. Many people looking for material gain came and joined him, as well as some people whom al-Ḥajjāj was pursuing for money or other penalties. Among the latter was 370. According to the text above, II, 933f., the battle was in March.

371. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 406, and P. Schwarz, Iran im Mittelalter (Leipzig, 1896–1936), 666f. Yāqūt's suggestion that this place was near Bandanījān, that is, in the mountains east of al-Madā'in, would fit the present context well.

a man from the tribe[372] named al-Ḥurr b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAwf. Two *dihqān*s among the inhabitants of the Durqiṭ Canal region[373] had mistreated and wronged him, and he had attacked them and killed them. He then joined Shabīb, was with him in Māh, and participated in his various battles, until Shabīb was killed. Then, when al-Ḥajjāj extended amnesty to all those who owed money or other penalties and had gone out to join Shabīb—that was after the day at al-Sabakhah[374]—al-Ḥurr came back to him with the others. The families of the two *dihqān*s came to demand that al-Ḥajjāj arrest him, and he was fetched and brought in; he had made his testament, despairing of his life. Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Enemy of God, you have killed two of the revenue collectors."[375] Al-Ḥurr replied, "The whole story, may God cause you to prosper, is worse than that." Al-Ḥajjāj asked, "How so?" He replied, "I forsook my obedience and separated myself from the community. But then you issued the amnesty for all who would come back to you. Here is my amnesty document, which you wrote for me." Al-Ḥajjāj said, [942] "Curse you! I have indeed, by my life, done so." And he let him go.

After the heat had broken, Shabīb left Māh with some eight hundred men and headed for al-Madāʾin, which was being governed by Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah; he halted at the bridges of Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān.[376] Then Mādharwāsb, the lord of Bābil Mahrūdh, wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, saying: "I hereby inform the amīr—may God cause him to prosper!—that Shabīb has come and halted at the bridges of Ḥudhayfah. I do not know where he is headed."

---

372. That is, Azd, to which ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and Farwah (and Abū Mikhnaf) belonged.

373. Somewhere near the Kūthā Canal, south and probably west of al-Madāʾin. See Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 7, 9; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 568 (pointed as Darqīṭ, but without explicit specification of vocalization); Le Strange, Lands, 80; al-ʿAlī, "Al-Madāʾin and Its Surrounding Area in Arabic Literary Sources," Mesopotamia 3–4 (1968–69), 438.

374. See text below, II, 958ff.

375. Rajulayn min ahl al-kharāj. This is presumably a plural of ṣāḥib al-kharāj, as used above (see note 342). A dihqān would collect the revenues from his peasants and then pay the central treasury; see Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation, 95f.

376. Ḥudhayfah b. al-Yamān, d. 36 (656), was an important commander in the conquest of Iraq and an early governor of al-Madāʾin; see Ziriklī, Aʿlām, II, 180. The location of his qanāṭir (stone bridges, arches) seems to be nowhere described more specifically than as "near al-Madāʾin." See Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 272; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 180.

When al-Ḥajjāj read this letter, he stood before the men, praised and glorified God, and said, "By God, men, either you will fight to defend your land and your spoil,[377] or I will send for a force more compliant and obedient, and more steadfast in the rage and terror of battle than you, and they will fight your enemy and appropriate your spoil." At this, the men came to him from every side, saying, "We will fight them, and we will satisfy the amīr; let the amīr send us out against them, and we will go wherever pleases him." Among those who came to him was Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah,[378] an old man who was unable to stand up by himself without a helping hand; he said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! You are sending out the men against them in bits and pieces. Better you should mobilize the men altogether and let them go to meet the enemy in a body. Then send forth as their commander a stalwart, courageous man, experienced in battle, a man who looks on flight as a crime and a disgrace and on steadfastness as glory and honor." Al-Ḥajjāj replied, "Such a man are you; you lead them, then!" Zuhrah said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, what [943] the troops need now is a man who carries a spear, wears a coat of mail, brandishes a sword, and sits firmly on horseback. But I can do none of these things; I have lost my strength and much of my eyesight. But do send me out among the forces with their commander. I can stay on a saddled riding-camel well enough and be with the commander in his camp to advise him with my opinions." Al-Ḥajjāj replied, "May God reward you handsomely for Islam and its people at the beginning of Islam, and may God reward you handsomely for Islam at the end of Islam, for you have given good and sincere advice! I will send out the forces altogether: Marching orders, men!"

The men set out marching without knowing who their commander would be, while al-Ḥajjāj wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān as follows:

I hereby inform the Commander of the Faithful, may God be generous to him, that Shabīb has advanced to near al-

377. Fayʾ; see note 67 above.

378. D. 77 (696), of the Banū al-Ḥārith (al-Aʿraj) b. Kaʿb b. Saʿd b. Zayd Manāt of Tamīm, a renowned veteran of the conquest of Iraq, who distinguished himself particularly at the battle of al-Qādisiyyah. See text above, I, 2231ff., 2338ff., 2355ff., etc.; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 75, II, 611; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, III, 85.

Madā'in and is threatening al-Kūfah. The Kūfans have fought him unsuccessfully in many battles; everywhere he kills their commanders and routs their forces. Perhaps the Commander of the Faithful will see best to send me the Syrians to fight their enemy for them and appropriate their land.[379] Peace.

When this letter reached 'Abd al-Malik, he sent him Sufyān b. al-Abrad[380] with four thousand men and Ḥabīb b. 'Abd al-[944] Raḥmān al-Ḥakamī[381] of Madḥij with two thousand; these he dispatched quickly to al-Ḥajjāj, as soon as he received the letter.

Meanwhile, the Kūfans were preparing to fight Shabīb, still without knowing who their commander would be; some said he would send out one, some another. Al-Ḥajjāj had in fact sent for 'Attāb b. Warqā' to come to him. 'Attāb was in command of the Kūfan cavalry with al-Muhallab; this was the army of Kūfans over which Bishr b. Marwān had sent out 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf as commander in the campaign against Qaṭarī.[382] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf had held this position for only about two months before al-Ḥajjāj came out as governor of Iraq; after al-Ḥajjāj's arrival, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf remained their commander only through Rajab and Sha'bān (October–December 694). Qaṭarī killed 'Abd al-Raḥmān at the end of Ramaḍān (late January 695),[383] and al-Ḥajjāj then sent out 'Attāb b. Warqā' to command that army of Kūfans which had lost 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf. Al-Ḥajjāj ordered 'Attāb to obey al-Muhallab, which 'Attāb found vexing, and things became so bad between him and al-Muhallab that 'Attāb wrote to al-Ḥajjāj asking to be relieved of his command of that army and recalled. When, therefore, he received al-Ḥajjāj's letter ordering him to come to him, he was very pleased.

---

379. Ya'kulū bilādahum, literally, "eat their land," as above they will "eat their fay'," that is, enjoy the revenues which are the conquerors' spoil.

380. Of the Banū Kalb; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 515.

381. Of the Banū al-Ḥakam b. Sa'd al-'Ashīrah; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 294f.

382. Qaṭarī was the current leader of the Azraqites; see note 13 above and text below, II, 1003ff. This paragraph summarizes the account above, II, 855–59, 875–78.

383. See text above, II, 875f., where the date was, according to the Baṣrans, 1 Ramaḍān, and, according to the Kūfans, 20 Ramaḍān.

Al-Ḥajjāj summoned the notables of the Kūfans, among them Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah al-Sa'dī of the Banū al-A'raj and Qabīṣah b. Wāliq al-Taghlibī, and he asked them their opinions on whom he should send out to command that army. They replied, "Your opinion is best, O amīr." He said, "I have sent for 'Attāb b. Warqā', and he will be coming to you tonight or tomorrow night; it will be he who marches out with the men." Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, you have hit them with the right stone.[384] No, by God, he will not come back to you until he has either achieved victory or been killed." Then Qabīṣah b. Wāliq said, "I will give you my opinion. If it is wrong, it is nevertheless the result of my sincere efforts to advise the Commander of the Faithful, the amīr, and all the Muslims; if it is right, it is God Who has led me to it. There is talk among us, and among the men, that an army has been sent out to you from Syria, the Kūfans having been defeated and routed, and shown themselves short on endurance and indifferent to the shame of flight, as if their hearts were not in themselves but in some other people. Perhaps you may decide to send to this army of yours that has been provided you from the Syrians, cautioning them to be on their guard and never to camp for the night without assuming that there will be a night attack on them. You are fighting a shrewd, crafty man, ever on the move. You have mobilized against him the Kūfans, in whom you are not entirely confident; and their brethren are these troops that have been sent to you from Syria. When Shabīb is in one area, suddenly he pops up in another; and I feel no assurance that he will not come on them unawares. But if they perish, we perish, and Iraq perishes." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "You impress me! This shows excellent judgment and is excellent advice." [945]

Al-Ḥajjāj sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ghariq, the client of Abū 'Aqīl,[385] to meet the advancing Syrians. He found them halted at Hīt[386] and brought them a letter from al-Ḥajjāj, saying: "When you reach Hīt, leave the Euphrates route to al-Anbār and follow the 'Ayn al-Tamr route to al-Kūfah, God willing. Be on your guard [946]

384. Ramaytahum bi-ḥajarihim; for the proverb, see Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 263.

385. The text above, II, 922, has Ibn Abī 'Aqīl.

386. On the west bank of the Euphrates, about fifty miles above al-Anbār; see EI², s.v. Hīt.

and speed the march. Peace." The men then came on quickly. Meanwhile, 'Attāb b. Warqā' arrived on the night that al-Ḥajjāj had said he would. Al-Ḥajjāj ordered him to lead the troops out, and he camped with them at Ḥammām A'yan.

Shabīb[387] advanced as far as Kalwādhā, where he crossed the Tigris; then he came on and halted at the lower town of Bahurasīr,[388] so that only the bridge of boats spanning the Tigris separated him and Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah. When Shabīb halted at the town of Bahurasīr, Muṭarrif cut the bridge. Then he sent to Shabīb, saying, "Send to me some of your leading commanders, together with whom I can study the Qur'ān and consider the stance that you advocate." Shabīb sent to him some of his leading commanders, including Qa'nab, Suwayd, and al-Muḥallil; but when they were about to board the boat, Shabīb sent word to them not to do so until his messenger had returned from Muṭarrif. When the messenger returned,[389] he sent to Muṭarrif, saying, "Send to me the same number of your companions as I am sending of mine to you, for me to hold as hostages until you send my companions back to me." But Muṭarrif said to the messenger, "Go to him and say: Why should I trust you with my companions if I send them to you now, when you do not trust me with your companions?" The messenger returned to Shabīb and delivered this message. Shabīb then sent his reply, saying, "You [947] know that we do not consider treachery permissible in our religion, whereas you not only do it but also consider it permissible." Muṭarrif then sent to him al-Rabī' b. Yazīd al-Asadī, Sulaymān b. Ḥudhayfah b. Hilāl b. Mālik al-Muzanī, and Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, his client[390] and the captain of his guard. Once they were in Shabīb's custody, he sent off his companions and they went to Muṭarrif. They spent four days exchanging messages, but in the

387. The following paragraph is duplicated, with only minor differences in wording, at II, 982f. below; both accounts come from Abū Mikhnaf, but with different earlier authorities.

388. The city of Veh-Ardashir, on the west bank of the Tigris, opposite Ctesiphon, in the complex of al-Madā'in; see *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'in.

389. The parallel version below, and some MSS here, omit this phrase. If it is original, we must assume that Shabīb sent the messenger twice, once to agree, and then again to set conditions.

390. His father's client in the parallel version below.

end agreed on nothing.[391] When it became clear to Shabīb that Muṭarrif was not going to follow him or join in with him, he prepared to set off to meet 'Attāb b. Warqā' and the Syrians.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: Shabīb summoned his chief companions and said to them, "The only one who ever frustrates my plans is this Thaqafī. Four days ago I told myself I should go out with a detachment of cavalry and meet this army coming from Syria, hoping to catch them off guard—or even on it, it doesn't matter. In any case I would be meeting troops cut off from the garrison, with no amīr like al-Ḥajjāj to have recourse to and no garrison like al-Kūfah to take refuge in. Then my spies came to me today and informed me that the first of these troops have reached 'Ayn al-Tamr and are thus now almost to al-Kūfah, while other spies came to me from the direction of 'Attāb b. Warqā', telling me that he is camped with the main body of Kūfan troops at al-Ṣarāt. He is thus exceedingly close, so let us prepare to set out against him."

Muṭarrif was afraid that word would reach al-Ḥajjāj about what he had done, treating with Shabīb, and he withdrew toward al-Jibāl,[392] intending to wait and see what would happen between Shabīb and 'Attāb. Then Shabīb sent to him, saying, "Since you [948] declined to render allegiance to me, I have correspondingly repudiated any obligations between us."[393] Muṭarrif said to his companions, "Let us declare open revolt. Al-Ḥajjāj will fight us in any case, so let him fight us with our strength at its greatest." He set out, abandoning[394] al-Madā'in. Shabīb then restored the bridge and sent his brother Muṣād to al-Madā'in.

'Attāb advanced toward him, halting at the market of Ḥakamah.[395] Al-Ḥajjāj had sent out the Kūfan forces en masse,

---

391. See the detailed account of the negotiations below, II, 983–88.

392. Media, the province centered on Hamadhān; see EI², s.v. Djibāl; Le Strange, Lands, 185ff.

393. Fa-qad nabadhtu ilayka 'alā sawā': Qur'ānic phraseology, from Qur'ān 8:58: "If you fear treachery from a people, then repudiate (any agreement) with them correspondingly (fa-nbidh ilayhim 'alā sawā')."

394. Reading taraka for nazala. Ibn al-Athīr's paraphrase (Kāmil, IV, 422) omits the word. From the parallels below, II, 956, 988, it is clear that Muṭarrif set out for al-Daskarah.

395. Brief notices in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 275, and Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 194, do not specify more closely the location of this place.

both the regular forces and the young men who were eager to fight; not counting these young men, the regular forces were 40,000. Those who arrived with 'Attāb at the market of Ḥakamah that day were then 40,000 of the regular forces and 10,000 of the young men—or 50,000 altogether. Al-Ḥajjāj left behind no man of Quraysh nor any member of any noble Arab house.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jundab: I heard al-Ḥajjāj speak from the pulpit when he sent 'Attāb with the men against Shabīb, saying, "Men of al-Kūfah! Go out with 'Attāb b. Warqā', all of you! No man is permitted to remain here except those I have appointed to administrative posts. Hear me! He who is steadfast and strives will earn honor and preferment. Hear me! He who shrinks and flees will earn disgrace and disdain. By Him than Whom there is no other god! If you perform in this battle as you have in previous battles, you will surely feel my rough side, and I will come down with my full weight on you!" Then he came down; and the men assembled with 'Attāb at the market of Ḥakamah.

[949] According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: Shabīb reviewed us at al-Madā'in; we were a thousand men. He stood before us, praised and glorified God, and said, "Company of Muslims! God has given you victory over them when you were a hundred or two hundred, and a few more than that, or a few less; but today you are hundreds and hundreds. I will perform the noon prayer and then lead you out." He performed the noon prayer, and proclamation was made to the men: "Cavalry of God! Mount and rejoice!" Shabīb then went out with his forces; but some of them began to straggle and fall behind. When he had crossed Sābāṭ[396] and we had halted with him, he delivered a sermon to us, reminding us of the battle-days of God and encouraging us to turn away from the world and fix our desire on the afterlife. He spoke for a long time, then ordered his muezzin to give the call to prayer. He did so, and Shabīb came forward and led us in the afternoon prayer. Then he set out and brought us up close to 'Attāb b. Warqā' and his forces. As soon as he saw them, he dismounted and ordered his muezzin to give the call to prayer. He did so, and Shabīb came forward and led us in the sunset prayer. His muezzin was Sallām b. Sayyār al-Shaybānī.

396. One farsakh south of Bahurasīr, at the bridge over the Malik canal. See *EI*², s.v. al-Madā'in; Ya'qūbī, Buldān, 321; Fiey, "The Topography of al-Madā'in," Sumer 23 (1967), 12.

'Attāb b. Warqā''s spies had come to him and informed him that Shabīb had advanced on him, and he led out all the forces and put them in battle array. From the first day he camped there he had dug a trench, but every day had acted as if he intended to march on Shabīb in al-Madā'in; informed of this, Shabīb said, "I would rather march against him than have him march against me," and went out to him. When 'Attāb lined up his troops, he appointed Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays over his right [950] wing, saying to him, "O son of my brother,[397] you are a noble man, so be steadfast and vie in steadfastness!"[398] He replied, "As for me, by God, I will fight so long as one man stands with me!" 'Attāb said to Qabīṣah b. Wāliq, who was at that time over a third of the Banū Taghlib, "Take care of the left wing for me." But Qabīṣah replied, "I am an old man, and it is a great effort for me just to stand beneath my standard. My strength is gone, and I cannot stand on my own without support. But here are 'Ubaydallāh b. al-Ḥulays and Nu'aym b. 'Ulaym, both Taghlibīs"—each of these was over a third of the Taghlib; Qabīṣah said, "Appoint whichever of them you prefer, and whichever you appoint, you will be appointing a resolute and determined and capable man." 'Attāb appointed Nu'aym b. 'Ulaym, then, over the left wing. He appointed Ḥanẓalah b. al-Ḥārith al-Yarbū'ī, 'Attāb's own paternal cousin and the shaykh of his clan, over the infantry and arrayed them in three ranks: a rank of men with swords, a rank of spear-bearers, and a rank of archers. 'Attāb then went along the entire line, from the right wing to the left, passing by the men of each standard successively and urging them to fear God, charging them to be steadfast, and giving them sermons.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Ḥaṣīrah b. 'Abdallāh—Tamīm b. al-Ḥārith al-Azdī: He stood before us and gave us a lengthy sermon. I can remember these few words from what he said: "O people of Islam! Those who have the best lot in Paradise are the

397. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was last mentioned (II, 857) as commander of the quarter of Tamīm and Hamdān at Rāmhurmuz. He was a Hamdānī (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 130, on his father), and 'Attāb a Tamīmī (see note 123 above).

398. Fa-ṣbir wa-ṣābir, from Qur'ān 3:200: iṣbarū wa-ṣābirū.

[951] martyrs. God praises none of His creatures more than the steadfast; hear how He says, 'Be ye steadfast; God is with the steadfast.'[399] He whose deeds God praises, how great is his status! But God despises no one more than those who commit outrages. See how this enemy of yours slaughters the Muslims with his sword, and they insist that they thereby win God's favor. They are the most wicked people on earth, the dogs of the people of Hell! Where are the sermonizers?" When he asked that, not one of us, by God, answered him. Seeing this, he asked, "Where are those who recite the poetry of 'Antarah?"[400] And no, by God, not a single man breathed a word of reply to this. He said, "We are God's! It seems to me I can see you fleeing from 'Attāb b. Warqā' and leaving him with the wind whistling up his ass!"

'Attāb then went and sat in the center,[401] having with him Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah, who also was sitting, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, and Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. Abī Jahm al-'Adawī.[402] Shabīb advanced with six hundred men, four hundred having stayed behind; he said, "Those who have stayed behind are those I would not care to have seen among us." He put Suwayd b. Sulaym with two hundred men on the left wing, put al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il with two hundred in the center, and himself took the right wing with two hundred. It was between sunset prayer and the final, evening prayer, and the moon had come out. Shabīb called to the other side, "Whose are these standards?" They replied, "The standards of the Rabī'ah!"[403] Shabīb said,

---

399. Qur'ān 8:46.

400. 'Antarah b. Shaddād, famous sixth-century poet and hero; see EI², s.v. 'Antara, and Sezgin, GAS, II, 113ff. Perhaps the point here is to challenge both the men's religious fervor and their martial spirit.

401. Commanders seem often to have sat in battle. Below we are told that 'Attāb was sitting on a ṭinfisah, a carpet, until the enemy got too close (when he stood up and fought); it is not clear whether this carpet was on a platform or a sort of chair, but it was presumably not on a horse. At the later battle of al-Sabakhah, al-Ḥajjāj sat on a chair (kursī); see text below, II, 959, and note 427. See also Fries, Heereswesen, 76.

402. Of the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b of Quraysh; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 26, and II, 423 (on his father).

403. These are the Taghlibīs speaking, from 'Attāb's left wing. Taghlib and Bakr were the two branches of Wā'il, the most important component of Rabī'ah; Shabīb's clan was the Banū Dhuhl b. Shaybān of Bakr b. Wā'il, and thus he himself belonged to Rabī'ah (see text above, II, 887, and note 160). Unlike Bakr, whose role in both Islam and Khārijism was very mixed, the Taghlib remained mostly Chris-

"Standards that have often been on the side of the truth, but have also often been on the side of the false—they have had a share of both! By God, I will strive against you and earn my reward for doing so! You are Rabī'ah, but I am Shabīb! I am Abū Mudallah! Judgment is to God alone! Stand if you will!" [952]

Then he charged at them from a dike in front of the trench[404] and broke their line. The standard-bearers of Qabīṣah b. Wāliq, 'Ubayd[405] b. al-Ḥulays, and Nu'aym b. 'Ulaym stood their ground, and they were killed, and the entire left wing was driven back. Men from the Banū Taghlib called to one another, "Qabīṣah b. Wāliq has been killed!" Shabīb said, "You have killed Qabīṣah b. Wāliq al-Taghlibī, O company of Muslims! God has said, 'And recite to them the account of him to whom We gave our signs, but he sloughed them off, so Satan pursued him and he became one of those who go astray.'[406] The same would describe your kinsman Qabīṣah b. Wāliq: he went to the Prophet and submitted,[407] then came with the unbelievers to fight you!" Then Shabīb came upon his body, and said, "Alas for you! If you had held fast to your first submission (islām), you would have had a happier destiny."

Then he attacked 'Attāb b. Warqā' from the left, while Suwayd b. Sulaym attacked the right, which was under the command of Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān. The latter fought on the right with men of the Banū Tamīm and Hamdān; they all fought very well and persevered until word came to them that 'Attāb b. Warqā' had been killed, and then they dispersed. 'Attāb, meanwhile, was still sitting on a carpet in the center, with Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah, when Shabīb suddenly descended on the troops of the center. 'Attāb said, "O Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah, this is a day of large numbers but small profit! Alas! to have five hundred horsemen of tian. See *EI*², s.v. Bakr b. Wā'il, and Kaḥḥālah, Mu'jam qabā'il al-'arab, 120ff. (Taghlib).

---

404. Wa-huwa 'alā musannāh amāma al-khandaq. It is not clear what trench is meant here, unless this is the village of Khandaq, mentioned earlier by Ṭabarī (without the article, I, 1041) as being in the ṭassūj of Bahurasīr; see al-'Alī, "Al-Madā'in and Its Surrounding Area," 436.

405. His name is given as 'Ubaydallāh above.

406. Qur'ān 7:175.

407. Aslama. Qabīṣah does not appear in Ibn Sa'd; Ibn Ḥajar, Iṣābah, III, 223, includes him as a Companion on the basis of this passage in Ṭabarī, which he quotes.

the like of the men of Tamīm with me, rather than this entire army! Is there none who will be steadfast before the enemy? Is [953] there none who will look beyond himself?"—for they dispersed and abandoned him. Zuhrah said to him, "Well spoken, 'Attāb! You have done as one would expect of you! By God, by God! If you had turned from them and fled, you would not have lasted long! Rejoice, for I hope that God may have destined us for martyrdom at the end of our lives." 'Attāb replied, "May God grant you the greatest reward He grants for good action." Thus did they spur each other on to religious fervor until Shabīb drew closer. Then 'Attāb sprang forward with a small band who had held out with him, most of the troops having scattered left and right. 'Ammār b. Yazīd al-Kalbī, a Medinese, said to him, "May God cause you to prosper! 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad has deserted you, and many of the men have joined him!" 'Attāb replied, "He has fled before, as well, and the young man did not seem to me then to be much bothered by what he did."[408]

Then he fought them for a time, saying, "Never have I seen a day of battle like this one! Never have I been so tried! Never have I seen fewer men fighting or more giving up and fleeing!" He was noticed by a man from the Banū Taghlib, one of Shabīb's companions, from the Banū Zayd b. 'Amr, named 'Āmir b. 'Amr b. 'Abd 'Amr,[409] who had had one of his kin killed by 'Attāb. He was one of the horsemen, and he went to Shabīb and said to him, "By God, I think that man speaking is 'Attāb b. Warqā'!" He attacked him with his spear, and he fell; it was he who had been assigned the task of killing him. The horses trampled Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah; although he tried to protect himself with his sword, he was an old man and unable to get up, and al-Faḍl b. 'Āmir al-Shaybānī came up to him and killed him.[410] Shabīb then reached him and found him dead; he recognized him and asked, "Who killed this man?"
[954] Al-Faḍl answered, "I killed him." Shabīb said, "This is Zuhrah b. Ḥawiyyah! By God, Zuhrah, if you were killed while in a state of 408. This statement should be seen in the context of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ash'ath's later rebellion, text below, II, 1052ff.

409. For the Zayd Allāh (or Zayd Allāt!) b. 'Amr of Taghlib, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 163, II, 604.

410. This man had earlier claimed responsibility for killing Zā'idah b. Qudāmah; see text above, II, 926.

error, nevertheless, on many a battle day of the Muslims did you show your mettle and render great service, and many a cavalry force of the polytheists did you defeat, many a detachment did you attack, many of their populous villages did you conquer! Yet God alone knew that you would be killed lending support to the oppressors."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: By God, we saw Shabīb grieving for this man, and one of the young men of Bakr b. Wā'il said, "By God, the Commander of the Faithful tonight grieves for a man of the unbelievers!" Shabīb said, "You know their error no better than I, but I also know of their past what you do not know; if they had held to it, they would have been brethren."

'Ammār b. Yazīd al-Kalbī was also killed in the battle, and Abū Khaythamah b. 'Abdallāh was killed that day as well. When Shabīb had overcome the government troops and their leaders, he said, "Hold back your swords from them," and summoned them to render the oath of allegiance. The men promptly did so, but later escaped under cover of darkness; even as Shabīb received their oaths, he had said, "They will flee shortly." Shabīb then took possession of what was left in the camp and sent for his brother to come to him from al-Madā'in. When the latter reached him at the camp, he set out against al-Kūfah, having spent two days at his camp at Bayt Qurrah;[411] he now intended a direct confrontation with the Kūfan forces.

Meanwhile, Sufyān b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī and Ḥabīb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥakamī of Madhḥij had entered al-Kūfah with their Syrian troops. These stiffened al-Ḥajjāj's back, and he was thereby able to do without the Kūfan forces. Al-Ḥajjāj ascended the pulpit [955] of al-Kūfah and said, after praising and glorifying God: "Men of al-Kūfah! May God give no glory to him who seeks glory through you, and may He give no victory to him who seeks victory with you! Leave us, and come not with us to fight our enemy! Go settle in al-Ḥīrah, with the Jews and Christians,[412] and fight not with

411. Location unknown. It is not the same as Dayr Qurrah (see text above, I, 2357–58 and II, 1072), which was on the other (western) side of the Euphrates; see *EI*², s.v. Dayr Ḳurra.

412. On the concentration of Jews and Christians in al-Ḥīrah, see Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 309, 375f.

us, except for those of you who were working as our administrators or otherwise did not participate in the battle under 'Attāb b. Warqā'."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: By God, we set out in pursuit of the government forces. I myself caught up with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath and Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī as they walked along, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān's head looked to me as if it were completely covered with mud. I turned away from them, not wanting to alarm them. If I had alerted Shabīb's men to them, they would have been killed on the spot; but I said to myself, "If I bring about the death of two such men of my people as these, I am not thinking aright."[413]

Shabīb continued as far as the Ṣarāt Canal and halted there.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. Suwār: Shabīb set out for al-Kūfah. When he reached Sūrā,[414] he called on the men, saying, "Which of you will bring me the head of the governor of Sūrā?" Al-Baṭīn, Qa'nab, Suwayd, and two others among his companions volunteered. They hurried off to the revenue office, where the officials were busy with one of the tax levies.[415] They got into the building through a ruse, saying to the men, "Answer the summons of the amīr!" When asked which amīr, they said, "An amīr sent out from al-Ḥajjāj in pursuit of that sinner[416] Shabīb!" With these men out of the way, it was possible to come on the governor unawares; when they reached him, they drew their swords, raised the cry of "Judgment is to God alone!" and struck off his head.
[956] They seized what money was there and rejoined Shabīb. When they came to him, he asked, "What is this that you have brought me?" They replied, "We have brought you the head of the sinner and what money we found there"—the money was in its bags on a beast. But Shabīb said, "What you have brought me is factionalism for the Muslims! Give me your javelin, boy!" With this he ripped open the bags, then ordered the beast goaded, so that the

413. The three men all belonged to South Arab (Qaḥṭānī) tribes: Azd, Kindah, and Hamdān. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 176.

414. On the Upper Sūrā canal, the east (and in Sasanian times principal) branch of the Euphrates, north of Bābil. See Le Strange, Lands, 70–72; Musil, Middle Euphrates, 274–77.

415. Samarajjah; see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.

416. Fāsiq; see note 109 above.

money scattered from the bags in all directions, until it reached the Ṣarāt Canal. He added, "If there is any left then, throw it in the water!"

Then Sufyān b. al-Abrad went out against him with al-Ḥajjāj. He had earlier gone to al-Ḥajjāj and said, "Send me to confront him before he comes to you." But al-Ḥajjāj had said, "I would prefer that we stay together until I meet him as I stand among you, with al-Kūfah behind us and the citadel in our hands."

In this year Shabīb entered al-Kūfah for the second time.

Shabīb's Second Entry into al-Kūfah and His Battle with al-Ḥajjāj

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. Suwār: Sabrah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf came from al-Daskarah to al-Kūfah after the Syrian army had arrived there. Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah had written to al-Ḥajjāj saying, "Shabīb is upon me; send an expeditionary force to al-Madā'in!" and al-Ḥajjāj had sent him Sabrah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf with two hundred horsemen. When Muṭarrif set out for al-Jabal, he took his men with him, having informed them of his intentions;[417] but he did not tell Sabrah. When he reached Daskarat al-Malik, he summoned Sabrah, informed him of his intentions, and invited him to join [957] him. Sabrah said, "Yes, I am with you"; but when he left his presence, he sent for his men, assembled them, and set off with them. Hearing that 'Attāb b. Warqā' had been killed and Shabīb had gone on toward al-Kūfah, he advanced as far as a village called Bayṭarā.[418] Shabīb had halted at Ḥammām 'Umar, and Sabrah went on to the Euphrates crossing at the village of Shāhī,[419] crossed the river, and doubled back until he reached al-Ḥajjāj. There he learned that the Kūfans were in disgrace. He went to see Sufyān b. al-Abrad and told him his whole story, informing him of his own obedience and his split with Muṭarrif, and pointing out 417. I.e., that he intended to rebel against al-Ḥajjāj and 'Abd al-Malik; see text above, II, 946–48, and, on al-Jabal or al-Jibāl, note 392.

418. Location unknown.

419. An important ford and boat bridge, about fifteen miles north of al-Kūfah and about ten miles southwest of Ḥammām 'Umar; see Musil, Middle Euphrates, 243; al-'Alī, "Minṭaqat al-Kūfah," 240.

that he had neither been with 'Attāb nor participated in a defeat in any of the battles of the Kūfans—"And I am still working as an administrator for the amīr and have with me two hundred men who have never experienced defeat with me and who have maintained their obedience and never participated in factionalism." Sufyān then went to see al-Ḥajjāj and informed him of all that Sabrah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān had told him. Al-Ḥajjāj said, "He has spoken sincerely and truly. Tell him, then, that he is to join with us in encountering our enemy." Sufyān conveyed this message to Sabrah.

Shabīb continued his advance, halting at the location of Ḥammām A'yan.[420] Al-Ḥajjāj summoned al-Ḥārith b. Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Zur'ah b. Mas'ūd al-Thaqafī and sent him out with some men from the security forces who had not participated in the battle with 'Attāb and some men who had been working as administrators, as well as about two hundred men from the Syrians. Altogether, he set out with about a thousand and halted at Zurārah. When Shabīb learned of this, he came up to him quickly with his men, and when he reached him he attacked, killed him, and defeated his forces. The defeated men came back to al-Kūfah. Shabīb also came on, crossing the bridge and camping on the [958] Kūfah side. Shabīb stayed in his camp three days. On the first day the only action was the killing of al-Ḥārith b. Mu'āwiyah. On the second day, al-Ḥajjāj sent out his clients and personal retainers,[421] armed, to occupy the approaches of the roads outside al-Kūfah. The Kūfan forces also went out and occupied the approaches of their roads, fearing the wrath of al-Ḥajjāj and 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān if they did not. Shabīb proceeded to have a mosque built on the edge of al-Sabakhah, next to where the fodder sellers are located, at the īwān;[422] this mosque is still standing today.

---

420. Across the Euphrates from al-Kūfah; see note 290 above.

421. Ghilmān, sg. ghulām. See EI², s.v. ghulām; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 211f.

422. It is unclear to what structure this refers. Īwān may refer to either a palace or a specific type of audience hall; see EI², s.v. Ṭabarī elsewhere refers only to the īwān Kisrā, the Sasanian palace at Ctesiphon/al-Madā'in (see text above, II, 776, and below, II, 1056). The īwān of al-Kūfah was presumably not the dār al-imārah, which was at the center of town and apparently far from al-Sabakhah; see Massignon, "Explication du plan de Kufa," 336.

On the third day, al-Ḥajjāj sent out Abū al-Ward, a client of his,[423] cuirassed, along with many men in cuirasses and some of his personal retainers. They said, "This is al-Ḥajjāj!" and Shabīb charged him and killed him, saying, "If this was al-Ḥajjāj, I have relieved you of him." Then al-Ḥajjāj sent out his retainer Ṭahmān,[424] similarly attired and accompanied, and again Shabīb attacked and killed him, saying, "If this was al-Ḥajjāj, I have relieved you of him." Then, in late morning, al-Ḥajjāj came out of the palace and said, "Bring me a mule to ride from here to al-Sabakhah." A mule with white ankles was brought, but he was told, "The local people, may God cause you to prosper, find ill omen in your riding a mule like this on a day like this." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Bring it here, for this is a day with both white ankles and a white blaze."[425] He mounted the mule and set out with the Syrians, taking the post road[426] and coming out at the top of al-Sabakhah.

When al-Ḥajjāj saw Shabīb and his forces, he halted. Shabīb, who was with six hundred horsemen, saw that al-Ḥajjāj had come out against him, and he advanced with his forces. Sabrah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān came to al-Ḥajjāj and asked, "Where does the amīr [959] order me to stand?" He replied, "Stand at the approaches of the roads, and if they come to you and fighting breaks out, then fight them." Sabrah went and took up his position with the assembled forces. Al-Ḥajjāj then had a chair brought to him, sat on it,[427] and 423. So also Ibn Aʿtham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 85f.; but Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 274, calls him a client of the Banū Naṣr.

424. In Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 274, he is called a client of ʿUthmān, and in Ibn Aʿtham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 85, where his death precedes that of Abū al-Ward, he is said to be a client of the Āl Banī Muʿayṭ. One of the two alternative versions of this incident given below (II, 963) identifies one of these two men as Aʿyan (of Ḥammām Aʿyan, see note 290 above) but does not identify the other, while the other version (966f.) identifies the two as Abū al-Ward and Aʿyan.

425. According to Jāḥiẓ, K. al-Qawl fī al-bighāl (Cairo, 1955), 136, mules were ridden into battle by leaders in order to show their men that they were prepared to stand or fall, being unable to flee on such a slow beast. Jāḥiẓ also mentions (ibid., 96) that mules with white anklets were considered unlucky.

426. Sikkat al-barīd, here presumably the road leading east out of town, across the bridge, and on to al-Madāʾin, although the term may also mean "post house," as in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 286. See ibid., glossarium, s. v. sikkah; Ibn al-Faqīh, Buldān (BGA, V), 183.

427. According to Ibn Rustah, Aʿlāq, 198, al-Ḥajjāj was the first Muslim commander to sit on a chair in battle; see Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 61 and n. 111.

proclaimed, "Men of Syria! You are men who hear and obey, men of steadfastness and conviction. Let not this vermin's falseness overcome your truth. Lower your eyes, get down on your knees, and meet the enemy with the points of your spears." The men got down on their knees and pointed their spears at the enemy, looking like a field of black stones.

Shabīb advanced against them, and when he drew near he arrayed his forces in three squadrons: one with him, one with Suwayd b. Sulaym, and one with al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il. Shabīb told Suwayd to attack with his cavalry; but when he did, the government troops held their position until the Khārijites reached the points of their spears, then jumped up and rushed straight at Shabīb and his forces, thrusting their spears and advancing until he was driven off. Al-Ḥajjāj cried, "Men who hear and obey! That is the way to do it! Boy! Move my chair forward!" Then Shabīb ordered al-Muḥallil to attack them; but they treated him just as they had treated Suwayd, and al-Ḥajjāj again cried, "Men who hear and obey! That is the way to do it! Boy! Move my chair forward!" Then Shabīb himself attacked them with his squadron. They held their position until he reached the points of their spears, then jumped up and rushed straight at him. He fought long with them, but then the Syrians thrust their spears and advanced until they drove him back to the rest of his forces. Seeing their steadfastness, he called to Suwayd, saying, "Take your cavalry and [960] attack the men on this road"—meaning the Laḥḥām Jarīr Road[428] —"and if you can drive the men from the road, you can come at al-Ḥajjāj from the rear, while we attack him from in front." Suwayd b. Sulaym accordingly separated off and attacked the men on this road; but he was assailed with arrows from the housetops and the approaches to the roads and forced to retreat. Al-Ḥajjāj had placed 'Urwah b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah with some three hundred men from the Syrian forces as a rearguard for him and his troops so they would not be vulnerable to attack from that direction.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: On that day Shabīb said to us, "O people of Islam! We have sold ourselves to 428. Both Laḥḥām Jarīr (Jarīr's Butcher?) and its road are mentioned elsewhere by Ṭabarī (see text above, II, 624, 775), but without further identifying detail.

God; and he who has sold himself to God cares little for any harm or pain that may come to him for God's sake. Hold fast, and charge as you charged in your other noble battles!" He gathered his forces, and al-Ḥajjāj, seeing the coming attack, said to his men, "Men who hear and obey! Stand firm against this one charge, and, by the Lord of Heaven, nothing will remain in the way of victory!" The men got down on their knees, and Shabīb attacked them with his collected forces. When he reached them, al-Ḥajjāj called out to all his men to jump up and rush straight at him. They thrust with their spears and hacked with their swords, advancing and pushing back Shabīb and his forces as he fought them, as far as Bustān Zā'idah.[429] When they reached that place, Shabīb called to his men, "O friends of God! Dismount! Dismount!" He himself dismounted and ordered half his forces to dismount, leaving the other half with Suwayd b. Sulaym. Al-Ḥajjāj came to the mosque of Shabath,[430] and said, "Men of Syria! Men who hear and obey! This is the beginning of victory, by the One Who holds al-Ḥajjāj's soul in His hand!" Some twenty men went up to the mosque with him, armed with arrows, and he told them, "If they approach us, shoot at them." The fighting on the ground was extremely fierce and went on through the entire day, [961] until the two parties had fought each other to a standstill. Then Khālid b. 'Attāb said to al-Ḥajjāj, "Let me fight them, for I have a case of personal vengeance to settle, and I am a man whose counsel is above suspicion." Al-Ḥajjāj granted his permission, and Khālid said, "I will come at them from behind and raid their camp." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Do as seems best to you."

Khālid went off with a band of Kūfans and entered their camp from the rear. He killed Shabīb's brother Muṣād, and Shabīb's wife, Ghazālah—she was actually killed by Farwah b. al-Daffān[431] al-Kalbī—and set fire to the camp. News of this came to both al-Ḥajjāj and Shabīb; al-Ḥajjāj and his men raised a single "God is great!" while Shabīb and every man on foot with him jumped on their horses. Al-Ḥajjāj said to the Syrians, "Charge them! This has broken their courage!" They charged them and defeated them, Shabīb remaining with the rear guard as it retreated.

429. Zā'idah's Orchard (probably of palm trees), in al-Sabakhah; see text above, II, 619.

430. Masjid Shabath, according to the editor, comparing text above, II, 632; but the MSS have masjid Shabīb, which is supported by Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 427.

431. Reading uncertain. Some manuscripts have al-D.qān or al-D.fār.

According to Hishām—Aṣghar the Khārijite—one of the men who was with Shabīb: When the men were defeated and Shabīb retreated by the bridge of boats, al-Ḥajjāj's cavalry pursued him. Shabīb was nodding as if dozing off, and I said, "Commander of the Faithful, turn around and look behind you!" He turned around with an air of indifference,then bowed his head and began to nod off again. They drew nearer, and we said, "Commander of the Faithful, they are getting near!" By God, he turned around again, with the same air of indifference, and then began to nod off again. Then al-Ḥajjāj sent to his cavalry saying, "Leave him to burn in the fire of God." They left him and went back.

[962] According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū 'Amr al-'Udhrī: Shabīb cut the bridge of boats after he crossed it. According to Farwah: I was with him when we were defeated, and he did nothing to the bridge; they did not pursue us as far as the bridge so that we should cut it.

Al-Ḥajjāj went back into al-Kūfah, ascended the pulpit, praised God, and said, "By God, Shabīb has not seen real battle before this! By God, he turned and fled, leaving his wife with a broken reed up her ass!"[432]

Another account of al-Ḥajjāj's battle with Shabīb in al-Kūfah is that of 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Abdallāh b. al-Mughīrah b. 'Aṭiyyah—his father—Muzāḥim b. Zufar b. Jassās al-Taymī: When Shabīb broke through al-Ḥajjāj's detachments, al-Ḥajjāj permitted us to come see him in the apartment in which he slept. He was in bed, with a blanket over him. He said, "I have summoned you with regard to a matter in which sincere differences of opinion can be frankly expressed, and I want your advice. This man has penetrated into the heart of your land, violated your territory, and killed your fighters. Advise me!" The men were silent, except for one, who moved his chair out of the line and said, "With the amīr's permission, I will speak." He said, "Speak!" The man said, "The amīr, by God, has neither feared God nor defended the Commander of the Faithful nor shown any commitment toward his subjects." Then he sat down on his chair, in line. This man was, in fact, Qutaybah.[433] Al-Ḥajjāj was enraged, threw aside the blanket, and let his legs dangle from the bed—I can see it even now—and asked, "Who said that?" Qutaybah then moved his chair out of the line again and repeated his words. Al-Ḥajjāj asked, "What do you suggest, then?" He said, "That you go out to him yourself and call him to account." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Go find me a good place to muster the troops; then come back to me."

---

432. This first account of Shabīb's second entry into al-Kūfah is now followed by a second, from 'Umar b. Shabbah (in two versions), which emphasizes the role of Qutaybah b. Muslim, previously unmentioned. A third account, unattributed, beginning at 965 below, parallels the first, but with numerous differences in detail. The summary in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 271, is closest to the first account. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 85–91, lists the defeats of Ṭahmān and Abū al-Ward after that of 'Attāb b. Warqā' but places all three among the commanders defeated well before the entry into al-Kūfah; in his account of the latter, Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī attributes the victory to al-Ḥajjāj and four thousand Syrians, mentioning no one else. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 139–44; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 187f.

We went out cursing ʿAnbasah b. Saʿīd, for it was he who had recommended to al-Ḥajjāj that he make Qutaybah one of his associates. The next morning, having all made our last testaments, we [963] armed ourselves. Al-Ḥajjāj performed the morning prayer but then withdrew. His messenger kept coming out, hour after hour, to ask, "Has he come yet? Has he come yet?" but we did not know whom he meant, the maqṣūrah being already jammed with people.[434] Finally, the messenger came out and asked, "Has he come yet?" and there was Qutaybah walking into the mosque, wearing a yellow robe from Herat[435] and a red silk turban, with a broad sword on a short suspensory, so it looked as if it was tucked under his arm; he had tucked the tail of his robe into his belt, and his cuirass struck against his shanks. The door was opened for him and he was admitted without delay, remained a long while, then came out again, bearing an unfurled standard. Al-Ḥajjāj prayed, making two prostrations, then rose and gave the word, and the standard was brought out the Elephant Door,[436] al-Ḥajjāj coming out behind it. There at the door was a reddish mule with blazes on its head and ankles, and al-Ḥajjāj mounted it. His personal servants offered to switch mounts with him, but he refused to ride any other. The men mounted their beasts, and Qutaybah mounted a bay horse with blazes on head and ankles, with a saddle so large that Qutaybah looked like a pomegranate in it. He set out along the Dār al-Siqāyah Road[437] until he came out at al-Sabakhah, where Shabīb had his camp. It was a Wednesday. They held back that day, then offered battle on Thursday morning. They resumed the attack early Friday morning, and, by the time of the prayer, the Khārijites were defeated.

433. Qutaybah b. Muslim, later famed as the conqueror of Transoxania, after being appointed governor of Khurāsān by al-Ḥajjāj in 86 (705); see text below, II, 1178, and EI², s.v. Ḳutayba b. Muslim.

434. Al-Ḥajjāj apparently withdrew from the mosque through a private entrance communicating directly with the governor's palace, which abutted the southern, qiblah side of the mosque; see K. A. C. Creswell, Early Muslim Architecture (Oxford, 1969), I, i, 42–58. This private entrance would be inside the maqṣūrah, a part of the mosque partitioned off for the governor's personal use (see SEI, s.v.). The following account suggests that the commanders and nobles awaited the governor in the maqṣūrah while the rest of the forces were assembled inside and around the mosque proper.

435. Qabāʾ harawī aṣfar; a sleeved garment, probably of silk. See Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements chez les Arabes (Amsterdam, 1845), 352–62; B. Spuler, Iran in früh-islamischer Zeit (Wiesbaden, 1952), 350f., 394f., 405f.

According to Abū Zayd[438]—Khallād b. Yazīd—al-Ḥajjāj b. Qutaybah: Shabīb advanced after al-Ḥajjāj had sent out one commander against him and he had killed him, and another and he had killed him as well; one of the two was A'yan, the owner of the Ḥammām A'yan. Shabīb advanced and entered al-Kūfah. He was [964] accompanied by Ghazālah, who had sworn an oath that she would pray two prostrations in the mosque of al-Kūfah, reciting in them the Qur'ānic *sūrah*s "The Cow" and "The Family of 'Imrān." And so she did.[439] Shabīb also had huts built in his camp.

At this point, al-Ḥajjāj stood and said, "It seems to me, men of Iraq, that you are not showing much commitment in fighting these people; and I have written to the Commander of the Faithful, asking him to send me reinforcements from the Syrians." Then Qutaybah stood up and said, "You have shown com-

436. Bāb al-Fīl. Various accounts of the naming of this mosque door are given by Ṭabarī (text above, II, 27) and Balādhurī (Futūḥ, 288).

437. The dār al-siqāyah was the public water supply, also mentioned above, II, 735.

438. 'Umar b. Shabbah.

439. The rites of prayer require recitation of the Qur'ān with each prostration (see SEI, s.v. ṣalāh); short *sūrah*s are generally used, but al-Baqarah and Āl 'Imrān, the second and third, are by far the longest. For Ghazālah's vow see also Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 320–21. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 87ff., says nothing of a vow but has Shabīb himself recite the two *sūrah*s and place both Ghazālah and his mother al-Jahīzah on the pulpit; see also Baghdādī, Farq, 89–92.

mitment neither to God nor to the Commander of the Faithful in fighting them!"

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Khallād—Muḥammad b. Ḥafṣ b. Mūsā b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar b. 'Uthmān al-Taymī: Al-Ḥajjāj throttled him with his turban.

Returning to the account of al-Ḥajjāj b. Qutaybah:[440] Al-Ḥajjāj asked, "How is that?" Qutaybah replied, "You send out a noble man and then send out with him men from the riffraff; they deliver him a defeat, and he, ashamed, fights until he is killed." Al-Ḥajjāj asked, "What do you suggest?" He replied, "That you go out yourself, accompanied by men your equal, who will defend you as they do themselves." Those who were present cursed him for this; and al-Ḥajjāj said, "By God, I will go out to confront him tomorrow." The next day, the men assembled, and Qutaybah said, "Remember your oath, may God cause the amīr to prosper!" The men cursed him again, and al-Ḥajjāj said, "Go find me a good place to muster the troops!" He and his men went and made their preparations, then set out. He came to a place that was rather dirty, a dump site, and said, "Muster for me here." When they protested that the place was dirty, he said, "What you are summoning me to is dirtier! Here the earth below and the sky above are wholesome."

He dismounted and arrayed the men. Khālid b. 'Attāb b. Warqā' was in disgrace and thus not among the forces. Shabīb and his companions came up, left their beasts in readiness nearby,[441] and marched out on foot. Shabīb said to them, "Do not shoot! Creep [965] forward beneath your shields until the enemy's spears are above them, then shove them upward and go in under them so you can stand up and halt their advance. God permitting, this will defeat them." The men advanced, creeping toward them. But Khālid b. 'Attāb took his personal forces,[442] circled around behind their camp, and set fire to their huts. When Shabīb's men saw the light of the fire and heard its crackle, they turned and saw that it was in their quarters, and hurried back to their horses. The troops then pursued them and inflicted a defeat on them. Al-Ḥajjāj was pleased with Khālid and entrusted him with the campaign against them.

440. Reading bn Qutaybah for wa-Qutaybah.

441. Qarrabū dawābbahum; see the parallel passage above (II, 629: qarribū khuyūlakum ba'ḍahā ilā ba'ḍ) and compare Lane, Lexicon, s.v. muqrab.

442. Shākiriyyah; see Fries, Heereswesen, 24f.

When[443] Shabīb killed 'Attāb, he aimed to enter al-Kūfah a second time and advanced to within a short distance of it. Al-Ḥajjāj sent out Sayf b. Hāni' and another man together to bring him information about Shabīb. When they came to his camp, he caught them and killed the other man, but Sayf got away. One of the Khārijites pursued him, but Sayf jumped with his horse over a stream and then asked the man for safe-conduct in exchange for telling him the truth. The man granted the safe-conduct, and he told him that al-Ḥajjāj had sent him and his companion to bring him information about Shabīb. The man said, "Tell him, then, that we are coming to him on Monday." Sayf returned to al-Ḥajjāj and informed him of this; al-Ḥajjāj said, "He is a liar and a fool."

[966] When Monday came, the Khārijites set out, heading for al-Kūfah, and al-Ḥajjāj sent out against them al-Ḥārith b. Mu'āwiyah al-Thaqafī. Shabīb encountered him at Zurārah and killed him and defeated his forces, then came on toward al-Kūfah. He sent al-Baṭīn with ten horsemen to find quarters for him on the bank of the Euphrates at the provision depot. Al-Baṭīn set out, but al-Ḥajjāj had sent Ḥawshab b. Yazīd with a group of Kūfans to occupy the approaches of the roads; al-Baṭīn fought them but was unable to overcome them. He sent to Shabīb for reinforcements and was sent some horsemen who managed to wound Ḥawshab's horse and defeat him, although he escaped with his life. Al-Baṭīn went on to the provision depot and set up camp on the bank of the Euphrates. Then Shabīb advanced, halting just past the bridge; when al-Ḥajjāj sent out no one against him, he advanced again, to al-Sabakhah, between al-Kūfah and the Euphrates. There he remained for three days, al-Ḥajjāj still sending out no one against him. Al-Ḥajjāj was advised to go out himself and sent out Qutaybah b. Muslim to prepare a place to muster for him. When Qutaybah returned, he said, "I have found the approach to them easy; go forth, then, with good omens." The call was issued to the men of al-Kūfah, and they marched forth, the notables marching out with al-Ḥajjāj, and took up positions at that place. The two sides now faced each other. Shabīb had, on his right, al-Baṭīn, and,

443. Here begins the third version of these events, introduced simply by qāla.

on his left, Qa'nab, the client of the Banū Abī Rabī'ah b. Dhuhl;[444] he had some two hundred men. Al-Ḥajjāj put Maṭar b. Nājiyah al-Riyāḥī on his right and Khālid b. 'Attāb b. Warqā' al-Riyāḥī on his left, with about four thousand men. Al-Ḥajjāj was told not to let Shabīb know where he stood, so he disguised himself and camouflaged his position and dressed his client Abū al-Ward to resemble him. When Shabīb saw Abū al-Ward, he attacked him and struck him with a rod weighing fifteen raṭls,[445] killing him. Then al-Ḥajjāj dressed up A'yan, the owner of the Ḥammām A'yan in al- [967] Kūfah, who was a client of Bakr b. Wā'il;[446] Shabīb also killed him. Then al-Ḥajjāj mounted a mule with a white blaze and anklets, saying, "Religion has both a blaze and anklets!" and said to Abū Ka'b, "Lead with the standard! I am Ibn Abī 'Aqīl!"[447]

Shabīb attacked Khālid b. 'Attāb and his forces, pushing them back to the great open space (raḥabah),[448] and attacked and defeated Maṭar b. Nājiyah. At this point, al-Ḥajjāj dismounted and ordered his men to dismount. He sat down on an 'abā'ah[449] with 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd. While they were thus situated, Maṣqalah b. Muhalhil al-Ḍabbī seized the bridle of Shabīb's horse and said to him, "What do you say about Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ and how do you testify concerning him?" Shabīb said, "Here and now, in the midst of this situation, with al-Ḥajjāj looking on?" Shabīb declared himself quit of Ṣāliḥ, and Maṣqalah said, "May God be quit of you!" His men then left him, except for forty horsemen who were his closest companions; the rest withdrew to the provision depot.[450] Al-Ḥajjāj said, "They have had a dispute!" He sent for Khālid b. 'Attāb, and he came and fought them. Ghazālah was killed, and a horseman was taking her head to al-Ḥajjāj when 444. A clan of the Banū Shaybān; see Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 304, and note 153 above.

445. About five kilograms; see note 313 above.

446. See note 290 above.

447. His great-grandfather was Abū 'Aqīl; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 118, II, 291.

448. Or raḥbah, an open area, especially one for prayer either inside or outside the mosque; here apparently the square in which the mosque of al-Kūfah stood. See Lane, Lexicon, s.v.; Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v.

449. A coarse woolen sleeveless cloak, but also, as perhaps here, a saddle-cloth of the same material. See Dozy, Supplément, s.v.

450. This dispute over Shabīb's predecessor is not further elaborated here and not paralleled in other sources.

Shabīb recognized it and ordered 'Alwān to attack the horseman, which he did, and killed him. He brought Shabīb the head, and he ordered it washed and buried, saying, "She is closer to you all in mercy"[451]—meaning Ghazālah. Shabīb's men then moved back to a defensive position. Khālid returned to al-Ḥajjāj and informed him that they had withdrawn, and al-Ḥajjāj ordered him to attack Shabīb. He attacked them and was drawn off by eight of them, including Qa'nab, al-Baṭīn, 'Alwān, 'Īsā, al-Muhadhdhab, Ibn 'Uwaymir, and Sinān, as far as the great open space. Meanwhile, Ḥawṭ b. 'Umayr al-Sadūsī[452] was brought to Shabīb where he [968] stood, and Shabīb said to him, "Ḥawṭ, judgment is to God alone!" He replied, "Judgment is to God alone!" Shabīb said, "Ḥawṭ is really one of your companions but he was afraid"; and he let him go. Then he was brought 'Umayr b. al-Qa'qā' and said to him, "Judgment is to God alone, 'Umayr!" But he did not understand, and said, "God be with my lost youth!"[453] Shabīb repeated to him, "Judgment is to God alone!" in order to let him off; but he would not understand, and Shabīb ordered him killed.[454]

Then Muṣād b. Yazīd, Shabīb's brother, was killed. Shabīb kept waiting for the party who had taken on Khālid, but they were slow to return, and Shabīb dozed off, until awakened by Ḥabīb b. Khidrah.[455] Al-Ḥajjāj's forces, meanwhile, would not advance on him, being in awesome fear of him. He went to the provision depot and began collecting the effects of those of his men who had been killed. Then his eight companions came to the place where he had been standing and, not finding him, thought that the enemy had killed him. Maṭar and Khālid returned to al-Ḥajjāj, who 451. A paraphrase of Qur'ān 18:81. The implication is that Ghazālah was a mother to them all; see Zamakhsharī, Asās al-balāghah (Beirut, 1979), s.v. ruḥm.

---

452. Reading Ḥawṭ with the Petersburg MS, against edited text Khūṭ. This man probably belonged to the Banū Sadūs b. Shaybān of the Dhuhl b. Tha'labah; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 152, and note 153 above.

453. Fī sabīl Allāh shabābī: a quotation? See Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 21, for a similar proverbial phrase.

454. This account is clearly a variant of the story told above (II, 920f.) of the well-known al-Naḍr b. al-Qa'qā', after Shabīb's first entry into al-Kūfah.

455. A client of the Banū Hilāl b. 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah, one of the celebrated Khārijite poets and orators. His father's name appears in various sources as Khidrah, Khudrah, Jadarah, and Judrah; see Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, I, 346, III, 264; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 709; I. 'Abbās, Shi'r al-Khawārij (Beirut, 1963), 78–82, 144. Ṭabarī cites verses by him below, II, 1002.

ordered them to pursue the band of eight. They did so, while the band pursued Shabīb, all continuing until they crossed the bridge at al-Madā'in.[456] The Khārijites went into a monastery there with Khālid on their heels. He surrounded them in the monastery, but they came out against him and drove him back some two farsakhs, until his men pitched themselves into the Tigris on their horses; Khālid also pitched himself in on his horse but got across on it with his standard in his hand. Shabīb said, "God oppose such a man and such a horse! This man is the most valiant fighter, and his horse is the most powerful horse on earth!" He was informed that this was Khālid, son of 'Attāb, and he said, "He has inherited his courage then. By God, if I had known, I would have plunged after him, even if he had plunged into Hell!"

Returning to the account of Abū Mikhnaf—Abū 'Amr al- [969]
'Udhrī: When Shabīb was defeated, al-Ḥajjāj entered al-Kūfah, ascended the pulpit, and said, "By God, Shabīb has never been fought this way before! He turned and fled, by God, leaving his wife with a broken reed up her ass!" Then he summoned Ḥabīb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥakamī and sent him in pursuit of Shabīb with three thousand Syrian troops.[457] Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Be on your guard against night attacks from Shabīb and, wherever you encounter him, engage him immediately, for God has notched his blade and broken his fangs." Ḥabīb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān then went out and pursued Shabīb as far as al-Anbār, halting there. Al-Ḥajjāj also sent to the administrators, ordering them to spread word secretly among Shabīb's men that any of them who came over to them would be given safe-conduct. All those who lacked true zeal and had been worn down by the fighting began to come over and were granted safe-conduct. Al-Ḥajjāj had also,[458] before this, on the day of their defeat, proclaimed to them that any of them who came to him would be granted safe-conduct, and now many men separated themselves from Shabīb's forces. Shabīb was then informed that Ḥabīb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was positioned at al-Anbār, and he advanced with his forces; when he was near their camp, he halted and led his men in the sunset prayer.

456. A distance of some seventy-five miles.

457. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 274. The summaries in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 91, and Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 328, identify the commander as 'Alqamah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥakamī. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 144.

458. Or not: wa-qabla dhālika mā nādā fīhim . . . anna man jā'anā . . .

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī:[459] By God, I was among the Syrian forces the night Shabīb came and made a surprise attack on us. When we stopped for the night, Ḥabīb b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān had assembled us and divided us into quarters, saying to each quarter, "For each quarter of you its own area should suffice; if one quarter is engaged in fighting, another [970] quarter should not come to their aid. Word has reached me that these Khārijites are nearby; prepare yourselves, then, for a night attack and fighting." We remained in this muster until Shabīb came and attacked us. He charged the quarter commanded by ʿUthmān b. Saʿīd al-ʿUdhrī and fought long with them with swords, but not a single man's foot retreated a step. Then he left them and went up against another quarter, which had been given in charge to Saʿd b. Bajal al-ʿĀmirī, and fought them; but again not a single man's foot retreated a step. Then he left them and went up against the next quarter, commanded by al-Nuʿmān b. Saʿd al-Ḥimyarī, but he achieved nothing more against them. Finally, he came to the last quarter, commanded by Ibn Uqayṣir al-Khathʿamī, and fought them a long time without accomplishing anything. He kept circling around us and attacking us until three quarters of the night had passed. He stuck to us until we thought that he would never let us go. Then he dismounted and forced us to fight them on foot for a long time. By God, between us, hands were hacked off and eyes put out and the dead piled up. We killed about thirty of them, and they killed about a hundred of us. By God, it seemed to us that if they had been more than the hundred men they were, they would have destroyed us. I will swear to God on that! They did not withdraw from us until they were as sick and tired of us as we were of them. I would see one of our men strike one of their men with his sword and not hurt him at all because he was so weak and worn out; or I would see another of our men fighting sitting down, making feeble thrusts with his [971] sword—too exhausted to stand. When finally they despaired of besting us, Shabīb mounted his horse and told those of his companions who had dismounted to remount. Once they were all firmly on horseback, he led them away from us.

459. On the Sakāsik of Kindah, who supported the Umayyads in Syria, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 503; al-Samʿānī, Ansāb, s. v. Saksakī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ, referring to Shabīb: When we left them, in very low spirits and with many wounded, he said to us, "What a heavy blow for us—if we were pursuing only worldly goals; but what a light one in view of God's reward!" His companions replied, "Truly spoken, Commander of the Faithful!"

I will never forget how he rushed up to Suwayd b. Sulaym and told him the following story: "I killed two of their men yesterday, one of them the bravest of men and the other the most cowardly. I went out at dusk last night to scout for you and met three of them who had come into a village to buy what they needed there. One of them made his purchases and came out in advance of his fellows, and I went out with him. He said, 'It seems that you have not bought fodder.' I replied, 'I have some comrades who have taken care of that for me.' Then I asked him, 'Where do you think this enemy of ours is camped?' He said, 'I hear that he is camped nearby us here. I swear to God, I wish I could have met this Shabīb of theirs!' I said, 'Would you like to?' He said, 'Yes!' I said, 'Watch out, then, for, by God, I am Shabīb!' and I drew my sword. By God, the man dropped dead! I said to him, 'Get up, damn you!' and then went to see, and he really was dead! I left him and was starting back, when I met this other one coming out of the village. He said, 'Where are you going now? The men are all going back to their camp.' I said nothing to him and went on, spurring my horse to a gallop. He came after me and caught up with me, and I pulled [972] up and asked him, 'What is the matter?' He said, 'You, by God, are one of our enemy!' I said, 'Yes, I am, by God!' He said, 'By God, you will not leave here until either you have killed me or I have killed you!' I charged at him and he charged at me, and we fought with our swords for a time. By God, I was his superior in neither tenacity nor boldness; but my sword was sharper than his, and I killed him."

Then we traveled on, crossed the Tigris, and went through the Jūkhā region; we crossed the Tigris again in the area of Wāsiṭ,[460]

460. A town about 120 miles southeast of al-Madā'in, but only built (by al-Ḥajjāj for his Syrian troops) six years later, in 83 (702). See text below, II, 1125, and *EI*², s.v. Wāsiṭ.

went on toward al-Ahwāz, then toward Fārs, and then on to Kirmān.

In this year, Shabīb perished, according to the account of Hishām b. Muḥammad; according to another account, he perished in the year 78 (697–698).[461]

Account of Shabīb's End

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī: It was al-Ḥajjāj himself who had sent us out against him[462]—that is, Shabīb—and now he distributed a great deal of money among us, giving a share to every man who had been wounded or shown particular valor. Then he ordered Sufyān b. al-Abrad to march out against Shabīb, and Sufyān prepared to do so. This distressed Ḥabīb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥakamī, who said, "You send Sufyān against a man whom I routed and whose best horsemen I killed!" Two months later, however, Sufyān carried out his orders. Shabīb, meanwhile, had remained in Kirmān while he and his forces recuperated and restored themselves; he then set out on his way back and was met by Sufyān at the Ahwāz Dujayl Bridge.[463] Al-[973] Ḥajjāj had written to al-Ḥakam b. Ayyūb b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī 'Aqīl, who was his son-in-law and his governor over al-Baṣrah, as follows: "Send out a noble, courageous man from among the Baṣrans with four thousand troops against Shabīb. Order him to join Sufyān b. al-Abrad and to heed and obey him." Al-Ḥakam sent out Ziyād b. 'Amr al-'Atakī with four thousand troops, and they had no sooner reached Sufyān than he encountered Shabīb. When they met, at the Dujayl Bridge, Shabīb crossed over to Sufyān. He found that Sufyān had dismounted and was among the infantry, having put Muhāṣir b. Ṣayfī al-'Udhrī over the cavalry; over his right wing he had put Bashīr b. Ḥassān al-Nahdī and over his left wing 'Umar b. Hubayrah al-Fazārī.[464] Shabīb advanced with his 461. What follow are two versions of Shabīb's death, both from Abū Mikhnaf. A third version, dated 78 (697–698) appears in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, I, 328, as well as, undated, in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 92. See note 470 below.

462. Aqfalanā al-Ḥajjāj ilayhi.

463. A bridge of boats crossing the Dujayl River (now the Karun) at al-Ahwāz; the Dujayl of al-Ahwāz is distinguished from the Dujayl Canal north of Baghdad. See Le Strange, Lands, 232–36.

464. Later governor of Iraq and leader of the Qaysī tribal faction; see text below, II, 1433ff., and EI², s.v. Ibn Hubayra.

forces in three squadrons, one under his own command, one under Suwayd, and one under Qa'nab al-Muḥallimī. He left al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il behind in his camp.

While Suwayd, on Shabīb's right, attacked Sufyān's left, and Qa'nab, on Shabīb's left, attacked Sufyān's right, Shabīb himself attacked Sufyān. We fought with swords much of the day, until they withdrew and returned to their original positions. Then Shabīb and his forces made more than thirty charges at us, but through it all we did not budge from our line. Sufyān said to us, "Do not disperse, but let the infantry advance on them as a body." By God, we kept at them with our swords and spears until we drove them back to the bridge. When Shabīb reached the bridge, he dismounted, along with about a hundred men. We fought them until evening, as fiercely as any army has ever [974] fought—as soon as they dismounted they fell on us with sword and spear in a way we had never seen an army fight before. When Sufyān saw that he would not be able to overcome them and could not even be sure that they would not overcome him, he summoned the archers and ordered them to attack them with arrows. This was in the evening, and the battle had begun at midday. The archers attacked them with arrows in the evening; Sufyān b. al-Abrad had set them in a line by themselves and put a man in charge of the bowmen.[465] They kept up the attack with arrows for a time; then the enemy charged them, but as they charged our archers, we charged them and diverted them.

As they continued to be attacked by the arrows, Shabīb and his companions mounted their horses and led another charge against the archers, which felled more than thirty of them. Then Shabīb turned with his mounted troops against us. He bore down directly on us, and we fought him with our spears until it became too dark. He withdrew from us then, and Sufyān said to his men, "Men, leave them be and do not pursue them! We will resume with them in the morning." We desisted from fighting them, with nothing dearer to us than that they should withdraw from us.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ: Soon we got to the bridge, and Shabīb said, "Cross over, companies of Muslims, and we will take them on again in the morning, God willing." We crossed over before him, while he stayed behind at our rear. Then he started across on his horse; but there was a Median mare[466] in front of him, and his horse lunged to mount her in the middle of the bridge. The Median became agitated, and Shabīb's horse's hoof went over the side of the boat and he fell in the water. As he fell, he said, "That God might determine a matter that was done."[467] He [975] sank beneath the water, then came up again and said, "That is the ordaining of the Almighty, the All-Knowing."[468]

465. Murāmiyah, apparently synonymous with aṣḥāb al-nabl, "archers," above, and rumāh, "archers," below.

According to Abū Mikhnaf: These are the accounts of Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī, who was one of the Syrians who fought Shabīb, and Farwah b. Laqīṭ, who was one of the participants in his battles. I also have heard the following account from a man of Shabīb's own clan, the Banū Murrah b. Hammām: There were men from Shabīb's own tribe[469] fighting with him, but they did not fully share his zeal. He had killed many of their fellow tribesmen, and that had pained and angered them. Among Shabīb's associates was a man named Muqātil, from the Banū Taym b. Shaybān. When Shabīb killed some men from the Banū Taym b. Shaybān, this man set upon the Banū Murrah b. Hammām and inflicted a number of casualties among them. Shabīb asked him, "What impelled you to kill them without orders from me?" He replied, "May God cause you to prosper, you have killed the unbelievers among my people, and I have killed the unbelievers among your people." Shabīb said, "And do you have authority over me so you can make independent decisions without me?" He replied, "May God cause you to prosper, is it not part of our religion to kill those who do not subscribe to our opinions, whether they are our own kin or not?" Shabīb said, "Yes, it is." Muqātil said, "Then I have done nothing but what I ought. Besides, Commander of the Faithful, I have certainly not struck down from your clan a tenth of the number you have struck down from mine. In any case, Commander of the Faithful, you have no

466. Faras unthā mādhiyānah. See Ṭabarī, glossarium, s. v. Mādhiyānah.

467. Qur'ān 8:42, 44, in the context of God's predetermination of the Battle of Badr.

468. Qur'ān 6:96, 36:38, 41:12.

469. 'Ashīrah, referring to other Shaybānid clans related to Shabīb's own clan (raht), the Banū Murrah b. Hammām b. Murrah b. Dhuhl b. Shaybān; see note 153 above.

warrant to grieve over the killing of unbelievers." Shabīb said, "I do not grieve over that."

There were with him many men among whose kin he had inflicted casualties; according to their claim, when he stayed behind with the last of his forces, they said to one another, "What say you to cutting the bridge as he crosses and getting our revenge right now?" They cut the bridge, the boats rocked, the horse panicked and bolted, and Shabīb fell in the water and drowned. [976]

According to Abū Mikhnaf: That Murrī gave me this account, and some people from Shabīb's clan tell the same story. The standard account, however, is the one I gave first.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī: We were preparing to go off when, by God, the bridgekeeper came and asked for our commander. We pointed him out to him, and he went up to him and said, "May God cause you to prosper, one of their men fell in the water, and they called to one another saying, 'The Commander of the Faithful has drowned!' Then they went off the way they had come, leaving not a soul behind in their camp."

Sufyān raised a cry of "God is great!" and we joined him in it. Then he set off for the bridge, and from there sent Muhāṣir b. Ṣayfī to cross over to their camp. He found not a whisper or a trace of them there; and when he dismounted, he found it to be the most well-appointed camp on God's earth! The next morning we searched for Shabīb until we found him and pulled him out, still wearing his cuirass. I have heard men say that they cut his chest open and took out his heart, and it turned out to be compact and hard as a rock; if one threw it to the ground, it would bounce as high as a man's stature. Sufyān said, "Praise God, Who has come to our aid!" We then took possession of their camp.[470]

According to Abū Zayd 'Umar b. Shabbah—Khallād b. Yazīd al-Arqaṭ: Shabīb's death was announced to his mother, but she re-

---

470. The first account given here, with the story of the mare, appears also in Mas'ūdī, Murūj, V, 322, and Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 455, both of whom also give the story of Shabīb's heart. Ṭabarī's second account, implicating Shabīb's own followers in his death, is not found in other published early sources. According to Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī and Ya'qūbī (see note 461 above), it was Sufyān who cut the bridge. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī also appends a long account of the captive Khārijite men and women led before al-Ḥajjāj, who pardoned some and had others executed.

fused to accept it when they said he had been killed; then, when she was told he had drowned, she accepted it and said, "When I gave birth to him I saw a flash of fire come out of me, and I knew that nothing but water would put it out."

[977] According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Farwah b. Laqīṭ al-Azdī al-Ghāmidī: Yazīd b. Nu'aym, Shabīb's father, was one of the men who joined the army of Salmān b. Rabī'ah when al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah sent him and those with him to the land of the Byzantines, on orders from 'Uthmān, as reinforcements to the Syrian forces.[471] When the Muslims returned from the campaign, the captives were put up for sale, and Shabīb's father, Yazīd b. Nu'aym, saw a tall, pretty, eye-catching girl, fair-skinned, but without a trace of gray or blue in her black eyes; and he bought her. Then he took her—this was at the beginning of the year 25 (645)—and brought her to al-Kūfah. There he asked her to convert to Islam, but she refused, and when he beat her, she only became more stubborn. Seeing this, he ordered her made ready, and then called for her, and she was brought in to him. When he had intercourse with her, she conceived Shabīb, who was born on Saturday, the Day of Sacrifice, in Dhū al-Ḥijjah of the year 25 (September 27, 646).[472] She loved her master dearly, and while she was in labor she said, "If you wish, I will convert to Islam as you asked me to." He said, "I do so wish." She then converted and was a Muslim when she bore Shabīb. She said, "I saw, in a dream, that a flash came forth from my vagina, which blazed forth to heaven and to the horizon on all sides, and then suddenly fell into a flood of running water, and went out. I gave birth to him on this day on which you shed blood, and I interpreted this vision of mine as meaning that I would see this son of mine, as he grew up, becoming a man of bloodshed, and that I

[978] would see him quickly rise and become great." His father used to take him and his mother often out to the desert, to his people's land at a watering hole called al-Laṣaf.[473]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Mūsā b. Abī Suwayd b. Rādī: The Syrian forces that arrived brought with them a stone[474] and said, 471. In the year 24 (645); see text above, I, 2806ff.

---

472. The Day of Sacrifice is the tenth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (see EI², s.v. ḥadjdj). 10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah 25 (September 27, 646) was a Wednesday.

473. Another version of this story in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, II, 457.

474. Al-ḥajar, literally, "the stone."

"We will not flee from Shabīb until this stone flees." Shabīb heard about this and decided to play a trick on them. He called for four horses and attached shields to their tails, two to the tail of each horse. Then he summoned eight of his companions to accompany him, as well as an attendant of his named Ḥayyān, and ordered Ḥayyān to bring along a waterskin. He then set out and came to one side of the camp. He ordered his companions to take up positions on the other sides of the camp, each two men with a horse, and then to touch the horses with their blades until they felt their keenness, and let them go into the camp. He arranged to meet his companions at a stream near the camp, saying, "Those of you who survive should meet at this stream." His companions were reluctant to carry out what he had ordered them to do, and when he saw this, he dismounted and himself did to the horses what he had ordered them to do. The horses rushed into the camp, and he went in behind them, crying, "Judgment is to God alone!" The men began to fight one another, but their commander, Ḥabīb b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥakamī, called out, "Men! This is a trick! Stand where you are until you can see clearly what is going on!" and they did so. Shabīb was still in their camp and stood where he was when he saw them stop their commotion. He had been hit with a blow from a rod and was in a weakened condition. When the men quieted down and returned to their [979] quarters, he managed to slip out amidst the crowd and reached the stream, where he found Ḥayyān. He said, "Ḥayyān, pour out some water on my head." When he stretched out his head for Ḥayyān to pour water over it, the latter was about to cut it off, saying to himself, "I will find no greater honor or celebrity than will come to me from killing this man, and it will be my safe-conduct with al-Ḥajjāj." But just as he had this thought, he felt a shudder of fear; and when he was slow opening the waterskin, Shabīb asked him, "Why are you so slow opening it?" and took his knife from his boot and cut it open and handed it back to him. He then poured out the water over his head. Ḥayyān explained, "It was cowardice, by God, and the shudder of fear that came over me, that kept me from cutting off his head after I intended to do so." Then Shabīb rejoined his companions in his camp.

According to Abū Jaʿfar: In this year, Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah rebelled against al-Ḥajjāj, throwing off his allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān, and rode off to al-Jibāl, where he was killed.[475]

Account of Muṭarrif's Rebelling and Throwing Off His Allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Bakr al-Azdī: The sons of al-Mughīrah b. Shuʿbah were excellent, noble men in their own right, aside from the nobility of their father and their status in their tribe. When al-Ḥajjāj came, and met and spoke with them, he learned that they were men of his own tribe and sons of his father,[476] and he made ʿUrwah b. al-Mughīrah governor of al-Kūfah,[477] Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah governor of al-[980] Madāʾin, and Ḥamzah b. al-Mughīrah governor of Hamadhān.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAbdallāh b. Saʿd b. Nufayl al-Azdī: When Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah came to al-Madāʾin as our governor, he ascended the pulpit, praised and glorified God, and said:

> Men! The amīr al-Ḥajjāj—may God cause him to prosper!—has appointed me governor over you and commanded me to rule with right and act with justice in all I do. If I do as he has commanded me, I will be the happiest of men; but if I do not, I will be the cause of my own perdition and the forfeiter of my own fortune. I shall sit to receive you morning and evening;[478] please come to me with your concerns, as

475. Ṭabarī's account from Abū Mikhnaf of Muṭarrif's rebellion is the most detailed we have; the version from Ibn al-Kalbī in Balādhurī's Ansāb (unpublished) differs little from it. See Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 191–95; Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjāj, 148–53. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 433–37, summarizes Ṭabarī, adding only an anecdote to the effect that al-Ḥajjāj questioned Muṭarrif's parentage, because while many of the Rabīʿah became Khārijites, this was true of none of the Qays ʿAylān (to whom the Thaqīf, the tribe of al-Mughīrah and al-Ḥajjāj, were often, although not invariably, assigned); see note 92 above and Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 92.

476. Both al-Ḥajjāj and al-Mughīrah belonged to the tribe of Thaqīf. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 419f.

477. See text above, II, 873.

478. Muṭarrif here paraphrases a ḥadīth of ʿAlī: "Remind them of the days of God and sit to receive them morning and evening" (the first phrase of this being in turn a quotation of Qurʾān 14:5); see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s. v. ʿaṣr, and Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, Sharḥ Nahj al-balāghah (Cairo, 1959–64), XVIII, 30f.

well as your advice on what will most benefit you and your land. I will work unceasingly for your good, to the extent I am able.

Then he came down. At that time there were in al-Madā'in men from the nobles of the garrison and the great families, as well as fighters too numerous for the town to hold, ready in case something should flare up in the Jūkhā region or the Anbār region. When Muṭarrif came down, he proceeded immediately to sit in the īwān[479] to receive people. He was approached by Ḥakīm b. al-Ḥārith al-Azdī, who was one of the prominent and noble men of the Azd—al Ḥajjāj later put him in charge of the treasury. He said, "May God cause you to prosper, I was some distance away when you spoke; I came forward to reply to you, but by then you were coming back down. We have understood what you told us, that you have been given authority—may God lead aright the giver and the receiver! You have encouraged us to hope for justice from you and you have asked for help in acting rightly. May God help [981] you in what you intend! You are like your father, whose actions always met with the approval of God and man." Muṭarrif said, "Come here to me," and he made room for him to sit beside him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ḥuṣayn b. Yazīd: He was one of the best governors ever sent out to us, energetic in suppressing immorality and condemning injustice." Bishr b. al-Ajda' al-Hamdānī al-Thawrī,[480] who was a poet, approached him and said:

I have fallen in love with a young woman of good character, with sparkling teeth, languid limbs, and a fine neck.
She is like the sun coming out on a rainy day, when she comes out to walk with her lithe and slender friends.
But turn your passions from her, and ride a great mannish she-camel to that generous and beneficent source of favor,

479. Probably, if not quite certainly, the īwān Kisrā, the famous Sasanian palace in Ctesiphon, part of whose façade still stands. See *EI*², s. vv. īwān, al-Madā'in, and note 422 above.

480. Not a son of the known poet al-Ajda' b. Mālik, as suggested by the editors; within the tribe of Hamdān, al-Ajda' b. Mālik belonged to the Banū Wādi'ah, not the Banū Thawr. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 229, 230.

To that glorious young man, lavish in his gifts, whom we recognize among the people whenever there is an unpleasantness to be got rid of.[481]
If you ask about lineage, his is a noble one;
he holds his head high with those who carry weight on the day scores are settled.
May the All-Merciful be your refuge from a band of men with red moustaches, like the black lions of the thicket—[982] The horsemen of Shaybān! Never have we heard of their like, sons of every lordly chief of noble descent.
They attacked Ibn Ḥuṣayn and his detachment, and left him a corpse on the battlefield, on the night of the feast.[482] Ibn al-Mujālid fell victim to their spears, as if he had slipped off a high, smooth rock.[483]
And every group assembled against them in Rūdhābār[484] was broken up with spearthrusts, between the palms and the desert.

Muṭarrif said to him, "Woe to you! You have only come to incite us!" Shabīb had advanced from Sātīdamā,[485] and Muṭarrif wrote to al-Ḥajjāj as follows:

> I hereby inform the amīr—may God cause him to prosper!—that Shabīb has advanced toward us. If the amīr should think it best to send me reinforcements with which to secure al-Madā'in, he will do so; for al-Madā'in is the gate and fortress of al-Kūfah.

Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf sent him Sabrah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf with two hundred men and 'Abdallāh b. Kannāz with

---

481. Sā'ata yuẓlā kullu mardūdī. Some manuscripts read yaḥlā: "whenever the unpleasant turns sweet."

482. On the defeat of 'Uthmān b. Qaṭan b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥuṣayn in Rādhān on the 'īd al-aḍḥā of the previous year, see text above, II, 932–37.

483. On the defeat of Sa'īd b. al-Mujālid at either Qaṭīṭiyā or al-Dayr, see text above, II, 907–12.

484. So, metrica causa, for Rūdhabār = Rūdhbār. On the battle, see text above, II, 922–29.

485. See note 187 above. According to Abū Mikhnaf's earlier account, Shabīb's advance began from Māh Bihzādhān; see text above, II, 941, and note 371.

another two hundred. Shabīb advanced and halted at the bridges of Ḥudhayfah, then continued forward to Kalwādhā,[486] where he crossed the Tigris, and continued on to the city of Bahurasīr, where he halted. Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah was in the ancient city,[487] where Chosroes' residence and the White Palace are located. When Shabīb halted at Bahurasīr, Muṭarrif cut the bridge [983] between him and Shabīb and sent to Shabīb saying, "Send to me some of your worthy associates, together with whom I can study the Qur'ān and consider the stance that you advocate." Shabīb sent to him a number of men, including Suwayd b. Sulaym, Qa'nab, and al-Muḥallil b. Wā'il; but when the ferry had been brought up and they were about to board it, Shabīb sent them a message, saying not to do so until his messenger had returned from Muṭarrif. He sent to Muṭarrif, saying, "Send to me a number of your companions, until you send my companions back to me." But Muṭarrif said to the messenger, "Go to him and say: Why should I trust you with my companions if I send them to you now when you do not trust me with your companions?" Shabīb sent back his reply, saying, "You know that in our religion we do not consider treachery permissible, while you do it and think nothing of it." Muṭarrif then sent to him al-Rabī' b. Yazīd al-Asadī, Sulaymān b. Ḥudhayfah b. Hilāl b. Mālik al-Muzanī, and Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, the client of al-Mughīrah, who was in charge of Muṭarrif's guard. Once they were in Shabīb's custody, he sent his companions on to Muṭarrif.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al Naḍr-b. Ṣāliḥ: I was with Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah—I[488] do not know whether he[489] said, "I was among the troops that were with him" or "I was there in his presence"—when Shabīb's envoys came to him. Muṭarrif always treated me and my brother with affection and respect and was not in the habit of hiding anything from us. When the envoys entered, Muṭarrif was alone except for me and my brother Ḥullām [984] b. Ṣāliḥ. They were six and we were three, and they were fully armed, while we had only our swords. As they came forward, 486. From here this account closely parallels that given above, II, 946f.

487. Al-madīnah al-'atīqah, viz., Ctesiphon, on the east side of the river. On it and the White Palace, see EI², s. v. al-Madā'in.

488. Abū Mikhnaf.

489. Al-Naḍr.

Suwayd said, "Peace be to him who fears to stand before his Lord[490] and recognizes right guidance and its people." Muṭarrif replied, "Yes, indeed! May God bless them!" They then sat down, and Muṭarrif said to them, "Give me an account of your position[491] and inform me of what it is you seek and what it is you advocate." Suwayd b. Sulaym praised and glorified God, and said, "What we advocate is the Book of God and the sunnah[492] of Muḥammad, God bless him. What we object to for our people is the expropriation of the spoils, the failure to enforce the Qur'ānic punishments, and the autocratic nature of the regime."[493] Muṭarrif responded, "You summon only to right and object only to blatant injustice. I follow you in this; now follow me in what I summon you to, so that we may combine forces and our hands may work as one." They said, "Come, then, say what you want to say, and if what you summon us to is right, we will agree." He said, "I summon you to fight with me against these renegade tyrants over the innovation they have introduced and to summon them to the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet. Let this question of rule be decided by a council among the Muslims, choosing whomever they themselves approve as amīr over them, on the model of the situation in which 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb left them.[494] If the Arabs knew that all that is meant by 'council' is 'the approved one from Quraysh,'[495] they would approve and you would gain many followers from them and supporters against your enemy, and you would accomplish this purpose of yours."

At this, they jumped up to depart, saying, "This is something [985] on which we will never agree with you." As they were leaving and just stepping out of the portico of the house, Suwayd b. Su-

490. Qur'ān 55:46, 79:40.

491. Quṣṣū 'alayya amrakum. See the qaṣaṣ of Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ, text above, II, 881–84, and note 139.

492. Way or custom; see SEI, s. v.

493. See the similar list of grievances in Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ's qaṣaṣ, text above, II, 883, where they are directed specifically at 'Uthmān.

494. On the shūrā, the council of six appointed by the dying 'Umar to appoint his successor, see text above, I, 2776ff.; and on its role in Khārijism, see text above, I, 3349, Qur'ān 42:38, and E. Salem, Political Theory and Institutions of the Khawārij (Baltimore, 1956), 52, 58.

495. Al-riḍā min Quraysh. The Khārijites were both unique and unanimous in rejecting the requirement that the leader of the community be from Quraysh; see EI², s. v. imāma.

laym turned to Muṭarrif and said, "Ibn al-Mughīrah, if our men had been hostile and treacherous, you would have been putting yourself at their mercy." Muṭarrif was shaken at this and said, "You speak truly, by the God of Moses and Jesus!"

The men returned to Shabīb and informed him of what Muṭarrif had to say. Shabīb had hopes of winning him over and told them, "In the morning, one of you is to go back to him." In the morning, then, he sent Suwayd to him, giving him his orders. Suwayd set forth and came to Muṭarrif's door. It was I who conveyed his request to enter, and when he had come in and sat down, I was about to leave; but Muṭarrif said to me, "Sit! I have no secrets from you." I sat. At the time I was a tender youth, and Suwayd asked Muṭarrif, "Who is this from whom you have no secrets?" He replied, "This noble man is the son of Mālik b. Zuhayr b. Jadhīmah."[496] Suwayd said, "Great! 'You have found a good horse, so keep him!'[497] If his religion is like his lineage, he is perfect."

Then he turned his attention to Muṭarrif and said, "We presented the Commander of the Faithful with what you said to us, and he said, 'Go to him and say, "Do you not know that for the Muslims to choose for themselves the one they consider the best among them is correct procedure, for that is how the sunnah proceeded after the death of the Messenger?" If he says yes, then say to him, "We, then, have chosen for ourselves that one among us whom we most approve and who has the greatest strength to bear the burden of responsibility; and so long as he makes no change or alteration, he is the one who wields authority over us."' Shabīb added to us, 'Tell him, "With regard to your comments on 'council,' when you said that if the Arabs knew that all [986] we mean in this regard is simply Quraysh, many of them would follow us, we reply that the people of truth lose nothing with God for being few, and the oppressors gain no good for being many. Our abandoning our truth, for which we rebelled, and entering into this 'council' to which you summon us would be a sin and a defeat, giving aid and comfort to the oppressors and showing our 496. A chieftain of 'Abs in pre-Islamic times, whose murder initiated the celebrated war of Dāḥis and al-Ghabrā'; see Aghānī[1], XI, 155f., XVI, 23ff.

497. For the proverb, see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 78.

weakness; for we are not of the opinion that Quraysh have any more rights in this matter than others among the Arabs."' Shabīb further instructed us, 'If he claims that they do have more rights in this matter than anyone else among the Arabs, ask him why; if he says it is because of their kinship to Muḥammad, then say to him, "If that were the case, then, by God, it would not have been fitting for our pious forefathers, the first Emigrants, to exercise authority over the family of Muḥammad—including even the children of Abū Lahab, if they had been the only surviving members.[498] Had they not known that the best of the people in God's eyes is the most pious of them[499] and that the one worthiest of this position is the most pious, the most excellent, and the one with the greatest strength to bear the burdens of their affairs, they would not have accepted authority over the people's affairs." We were the first to protest oppression, to work to undo tyranny,[500] and to fight against the factions. If Muṭarrif follows us, he will be treated as any one of us, both for good and bad, being one of the Muslims; if he does not, then he is as one of the polytheists whom we consider our enemy and whom we fight.'"

Muṭarrif replied, "I have understood what you say. Go back to your camp for this day, while we consider our position." Suwayd returned to his camp, and Muṭarrif summoned some of his most trusted advisers, including Sulaymān b. Ḥudhayfah al-Muzanī and al-Rabī' b. Yazīd al-Asadī.

[987] According to al-Nadr b. Ṣāliḥ: I was standing with Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, the client of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, next to Muṭarrif, each of us with his sword; Yazīd was in charge of his guard. Muṭarrif said to the men, "You are my advisers, my friends, and those in whose integrity and good judgment I trust. By God, I have abhorred the deeds of these oppressors all along, protesting against them in my heart and working to undo them as much as possible

498. The reference is probably specifically to the first two caliphs, whose authority was recognized by Muḥammad's family, including not only 'Alī but also many other cousins, among them the sons of Muḥammad's old enemy 'Abd al-'Uzzā (Abū Lahab; see *EI*², s. v.). Abū Lahab's sons 'Utbah and Mu'attib did become Muslims but played no prominent role in the government of the community; see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, IV, i, 41f., V, 336.

499. A paraphrase of Qur'ān 49:13.

500. Ghayyara al-jawr, literally "change tyranny." Compare Muṭarrif's statement below that he "worked to undo" the deeds of the oppressors.

with my own deeds and orders. Now that their sins have become so great, and I have encountered these people who strive against them,[501] I have decided I have no choice but to oppose and resist them, if I can find allies to support me against them. I summoned these people and said to them such-and-such, and they said to me such-and-such, and I have decided not to fight them; indeed, if they were willing to follow my opinion as I described it to them, I would cast off allegiance to 'Abd al-Malik and al-Ḥajjāj and go off to strive against them." Al-Muzanī said to him, "These men will never follow you in your opinion, nor will you follow them. Keep this parley quiet and let no one know about it." Al-Asadī also said much the same thing. Then his client Ibn Abī Ziyād fell to his knees and said, "By God, not a single word of what was said between you and them will escape al-Ḥajjāj, and that with each word embellished with ten more just like it! By God, if you were to try to escape from al-Ḥajjāj over the clouds, he would still hunt you down to destroy you and those with you. Run for your life! Get out of this place! The people of al-Madā'in on this side, and on that side, and the people of Shabīb's camp, will talk about what went on between you and Shabīb, and before you go to bed tonight, the news will have reached al-Ḥajjāj. Find yourself a [988] home other than al-Madā'in!" The other two companions added, "Our view is just as he said." Muṭarrif asked them, "What is your decision, then?" They said, "To agree to what you summon us to, and to make common cause with you against al-Ḥajjāj or anyone else."

Then Muṭarrif looked at me and asked, "What is your decision?" I replied, "To kill your enemies, and to stand fast with you so long as you stand fast." He said, "That is what I expected of you."

He waited for three days. Then Qa'nab came to him and said, "If you follow us, you are one of us; if you refuse, then any truce between us is over." Muṭarrif said, "Do not rush us today; we are still considering."

Then he sent to his men saying, "Ride out tonight, every last one of you, and come with me to al-Daskarah to deal with something that has happened there." He set out before dawn, with his men, and went as far as Dayr Yazdajird, where he halted. There he was met by Qabīṣah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Quḥāfī of Khathʿam.[502] He invited the latter to accompany him, and he did so; he outfitted him, gave him a mount, and ordered him given some money. Then he went on to al-Daskarah. After halting there, when he was ready to set out again, he had no choice but to inform his men of his intentions. He called together their leaders, and, after making appropriate mention of God and blessing His Messenger, he said to them:

501. Yujāhidūnahum.

> God has prescribed jihād for His creatures, and commanded them to act with justice and benevolence; He has said in the revelation He sent us, "Help one another to righteousness and piety, but help not one another to sin and injustice; fear God, God is harsh in punishment."[503] I make God my witness that I have cast off my allegiance to ʿAbd al-Malik and al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. Those of you who desire to accompany me, being of like mind with me, follow me, and you will have a good example and good company. As for those who refuse, > [989] they may go wherever they wish; I have no desire for followers who are not committed to jihād against the tyrants. I summon you to the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet and to fight against the oppressors. If God determines affairs in our favor, this matter[504] will be decided by council among the Muslims, who will approve for themselves whomever they like.

His men responded with alacrity and gave him their oath of allegiance. Then he went into his quarters and sent for Sabrah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf and ʿAbdallāh b. Kannāz al-Nahdī. Meeting with them in private, he summoned them as he had all of his men. They gave him their approval, but then, when he set out, they departed with those of his men who were with them and went to al-Ḥajjāj, whom they found had taken the field against Shabīb, and participated with him in the battle with Shabīb.

---

502. For the Banū Quḥāfah of Khathʿam, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 226, II, 470. This man was Abū Mikhnaf's source for the qaṣaṣ of Ṣāliḥ b. Musarriḥ given above, II, 881f., where he is said to have been a sympathizer of the latter.

503. Qurʾān 5:2.

504. Determination of the legitimate leader of the community.

Muṭarrif set out with his men from al-Daskarah, heading toward Ḥulwān. Al-Ḥajjāj had this same year sent out Suwayd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Saʿdī as governor of Ḥulwān and Māh Sabadhān.[505] When he heard that Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah was advancing toward his land, he realized that if he dealt with him gently or attempted to cajole him, al-Ḥajjāj would never put up with it; Suwayd accordingly mustered against him the townsmen and the Kurds, the latter holding the Ḥulwān pass against him. Suwayd marched out to him, hoping all the while to avoid fighting him and yet to be forgiven by al-Ḥajjāj; it was a poor excuse for a march.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlqamah al-Khathʿamī: When al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah al-Khathʿamī[506] heard that Muṭarrif had set out from al-Madāʾin toward al-Jabal, he followed after him with some thirty men, from his own tribe and others. I was one of them. We caught up with Muṭarrif at Ḥulwān and [990] participated with him in the battle against Suwayd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr: the same.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlqamah: As soon as we reached Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah, he showed great pleasure at our arrival and seated al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah next to himself.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlqamah: When Suwayd came out to meet them with his forces, he stayed with the infantry, not leading them out from their tents, while his son, al-Qaʿqāʿ, advanced with the cavalry; but his cavalry that day was not numerous.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: I would say they were two hundred. According to Ibn ʿAlqamah: I would say they were less than three hundred.

Muṭarrif summoned al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah and sent him out against them with about the same number. They advanced against al-Qaʿqāʿ, well-known horsemen determined to give him a good fight. When Suwayd saw them preparing to attack his son, he sent to them a boy of his named Rustam, who was later killed

505. This is a falsely etymologized form of Māsabadhān, a district south of Ḥulwān, in the front range of the Zagros. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 393; Le Strange, Lands, 202; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 142.

506. A former partisan of Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr; see text above, II, 773f.

with him at Dayr al-Jamājim[507] with the standard of the Banū Sa'd in his hand. This boy ran off quickly to al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah and told him confidentially, "If you intend to leave this land of ours and go elsewhere, then leave us, for we do not wish to fight you. But if it is to us you have come by intent, then we must protect what is ours." When he delivered this message, al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah told him, "Go to our amīr and tell him what you have told me." The boy then proceeded on to Muṭarrif and told him the same thing he had told al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah. Muṭarrif said, "My aim is neither you nor your land." The boy said, "Then stay on this road until you have left our land. We have found ourselves [991] obliged to arrange for people to see that we came out against you and for word of this to be passed on."

Muṭarrif sent for al-Ḥajjāj, and he joined him. They continued along the road until they reached the pass and found it held by the Kurds. Muṭarrif dismounted, as did all his men, and sent up al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah with his right wing and Sulaymān b. Ḥudhayfah with his left wing to confront them. These two defeated and killed them, and Muṭarrif and his men continued safely on until they drew near Hamadhān. Muṭarrif avoided the latter, turning off to his left toward Māh Dīnār;[508] his brother Ḥamzah b. al-Mughīrah was governor of Hamadhān, and Muṭarrif preferred not to enter it and subject his brother to accusations from al-Ḥajjāj. But when Muṭarrif entered the land of Māh Dīnār, he wrote to his brother Ḥamzah, saying, "Our expenses have mounted and supplies have become a severe problem. Please help out your brother with what money and arms you can." He sent this message with Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, the client of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, who came to Ḥamzah with Muṭarrif's letter at night. When Ḥamzah saw him, he said to him, "May your mother be bereft of you! You have killed Muṭarrif!" Yazīd replied, "It is not I who has killed him, may I be your ransom, but Muṭarrif who has killed himself and me with him; I hope he does not kill you as well." Ḥamzah said, "Woe to you! Who seduced him into this business?" Yazīd said, "It was he who seduced himself into this"; then he sat with him and gave him a full acount of the whole affair, and handed him Muṭarrif's letter. Ḥamzah read it, then said, "Yes, I will send him money and arms. But tell me, do you think I can keep this secret?" Yazīd said that he thought it could not be kept secret, but [992] Ḥamzah said to him, "By God, if I fail him in the more efficacious of the two kinds of support, that which is open, I will not forsake him in the lesser, that which is secret!"

507. Where al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf defeated the rebel 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ash'ath, in 83 (702); see text below, II, 1070ff.

508. The district of Nihāwand, south of Hamadhān, according to an account in the text above (I, 2628, 2631) and in Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl (Leiden), 145. Ḥamzah al-Iṣfahānī identified it rather with the district of Dīnawar, west of Hamadhān, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 406, which would agree better with a turn to the left here; but the statement below that Māh Dīnār bordered Iṣfahān must refer to the Nihāwand region. Dīnawar was officially named Māh al-Kūfah, and Nihāwand Māh al-Baṣrah; see *EI*², s. vv. Dīnawar, Māh al-Baṣra.

He sent him money and arms with Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, who brought them to Muṭarrif. We were camped in one of the rural districts of Māh Dīnār, called Sāmān,[509] on the borders of the Iṣfahān region; this was a district where some of the Ḥamrā' were settled.[510]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: By God, no sooner had Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād set off than I heard the men of the camp spreading the word that the amīr was sending to his brother to ask him for money and arms. I went to Muṭarrif and informed him of this. He struck his brow with his hand and said, "Glory to God! One said, 'What can be kept secret?' The other replied, 'That which is not!'"

As soon as Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād arrived, Muṭarrif set off, halting at Qum, Qāshān,[511] and Iṣfahān.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah: When Muṭarrif reached Qum and Qāshān and felt secure, he summoned al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah and said to him, "Tell me about Shabīb's defeat the day at al-Ṣabakhah. Were you an eyewitness, or had you left before the battle?" Al-Ḥajjāj replied, "No, I was an eyewitness." Muṭarrif said, "Tell me, then, how things went with them." Al-Ḥajjāj told him, and he said, "I was hoping that Shabīb would win; even if he was in error, he would be killing another in error."

509. Mentioned, but without additional information, by Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 13f.

510. The Ḥamrā' ("red") were early Persian converts to Islam who participated in the conquest of Iran; some of them were settled near Ḥulwān after its conquest in 16 (637). See text above, I, 2473f.; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 197.

511. Modern Kāshān, between Qum and Iṣfahān; see *EI*², s. v. Kāshān.

It seemed to me that this desire of his was actually because he was hoping to accomplish his own aims if al-Ḥajjāj perished. Then Muṭarrif sent out his officials.[512]

[993] According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: Muṭarrif acted decisively, if only the fates had not been stronger. He sent the following message with al-Rabīʿ b. Yazīd to Suwayd b. Sirḥān al-Thaqafī and to Bukayr b. Hārūn al-Bajalī:[513]

> We summon you to the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet, and to jihād against him who has obstinately rejected the truth, expropriated the spoils, and abandoned the judgment of the Book.[514] When the truth appears and the false is overcome and the Word of God is rightfully exalted,[515] we will let this question be decided by council among the Community, the Muslims recognizing whom they please as the approved one. He who accepts this from us is our brother in religion and our comrade in life and death; but we will strive against[516] him who rejects this from us and ask God for His aid against him. It is sufficient to establish our claim against him, and sufficient to show his bad judgment in abandoning jihād in the way of God, and his weakness in conciliating the oppressors in the affairs of God, that God has prescribed fighting for the Muslims, calling it "hateful";[517] and no one can obtain God's good pleasure except by adhering steadfastly to God's command and waging jihād against God's enemies. Accept the truth, then, may God have mercy on you, and summon to it those for whose acceptance you hope, and let them know what they have not known. Let all who agree with our opinions, and accept our summons, and consider our enemy their own, come to me.

---

512. ʿUmmāl, usually tax officials, and probably so here as well, sent out to collect the kharāj of the surrounding districts for Muṭarrif.

513. On the Bajīlah tribe, of uncertain ancestry, see EI², s. v. Badjīla. Both men were in al-Rayy, as emerges below.

514. Taraka ḥukm al-kitāb. It was ʿAlī's willingness to submit to the arbitration of man, rather than the judgment of the Qurʾān, that led to the original Khārijite revolt. The slogan "Judgment is to God alone" is a variant of this basic Khārijite tenet; see note 233 above.

515. Kalimat Allāh hiya al-ʿulyā, a paraphrase of Qurʾān 9:40.

516. Jāhadnā.

517. Qurʾān 2:216: Kutiba ʿalaykum al-qitāl wa-huwa kurh lakum.

May God lead you and us aright and be forgiving to you and us; He is the Forgiving, the Merciful. Peace.

When this letter reached the two men, they went among some of the men of al-Rayy and summoned those who would follow them. Then they departed secretly with some hundred from the men of al-Rayy, unremarked by anyone, and went to Muṭarrif. [994]

Then al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah, al-Ḥajjāj's governor of Iṣfahān, sent off a letter, saying, "If the amīr, may God cause him to prosper, has any care for Iṣfahān, or elsewhere, let him send out a massive army against Muṭarrif to annihilate him and those with him. He has just been joined by a band of men who came from some land or other to the place where he is staying now, and thus he has grown more powerful and his followers more numerous. Peace." Al-Ḥajjāj wrote back to him, saying, "When my messenger comes to you, muster those who are with you. Then, when 'Adī b. Wattād comes to you, lead your forces forth with him, and heed and obey him. Peace." When al-Barā' read this letter, he went out and mustered his forces. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf began sending out to al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah men on post horses, in groups of ten, fifteen, or twenty, until he had sent out to him some five hundred altogether. Al-Barā''s own forces numbered two thousand.

Meanwhile, al-Aswad b. Sa'd al-Hamdānī came out to al-Rayy, after[518] the victory God granted al-Ḥajjāj on the day he met Shabīb at al-Sabakhah. He passed through Hamadhān and al-Jibāl and stopped to see Ḥamzah, who excused himself to him.[519] According to al-Aswad: I informed al-Ḥajjāj about Ḥamzah, and he said, "I have already heard about that." He wanted to dismiss him, fearing that he would play him false if he held back,[520] and sent to Qays b. Sa'd al-'Ijlī, who was at that time in charge of Ḥamzah b. al-Mughīrah's security force—there were a number of people from the Banū 'Ijl and Rabī'ah in Hamadhān.[521] He sent

518. Kāna . . . atā al-Rayy fī fatḥ Allāh 'alā al-Ḥajjāj.

519. That is, he declined to supply troops for the fight against his brother. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 436.

520. Fa-khashiya an yamkura bihi in yamtani' minhu. Some MSS read wa-yamtani' minhu ("that he would play him false and elude him"), as was perhaps also read by Ibn al-Athīr, who paraphrases (Kāmil, IV, 436), "(al-Ḥajjāj) pretended to accept his excuse; he wanted to dismiss him but was afraid that he would elude him."

521. On the Banū 'Ijl, one of the Bakr b. Wā'il tribes and thus part of the Rabī'ah confederation, see EI², s. v. 'Idjl.

Qays b. Sa'd a letter of appointment over Hamadhān and an order [995] saying, "Put Ḥamzah b. al-Mughīrah in irons and keep him imprisoned there until further orders from me." When Qays received the letter and the order, he set out with a large number of his kinsmen. He entered the mosque just as the afternoon prayer was beginning and performed the prayer with Ḥamzah. When Ḥamzah went out, Qays b. Sa'd al-'Ijlī, the chief of his security force, went out with him, gave him al-Ḥajjāj's letter to read, and showed him the letter of appointment. Ḥamzah said, "Heed and obey." Qays put him in irons and held him in prison, and took over the governorship of Hamadhān. He sent out his officials over the district, choosing them all from his own people, and wrote to al-Ḥajjāj as follows: "I hereby inform the amīr—may God cause him to prosper!—that I have put Ḥamzah b. al-Mughīrah in irons and thrown him in prison. I have sent out my officials over the land revenue and have already begun to collect it.[522] Perhaps the amīr—may God prolong his life!—may give me permission to go out against Muṭarrif and strive against him with my people and those of my land who obey me; for I hope for a greater reward for jihād than for collecting the land revenue. Peace."

When al-Ḥajjāj read this letter, he laughed and said, "Here is the quarter where we are secure should all else fail!" Ḥamzah's position in Hamadhān had been the worst worry God could create for al-Ḥajjāj, who feared that he would support his brother with money or arms, or even, for all he knew, take it into his head to rebel himself. This is why he continued to scheme against him until he was able to dismiss him; once he felt secure there, he could go after Muṭarrif.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Muṭarrif b. 'Āmir b. Wāthilah:[523] When al-Ḥajjāj read the letter of Qays b. Sa'd al-'Ijlī and his statement that "if the amīr would like, I will march out and strive 522. Ba'athtu 'ummālī 'alā al-kharāj wa-waḍa'tu yadī fī al-jibāyah.

523. His father, Abū al-Ṭufayl 'Āmir b. Wāthilah al-Kinānī, was a famous horseman and poet who had borne 'Alī's standard and supported al-Mukhtār; he was reputedly the last Companion to die, in 100 [718]. See Sezgin, GAS, II, 412; Ziriklī, A'lām, IV, 26. Muṭarrif's brother al-Ṭufayl is mentioned below with the forces of al-Barā'.

against him with my people," he said, "How I hate to see the Arabs increasing in number in the kharāj land!"[524]

According to Ibn al-Ghariq:[525] The minute I heard this from al- [996] Ḥajjāj, I realized that if he were free to do so, he would have dismissed him.

According to al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to 'Adī b. Wattād al-Iyādī, the governor of al-Rayy, ordering him to march out against Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah, joining forces first with al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah; when they met, 'Adī was to have command of the men.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—his father[526]—'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr[527]—'Abdallāh b. Sulaym al-Azdī:[528] I was sitting with 'Adī b. Wattād in his council in al-Rayy when al-Ḥajjāj's letter arrived. He read it, then gave it to me, and I read it. It said: "When you read this letter, take three quarters of the men of al-Rayy there with you and advance to meet al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah in Jay,[529] then proceed on together. When you meet, you will be in command of the men until God kills Muṭarrif. Once God has rid the believers of him, return to your regular position, under God's protection, security, and shelter." When I had read it, 'Adī said to me, "Go and prepare for war."

'Adī went out to muster the troops, summoning the secretaries, who called up[530] three quarters of the men. It was less than a week before we set out. We came to Jay, where we were met by Qabīṣah al-Quḥāfī[531] with nine[532] hundred Syrians, including

---

524. That is, land from whose non-Muslim (and non-Arab) owners the traditional land tax was collected; al-Ḥajjāj's policy was to preserve a strict segregation between a non-Arab taxpaying peasantry and an urban and military Arab aristocracy.

525. Presumably the 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ghariq mentioned above (II, 922, 945) as al-Ḥajjāj's messenger to the approaching Syrians.

526. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd; see U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 224.

527. Probably a cousin of Abū Mikhnaf's grandfather, according to U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 225.

528. An uncle of Abū Mikhnaf's grandfather, and probably of 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr, according to U. Sezgin, Abū Miḫnaf, 225.

529. One of the twin cities comprising Iṣfahān; see Le Strange, Lands, 203ff.

530. Ḍarabū al-ba'th 'alā.

531. Last seen (II, 988) accompanying Muṭarrif. Is this a slip for al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah?

532. Perhaps to be emended to "seven" to match the number a few lines below (or vice versa).

'Umar b. Hubayrah. We remained at Jay only two days before 'Adī b. Wattād set out with all the forces under his command. He had three thousand fighters from the men of al-Rayy; a thousand fighters with al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah, sent to him by al-Ḥajjāj from al-[997] Kūfah; seven hundred Syrians; and some thousand men from the people of Iṣfahān and the Kurds. Altogether, they were nearly six thousand fighters. 'Adī advanced until he came up against Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ and[533] 'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah: When Muṭarrif heard that they were marching against him, he had a trench dug around his forces; and they remained inside it until the government forces arrived.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Yazīd, the client of 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr: I was with my master at that time. 'Adī b. Wattād went out and put the men in battle array. He put 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr over his right wing, then sent word to[534] al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah to stand with the left. But al-Barā' was angry and said, "You order me to stand with the left, when I am a governor[535] like you! Those are my cavalry in the left, and I have put over them the horseman of Muḍar, al-Ṭufayl b. 'Āmir b. Wāthilah."[536] This reply was conveyed to 'Adī b. Wattād, and he said to Ibn Uqayṣir al-Khath'amī, "You go out and take command of the cavalry. Go to al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah and tell him, 'You have been commanded to obey me. You have nothing to do with right and left and cavalry and infantry. Your duty is to obey your orders. Do not cross me in anything and lose my good will.'" Until then, he had treated him with full respect.

Then 'Adī put 'Umar b. Hubayrah over his left, sending with him a hundred Syrians; he went and took his position, with his standard. One of his men said to al-Ṭufayl b. 'Āmir, "Take down your standard and go away; this position is ours." Al-Ṭufayl replied, "I will not quarrel with you. This standard was committed [998] to me by al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah, and he is our commander. But we know that your man is in command of the assembled forces, and

---

533. Reading wa- for 'an.
534. Qāla li-, "told," but apparently through a messenger; see below.
535. Amīr, also translated "commander" below.
536. See note 523 above, and Ziriklī, A'lām, III, 329.

if this has been committed to your master, then, may God bless him, we heed and obey immediately." Then 'Umar b. Hubayrah said to his men, "Take it easy! Desist from your brother and cousin!" and to al-Ṭufayl, "Our standard is yours, and if you wish, we will gladly surrender it to you." We have never seen two men as coolheaded as those two in that situation.

Then 'Adī b. Wattād dismounted and moved his forces against Muṭarrif.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ and 'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah: Muṭarrif put al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah in charge of his right wing, al-Rabī' b. Yazīd al-Asadī in charge of his left wing, and Sulaymān b. Ṣakhr al-Muzanī in charge of his rearguard. He himself dismounted and walked with the infantry. His standard was with Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, the client of his father al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah.

As the two armies advanced and drew near each other, Muṭarrif said to Bukayr b. Hārūn al-Bajalī, "Go out to them and summon them to the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet and reproach them for their wicked deeds." Bukayr b. Hārūn went out to them on a black horse with a blaze and a fine tail, wearing a cuirass, a leather helmet, and armlets, and with a spear in his hand; he had fastened his cuirass with a red sash made from the fringes of woolen robes.[537] He called out in his loud, high voice: "Men of our qiblah,[538] men of our religion, men of our confession![539] We beseech you by God, than Whom there is no other god, Whose knowledge of what you hide is as His knowledge of what you display, to be fair and honest with us, to speak out of commitment to God, not to His creatures, and to be witnesses for God against His servants of what God knows of His servants. Tell me about 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān and al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf: do you [999] not recognize them as tyrants and despots, who follow their own vain opinions, seizing people on idle suspicions and killing them out of simple anger?"

The men called out from every side, "Enemy of God! You lie! It is not so!" He said to them, "'Woe to you! Do not forge a lie against God, lest He destroy you by some punishment; he who forges a lie fails.'[540] Woe to you! Will you teach God what He does not know?[541] We have called on you to testify, and God has said about testimony, 'He who hides it is sinful of heart.'"[542] Then Ṣārim, the client of 'Adī b. Wattād and his standard-bearer, went out against him. He charged at Bukayr b. Hārūn al-Bajalī, and they fought with their swords. 'Adī's client's blow had no effect; then Bukayr struck him with his sword and killed him. Then he went forward and said, "Horseman to horseman!" but no one would come out to meet him. He recited:

537. 'Iṣābah min ḥawāshī al-burūd. See Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements chez les Arabes, 59–64, 300–5.

538. The direction of prayer for Muslims, toward Mecca; see EI², s. v. ḳibla.

539. Da'wah.

Ṣārim, you have encountered a cutting (ṣārim) sword,
And a powerful maned lion.

Then al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah, who was in the right, attacked 'Umar b. Hubayrah, who was in the left. With 'Umar in the left was also al-Ṭufayl b. 'Āmir b. Wāthilah, and al-Ḥajjāj encountered him. They were close friends, and recognized each other just as each was raising his sword against the other, and held back.

The two wings fought for a long time before 'Adī b. Wattād's left gave a little ground, and al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah moved to occupy the space. Then al-Rabī' b. Yazīd attacked 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr, and they also fought long, until the men made a concerted attack on al-Asadī and killed him; and Muṭarrif b. al-Mughīrah's left was [1000] driven back as far as his own position. Then 'Umar b. Hubayrah attacked al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah and his forces and fought long with him. The latter finally decided to desist and went to join Muṭarrif. Ibn Uqayṣir al-Khath'amī charged with the cavalry against Sulaymān b. Ṣakhr al-Muzanī, who was killed, and his cavalry driven back as far as Muṭarrif. This cavalry battle was the fiercest fighting the men had ever seen, but Ibn Uqayṣir finally reached Muṭarrif.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: On that day Muṭarrif kept calling out to them, saying, "'People of the Book! Come to a word we may acknowledge equally: that we serve no one but God, and associate nothing as partner to him, and we do not take one another as lords apart from him. If they turn their backs, say: We testify that we are Muslims.' "[543] He continued to fight until he was killed. 'Umar b. Hubayrah cut off his head; it is said that it was he who killed him; although more than one had rushed at him, it was Ibn Hubayrah who cut off his head. 'Adī b. Wattād dispatched him with the head, and this meant advancement for him.[544] 'Umar b. Hubayrah fought bravely and well that day.

540. Qur'ān 20:61.
541. An echo of Qur'ān 49:16.
542: Qur'ān 2:283.

According to Abū Mikhnaf: Ḥakīm b. Abī Sufyān al-Azdī said he killed Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, the client of al-Mughīrah b. Shu'bah, who was Muṭarrif's standard-bearer.

They reached Muṭarrif's camp, which Muṭarrif had entrusted to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Afīf al-Azdī. He was killed; he was a good, temperate, abstemious man.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Zayd, their client:[545] I saw his head with Ibn Uqayṣir al-Khath'amī and was unable to restrain myself from saying to him, "By God, you have killed a man who prayed and worshipped and thought much on God." He came [1001] toward me and asked who I was, and my master said to him, "This is my attendant. What is the matter?" Ibn Uqayṣir told him what I had said, and he said, "He is mentally deficient."

Then we went off to al-Rayy with 'Adī b. Wattād. He sent some of the valiant men to al-Ḥajjāj, and he welcomed and honored them. When he returned to al-Rayy, the Bajīlah came to 'Adī b. Wattād and asked for safe-conduct for Bukayr b. Hārūn, and he granted it. Then the Thaqīf asked for safe-conduct for Suwayd b. Sirḥān al-Thaqafī, and he granted it. Then the kin of every man who had been with Muṭarrif asked for and were granted safe-conduct for him, which was a good deed on his part. Some of Muṭarrif's men had been surrounded in Muṭarrif's camp; they called out, "Barā'! Get safe-conduct for us! Barā'! Intercede for us!" He interceded for them, and they were released. 'Adī took many prisoners, and then he let them go.

---

543. Qur'ān 3:64.

544. Awfadahu bihi 'Adī b. Wattād wa-ḥaẓiya bihi, presumably meaning that he took the head to al-Ḥajjāj, who was well pleased. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 436.

545. I.e., of the Azd.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Naḍr b. Ṣāliḥ: He[546] set out and came to Suwayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān at Ḥulwān, and was welcomed and honored by him; then he went on to al-Kūfah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abdallāh b. 'Alqamah: Al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah al-Khath'amī came to al-Rayy, where he had formerly been stationed, and appeal was made to 'Adī on his behalf. But 'Adī said, "This is a notorious man, who won notoriety along with his companion; and here is a letter from al-Ḥajjāj to me about him."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—his father—'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr: I was among those who spoke to 'Adī on al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah's behalf. He took out and showed us this letter from al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf: "If God has killed al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah, good riddance! That is what I hope and desire. If he yet lives, seek him out from there, [1002] put him in chains, and send him directly to me, God willing. Peace." 'Adī said to us, "I have received specific orders about him, which I have no choice but to heed and obey. If I had not had these specific orders, I would have granted him safe-conduct for you and held back from him, not seeking him out." We then departed from him.

Al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah remained in fear until 'Adī b. Wattād was dismissed, and Khālid b. 'Attāb b. Warqā' came in his place. I went to him and spoke to him on al-Ḥajjāj's behalf, and he granted him safe-conduct.

Verses by Ḥabīb b. Khidrah, a client of the Banū Hilāl b. 'Āmir:[547]

Has Fā'id ever heard of our speeding away[548] for fear of the sharp swords of an enemy,

---

546. It is not clear who is meant here, although al-Barā' seems the most likely. Already in the previous paragraph several pronouns are ambiguous, and the state of the text seems questionable.

547. Mentioned with Shabīb at al-Kūfah; see text above, II, 968, and note 455. Ṭabarī's placing these verses here, as a sort of coda to his account of Shabīb's revolt, implicitly includes Muṭarrif's rebellion as part of that movement. For a review of opinions on whether Muṭarrif was a "Khārijite," see Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 194.

548. Hal atā Fā'ida 'an īsādinā, adopting a reading suggested by the editors for text aysārinā.

When fear came upon us from a quarter we thought secure, and we rode through the dark to another land?
Ask Hadyah whether she has ever seen men of nobler character than us.
Ask her whether they remain amicable with us, or are determined to hate us.
Many a sweetheart have I had before her,
with whom I cut the knot, and let her go.
We have experienced life at its calmest, and we have experienced life at its most turbulent.
I have experienced Time—a Time of which I am eager for one part and shun another.
I have seen the horses packed closely together, only their eyes distinguishable,
Their riders passing, one to another, on the points of the spears, a cup overflowing with the black blood of death.
It is the charge of the horsemen that delights me, while diversion merely robs me of my delight
In the advancing helmets, as the horsemen leave creases from their Indian swords in them.[549]
Many a morning of battle has there been that suited me [1003] perfectly,
Just like an old waterskin and its cover.[550]

According to Abū Ja'far: In this year, dissension arose among the Azraqites who followed Qaṭarī b. al-Fujā'ah.[551] Some of them dissented from him and withdrew from him, and gave allegiance to 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr, while others maintained their allegiance to Qaṭarī.[552]

---

549. Bi-mushīḥi l-bayḍi ḥattā yatrukū/ li-suyūfi l-Hindi fīhā ṭuraqā.

550. Or: Just like Shann and Ṭabaqa(h). For the proverb and its interpretations, see Maydānī, Amthāl, II, 284f.

551. See text above, II, 944 and note 382, and EI², s. v. Ḳaṭarī.

552. Ṭabarī makes no mention of an 'Abd Rabb al-Ṣaghīr (the Younger, as opposed to al-Kabīr, the Greater or Elder), but other sources do. Both men are involved in the schism in the accounts in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 55ff.) and Ya'qūbī (Ta'rīkh, II, 329ff.). Mubarrad (Kāmil, 678, 685ff.) has only 'Abd Rabb al-Ṣaghīr, whom he calls a client of the Banū Qays b. Tha'labah (of Bakr); Ibn Khayyāṭ (Ta'rīkh, 275) gives the same tribal affiliation for his 'Abd Rabb (unqualified). Like Ibn Khayyāṭ, Dīnawarī (al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 286–88) mentions only one 'Abd

Account of the Dissension among the Azraqites and the Reason for Its Breaking Out, until They Came to Ruin

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Yūsuf b. Yazīd: Al-Muhallab remained in Sābūr fighting Qaṭarī and his Azraqite supporters for about a year after al-Ḥajjāj recalled 'Attāb b. Warqā' from his army.[553] Then he attacked them on the day of the Orchard,[554] fighting them fiercely. Kirmān was then in the hands of the Khārijites, and Fārs in the hands of al-Muhallab. The Khārijite forces found themselves straitened in the position they occupied, with no supplies coming to them from Fārs and themselves far from home; so they withdrew to Kirmān. Al-Muhallab came after them, halting at Jīruft—Jīruft is the capital of Kirmān.[555] He fought fiercely with them there for more than a year, keeping them out of Fārs altogether. Once all of Fārs was in the hands of al-Muhallab, al-Ḥajjāj sent out his officials to administer it, taking it over from al-Muhallab. Word of this reached 'Abd al-Malik, [1004] and he wrote as follows to al-Ḥajjāj: "Leave the land revenue of the mountains of Fārs in the hands of al-Muhallab; for it is imperative that the army be strong and the commander of the army adequately supported. Let him have the district of Fasā and Darābjird and the district of Iṣṭakhr."[556]

Al-Ḥajjāj left these to al-Muhallab, who sent out his officials to administer them; they served to give him strength against the

---

Rabb. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, IV, 437ff.) combines the accounts of Ṭabarī and Mubarrad, but refers to the single rebel leader throughout as 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr.

553. See text above, II, 877f., 944.

554. Yawm al-bustān. Other independent published sources do not mention this battle under this name. Perhaps it is the same as the battle at Shi'b Bawwān, mentioned by Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 34) and probably referred to in the verses by Ka'b al-Ashqarī quoted below (II, 1012, and see note 575). Shi'b Bawwān, fifty miles northwest of Shīrāz, was considered one of the world's beauty spots; see Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if al-ma'ārif (Cairo, 1960), 157; Le Strange, Lands, 260.

555. Jīruft was some fifty miles southwest of Bam; see EI², s. v. Djīruft.

556. For these three cities (and here two districts) of central Fārs, see EI², s. vv. Fasā, Darābdjird, Iṣṭakhr.

enemy and his interests. In this regard, the poet of Azd has this to say, reproaching al-Muhallab:

We fight to defend the palaces of Darābjird and collect taxes for al-Mughīrah and al-Ruqād.

Al-Ruqād b. Ziyād b. Hammām was a man of the 'Atīk, held in high esteem by al-Muhallab.[557]

Al-Ḥajjāj sent al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah to al-Muhallab,[558] and wrote to him as follows: "By God, it seems to me that if you really wished to, you could have exterminated these renegade Khārijites by now; but you like their continuing presence, so you may consume the land around you. I have sent you al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah to rouse you to attack them; attack them, then, when he comes to you, with all the Muslims, and wage the fiercest jihād against them. Let me hear no excuses or petty lies, or other such things that, coming from you, are distasteful and unacceptable to me. Peace."

Al-Muhallab sent out his sons, each with a cavalry detachment, and his troops according to their standards, ranks, and fifths.[559] [1005] Al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah came and was positioned by al-Muhallab on a hill near the troops, where he could see them. The detachments attacked the enemy detachments, and the infantry the infantry;

557. Al-Muhallab himself belonged to al-'Atīk b. al-Asd of the Azd 'Umān; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 203, II, 421. The al-Mughīrah mentioned in the verses is al-Muhallab's son. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 560, cites the verse and names its author as Abū al-Bahā' al-Iyādī (of Azd; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 220). Mubarrad (Kāmil, 684), in an account explicitly accusing al-Mughīrah and al-Ruqād of not passing the collected revenue on to the troops, quotes four other verses with the same meter and rhyme, and presumably from the same poem. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 98f.; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 180.

558. This was presumably before al-Barā''s appointment as governor of Iṣfahān, but Ṭabarī gives no precise synchronisms. Mubarrad, Kāmil, 671f., recounts the following incident before 'Attāb's arrival as co-commander.

559. 'Alā rāyātihim wa-maṣāffihim wa-akhmāsihim. The first two terms probably refer to the cavalry and infantry respectively, while the "fifths" are those into which the Baṣran army was divided; see text above, II, 720, and Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 250.

they fought as hard as the men ever had from the morning prayer to midday, then withdrew. Al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah came to al-Muhallab and said to him, "No, by God! Never have I seen horsemen like your sons, or Arab horsemen like your horsemen! Nor have I ever seen the like of these people who fight you, of such stamina and valor! By God, you have a good excuse!" Al-Muhallab withdrew with the men until afternoon prayer, then took them out again, with his sons over the cavalry detachments, and they fought as they had in the morning.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mughallis al-Kinānī—his paternal uncle Abū Ṭalḥah: One of their detachments went against one of our detachments, and the battle between them grew fierce, neither side giving way to the other. They fought on until nightfall separated them. Then one side asked the other, "From what people are you?" They answered, "We are from the Banū Tamīm." Those on the other side then said, "We too are from the Banū Tamīm." They withdrew in the evening.

Al-Muhallab asked al-Barā', "What did you see?" He replied, "I saw a people, by God, against whom no help will avail you but God's!" Al-Muhallab rewarded al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah with generous treatment, giving him a mount and fine garments, and ordering ten thousand dirhams paid out to him. Al-Barā' then departed and returned to al-Ḥajjāj, conveying to him al-Muhallab's excuse and informing him of what he had seen. Al-Muhallab himself also wrote to al-Ḥajjāj as follows: "I have received the letter of the [1006] amīr—may God cause him to prosper!—with his accusations against me concerning these renegade Khārijites. The amīr ordered me to attack them and let his messenger observe, and I have done so. Let him ask him about what he observed. As for me, by God, if I were able to exterminate them and eliminate them from this land, and desisted from doing so, I would be cheating the Muslims, betraying the Commander of the Faithful, and showing myself untrue to the amīr—may God cause him to prosper. God forbid that this should be my attitude and my way of serving God! Peace."[560]

560. Both Mubarrad (Kāmil, 667–77, 681f., 688f.) and Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (Futūḥ, Al-Muhallab continued to fight them there for eighteen months. He neither made a dent in them nor himself suffered, with the men of Iraq who were with him, an attack in any battle with sword and spear that would drive them off and cause them to desist. Then one of the rebels, a man from the Banū Ḍabbah named al-Muqa'ṭar, who was an official for Qaṭarī over one of the regions of Kirmān, set out with a detachment of them and killed a man who had been a valiant warrior for the Khārijites and entered into clientage with them. When al-Muqa'ṭar killed him, the Khārijites ran to Qaṭarī and told him, saying, "Permit us to kill the Ḍabbī as vengeance for our comrade." But he replied, "That is not my decision. A man interprets and errs in his interpretation:[561] it is not my judgment that you should kill him. He is, besides, one of the best and most preeminent among you." They said, "Yes, we should kill him!" He said, "No!" Thus conflict arose among them, and they gave authority to 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr, repudiating Qaṭarī; but a band of them maintained their allegiance to Qaṭarī, perhaps a quarter or fifth of the whole. Qaṭarī fought these new opponents for nearly a month, morning and evening. [1007]

Al-Muhallab wrote as follows to al-Ḥajjāj to inform him of this: "God has cast the fierceness of the Khārijites in their own midst. Most of them have repudiated Qaṭarī and rendered allegiance to 'Abd Rabb, while a band of them have remained with Qaṭarī. They now battle one another mornings and evenings, and I have hope that this may be the cause of their ruin, God willing. Peace."

Al-Ḥajjāj responded as follows: "I have received your letter in which you mention the internal conflict among the Khārijites. When this letter of mine reaches you, take the field against them, while they are in conflict and divided, before they can reunite and become a more formidable foe to you. Peace."

VII, 17–23) stress al-Ḥajjāj's persistent harassment of al-Muhallab. In Mubarrad, al-Barā' is the first of a series of envoys sent out to the latter, while Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī lacks al-Barā' but mentions two of Mubarrad's other envoys, as well as a third not reported elsewhere. (Although frequently divergent from other versions, Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī's account is in general the fullest we have for al-Muhallab's campaigns against the Azraqites.) See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 95–97; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 179f.

561. Ta'awwala fa-akhṭa'a fī al-ta'wīl. The official was apparently carrying out judicial as well as fiscal responsibilities.

Al-Muhallab replied as follows: "I have received the amīr's letter and understood everything in it. I do not believe I should fight them now, when they are killing one another and reducing each other's numbers. If they keep at this, we will have what we want and they will perish; if they do reunite, they will be doing so only after having exhausted one another; and at that point I will immediately attack them, when they are at their weakest and most vulnerable, God willing. Peace."

Al-Ḥajjāj let him be, and al-Muhallab let them fight among themselves for a month without moving against them. Then Qaṭarī departed with his remaining followers for Ṭabaristān, while most of them rendered allegiance to 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr. Al-Muhallab attacked the latter, and they put up a good fight; but then God killed them, only a few of them surviving. Their camp and what was in it were seized, and the survivors taken captive, because they had been taking Muslims captive.[562]

Ka'b al-Ashqarī—al-Ashqar is a clan of Azd—recited these verses on the battle day of Rāmhurmuz and the days of Sābūr and the days of Jīruft:[563]

562. The word used here, saby, refers to taking captives, usually noncombatants, after a battle, to be sold into slavery, as opposed to asr, taking captives on the battlefield, who were often killed; see Fries, Heereswesen, 90. Both measures should apply only to non-Muslims; but the Khārijites considered non-Khārijites non-Muslims, which is the point here.

Mubarrad (Kāmil, 677–79, 684–96) gives a much more detailed account of the schism among the Azraqites, referring to seven separate incidents that created tensions before the final split over Qaṭarī's refusal to remove the unpopular al-Muqa'ṭar al-'Abdī (of 'Abd al-Qays, not Ḍabbah), and labeling the struggle one between mawālī and Persians (under 'Abd Rabb al-Ṣaghīr) and Arabs (under Qaṭarī). Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 55–69) makes the split a three-way one, with separate parties under Qaṭarī, 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr, and 'Abd Rabb al-Ṣaghīr, but gives no indication of the origin of the dispute; his very detailed account of the ensuing four-way struggle has al-Muhallab defeating the temporarily reallied forces of Qaṭarī and al-Ṣaghīr, the latter dying in battle and the former fleeing to al-Rayy, then taking the city of Jīruft from al-Kabīr, whose forces were scattered. Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 286–88, is hopelessly muddled; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, 329f., and Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 275, give only brief summaries; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 437–39, combines information found in Ṭabarī and in Mubarrad. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 99–103; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 180f.

563. On the poet Abū Mālik Ka'b b. Ma'dān (d. c. 95 [714]), see Sezgin, GAS, II, 377f., and Aghānī[1], X, 54–61; on al-Ashqar (Sa'd b. 'A'idh) of Azd, see Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, I, 212, II, 492. According to Mubarrad (Kāmil, 694), Ka'b was one of two envoys sent by al-Muhallab to al-Ḥajjāj to announce the victory and Ḥafṣ! Traveling has taken me far from you, [1008] and I have been sleepless, my eyes sore from wakeful nights.

Despite your gray hairs, Ka'b, you have been hooked by a girl;
gray hairs usually keep idle fancies at bay.
Do you still retain the commitment she made, or, now that she is far away, is the tie severed?
I have been hooked by a girl who lives at the top of al-Ṭaff,[564] in an upper chamber, beyond many doors and rooms, Fleshy in the shoulders, and so full in the hips that when she gets up to walk away, they almost stay behind.
I have left behind, on the banks of the two Zābīs,[565] a home of hers where nomad and settled alike find good fortune;
And I have chosen an abode with a clan that pleases me, among whom there are still select men if you choose them.[566]
When my land became disagreeable to me, I set out to seek favors
(and he who seeks good is full of desire and expectation) From Abū Sa'īd[567]—for I came seeking favors, [1009] hoping for your generosity, when I was touched by want.
Had it not been for al-Muhallab, we would never have visited their land, so long as trees and water remain on the earth;
But there is no clan I know of among the people among whom there is no visible sign of your beneficence.

---

recited this ode before the latter; the Aghānī has the same account and quotes seventeen lines from the poem. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 69) gives only one line of the poem in his account of al-Muhallab's occupation of Jīruft after the defeat and death of 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr.

564. The transition zone between the southern Euphrates valley and the desert to the west; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 539f.; Musil, Northern Neǧd, 198–200.

565. Probably a district south of al-Madā'in, named for the Zābī canal or canals, rather than the two Zāb or Zābī Rivers of northern Iraq; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 905f. Qudāmah, Kharāj (BGA, VI), 236, and other geographers refer to the former in the plural as al-Zawābī, with upper, middle, and lower subdistricts.

566. Mā zāla fīhim li-man nakhtāruhum khiyaru (in some MSS yakhtāruhum).

567. Al-Muhallab.

You have revived them with your munificent gifts just as the land revives when touched by rain.
If I should fall into indigence, I would hope to find it forestalled by favor from God through your hands.
Restore a brother whose strength has been sapped by poverty, and perhaps the strength sapped from his bones will be restored.
My relations shun me, and my expectations have betrayed me;
God bless me, what can I do on my own?
You who have bestowed a slave girl with a face radiant in beauty like the sun, fine of figure, with languor in her glance—
From you continue to come forth full moons of evening, as well as others with blazes from your munificence gleaming like the dawn—
You were brought up for glory by kings whose heir you are, proud-seeming men, yet of gentle character, [1010] Who took vengeance for their dead, by acts they recount with glory, at a time when no casualty of war was avenged.
When the enemy came upon them, the men resigned themselves, and were at a loss what to do;
Not one of them would go beyond the gate of the bridge—war had bitten the men of the garrison, and they had run to hide in their hole.[568] Fear was brought into the interiors of the houses, and fell on womanish men, men one would pay no bloodwit for.
But then the war intensified, and we were sorely tested, and faced with something for which one must tuck up one's robe;
We kept at them without letup,

568. Here begins the poet's account of the Azraqite wars. The next few verses are too allusive to tie closely to the chronology but apparently refer to the period just before al-Muhallab's reappointment to the command directly by 'Abd al-Malik; see text above, II, 855. The bridge here is probably that over the Dujayl at al-Ahwāz; see the account in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfi, Futūḥ, VI, 298–309.

and when the danger grew great, the shaykh tucked up his robe.[569] Before that day, we had belittled the threat they posed, but then the insignificant became critical.
When we were worn out, and they had occupied our territory, and the men had been called up repeatedly but not responded,
A call went forth from a man preeminent among his people,[570] a man in no way unequal to the situation.
He distributed among them what had been there since they took refuge,[571] [1011] benefits that had been stored up for them.
They dressed themselves in battle gear, and the next morning had crossed the bridge and were beyond it.
They marched with standards of glory raised high, above lions steady in the fray.
They had already left al-Ahwāz behind them, and assembled at Rāmhurmuz when they heard the news—
The death of Bishr. Then the men broke up and scattered, except for a few who remained, recalled to their sense of duty.[572]
Then there came to us one satisfied with his appointment, a man of sincere loyalty; and we did not betray him as the others did.[573]
Then we assembled at Sābūr of the Armies,[574] and a fire that threw sparks was kindled between us and them.
The bold warriors we encountered were mad dogs, as if it were jinn we were fighting, nothing recognizably human.

---

569. Fa-shammara l-shaykhu lammā a'ẓama l-khaṭaru. If this is not simply proverbial, it is unclear to whom it refers.

570. Nādā mru'un lā khilāfa fī 'ashīratihi/ 'anhu. This is al-Muhallab's reappointment by 'Abd al-Malik.

571. Afshā hunālika mimmā kāna mudh 'aṣarū/ fīhim (ṣanā'i'a mimmā kāna yuddakharū).

572. See text above, II, 857–59.

573. Probably a reference to al-Ḥajjāj and the rebellion of Ibn al-Jārūd; see text above, II, 873f.

574. Sābūr al-junūd, an epithet also given above, I, 2810, in some MSS, but undocumented by geographical writers.

In furious fighting we exchanged poisonous potions with them, from nightfall until the break of dawn.
[1012] The dead there had no blood price and no vengeance;
our blood and theirs flowed unrequited.
Finally they began to withdraw before us from the place, driven back by our lions boldly advancing.
That morning on the hill, among the spears, all their cunning and all the tricks they could devise availed them nothing—
Our detachments ran on at will around al-Muhallab, until the moon shone forth.
There the foe turned away, cheerless after their joy, and put fences and rivers between them and us.
They mustered their forces below the mountains, when they halted at Kāzarūn, but they neither overcame nor conquered.
They found us earnest fighters, in an encounter where they thought they would win, but did not,
At Dasht Bārīn, on the day of the pass,[575] when those lions who roared as they shed human blood were overtaken—[1013] They encountered detachments that left them no gap to exploit, disdainful of those who had the misfortune to fight them, Advancing when challenged by the enemy cavalry, and attacking again as they exposed their rear.
And at Jubayrayn,[576] when they advance in lines, they turned back humiliated, having been defeated and routed.
By God, there was not a day they engaged us in combat that they were not overcome by yet another of our victories,

---

575. Yawm al-shi'b. Dasht Bārīn was a rustāq of the district of Sābūr, whose capital was al-Nawbandajān; see Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 45; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 576. The "day of the pass" probably refers to the battle described by Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 34) at Shi'b Bawwān, just east of al-Nawbandajān; see Ibn Khurradādhbih, Masālik, 43, and note 554 above.

576. Considerable variation in pointing and even ductus in various manuscripts; the reading adopted is from Iṣṭakhrī, Masālik (BGA, I), 105, 136, where this place is mentioned immediately after Dasht Bārīn. See also Ibn Ḥawqal, Masālik (BGA, II), 204, reading Jīnzīr.

Driven back from every position by our lances, beset morning and night by our mad dogs.
They prudently retreated, having had enough of our spears, toward al-Ḥarūb;[577] but their prudence could not save them.
A fair countenance, a generous hand, a man thoughtful, generous, lacking neither strength nor experience, Tested in battle, a man who achieves what he sets out to do, not to be taken lightly, with opinions not to be ignored—
For three years he kept us at it, [1014] engaged alternately in battle and planning, Saying, "Tomorrow will come to him who waits for it,[578] and there are lessons to be learned from the days and the nights;
Leave off running after them, and watch and wait;
a good warrior knows how to be patient,[579]
Until the situation changes, bringing hope of success, and it becomes clear what he should and should not do."
Then he drove them back to Kirmān, and they broke up, and their fate was sealed.
We marched against them, moving like a wave, and they came to meet us;
we already had plenty of reasons to hate each other.
Our abhorrence was only the greater when we called to mind our dead, from whose memory our eyes would never dry.
When we remember al-Jazūr[580] and the dead there who lay two years unburied,
We feel the pain in our breasts, and spare them nothing, [1015] just as they spare us nothing if they can.
They allow us no slips in battle, nor do we ever let their slips go by.

---

577. Unidentified, unless this is a corruption of al-Jazūr, mentioned below.

578. Inna ghadan mubdin li-nāẓirihī; see Maydānī, Amthāl, I, 63f., for the proverb inna ghadan li-nāẓirihi qarīb.

579. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 57, cites this line in his account of the initial split between Qaṭarī and the two 'Abd Rabbs.

580. Site of the defeat by Qaṭarī of 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 66, and text above, II, 821ff.

They will accept no excuse from us but death, just as no excuse they may offer is acceptable to us.
Two lines of men across the plain, like two mountains, with flashes of lightning between them that rivet the eye
On a zeal that none will give up, each side fighting to the recitation of Qur'ānic chapters.
As they advance, they walk in their helmets and cuirasses like pack animals led in file by small bands of men.
Our chief has a crowd of us around him,
a clan from Azd, steadfast in adversity,
In a battle the very sight of which undoes valiant heroes, and in which men are cut down at the first engagement.
But we still had men there smiting them with Mashrafī swords, as the fire of battle blazed; [1016] No blade one relied on could survive that vortex of death, except the keenest and most deadly.
We trample them with our swift armored steeds, with fragments of hardwood spears scattered among us, Covering dead men and the still-dying wounded, who look as if they have been sprinkled with saffron.
Dead men for dead men, retaliation taken in kind, easing the breasts of men who have long awaited its fulfillment, Lie there next to slaughtered steeds, their bodies, like the horses, prey for scavengers,
In a battle where the dead on the field look like palm trunks uprooted[581] by the driving wind.
So it was in previous battles, before this day,
in which the Azd won praise and victory,
In every battle in which the Azd faced a hideous foe, the terror of whom would turn hair white in an hour.
The Azd, my people, are the best people ever known,
when their chieftains stride forth on the day of battle, [1017] Citadels of might, where refuge can be sought on the day war streaming with blood tucks up its robe—
A clan who seek their glory with their swords;
hateful war brings out noble actions quickly.

581. A'jāzu nakhlin . . . yanqa'iru, an echo of Qur'ān 54:20.

Had al-Muhallab not been over the army that came to the rivers of Kirmān, under God, they would never have come back.
We held fast to the cord of God, while they denied the clear pronouncements of revelation;[582] nor did we disbelieve as they disbelieved.
They strayed from the straight path and from Islam, and followed a religion opposed to that brought by the Warners.

Verses by al-Ṭufayl b. ʿĀmir b. Wāthilah, describing the death of ʿAbd Rabb al-Kabīr and his comrades and Qaṭarī's wanderings, how they pursued him, and how he eluded them:

At our hands, ʿAbd Rabb and his troops have felt the touch of punishment,[583] and their captives have become part of the booty.
He marched against them with his army, and in Kirmān he swept them off a level plain of land.
The Qaṭarī of unbelief was then nothing but an ostrich[584] tracked across the desert, running through the night without sleep.
When he ran from us in flight, he headed down a way other than the true well-marked path;
Flight will not save him—not even were he to be carried by an Ark over the still expanse of the sea.

According to Abū Jaʿfar: In this year, Qaṭarī, ʿAbīdah b. Hilāl,[585] [1018] ʿAbd Rabb al-Kabīr, and the Azraquites with them were destroyed.

---

582. Al-muḥkamāt, as opposed to the obscure or ambiguous passages, al-mutashābihāt, both terms from Qurʾān 3:7; for various interpretations, see Ṭabarī, Jāmiʿ al-bayān ʿan taʾwīl āy al-Qurʾān (Cairo, 1955–60), VI, 169–83.

583. ʿIqāb. If the next line in the text followed this one in the original poem, perhaps a better reading would be ʿuqāb, "eagle," referring to al-Muhallab.

584. Naʿāmah. Qaṭarī's kunyah in war was Abū Naʿāmah; see Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, I, 34f., III, 264. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s. v. qṭr, cites a verse mentioning naʿāʾim qaṭariyyah, "ostriches from Qaṭar."

585. ʿAbīdah b. Hilāl al-Yashkurī, of the Banū Yashkur of Bakr b. Wāʾil, known for his oratory and poetry. See text above, II, 515; Mubarrad, Kāmil, 652, 682ff.; Ziriklī, Aʿlām, IV, 357f.

Destruction of the Azraqites

The circumstances of this were as follows: When those Azraqites of whom we have given an account split up because of the internal dissension that arose among them in Kirmān, and some followed 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr while others followed Qaṭarī, the latter, finding his strength much reduced, set out for Ṭabaristān.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Yazīd: When word of this reached al-Ḥajjāj, he sent Sufyān b. al-Abrad with a large army of Syrians in pursuit of Qaṭarī. Advancing first to al-Rayy, Sufyān set out after him. Meanwhile, al-Ḥajjāj wrote to Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, who was in command of an army of Kūfans in Ṭabaristān, ordering him to heed and obey Sufyān. Isḥāq advanced to join Sufyān and accompanied him in pursuit of Qaṭarī until they caught up with him in one of the defiles of Ṭabaristān and engaged him in battle. Qaṭarī's forces were scattered, and he fell off his mount down into the defile and rolled down until he lay prostrate at the bottom.

According to Mu'āwiyah b. Miḥṣan al-Kindī: I saw him fall but did not know who he was. Then I saw fifteen Arab women, all of them as comely and pleasing to the eye as your Lord willed, except for one old woman among them. I charged at them and drove them off toward Sufyān b. al-Abrad; but when I had brought them up close to him, the old woman lunged at me with her [1019] sword and struck my neck with it, cutting through my underhelmet and nicking a piece from my neck. I brandished my sword and struck at her face; the blow broke through her skull and she fell dead. Then I turned to the young women and pushed them back to Sufyān. He laughed about the old woman and said, "What did you kill her for, may God shame her?" I replied, "Did you not see how she struck me, may God cause you to prosper? By God, she almost killed me!" He said, "I did see, and, by God, I do not blame you for what you did, may God curse her."

Then one of the local inhabitants went to Qaṭarī where he had tumbled down the defile. Qaṭarī, who was very thirsty, said, "Bring me some water to drink." The man replied, "Give me something for bringing you drink." Qaṭarī said, "Woe to you! By God, I have nothing with me but my weapon, as you see; I will give it to you if you bring me water." The man replied, "No, give it to me now!" Qaṭarī said, "No, bring me the water first." The man went around until he reached a point above Qaṭarī, and he sent a large stone rolling down on him from above, which struck him in the hip and prostrated him. This person then cried out to the men, and they came running to him—he did not know at the time that this man was Qaṭarī, although he assumed he must be one of their nobles, from his good appearance and the quality of his weapon. A group of Kūfans ran and got to him first and killed him; in this group were Sawrah b. Abjar al-Tamīmī; Ja'far b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf; al-Ṣabāḥ b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath; Bādām, a client of the Banū al-Ash'ath; and 'Umar b. Abī al-Ṣalt b. Kanārā, a client of the Banū Naṣr b. Mu'āwiyah,[586] who was one [1020] of the dihqāns. All of these claimed to be his killer. Then Abū al-Jahm b. Kinānah al-Kalbī came up to them, and each claimed that it was he who killed Qaṭarī. Abū al-Jahm then said, "Give it[587] up to me until you can settle this among yourselves." They gave it up to Abū al-Jahm, and he took it to Isḥāq b. Muḥammad, who was in command of the Kūfans. Ja'far did not join Isḥāq, because of something that had arisen between them, so that Ja'far was not speaking to Isḥāq, and was with Sufyān b. al-Abrad rather than with him—Ja'far was in command of the quarter of the Medinese in al-Rayy, but when Sufyān met the forces from al-Rayy, he had selected their best horsemen to accompany him and marched them out with him. When, then, the men came to him[588] with Qaṭarī's head, arguing over it, and he saw the head in the possession of Abū al-Jahm b. Kinānah al-Kalbī, he said to him, "You go with it and leave these quarrelers here." Abū al-Jahm set out with Qaṭarī's head and brought it to al-Ḥajjāj; then he took it on to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān. He was granted a bonus of two thousand dirhams and given a fuṭm—which means to assign to the younger soldiers a place in the military roll.[589] Ja'far came to Sufyān and said to him, "May God cause you to prosper, Qaṭarī had cut down my father, and this was my only concern in the matter. Bring me together with those who claim 586. The vocalization Kanārā is uncertain. The Banū Naṣr b. Mu'āwiyah were a clan of the Qays 'Aylān; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 446.

587. Qaṭarī's head.

588. Sufyān, according to the paraphrase in Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 442.

589. Fa-ulḥiqa fī alfayn wa-u'ṭiya fuṭman ya'nī annahu yufraḍa lil-ṣighār fī al-dīwān. See Ṭabarī, glossarium, s. v. fuṭm, and note 168 above.

that they killed him, and ask them whether I was not ahead of them and got to him before them and struck him a blow that felled him, after which they came up to me and began to strike him with their swords. If they confirm this account of mine, they will be telling the truth; if they deny it, I swear by God that I am the one who did it; and if I did not, then let them swear by God that it is they who killed him and that they know nothing of what I say and that I have no claim to him." Sufyān replied, "You come to me now, after we have sent off the head!" When he had gone away, he said to his comrades, "By God, you[590] have the best claim among the men to him."

Then Sufyān b. al-Abrad set off for the camp of 'Abīdah b. Hilāl, [1021] who had fortified himself in a castle in Qūmis,[591] besieged him, and fought him for some days. Then Sufyān b. al-Abrad marched out with us against them, surrounded them, and ordered his herald to proclaim to them, "Any man who kills his master and then comes out to us will be granted safe-conduct." To this 'Abīdah b. Hilāl said:[592]

By my life! The deaf one[593] has given the doubter a speech that fills our breasts with outrage!
By my life! If I were to give Sufyān my allegiance, and forsake my religion, I would indeed be a fool!
I raise my complaint to God for the state in which you see our horses, emaciated and stumbling, their marrow almost exhausted, Beset by slingers from all sides,
in Qūmis, until the most spirited are beaten down.
If this siege is now their end, yet many a dead man has lain at their feet, soaked in his own blood.

---

590. Singular, probably referring to Ja'far; the speaker is probably Sufyān.

591. A province southeast of Ṭabaristān and west of Khurāsān; see *EI*², s. v. Ḳūmis; Le Strange, Lands, 264–68. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 62, V, 65, quotes a verse (also in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 83) identifying the castle as Sadhawwar.

592. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 82–83, gives a partly overlapping selection of verses from the same poem, with many variants. For other citations, see 'Abbās, Shi'r al-Khawārij, 52f., 166.

593. Al-Aṣamm, Sufyān's sobriquet, probably meaning "undeterrable"; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 515; Lane, Lexicon, s. v. aṣamm.

These were formerly steeds that, if led out on sore hooves, would neigh at the doors of the tents.[594]

Sufyān maintained his siege of them until they were reduced to misery and ate their riding animals; then they came out and fought him, and he killed them and sent their heads to al-Ḥajjāj. He then proceeded on to Dunbāwand[595] and Ṭabaristān, and remained there until al-Ḥajjāj dismissed him, before the battle of al-Jamājim.[596]

According to Abū Ja'far: In this year, Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd killed Bukayr b. Wishāḥ al-Sa'dī. [1022]

Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh Kills Bukayr b. Wishāḥ in Khurāsān

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad[597]—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad: Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh, 'Abd al-Malik's governor over Khurāsān, put Bukayr in charge of the campaign in Transoxania. He had earlier put him in charge of Tukhāristān, and Bukayr had made his preparations for setting out for it and spent a great deal of money; but then Baḥīr b. Warqā' al-Ṣuraymī slandered him to Umayyah, as I have already recounted, and Umayyah ordered him to remain where he was.[598] Now, when he put him in charge of the campaign in Transoxania, he again made his preparations,

---

594. Wa-qad kunna mimmā in yuqadna 'alā l-wajā/ lahunna bi-abwābi l-qibābi ṣahīlū.

595. Modern Damāwand, the highest peak in the Elburz, south and west of Ṭabaristān; see EI², s. v. Damāwand.

596. On the final defeats of Qaṭarī and 'Abīdah, see Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 275 (Qaṭarī only, killed by Sawrah and Bādhān, year 78 [697–698]); Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, III, 264 (Qaṭarī killed by Sawrah); Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 289 (Sufyān takes Qaṭarī's head to al-Ḥajjāj). Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 329f., asserts that Qaṭarī was received hospitably by the ispahbadh of Ṭabaristān until he demanded that the latter convert to Islam; the ispahbadh then fetched the governor of al-Rayy, Sufyān b. al-Abrad, and defeated and killed Qaṭarī, in the year 79 (698–699). According to Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 79–84, Qaṭarī was killed by Bādhām after being pinned by his fallen horse; Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī adds an account of a parley at the siege in Qūmis, in which 'Abīdah offered Sufyān's men the choice of Qur'ānic recitation or his own poetry but then reproached them for requesting the latter. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 105f.; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 182.

597. Al-Madā'inī.

598. See text above, II, 859–62.

spending a great deal of money on horses and weapons, and going into debt with the Soghdians and their merchants. But Baḥīr said to Umayyah, "Once the river is between him and you and he encounters the kings there, he will cast off allegiance to the caliph and summon to his own authority." Umayyah then sent to Bukayr, saying, "Stay where you are; perhaps I will go on campaign myself, and you will accompany me." Bukayr was angry and said, "He seems to be doing me a deliberate injury." 'Attāb al-Liqwah al-Ghudānī[599] had gone into debt in order to accompany [1023] Bukayr, and when he did not go, his creditors took him and had him put in prison; Bukayr paid off his debts and he was released. Then Umayyah made up his mind to go on campaign.

He ordered preparations made for a campaign against Bukhārā, to be followed by a march against Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim in al-Tirmidh.[600] The men made preparations and readied themselves. Umayyah left his son Ziyād as his deputy over Khurāsān, and Bukayr marched out with him. He camped at Kushmāhan,[601] and remained there a few days; then he ordered the army to move on. Then Baḥīr said to him, "I am afraid the men may lag behind; tell Bukayr to ride in the rear guard and keep the men together."

Umayyah gave Bukayr this order, and he took charge of the rear guard until they reached the river. Then Umayyah said, "Cross, Bukayr!" But 'Attāb al-Liqwah al-Ghudānī said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, you cross, then let the troops cross after you." Umayyah crossed, and then the troops crossed. Then Umayyah said to Bukayr, "I am afraid my son will not be able to carry out his duties properly; he is, after all, little more than a boy. Return to Marw and see to its affairs for me; I put you in charge of it. Help my son in this way and see to his affairs." Bukayr selected horsemen from the cavalry of Khurāsañ, men he knew and trusted, and

599. In Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, IV, 444), 'Uqāb ("eagle") Dhū al-Liqwah ("the one of the swift eagle"); perhaps a better reading would be "al-Luqwah," "palsy of the mouth." Ghudānah b. Yarbū' was a clan of Tamīm; see Caskel, Ǧamharat annasab, I, 59, 71, II, 275.

600. Mūsā's band had taken al-Tirmidh, after various adventures in Transoxania, and held it since before the death of Mūsā's father; see text below, II, 1145–49. On al-Tirmidh, on the Oxus some two hundred miles southeast of Bukhārā, see Le Strange, Lands, 440f.

601. The first stage northeast of Marw, at the edge of the cultivation on the Bukhārā road; see Le Strange, Lands, 400.

crossed back over. Umayyah went on to Bukhārā, with Abū Khālid Thābit, a client of Khuzā'ah, over his vanguard. As Bukayr crossed back, after Umayyah had left, 'Attāb al-Liqwah said to him, "We killed ourselves and our kin gaining control of Khurāsān. Then we asked for a governor from Quraysh who would bring us together, and we were sent a governor who plays with us and transfers us from one prison to another." Bukayr asked, "What are you suggesting?" He replied, "Burn these boats, [1024] go back to Marw, throw off your allegiance to Umayyah, and stay in Marw for a while, exploiting its revenues."

'Attāb's opinion was seconded by al-Aḥnaf b. 'Abdallāh al-'Anbarī;[602] but Bukayr said, "I fear lest these horsemen who are with me may perish." Al-Aḥnaf said, "Are you afraid that you will lack men? I will bring you as many as you like from the people of Marw if these who are with you perish." Bukayr said, "I fear the Muslims may perish." He said, "All you have to do is have a herald proclaim that anyone who converts to Islam will be exempted from the land tax, and fifty thousand will come praying to you, men who will heed and obey better than these."[603] Bukayr said, "I fear Umayyah and those with him will perish." He said, "Why should they perish, when they have the equipment, numbers, courage, weapons, and everything they need to defend themselves as far as China?"

Bukayr burned the boats, returned to Marw, seized and imprisoned Umayyah's son, and summoned the people to renounce their allegiance to Umayyah, which they did. When Umayyah heard of this, he made peace with the Bukhārans for a small payment and headed back. He ordered boats constructed, and they were made for him and assembled. Then he said to the notables of Tamīm who were with him, "Does not Bukayr amaze you? When I came to Khurāsān, I was warned about him, and received all sorts of complaints and accusations about him and about various ill-gotten gains; but I turned a deaf ear to all of that and launched no investigation of him or of a single one of his 602. The Banū al-'Anbar b. 'Amr were a clan of the Tamīm; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 189.

603. Umayyah's imposition on Muslim landowners of the kharāj, which was collected by non-Muslim dihqāns, is cited below, II, 1029, as a source of dissatisfaction with Umayyah exploited by Bukayr.

officials. Then I offered him command of my security force, but he refused it, and I let it pass. Then I gave him a governorship, but I was warned against him and ordered him to stay where he was; I only did so out of consideration for him. Then I sent him back to Marw and give him authority there. But he showed no gratitude for any of this and now repays me in the way you see!" But some of the men replied, "O amīr, this was not his idea; the suggestion [1025] to burn the boats came to him from 'Attāb al-Liqwah." Umayyah said, "And what is 'Attāb? Is 'Attāb anything but a hen sitting on her eggs?" When 'Attāb heard about this comment, he recited the following verses:

When you encounter these brooders, you will find them armored, thick-necked, mounted on noble steeds.
You left off what you were about, out of cowardice and weakness,
and foolishly came to us, O basest of the Arabs;
When you saw how forbidding were the mountains of Soghdia, you turned tail on Mūsā and Nūḥ,[604]
And came running to us, like a bold hyena, without a word;[605] but you flew from the palms of al-Baḥrayn like a cowardly bustard.[606]
Make all the threats you like! You will find me under the fluttering standards before a dark and rumbling cloud of men,
Advancing slowly on a fine horse with sleek cheekbones, which alternately ambles and runs as it goes to meet the detachment.

When the boats were ready, Umayyah crossed over and headed for Marw, leaving Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh unmolested. Umayyah said, "O God, I was good to Bukayr, but he was ungrateful for my good treatment and did what he did. O God, take care of him for me!"
[1026] Shammās b. Dithār,[607] who had returned from Sijistān after the

---

604. Sons of 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim; on Nūḥ, who accompanied his brother Mūsā in Transoxania, see text below, II, 1155–60.

605. Wa-ji'ta dhīkhan mughidhdhan mā tukallimunā.

606. A reference to Umayyah's defeat in battle with Abū Fudayk; see text above, II, 829, 860f.

607. Al-'Uṭāridī, one of the leaders of the revolt of Tamīm against Ibn Khāzim, death of Ibn Khāzim and gone on campaign with Umayyah, said, "O amīr, I will take care of him for you, God willing!" Umayyah sent him ahead with eight hundred men; he advanced as far as Bāsān,[608] which belongs to the Banū Naṣr,[609] and halted there. Bukayr marched out against him, having with him Mudrik b. Unayf, whose father was with Shammās. Bukayr sent a message to Shammās, saying, "Could Tamīm find no one to fight me but you?" and blaming him. Shammās sent back to him, saying, "You are more blameworthy and have behaved more badly than I. You broke faith with Umayyah and showed him no gratitude for his favor to you when he came and honored you, not laying a finger on you or any of your agents."

Bukayr launched a surprise night attack against Shammās and scattered his forces; but he told his men, "Do not kill any of them, but take their weapons." Accordingly, when they took a man, they stripped him of his equipment and left him. The troops were scattered, Shammās himself going to a village of Ṭayyi' named Būyanah.[610] Umayyah, meanwhile, advanced as far as Kushmāhan, and Shammās b. Dithār returned to him there. Then Umayyah sent out Thābit b. Quṭbah, a client of Khuzā'ah. Bukayr offered battle, took Thābit captive, and scattered his forces; but then Bukayr let Thābit go because of a favor he owed him.

Thābit returned to Umayyah, and Umayyah advanced with his forces. Bukayr engaged him in combat. Bukayr's security force was under the command of Abū Rustam al-Khalīl b. Aws al-'Abshamī; he fought valiantly that day, but Umayyah's men called out to him, "O commander of the security force of 'Ārimah!" 'Ārimah was Bukayr's concubine. Abū Rustam drew back, but Bukayr said to him, "Damn it, pay no mind to what and a personal enemy of Bukayr; see text above, II, 495f., 593–96. On 'Uṭārid b. Ḥājib of Tamīm, see Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, I, 60, II, 580.

---

608. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 468, 766f., mentions Bāshān or Fāshān as a village of Marw. It was northwest of the city; see Le Strange, Lands, 399.

609. Probably the Banū Naṣr b. Mu'āwiyah, of Qays 'Aylān, mentioned above, II, 1019f. On the mass migration that brought fifty thousand Kūfan and Baṣran fighters with their families to the Marw oasis in 51 (671), see text above, II, 81, 155f., and Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 410. Ş. al-'Alī, "Istīṭān al-'arab fī Khurāsān," Majallat Kulliyyat al-ādāb—Baghdād, 1958, 37f., 67f., suggests that villages were residences for "their" Arab clans rather than sources of revenue.

610. Two farsakhs from Marw, according to Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 766f.

these people call out! This 'Ārimah has a stallion to protect her! Advance your standard!" They fought until Bukayr was forced back. He withdrew inside the wall and quartered in the old market, while Umayyah quartered in Bāsān. Then followed a series of encounters in the Field of Yazīd.[611] One day Bukayr's forces were driven back, but Bukayr protected them. Another day, there was another encounter in the Field, in which one of the men of the [1027] Banū Tamīm was hit in the foot and began to hobble away, while Huraym[612] gave him protection. The man said, "O God, help us and strengthen us with angels!" Huraym said to him, "Fight for yourself, man! The angels have better things to do!" The man restrained himself for a time, but then again called out, "O God, strengthen us with angels!" Huraym said, "Either you spare me this or I leave you to the angels!" But he continued to protect him until he brought him back to the men.

One of the men of the Banū Tamīm called out, "Umayyah! Scandal of Quraysh!" Umayyah swore an oath that if he got the better of this man, he would slit his throat. He did get the better of him, and did slit his throat, between two of the battlements of the city. Another day, in yet another encounter, Bukayr b. Wishāḥ struck Thābit b. Quṭbah on the head, calling out his ancestry and saying, "I am Ibn Wishāḥ!" Thābit's brother Ḥurayyith b. Quṭbah then attacked Bukayr, and Bukayr was thrown back and his forces driven off. Ḥurayyith pursued Bukayr until he reached the bridge, and called to him, "Where are you going, Bukayr?" Bukayr turned back to attack him, and Ḥurayyith gave him a sword blow on the head that cut through the underhelmet and penetrated to his head, and he fell. His comrades took him and brought him into the city.

That is the way they fought them. But otherwise, Bukayr's men would go around garbed in brightly dyed garments, with red and yellow mantles and wrappers,[613] and sit talking in the outskirts 611. Maydān Yazīd, mentioned below (II, 1477) as a place of assembly. Perhaps it was named (subsequently) for Yazīd b. al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, governor of Khurāsān 82–85 (701–704); see text below, II, 1083, 1138ff.

612. Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah al-Mujāshi'ī, later noted as commander of the cavalry of Tamīm; see text below, II, 1202, and Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 287.

613. Mutafaḍḍilīn fī thiyāb muṣabbaghah wa-malāḥif wa-uzur ṣufr wa-ḥumr. See Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements chez les Arabes, 24–46, of the city, while a herald proclaimed, "He who shoots an arrow will be shot at by us with the head of one of his children or his kin." No one took any shots at them.

But Bukayr was worried, and feared that if the siege was prolonged, the men would desert him; so he asked for a truce. Umayyah's forces also favored a truce, because of their families inside the city, and asked Umayyah to make a truce with Bukayr. Umayyah was a peace-loving man, and made the truce, on the following terms: Umayyah was to pay Bukayr 400,000 dirhams, as well as gifts to his comrades, to appoint Bukayr to any of the districts of Khurāsān he wished, and not to listen to what Baḥīr [1028] said about him; if Umayyah found any reason to be suspicious of him, he would have forty days safe-conduct to get out of Marw. Umayyah got safe-conduct for Bukayr from 'Abd al-Malik and wrote the document up for him at the Sanjān Gate.[614] Then Umayyah entered the city.

Some people say that Bukayr did not go out on campaign with Umayyah, but rather that when Umayyah went out on campaign, he left Bukayr as his deputy over Marw. Then Bukayr rebelled, and Umayyah returned and fought him, then made a truce with him and entered Marw. Umayyah kept faith with Bukayr and treated him with the same honor and complaisance as formerly. He also sent for 'Attāb al-Liqwah and said to him, "You were the mastermind of the plot." 'Attāb said, "Yes, may God cause the amīr to prosper." Umayyah asked, "Why?" 'Attāb replied, "I had little money and many debts, so I turned against my creditors." Umayyah said, "Woe to you! So you stirred up strife among the Muslims, and burned the boats, with the Muslims in the middle of enemy territory, with no fear of God?" 'Attāb said, "That is the way it was, and I ask God for forgiveness." Umayyah asked, "How large are your debts?" 'Attāb answered, "Twenty thousand." Umayyah said, "If you will refrain from stirring up trouble among the Muslims, I will pay off your debts." 'Attāb said, "I will, may God make me your ransom!" Umayyah laughed and said, "I have little faith in what you say, but I will nevertheless pay off 401–3. Bright colors apparently indicated non-bellicose intentions, as with the red sash of Muṭarrif's summoner, mentioned above, II, 998.

614. On the southeast side of the city; see Le Strange, Lands, 399.

your debts." He paid the twenty thousand. Umayyah was a gentle, easygoing, and generous man; no one among the governors of Khurāsān gave out such generous gifts there as he.[615]

He was nevertheless at the same time oppressive to them. He was extremely pompous and used to say, "Khurāsān and Sijistān hardly suffice me for my kitchen!"[616] Umayyah dismissed Baḥīr from the command of his security force and gave it to 'Aṭā' b. Abī [1029] al-Sā'ib. He wrote to 'Abd al-Malik explaining the affair with Bukayr and his pardoning him, and 'Abd al-Malik responded by selecting an expeditionary force to send to Umayyah in Khurāsān; the men made their arrangements for who would pay and who would go, and Shaqīq b. al-Sulayk al-Asadī transferred his stipend to a man of Jarm.[617] Umayyah levied the land tax on the people[618] and pressed them hard. One day Bukayr was sitting in the mosque with some people from the Banū Tamīm, and they spoke of Umayyah's harshness to the people, blaming him and saying, "He has made the dihqāns masters over us in collecting taxes." Also present in the mosque were Baḥīr, Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn,[619] and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Jāriyah b. Qudāmah.[620] Baḥīr brought 615. Bukayr's rebellion is mentioned very briefly in Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 416f., Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 324, and Ibn Ḥabīb, Asmā' al-mughtālīn min al-ashrāf fī al-jāhiliyyah wa-al-Islām (in A. S. Hārūn, ed., Nawādir al-makhṭūṭāt [Cairo, 1951–54], II), 176f. According to the slightly fuller account in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VI, 290f., the siege of Marw lasted four months, and Umayyah's payoff to Bukayr was 200,000 dirhams in addition to whatever wealth Bukayr had already laid his hands on. See also Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 443–46; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 111.

616. According to Aghānī', XIII, 54, Umayyah wrote back to 'Abd al-Malik that "the revenue of Khurāsān is insufficient to cover the expenses of my kitchen" but was dismissed after 'Abd al-Malik read a confidential note (of undisclosed contents) slipped by the poet Thābit Quṭnah into the same delivery.

617. On the process of ju'ālah, or paying for substitutes on expeditions, see Lane, Lexicon, s. v. ju'ālah; Ṣ. al-'Alī, al-Tanẓīmāt al-ijtimā'iyyah wa-al-iqtiṣādiyyah fī al-Baṣrah fī al-qarn al-awwal al-hijrī (Baghdad, 1953), 139–40. The point of the specific reference to the Asadī and the Jarmī is unclear.

618. Akhadha Umayyah al-nās bi-al-kharāj. The "people" here and in the following sentence are the Arab emigrés, who were acquiring land and paying kharāj on it; since in Marw collection was in the hands of the dihqāns, non-Arabs and non-Muslims were now collecting taxes from Arab Muslims. See Shaban, Islamic History, I, 173f.

619. Last mentioned as an intermediary between Baḥīr and Bukayr, text above, II, 860.

620. Son of Jāriyah b. Qudāmah al-Tamīmī, a prominent supporter of 'Alī against Mu'āwiyah; see Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, i, 38f.

word of this incident to Umayyah, but Umayyah refused to believe him. Baḥīr appealed to the witness of these men, as well as to the witness of Muzāḥim b. Abī al-Mujashshir al-Sulamī.[621] Umayyah summoned Muzāḥim and asked him, but he said, "He was only joking." Umayyah then left Bukayr alone. But Baḥīr came to him and said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, Bukayr—I swear to God—has summoned me to cast off my allegiance to you; he said, 'Were it not for your position, I would kill this Qurayshite and enjoy the fruits of Khurāsān.'" But Umayyah said, "I cannot believe this, after he has done what he has done and I have granted him safe-conduct and given him gifts."

Then Baḥīr brought him Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Jāriyah, and they bore witness that Bukayr said to them, "If you would obey me, I would kill that effeminate Qurayshite," and thus summoned them to assassinate Umayyah. Umayyah said, "You know best what you saw. I would not suspect this of him; but to let him be, after the witness you have borne, would show weakness." Then he told his chamberlain,[622] 'Ubaydah, and the captain of his guard,[623] 'Aṭā' b. Abī al-Sā'ib, "When Bukayr comes in with his brother's sons Badal and Shamardal, and I stand up, seize them." When Umayyah sat in public audience, Bukayr and his brother's sons came; when they sat down, Umayyah stood up from his dais and withdrew. The people left, and as Bukayr was [1030] leaving, they arrested him and his brother's sons. Umayyah summoned Bukayr and said, "You are the one who said thus-and-so?" Bukayr replied, "Be not rash, may God cause you to prosper, and do not listen to the words of that son of a bitch."[624] But Umayyah threw him in prison, and took his concubine al-'Ārimah and imprisoned her; he also imprisoned al-Aḥnaf b. 'Abdallāh al-'Anbarī, saying, "You are one of those who counseled Bukayr to rebel."

The next day, Umayyah brought out Bukayr; and Baḥīr, Ḍirār, 621. Probably of the Banū Sulaym b. Manṣūr, a tribe of Qays; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 516.

---

622. Ḥājib, perhaps "chief bodyguard;" see EI², s. v. ḥādjib.

623. Ṣāḥib ḥarasihi. This man has been identified above as the head of the shurṭah, which suggests that, at least in Khurāsān, the two terms may refer to the same body of men.

624. Ibn al-maḥlūqah. For various interpretations of the meaning of this mild imprecation, see Lane, Lexicon, s. v. ḥalaqa.

and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Jāriyah bore witness against him that he had summoned them to rebel against Umayyah and assassinate him. Bukayr said, "May God cause you to prosper, be not hasty; for these are my enemies." Then Umayyah asked Ziyād b. 'Uqbah, the chief of the Ahl al-'Āliyah,[625] Ibn Wālān al-'Adawī, at that time one of the chiefs of the Banū Tamīm,[626] and Ya'qūb b. Khālid al-Dhuhlī,[627] "Will you kill him?"—but they declined. Then he asked Baḥīr, "Will you kill him?" and he answered, "Yes." Umayyah handed Bukayr over to Baḥīr; but then Ya'qūb b. al-Qa'qā' al-A'lam al-Azdī,[628] who was a friend of Bukayr's, got up from his place and embraced Umayyah, saying, "I appeal to you to think of God, O amīr, in Bukayr's case—after you have been so generous to him." Umayyah said, "Ya'qūb, no one will kill him but his own people, who have borne witness against him."[629] Then 'Aṭā' b. Abī al-Sā'ib al-Laythī, who was the captain of Umayyah's guard, said, "Leave the amīr alone!" Ya'qūb said, "No!" and 'Aṭā' struck him with the hilt of his sword and blood-ied his nose, and then withdrew. Then Ya'qūb said to Baḥīr, "O Baḥīr, the men pledged Bukayr their word when they made peace with him, and you were one of them. Do not break your pledge!" Baḥīr replied, "O Ya'qūb, I gave him no pledge!" Then Baḥīr took Bukayr's extended[630] sword, which he had taken from Uswār al-Turjumān, Ibn Khāzim's interpreter. Bukayr said, "O Baḥīr, you will break up the Banū Sa'd if you kill me; let this Qurayshite [1031] himself do with me as he will." But Baḥīr said, "No, by God, O son of an Iṣfahānī mother! The Banū Sa'd will not be at peace so

625. Tribes from the upper Ḥijāz, mostly Qays 'Aylān, constituting one of the "fifths" of the Baṣran army, operative also in Khurāsān; see Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 246; al-'Alī, "Istīṭān al-'arab fī Khurāsān," 4off.

626. 'Abdallāh b. Wālān al-'Adawī is mentioned below (II, 1188) as a confidant of Qutaybah b. Muslim and identified as one of the Banū Milkān. The latter were a branch of the Thawr b. 'Abd Manāt, who were joined with the related clans of Taym, 'Adī, 'Ukl, and Ḍabbah in a confederation called al-Ribāb, itself related to and allied with Tamīm. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 59, 85, II, 486.

627. Probably of the Banū Dhuhl b. Taym b. 'Abd Manāt of al-Ribāb; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 85.

628. Called Ibn al-A'lam and qāḍī Khurāsān below, II, 1485. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, ii, 103.

629. That is, the Tamīm and their allies of al-Ribāb, or specifically the Banū Sa'd b. Zayd Manāt b. Tamīm, to which both Baḥīr and Bukayr belonged.

630. Mawṣūl, fitted with an extension called a ṣilah; see Ṭabarī, glossarium, s. v. waṣala.

long as we are both alive!" Bukayr said, "Get on with it, then, you son of a bitch!" Baḥīr killed Bukayr. It was a Friday. Umayyah killed Bukayr's brother's two sons and gave Bukayr's concubine, al-'Ārimah, to Baḥīr. Umayyah also heard accusations against al-Aḥnaf b. 'Abdallāh al-'Anbarī; he summoned him from prison and said, "You too are one of those who gave Bukayr this counsel," and reviled him, then said, "I hereby hand you over to these men."

Then Umayyah sent out a man from Khuzā'ah against Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, but he was treacherously murdered by 'Amr b. Khālid b. Ḥuṣayn al-Kilābī, and his army scattered. One group of them asked Mūsā for safe-conduct, and joined him; others returned to Umayyah.[631]

In this year, Umayyah crossed the river of Balkh to campaign. He and his forces were surrounded and reduced to misery, and were on the point of perishing before they escaped. Umayyah and the troops with him then returned to Marw. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Khālid b. al-'Āṣ b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah[632] satirized Umayyah in the following verses:

Tell Umayyah that he will get his reward for bad actions—and these do have their reward.
Whoever may consider reproaching you or desire to do so,
I myself have no such intention with you.[633]
Any good you have done is wiped out by your bad qualities, whose evil fruits have been parceled out to you.
Whoever named you Umayyah,[634] when passing out names at the time of your birth, got it right.

According to Abū Ja'far: In this year, the leader of the pilgrimage was Abān b. 'Uthmān, who was the governor of Medina.[635] The governor of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah was al-Ḥajjāj b.

631. A fuller account of this appears below, II, 1149–51.

632. A Makhzūmī of Quraysh, and brother of the well-known poet al-Ḥārith b. Khālid al-Makhzūmī, whom 'Abd al-Malik appointed governor of Mecca in 80 (699–700); see Aghānī[3], III, 97; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 307; Sezgin, GAS, II, 417.

633. Wa-man yanẓur 'itābaka aw yuridhū/fa-lastu bi-nāẓirin minka l-'itābā.

634. Diminutive of amah, "slave woman."

635. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 275, 301; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 336.

[1032] Yūsuf, and the governor of Khurāsān was Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—anonymous—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: Abān b. 'Uthmān was leader of the pilgrimage twice while he was governor of Medina, in the years 76 (695–696) and 77 (696–697).[636] According to some, Shabīb perished in the year 78 (697–698);[637] some say the same for the deaths of Qaṭarī, 'Abīdah b. Hilāl, and 'Abd Rabb al-Kabīr.[638] In this year, al-Walīd conducted a summer expedition.[639]

---

636. See text above, II, 940, and note 369.

637. So Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 328; see text above, II, 972, and note 461.

638. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 275, dates Qaṭarī's death to 78, and Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 330, dates it to 79.

639. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 275, reports that al-Walīd campaigned in the region between Malaṭyah and al-Miṣṣīṣah. According to Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 337, Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam had done this the previous summer, and in 78 al-Walīd raided Aṭmār (?) from the direction of Malaṭyah. See F. 'Uthmān, al-Ḥudūd al-islāmiyyah al-bīzanṭiyyah bayn al-iḥtikāk al-ḥarbī wa-al-ittiṣāl al-ḥiḍārī (Cairo, 1966), II, 74, and note 655 below.

The Events of the Year 78

(MARCH 30, 697—MARCH 19, 698)

The Important Events Occurring in This Year

'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān dismissed Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh from the governorship of Khurāsān and included Khurāsān and Sijistān under the jurisdiction of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. When they were included in his jurisdiction, al-Ḥajjāj dispersed his officials throughout them.

The Officials Whom al-Ḥajjāj Appointed in Khurāsān and Sijistān, and Why He Appointed Whom He Did, with Further Details

It is reported: When al-Ḥajjāj had finished with Shabīb and Muṭarrif, he transferred from al-Kūfah to al-Baṣrah, leaving as his deputy over al-Kūfah al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Aqīl.[640] According to some reports, he first deputized 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-Ḥaḍramī, but then dismissed him and replaced 640. Al-Thaqafī, according to text below, II, 1381. He was probably a cousin of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf (b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī 'Aqīl).

[1033] him with al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh.[641] Al-Muhallab came to him in al-Baṣrah, having finished with the Azraqites.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī: When al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah had finished with the Azraqites, he came to al-Ḥajjāj; this was in the year 78. Al-Ḥajjāj seated him beside him and called for the distinguished fighters among his forces. Whomever al-Muhallab mentioned as a man who showed valor among his forces, al-Ḥajjāj took his word for it. Al-Ḥajjāj gave them mounts and good bonuses and increased their stipends; he said, "These are men of action and have the best claim to the wealth; these are the defenders of the frontiers and the bane of the enemy."[642]

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq: Al-Ḥajjāj assigned al-Muhallab Sijistān as well as Khurāsān. But al-Muhallab said to him, "Let me refer you to a man who is better acquainted with Sijistān than I; he was formerly governor of Kābul and Zābul,[643] and collected taxes, waged war, and made peace with the people there." Al-Ḥajjāj replied, "Indeed! Who is that?" Al-Muhallab said, "'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah."[644]

Then al-Ḥajjāj sent out al-Muhallab over Khurāsān and 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah over Sijistān. The governor over these provinces had been Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd b. Abī al-'Īṣ b. Umayyah; he was 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān's governor, al-Ḥajjāj having nothing to do with him, from the time he was sent out to Iraq until this year, when 'Abd al-Malik dismissed Umayyah and added the area of his authority to that of al-Ḥajjāj. Al-

641. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 296, mentions only 'Abd al-Raḥmān as al-Ḥajjāj's deputy over al-Kūfah at this time. This man is called 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir below, II, 1069f.

642. A parallel account in Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 310; more briefly in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 78 (620 fighters honored), and Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 289.

643. The regions around Kābul and to its southwest, toward Ghaznah and Qandahār; see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 904f., IV, 220f.; Le Strange, Lands, 334, 349f.; EI², s. vv. Kābul, Kābulistān.

644. On him, see C. E. Bosworth, "'Ubaidallāh b. Abī Bakra and the 'Army of Destruction' in Zābulistān," Der Islam 50 (1973), 268–83; Ziriklī, A'lām, IV, 345. His father Abū Bakrah was a slave of Thaqīf who became a client of the Prophet, but 'Ubaydallāh later tried to pass himself off as a real Thaqafī; see Aghānī¹, XVII, 9; Goldziher, Muhammedanische Studien, I, 137f., 141. 'Ubaydallāh was governor of Kābul under Ziyād b. Abīhi, 51–53 (671–673); see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 397.

Muhallab went out to Khurāsān and 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah to Sijistān; 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah remained inactive the rest of this year.[645] This is the account of Abū Mikhnaf from Abū al-Mukhāriq.

The account of 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad: Khurāsān and Sijistān were joined with Iraq under al-Ḥajjāj's authority at the beginning of the year 78, after the Khārijites had been killed. He appointed 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah over Khurāsān and al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah over Sijistān. But al-Muhallab disliked Sijistān. He met 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd b. Ṭāriq al-'Abshamī,[646] who was the head of al-Ḥajjāj's security force, and said, "The amīr has appointed me to Sijistān and Ibn Abī Bakrah to Khurāsān, even though I know Khurāsān better than he does, since I got to know it in the time of al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī,[647] and Ibn Abī Bakrah is better able to deal with Sijistān than I. Speak to the amīr and get him to switch me to Khurāsān and Ibn Abī Bakrah to Sijistān." 'Abd al-Raḥmān replied, "I will; you speak also to Zādhān Farrūkh[648] and get him to help me." Al-Muhallab spoke to him, and he agreed to help. Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Ubayd said to al-Ḥajjāj, "You have appointed al-Muhallab to Sijistān, but Ibn Abī Bakrah is better able to deal with it than he." Zādhān Farrūkh added, "That is true!" Al-Ḥajjāj said, "But we have already written up his letter of appointment." Zādhān Farrūkh said, "His letter of appointment could be changed without difficulty." Al-Ḥajjāj then reassigned Ibn Abī Bakrah to Sijistān, and al-Muhallab to Khurāsān. [1034]

Al-Muhallab was, however, required to pay up 1,000,000 dirhams from the revenue of al-Ahwāz, where he had been governor under Khālid b. 'Abdallāh. Al-Muhallab said to his son al-Mughīrah, "Khālid made me governor of al-Ahwāz, and made you 645. That is, before launching an expedition against Zunbil; see the continuation of this account below, II, 1036. The following year, 79, began in late March.

646. Of the Banū 'Abd Shams b. Sa'd of Tamīm; see Caskel, Ǧamharat annasab, I, 78, II, 130.

647. See text above, II, 109.

648. Zādhān Farrūkh b. Payrōazh, head of the dīwān al-kharāj and the last to keep the accounts in Persian; according to Jahshiyārī, Wuzarā' (Cairo, 1980), 38, his assistant, Ṣāliḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, converted them to Arabic in this same year (78). See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 300f.; Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 53f.

governor of Iṣṭakhr.[649] Now al-Ḥajjāj has demanded that I pay up 1,000,000 dirhams. I will pay half of it, and you pay the other half." Al-Muhallab had no money when he was dismissed, and had had to borrow. He spoke to Abū Māwiyyah, the client of 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, who had been in charge of 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir's treasury,[650] and he lent al-Muhallab 300,000 dirhams. But [1035] Khayrah al-Qushayriyyah, al-Muhallab's wife, said, "This will not cover your obligation," and she sold some jewelry and other things, bringing the total up to 500,000. Then al-Mughīrah brought 500,000 to his father, and he took the money to al-Ḥajjāj. Al-Muhallab then sent out his son Ḥabīb with his vanguard.[651] The latter came to al-Ḥajjāj to bid him farewell, and al-Ḥajjāj ordered him given 10,000 dirhams and a gray mule. Ḥabīb set out on this mule for Khurāsān, traveling with his men, who rode the post. He traveled for twenty days, and then as they entered the city, they were met by a beast carrying a load of firewood, and the mule shied; they marveled at her shying after all that traveling and fatigue. Ḥabīb did not interfere with Umayyah or his officials. He stayed there ten months, until al-Muhallab came out to him in the year 79 (698–699).[652]

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik;[653] so I was informed by Aḥmad b. Thābit—anonymous—

649. See text above, II, 822–26.

650. It is unclear whether 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir is here in both instances 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Kurayz, governor of al-Baṣrah under Mu'āwiyah (see *EI*², s. v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir), or, in one or both instances, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Misma', later head of the shurṭah in al-Baṣrah (see text below, II, 1062).

651. Muqaddimah, here apparently more an advance party.

652. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 266, 310f., and Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VI, 293, Umayyah was dismissed because of his avoidance of raiding and the corresponding decrease in plunder; but Balādhurī also reports (Futūḥ, 399) that Umayyah's son 'Abdallāh, who deputized for his father in Sijistān, made a disgraceful truce with Zunbīl there, and Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 111f.) has a distorted version of the same incident, attributing it to Umayyah himself. Balādhurī further states (Ansāb, XI, 266, 310f.) that al-Ḥajjāj sent 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah to 'Abd al-Malik to ask for the governorship of Khurāsān (for al-Ḥajjāj) and that it was only after the caliph had offered it to 'Ubaydallāh himself, who declined it, that he granted it to al-Ḥajjāj. Al-Muhallab's being preceded to Khurāsān by his son Ḥabīb is mentioned in neither the above sources nor the short notices in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 275, 297; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 330; Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 78. See also Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 154f.; Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 52f., and the article cited in note 644; M. A. Shaban, The 'Abbāsid Revolution (Cambridge, 1970), 54f.

653. So also Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 276, 301. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 336, has Abān b. 'Uthmān, but the text is questionable.

Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar. The governor of Medina in this year was Abān b. ʿUthmān. The governor of al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, Khurāsān, Sijistān, and Kirmān was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf; his deputy in Khurāsān was al-Muhallab, and in Sijistān ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah. Shurayḥ was in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah, and it is reported that Mūsā b. Anas was in charge of the judiciary in al-Baṣrah.[654] In this year ʿAbd al-Malik sent out Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam on campaign.[655]

---

654. Son of Anas b. Mālik; see Ibn Saʿd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, i, 140.

655. Against the Byzantines. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, 275–78, dates a campaign by Yaḥyā against Marj al-Shaḥm to the following year, 79, as well as a campaign by al-Walīd "from the direction of Malaṭyah," and, for 78, reports rather a campaign by Muḥriz b. Abī Muḥriz, who conquered Azqalah (? Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX,21, reads Irqīliyyah), but whose army was devastated by a storm on its way back. The plague that prevented campaigning in 79, according to Ṭabarī, however, is dated by Ibn Khayyāṭ to 80. See also note 639 above.

The Events of the Year

79

(March 20, 698–March 8, 699)

The Important Events of This Year

In this year the people of Syria were visited by a plague so severe [1036] that they were all but annihilated. No one launched any campaigns in this year, it is reported, because of the plague there and the large number of deaths.[656]

In this year, it is reported, the Byzantines attacked the people of Antioch.[657]

---

656. The same information in Elias of Nisibis, Opus chronologicum (Baethgen), year 79. Theophanes, Chronographia, A. M. 6192, mentions a great plague, without specifying its location, in the same year in which al-Ḥajjāj defeated Ibn al-Ash'ath (dated 82 or 83 [701–702] by Ṭabarī, text below, II, 1070); Michael the Syrian, Chronique (Paris, 1899–1910), II, 474f., dates the beginning of a great seven-year plague to the year 75 (694–695). This plague is not included in what became the (rather Iraqi-oriented) standard list; see M. Dols, "Plague in Early Islamic History," Journal of the American Oriental Society 94 (1974), 378.

657. Theophanes, Chronographia, A. M. 6192, records a major Byzantine raid on Syria, as far as Samosata (not Antioch), for the year of the "great plague" (see previous note). See also 'Uthmān, al-Ḥudūd al-islāmiyyah al-bizanṭiyyah, II, 74.

In this year, 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah campaigned against Zunbīl.[658]

The Campaign by 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah in Sijistān

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī: When al-Ḥajjāj appointed al-Muhallab to Khurāsān and 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah to Sijistān, al-Muhallab went out to Khurāsān and 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah to Sijistān; this was in the year 78 (697–698). 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah remained inactive the rest of this year, then attacked Zunbīl.[659] Zunbīl had been under a truce, with the Arabs collecting land taxes from him; but he had several times held back and refused to pay.[660] Al-Ḥajjāj then wrote to 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah saying, "Take the field against him with the Muslims you have with you and do not return until you have plundered his land, razed his fortresses, killed his fighting men, and taken his women captive." 'Ubaydallāh set out with the Muslims he had with him, Kūfans and Baṣrans. In command of the Kūfans was Shurayḥ b. Hāni' al-Ḥārithī al-Ḍabābī,[661] who had been a companion of 'Alī; in command of the Baṣrans was 'Ubaydallāh, who also commanded the entire army. He advanced and penetrated into the lands of Zunbīl, seizing cattle, sheep, and other property as he wished, and razing fortresses and castles. He conquered a great deal of their territory, [1037] as Zunbīl's Turkish[662] forces fell back from one land after an-

658. For a full analysis of this episode, with a review of the sources, see Bosworth, "'Ubaidallāh b. Abī Bakra and the 'Army of Destruction' in Zābulistān (79/698)." For the reading Zunbīl, emended from text Rutbīl (and representing a local title, not a personal name), see Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 34–36.

659. Ṭabarī here resumes the account interrupted above, II, 1033.

660. According to Balādhurī and Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh (or his son 'Abdallāh) had exempted Zunbīl from tribute for the duration of his governorship, as part of a disgraceful treaty that led to his replacement; see note 652 above.

661. Of Madhḥij; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 261, II, 533. For his long and eventful career, and his fervent support of 'Alī, see text above, I, 3259–62, 3354–60, II, 134–37, and Bosworth, "'Ubaidallāh b. Abī Bakra," 275. According to Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 113, he was at this time nearly a hundred years old.

662. On the vagueness of this term in early sources, see Bosworth, "'Ubaidallāh b. Abī Bakra," 271.

other, until they were in the heart of their territory and drew near their city.[663] But when they were within eighteen *farsakh*s of the city, Zunbīl's forces occupied the passes and defiles against the Muslims, leaving them in the country districts.[664]

The Muslims were in a predicament and feared they were doomed. Ibn Abī Bakrah sent to Shurayḥ b. Hāni', saying, "I am going to offer the enemy a truce, giving them money in exchange for safe passage out of here"; he then sent them this message, offering them 700,000 dirhams for a truce.[665] But Shurayḥ came to him and said, "Any amount you pay out for a truce will be credited by the government against your stipends." Ibn Abī Bakrah replied, "Even if the government should withhold our stipends for the rest of our lives, that would not be as bad as perishing!" But Shurayḥ said, "By God, I have reached an age where my pleasures are at an end, and there is not an hour, day or night, that I do not expect to die before it elapses. I have been seeking martyrdom for a long time, and if I miss it today, I do not think I will find it before dying a natural death." Then he said to the men, "People of Islam! Help one another against your enemy!" Ibn Abī Bakrah said to him, "You are an old man and have gone senile." Shurayḥ retorted, "Your only claim to nobility is that people say 'the Orchard of Ibn Abī Bakrah' and 'the Bath of Ibn Abī Bakrah!'[666] People of Islam! Those of you who wish for martyrdom, come to me!" A few of the volunteers followed him, and some of the horsemen in the army and some of the more dedicated. They fought until all but a few were cut down.[667]

---

663. The summer capital, in Zābulistān (probably in the Ghaznah region), according to Bosworth, ibid., 276.

664. Wa-khallawhum wa-al-rasātīq; see note 213 above.

665. According to Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 312, the terms were either 500,000 or 700,000 dirhams, plus a number of hostages, including Ibn Abī Bakrah's three sons, and a pledge not to raid Zunbīl's territory while Ibn Abī Bakrah remained governor; Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 112, has one million dirhams, half the invaders' arms, and ten years' exemption from kharāj, as well as the hostages.

666. 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah, whose origins were extremely lowly (see note 644 above), had built a bath in al-Baṣrah after his brother Muslim had reaped great profit from his bath and a third brother, 'Abd al-Raḥmān, had followed suit; see Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 353–54, and Morony, Iraq after the Muslim Conquest, 270. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 113, also has Shurayḥ refer to 'Ubaydallāh's bath and orchard (bustān) in al-Baṣrah.

667. Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 313, states that Shurayḥ had previously attempted to

On that day Shurayḥ recited the following rajaz verses:[668]

I have become a man of sorrow, suffering from old age. [1038]
Long did I live among the polytheists;
Then I lived to see the Prophet, the Warner, and after him his Ṣiddīq and 'Umar;
And the Day of Mihrān,[669] and the Day of Tustar,[670] and the assemblies at Ṣiffīn and al-Naharā,[671]
And at Bājumayrāt[672] as well as al-Mushaqqar[673]— Fie! How long this life is!

He fought until he was killed, along with many of his comrades, although some escaped.

They then withdrew from the territory of Zunbīl and were met by Muslims with food. But when one of them ate his fill of the food, he would die. When the people saw that, they were afraid to feed them, but then began to feed them ghee, little by little, until they were able to eat properly.[674] Word of all this came to al-persuade Ibn Abī Bakrah to retreat, having acquired sufficient booty, without attempting to capture towns; but at this juncture Shurayḥ offered an eloquent speech in favor of martyrdom and persuaded some volunteers of Madhḥij and Hamdān to join him; the ensuing casualties included members of the Baṣran and Kūfan contingents, as well as some Syrians. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 113, also refers to Madhḥij and Hamdān but makes the conflict essentially one between Shurayḥ and the Kūfans and Ibn Abī Bakrah and the Baṣrans; ten thousand Kūfans entered the battle and were killed.

---

668. Also in Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 313f., and, with variants, Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 113f.

669. A victory by the Muslims, under al-Muthannā b. Ḥārithah, over the Persians, under Mihrān b. Mihribandādh al-Hamadhānī, in 13–14 (634–635), a little over a year before the great victory at al-Qādisiyyah; also known as yawm al-nakhīlah or the Battle of al-Buwayb. See text above, I, 2184–2201; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 253f.; Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 197–200.

670. On the siege and conquest of Tustar (modern Shushtar) by the Muslims under Abū Mūsā al-Ash'arī in the year 17 (638), see text above, I, 2551f.; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 380; Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 215f.

671. On Shurayḥ's participation at the confrontation between 'Alī and Mu'āwiyah at Ṣiffīn in 37 (657), see text above, I, 3354–60. Al-Naharā is for al-Nahrawān, where 'Alī's forces massacred the Khārijites in 38 (658); see text above, I, 3360–89.

672. For Bājumayrā, near Takrīt, where Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr encamped before his final defeat by 'Abd al-Malik in 72 (691), see text above, II, 797, 805; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 454f.

673. In al-Baḥrayn, site of the defeat of the Khārijite Abū Fudayk by 'Umar b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar in 73 (693); see text above, II, 853; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 541f.

674. Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 314–17, reports that only five thousand men made it Ḥajjāj, whose dismay at the entire story from start to finish knew no bounds. He wrote as follows to 'Abd al-Malik:

> The troops of the Commander of the Faithful that are in Sijistān have met disaster, and only a few of them escaped. The enemy has been emboldened by this success against the people of Islam and has entered their lands and conquered all their fortresses and castles. Now I want to send out against them a massive force of men from the two garrisons and would like to consult the opinion of the Commander of the Faithful on that. If it is his opinion that I should dispatch this force, I will do so. If that is not his opinion, the Commander of the Faithful remains the supreme authority over his own > [1039] forces; but I fear that if Zunbīl and the polytheists with him are not met quickly by a massive force, they will overrun that entire frontier.

In this year, al-Muhallab arrived in Khurāsān as governor, and Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh quit the province.[675] It is reported that the judge Shurayḥ asked to be relieved of his position in this year and suggested Abū Burdah b. Abī Mūsā al-Ash'arī as his replacement. Al-Ḥajjāj relieved him and appointed Abū Burdah.[676]

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was Abān b. 'Uthmān, according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—anonymous—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar; the same is reported by al-Wāqidī and other historians.[677] Abān was in this year governor over Medina for 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān. Governor over Iraq and the entire East was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. Al-Muhallab was governor over Khurāsān for al-Ḥajjāj; according to some, al-Muhallab was the military governor and his son al-Mughīrah the tax governor. In charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah was Abū Burdah b. Abī Mūsā, and in charge of the judiciary in al-Baṣrah was Mūsā b. Anas.

---

back to Bust and quotes verses by A'shā Hamdān attacking Ibn Abī Bakrah for attempting to profit from their misery; see Bosworth, "'Ubaidallāh b. Abī Bakra," 278–83.

675. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 297, and see note 652 above.

676. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 298, and see notes 49 and 322 above.

677. Ahl al-siyar. The same information in Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 277, 301; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 336.

The Events of the Year 80

(MARCH 9, 699–FEBRUARY 25, 700)

The Important Events of This Year

In this year, according to Ibn Sa'd[678]—Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī, there was a flash flood in Mecca that swept away the pilgrims and inundated the buildings. That year was named the [1040] Year of Sweeping Away[679] because that flash flood swept away everything in its path.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. Rifā'ah b. Tha'labah—his father—his grandfather: The flash flood came down and swept away the pilgrims in the valley of Mecca; that is why it was called the Year of Sweeping Away. I saw loaded camels, men, and women caught in the flood and unable to resist it. While I was watching the water, it reached the Rukn[680] and rose above it.

---

678. Muḥammad b. Sa'd, d. 230 (845), the author of the K. al-Ṭabaqāt al-kabīr; see *EI*², s. v. Ibn Sa'd.

679. 'Ām al-Juḥāf. A fuller account in Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 395f. See also Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 54; Elias of Nisibis, Opus chronologicum (Baethgen), year 80; Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 357.

680. The "corner," that is, the eastern corner of the Ka'bah, where the Black

In this year the Sweeping Plague struck al-Baṣrah, according to the statement of al-Wāqidī.[681]

In this year al-Muhallab crossed the river of Balkh and attacked Kish.[682]

Al-Muhallab Attacks Kish

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad and others: When al-Muhallab attacked Kish, his vanguard was under the command of Abū al-Adham Ziyād b. ʿAmr al-Zimmānī, with three thousand, which really counted as five thousand[683] because Abū al-Adham by himself was worth two thousand in valor, leadership, and strategy.

While al-Muhallab was attacking Kish, there came to him the paternal cousin of the king of al-Khuttal,[684] urging him to attack that province. Al-Muhallab sent off with him his son Yazīd. Yazīd camped with his forces and the king's cousin camped apart. The king, whose name was al-Sabal,[685] was at that time encamped at [1041] some distance. But then al-Sabal surprised his cousin by night, raising the call "God is great!" in his camp. Al-Sabal's cousin thought that the Arabs had betrayed him out of fear lest he betray them after he encamped apart from them. Al-Sabal took him captive and had him brought to his fortress and killed.

Yazīd b. al-Muhallab surrounded al-Sabal's fortress, and the latter's forces made peace with him on the basis of a ransom that they brought him. Yazīd then returned to al-Muhallab. The mother of the one whom al-Sabal killed sent to al-Sabal's mother,

---

Stone is mounted; see EI², s. v. Kaʿba. Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 54, and Azraqī, Akhbār Makkah, 395, state that the water surrounded the Kaʿbah.

681. Ṭāʿūn al-Jārif, usually dated to 69 (688–689), as observed by Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 31, quoting Ṭabarī here; see Dols, "Plague in Early Islamic History," 379.

682. Modern Shahrisabz, about fifty miles south of Samarqand; see EI², s. v. Kishsh.

683. Abū al-Adham . . . fī thalāthat ālāf wa-hum khamsat ālāf illā ann Abā al-Adham kāna yughnī ghanā' alfayn . . . Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, IV, 45, understands this as meaning that Abū al-Adham had three thousand men and al-Muhallab himself five thousand.

684. A princedom of the Upper Oxus, east of modern Dushanbe; see EI², s. v. Khuttalān.

685. Possibly a title; see J. Marquart, Ērānšahr (Berlin, 1901), 302f.

saying, "What hope have you for al-Sabal's survival after killing his cousin? He has seven brothers whose vengeance al-Sabal has drawn on himself, and you are the mother of only one." Al-Sabal's mother sent back to her saying, "Lions have few offspring, but pigs have many."

Then al-Muhallab sent his son Ḥabīb out to Rabinjan,[686] where he encountered the lord of Bukhārā with forty thousand men. One of the polytheists called out a challenge for single combat, and Ḥabīb's personal retainer[687] Jabalah came forward to engage him. He killed the polytheist, then attacked the rest of them, and killed three of them before he withdrew. The entire army then withdrew, as did the enemy to their territory. When a group of enemy forces halted at a village, Ḥabīb marched against them with four thousand men, fought and defeated them, burned the village, and then returned to his father. This village was subsequently called "the Burned";[688] according to some, it was Ḥabīb's retainer Jabalah who burned it.

Al-Muhallab remained at Kish for two years. It was suggested to him that he advance to al-Sughd[689] and beyond, but he said, "All I ask from fortune in this campaign is the well-being of these troops until they get back to Marw safe and sound."

One day a man from the enemy came out with a challenge to single combat. Huraym b. 'Adī, the father of Khālid b. Huraym,[690] went out to meet him, wearing a turban wound around his [1042] helmet. He came to a brook, where the polytheist circled about him for some time until Huraym killed and despoiled him. But al-Muhallab reproached him and said, "If you had been cut down, and then I received reinforcements of a thousand horsemen, they would not have offset my loss."

While he was at Kish, al-Muhallab became suspicious of a 686. Or Arbinjan, halfway between Bukhārā and Samarqand. See Le Strange, Lands, 468; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 189f.; Barthold, Turkestan, 99.

687. Ghulām; see note 421 above.

688. Al-Muḥtariqah, between Kish and Samarqand. According to the text below, II, 1229, the village, formerly known as Faryāb (or Qaryāt), was burned by the forces of Qutaybah b. Muslim in 91 (710). See Barthold, Turkestan, 137f.

689. Soghdia, the Zarafshan valley, north of Kish; see Le Strange, Lands, 460.

690. According to Ibn al-Kalbī, Huraym b. 'Adī belonged to the Banū Mujāshi' of Tamīm (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 61, II, 287); but the text below (II, 1569) identifies his son Khālid as one of the Banū Tha'labah b. Yarbū', also of Tamīm.

group of Muḍarites, and held them confined there; but when he withdrew, after a truce had been arranged, he let them go. Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him saying, "If you were right to confine them, you were wrong to let them go; and if you were right to let them go, you wronged them by confining them." Al-Muhallab replied, "I feared them, so I confined them. Once I felt secure, I let them go." Among those he confined was 'Abd al-Malik b. Abī Shaykh al-Qushayrī.[691]

Then al-Muhallab agreed on a truce with the people of Kish on the basis of a ransom. While he was waiting to collect it, he received a letter from Ibn al-Ash'ath informing him of his rebellion against al-Ḥajjāj and summoning him to support him in his rebellion. Al-Muhallab sent Ibn al-Ash'ath's letter on to al-Ḥajjāj.[692]

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ash'ath Campaigns in Sijistān

In this year, al-Ḥajjāj sent out 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath to Sijistān to do battle with Zunbīl, the lord of the Turks. There is disagreement among the historians on the reason why al-Ḥajjāj sent him out there and on where 'Abd al-Raḥmān was when al-Ḥajjāj appointed him to Sijistān and to do battle with Zunbīl.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq: When 'Abd al-Malik received the letter of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf informing him of the army that had been with 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah in the territory of Zunbīl and their fate there, he wrote to him as follows:

[1043] I have received your letter reporting the blow suffered by the Muslims in Sijistān. These are people whom God had decreed would be killed; they came out to where they were to lie, and their reward is with God.[693] As for your request for my opinion—whether to lead out the troops and direct them to that frontier where the Muslims suffered this blow or to keep them there—my opinion in this matter is that you should carry on according to your own opinion, proceeding rightly; and I wish you all success.

691. Probably of the Banū Qushayr b. Ka'b, a clan of 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah (of Qays 'Aylān of Muḍar); see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 105. Al-Muhallab presumably feared a return of the Muḍarite leader 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim. On conflict between Azd and Qays under al-Muhallab, see also Aghānī[1], XIII, 56f.; Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 112.

692. Reported also by Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 329, 335–36, where al-Muhallab expresses his indignation at this proposal from someone younger than some of his sons. Ṭabarī (text below, II, 1058f.) and Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, (Futūḥ, VII, 118f.) give two versions of al-Muhallab's reply to Ibn al-Ash'ath, attempting to dissuade him from his rebellion.

There was no one in all of Iraq whom al-Ḥajjāj hated more than ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath; he used to say, "I never see him without wanting to kill him!"

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Numayr b. Waʿlah al-Hamdānī al-Yanāʿī[694]—al Shaʿbī:[695] I was sitting with al-Ḥajjāj when ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath was admitted. When al-Ḥajjāj saw him, he said, "Look at the way he walks! By God, I would like to cut off his head!" When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān withdrew, I also withdrew, and got ahead of him and awaited him at the door of Saʿīd b. Qays al-Sabīʿī.[696] When he came up, I said, "Let us go in the door here. I want to speak to you about something, but I adjure you by God never to mention it so long as al-Ḥajjāj is alive." He agreed, and I told him what al-Ḥajjāj had said about him. He said, "May I fare as al-Ḥajjāj said if I do not expend every effort to strip him of his power! We have coexisted for too long!"[697]

Then al-Ḥajjāj set to fitting out twenty thousand Kūfans and twenty thousand Baṣrans, devoting himself to this task with great zeal. He paid the men their stipends in full, ordering them to equip themselves with excellent horses and full arms. Then he began to [1044] review the troops, and whenever he saw a man who had been cited 693. A paraphrase of Qurʾān 3:154, revealed after the defeat at Uḥud.

694. On the Yanāʿ b. Dawmān of Hamdān, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 230, II, 590.

695. Abū ʿAmr ʿĀmir b. Sharāḥīl al-Shaʿbī, d. 103 (721), the famous traditionist; see Sezgin, GAS, I, 277.

696. Of the Banū al-Sabīʿ b. Sabʾ of Hamdān, an important clan in al-Kūfah; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 492.

697. Variants of this account in Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 318f., and Dīnawarī, al-Akhbār al-ṭiwāl, 322. Ibn Aʿtham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 108–10, records from al-Shaʿbī Ibn al-Ashʿath's earlier rejection of an offer to head al-Ḥajjāj's shurṭah, as well as other illustrations of his arrogance. On the former amity between the two men and the marriage of al-Ḥajjāj's son to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's sister, see Périer, Vie d'al-Ḥadjdjādj, 159f.; *EI*², s. v. Ibn al-Ashʿath.

for bravery, he gave him a generous bonus.[698] 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Miḥjan al-Thaqafī came upon 'Abbād b. al-Ḥuṣayn al-Ḥabiṭī,[699] who was with al-Ḥajjāj, as he was going to meet 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Umm al-Ḥakam al-Thaqafī,[700] who was reviewing the troops. 'Abbād said, "I have never seen a finer or more beautiful horse than this. A horse provides both strength and a weapon.[701] This is also a powerful mule." Al-Ḥajjāj thereupon gave 'Ubaydallāh a bonus of 550 dirhams. Then 'Aṭiyyah al-'Anbarī[702] came upon him, and al-Ḥajjāj said, "'Abd al-Raḥmān, be generous to this one."

When al-Ḥajjāj had these two forces in good order, he sent out 'Uṭārid b. 'Umayr al-Tamīmī, who encamped at al-Ahwāz. Then he sent out 'Ubaydallāh b. Ḥujr b. Dhī al-Jawshan al-'Āmirī of the Banū Kilāb,[703] but then changed his mind and sent out to command them 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, dismissing 'Ubaydallāh b. Ḥujr. 'Abd al-Raḥmān's paternal uncle, Ismā'īl b. al-Ash'ath, came to al-Ḥajjāj and said, "Do not send him out! I fear that he may disobey your orders. By God, he has never crossed the Euphrates bridge and continued to recognize the authority or claim to obedience of any governor." Al-Ḥajjāj replied, "Not in this case. He both fears and respects me too much to disobey my orders or throw off his obedience to me." He then sent him out in command of that army, and he led them forth and came to Sijistān in the year 80 (699–700).[704] Upon arrival, he assembled the men already there.

---

698. Aḥsana ma'ūnatahu.

699. A descendant of al-Ḥārith b. 'Amr b. Tamīm, known as al-Ḥabiṭ, and formerly a commander for Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr in al-Baṣrah. See text above, II, 720ff; Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, II, 102; Ziriklī, A'lām, IV, 28. According to Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 368f., the city of 'Abbādān was named for this 'Abbād.

700. Governor of al-Kūfah under Mu'āwiyah in 58 (678); see text above, II, 181. Umm al-Ḥakam was Mu'āwiyah's sister.

701. Wa-inn al-faras quwwah wa-silāḥ.

702. 'Aṭiyyah b. 'Amr of al-'Anbar b. 'Amr b. Tamīm; see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 81, II, 205.

703. On Dhū al-Jawshan Shuraḥbīl b. al-A'war b. 'Amr b. Mu'āwiyah al-Ḍibāb b. Kilāb b. Rabī'ah b. 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah, see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, I, 98, II, 532.

704. Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 319f., has either twelve thousand or ten thousand men from al-Kūfah, put initially under the command of either 'Uṭārid or a descendant of Dhū al-Jawshan; these marched to al-Baṣrah, where a like number of men were chosen and commanded by 'Aṭiyyah. Balādhurī agrees with Ṭabarī on the transferral to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, despite the warning by the latter's uncle, but dates this to the end of 79 (699). The account in Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 114ff.,

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Zubayr al-Arḥabī, a man of Hamdān who was with 'Abd al-Raḥmān: He ascended the pulpit, praised and glorified God, and said:

> Men, the amīr al-Ḥajjāj has appointed me to your frontier district and charged me with jihād against your enemy, who has plundered your land and destroyed your property. Let no man of you shirk his duty and bring punishment down on himself. Go out to your camp and muster there with the troops. [1045]

The men all mustered in their camp. Markets were set up for them, and the men began to ready themselves and prepare their equipment for battle. When word of this reached Zunbīl, he wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad, apologizing to him for the blow inflicted on the Muslims and informing him that he had acted only reluctantly and that they had forced him to fight them; and he asked for peace if 'Abd al-Raḥmān would accept payment of the land tax from him. 'Abd al-Raḥmān neither accepted nor replied but immediately set out against him with his forces and came to the borders of his territory.[705] Zunbīl began to call in his forces, leaving the land to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, district by district and fortress by fortress. Ibn al-Ash'ath, as he took control of an area, would send out a tax official over it, accompanied by armed attendants.[706] He also set up a post between the various areas, positioned lookouts in the passes and ravines, and stationed advance parties[707] in every potentially dangerous spot. Then, when he had taken possession of a large part of Zunbīl's territory and filled his hands with cattle, sheep, and great amounts of plunder, he held the men back from further penetration into Zunbīl's lands, saying, "We will content ourselves with the territory we have conquered from them this year until we can collect the taxes and get to know it and the Muslims may boldly travel its roads. Next year we will advance farther, and so we will continue year by year to [1046] which parallels Ṭabarī's second version below, has Ibn al-Ash'ath's four half-brothers warning al-Ḥajjāj against him.

---

705. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 116, records a threatening letter sent by Ibn al-Ash'ath to Zunbīl, and the latter's conciliatory reply.

706. A'wān.

707. Masālih.

deprive them of more pieces of their territory, until, in the end, we will fight them for their treasures and their women, in their most remote districts and in their most impregnable fortresses; and we will not leave their land until God destroys them." Then he wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, informing him of the conquests God had given him in the land of the enemy and His gracious favor to the Muslims, and explaining the strategy he was pursuing.[708]

The other account, beside that of Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq and the others that I have given in the matter of Ibn al-Ash'ath, explains his appointment to Sijistān and his march against the territory of Zunbīl differently from what is reported on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf. According to this account, the reason for that was as follows: Al-Ḥajjāj sent out Himyān b. 'Adī al-Sadūsī[709] to Kirmān with an advance party to provide reinforcements to the administrator over Sijistān and Sind if such reinforcements were needed. But Himyān and his comrades rebelled, and al-Ḥajjāj sent out Ibn al-Ash'ath to fight him, and he defeated him and took his place. Then 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah, who was the administrator over Sijistān, died, and al-Ḥajjāj wrote out a letter of appointment for Ibn al-Ash'ath to administer it. Al-Ḥajjāj also mustered an army, on which he expended two million dirhams, in addition to the stipends. It was called the Peacock Army, and al-Ḥajjāj ordered Ibn al-Ash'ath to march out with it against Zunbīl.[710]

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was Abān b. 'Uthmān, according to Aḥmad b. Thābit—anonymous—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū [1047] Ma'shar, and also according to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī.

---

708. Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 321–23, reports that Ibn al-Ash'ath was based in Bust and posted his brother in al-Rukhkhaj; according to his account, Zunbīl was advised by a renegade Tamīmī Khārijite named 'Ubayd b. Suba'. The summary account in Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 331, which gives Ibn al-Ash'ath ten thousand picked troops, also places Ibn al-Ash'ath in Bust, from which he led a preliminary campaign which frightened him enough to put off further campaigning for a year; his letter to al-Ḥajjāj explaining this was answered with threats, which led him to revolt.

709. Formerly head of the shurṭah in al-Baṣrah; see text above, II, 445–47, 464.

710. The term "Peacock Army" is also mentioned by Balādhurī, Ansāb, XI, 319ff., and many other sources. Balādhurī has versions of both of Ṭabarī's accounts, as well as a third stating that Ibn al-Ash'ath was fighting the Khārijites when appointed by al-Ḥajjāj. Ibn A'tham al-Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 115f., has Ibn al-Ash'ath defeat Himyān on his way to Sijistān, after his appointment there. See Dixon, Umayyad Caliphate, 152ff.; Bosworth, Sīstān under the Arabs, 58ff.

According to others, the leader of the pilgrimage in this year was Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik.[711] The governor of Medina in this year was Abān b. 'Uthmān. The governor of Iraq and the entire East was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. The governor of Khurāsān under al-Ḥajjāj was al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah. Abū Burdah b. Abī Mūsā was in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah, and Mūsā b. Anas was in charge of the judiciary in al-Baṣrah. In this year 'Abd al-Malik sent out his son al-Walīd on campiagn.

---

711. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 278, 301, and Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 336, agree that Abān led the pilgrimage.

The Events of the Year 81

(FEBRUARY 26, 700–FEBRUARY 14, 701)

The Events of This Year

In this year occurred the conquest of Qālīqalā.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad: 'Abd al-Malik sent out his son 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik in the year 81, and he conquered Qālīqalā.[712]

In this year, Baḥīr b. Warqā' al-Ṣuraymī was killed in Khurāsān.

Account of Baḥīr b. Warqā''s Death in Khurāsān

The circumstances of his being killed: It was Baḥīr who undertook to kill Bukayr b. Wishāḥ when Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh ordered him to do so.[713] Then 'Uthmān b. Rajā' b. Jābir b. Shaddād, one of the Banū 'Awf b. Sa'd, of the Abnā', incited a man from the Abnā', one of Bukayr's clan, to vengeance with these verses:[714]

---

712. Modern Erzurum; see Le Strange, Lands, 116f., and EI², s. v. Erzurum.

713. See text above, II, 1022–31.

714. On the Abnā' and the Banū 'Awf b. Sa'd (possibly to be understood as 'Awf b. Ka'b b. Sa'd), see text above, II, 860, and note 38.

By my life! How patiently you bear this mote in your eye! [1048]
You sleep well at night with a bellyful of the best wine.
You have left a killing unavenged, preferring gentle sleep;
but he who drinks the ruby liquor is in debt for a slaying![715]
If you were a true noble of the 'Awf b. Sa'd, you would have left Baḥīr in a pool of blood.
Tell Baḥīr: Sleep well and fear no avenger from 'Awf!
for 'Awf are simple herders of little lambs.
Forget the mutton for one day! You are all in debt for a slaying!
And you have become a subject for wagging tongues east and west.
Rouse yourselves! If Bukayr were here tonight, as he used to be, well and healthy, he would meet them tomorrow in a dusky detachment.[716]

He also said:

If Bakr had gone out in his armor, to challenge him, by the Lord of the Throne, Baḥīr would not have come out to fight him.
I seek something of Time, if Time should let me live, as one fully qualified, before God, for such a quest.

Baḥīr heard that the Abnā' were threatening him, and said:

The Abnā' threaten me in ignorance, as if they see my halls empty of the Banū Ka'b!
I raise against them my hand with a sharpened blade, [1049] a sword the color of salt, keen and glittering.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad: Seventeen men of the Banū 'Awf b. Ka'b b. Sa'd made a compact to take blood vengeance for Bukayr. One of them, a young man named al-Shamardal, came out of the desert to Khurāsān, found Baḥīr standing, and assaulted and stabbed him. Baḥīr fell to the ground, and he thought that he had killed him. The men cried 715. Wa-man shariba l-ṣahbā'a bi-l-witri yusbaqī.

716. La-ghādāhum bi-ja'wā'a faylaqī. The usual phrase is katībah ja'wā'; see Zamakhsharī, Asās, s. v. ja'wā'.

out, "A Khārijite!" Al-Shamardal raced to get away from them, but his horse stumbled and threw him, and he was killed.

Then Ṣa'ṣa'ah b. Ḥarb al-'Awfī, one of the Banū Jundab,[717] came out of the desert, having sold some of his booty and bought an ass. He went to Sijistān and took up residence near some of Baḥīr's relatives there. He befriended them and told them he was a man from the Banū Ḥanīfah, from the people of al-Yamāmah.[718] He continued to come and sit with them often until they became friends with him; then he said to them. "I have a legacy in Khurāsān that I have been cheated out of. I hear that Baḥīr is a very powerful man in Khurāsān. Please write to him on my behalf and ask him to help me obtain my rights." They wrote to him, and Ṣa'ṣa'ah set out, arriving at Marw while al-Muhallab was on campaign.

He met some people from the Banū 'Awf and told them what he was about. A client of Bukayr's, an armorer, came up and kissed his head. Ṣa'ṣa'ah said to him, "Make me a dagger." He made him a dagger, heating it and plunging it into ass's milk repeatedly. Then Ṣa'ṣa'ah set out from Marw, crossed the river, and came to al-Muhallab's camp, which was at that time at Akharūn.[719] He met Baḥīr, gave him the letter, and said, "I am a man from the [1050] Banū Ḥanīfah. I was a companion of Ibn Abī Bakrah. I lost my money in Sijistān, but I have a legacy in Marw. I have come to sell it and then return to al-Yamāmah."

Baḥīr ordered him given expense money, had him stay with him, and told him to ask him for whatever he wished. Ṣa'ṣa'ah replied, "I will stay with you until the troops withdraw." He stayed a month or so, accompanying him to al-Muhallab's public and private audiences until he became known.

Baḥīr was afraid of attempts on his life and trusted no one. But when Ṣa'ṣa'ah turned up with a letter from his relatives, he said, "This is a man from Bakr b. Wā'il," and trusted him. Ṣa'ṣa'ah came one day when Baḥīr was sitting in al-Muhallab's private

---

717. Neither Ibn al-Kalbī (apud Caskel) nor Ibn Ḥazm mentions a Jundab of the 'Awf b. Ka'b b. Sa'd.

718. The Ḥanīfah b. Lujaym of the oases of al-Yamāmah in central Arabia were a tribe of Bakr b. Wā'il; see *EI*², s. v. Ḥanīfa b. Ludjaym.

719. Or Kharūn, a district north of the Oxus, near modern Dushanbe; see Barthold, Turkestan, 76; Ḥudūd al-'Ālam (trans. Minorsky), 337, 353.

audience, wearing a shirt, a robe, and sandals.[720] He sat down behind him, then drew up close to him and leaned over him as if he were going to say something to him, and stabbed him in the flank with his dagger, burying it deep inside him. The people cried out, "A Khārijite!" He cried, "O slayers of Bukayr! I have taken vengeance for Bukayr!" He was seized by Abū al-'Aṭfā' b. Abī al-Kharqā', who was then head of al-Muhallab's security force, and brought to al-Muhallab. Al-Muhallab said, "Woe to you! You have not achieved your vengeance, and have killed yourself, while Baḥīr does well!" Ṣa'ṣa'ah said, "I stabbed him with a thrust that, if divided up among the army, would have killed them all! I also felt the wind from his belly on my hand." Al-Muhallab imprisoned him; some of the Abnā' came to the prison to visit him and kissed his head.

Baḥīr died the next day around midday. Ṣa'ṣa'ah was told of his death and said, "Do with me now as you like and however seems best to you. Have not the vows of the women of the Banū 'Awf been fulfilled, and have I not achieved my vengeance? I am indifferent to my fate. By God, he gave me more than one chance to do the deed while he was alone, but I was unwilling to kill him in private." Al-Muhallab said, "Never have I seen a man more generously willing to give up his life while in bonds than this one!" [1051]
Then he ordered Abū Suwayqah, a paternal cousin of Baḥīr's, to kill him. Anas b. Ṭalq said, "Woe to you! Baḥīr has already been killed; do not kill this one as well!" But Abū Suwayqah refused to heed him, and killed Ṣa'ṣa'ah. Anas reviled him.

According to others, al-Muhallab sent Ṣa'ṣa'ah to Baḥīr before the latter died. Anas b. Ṭalq al-'Abshamī said to him, "Baḥīr, you killed Bukayr; now let this one live." But Baḥīr said, "Bring him nearer me! No, by God, I will not die while you still live!" They brought him nearer him, and he put his head between his legs and said, "Kill 'Ifāq in cold blood—he is an abiding evil!"[721] Ibn Ṭalq 720. Qamīṣ wa-ridā' wa-na'lān. See Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements chez les Arabes, 59n., 371–75, 421–24.

721. Iṣbir 'Ifāq innahu sharr bāqin. This line, which must have been proverbial, occurs in a variant form in an anecdote recorded by Ibn Abī al-Ḥadīd, Sharḥ Nahj al-balāghah, IV, 85, according to which a man known for his eloquence in rhymed prose was asked by the Shī'ites of al-Kūfah to silence the militantly anti-Shī'ite 'Ifāq b. Shuraḥbīl al-Taymī (so read for text al-Tamīmī; see Caskel, Gamharat an- said to Baḥīr, "God curse you! I speak to you on his behalf, and you kill him right in front of me!" Baḥīr stabbed him with his sword until he was dead; then Baḥīr himself died. Al-Muhallab said, "'We are God's, and to God we return'—so I say of a campaign in which Baḥīr has been cut down."[722]

'Awf b. Ka'b and the Abnā' were angry and said, "Why was our comrade killed, when he was only seeking his vengeance?" They were opposed by Muqā'is and the Buṭūn, until people feared the situation would get out of hand. But the more temperate men said,[723] "Take responsibility for the blood of Ṣa'ṣa'ah and accept the blood of Baḥīr as retribution for Bukayr." So they paid the bloodwit[724] for Ṣa'ṣa'ah.

One of the men of the Abnā' praised Ṣa'ṣa'ah with these verses:

God be praised for a young man whose ambition went beyond Iraq, across deserts and seas;
He kept pressing and driving himself until he caught up with Baḥīr at Kharūn.

'Abd Rabbih al-Kabīr Abū Wakī', who was one of Ṣa'ṣa'ah's kin, went out into the desert and told Bukayr's kin, "Ṣa'ṣa'ah has been killed seeking vengeance for the death of your comrade. Pay his bloodwit!" Thus he received two bloodwits for Ṣa'ṣa'ah.[725] nasab, I, 150, II, 353); he said to 'Ifāq, "O God, kill 'Ifāq! He is a hypocrite within and a troublemaker without, an unabashed schismatic with an unstable character!" (Allāhumma qtul 'Ifāq fa-innahu asarra nifāqā, wa-aẓhara shiqāqā, wa-bayyana firāqā, wa-talawwana akhlaqā).

---

722. The quotation is from Qur'ān 2:156, where it is introduced by the phrase "Those who say, when afflicted by a disaster . . ."

723. To Muqā'is and the Buṭūn.

724. Reading waddaw for text waddū.

725. A garbled version of this in Ibn Ḥabīb, Asmā' al-mughtālīn, 176f.; see also Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 34f.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXIII

The Zenith of the Marwānid House

TRANSLATED BY MARTIN HINDS

Khurasan and Transoxania in the Early Eighth Century

The Events of the Year 81 (cont'd)

(FEBRUARY 26, 700–FEBRUARY 14, 701) [1052]

Abū Ja'far said: In this year 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath and those of the Iraqi army who were with him disobeyed al-Ḥajjāj and advanced upon him to fight him. This is what Abū Mikhnaf said on the authority of Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī; as for al-Wāqidī, he claimed that this took place in the year 82.

What Led 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath to Do What He Did, with an Account of His Actions after Disobeying al-Ḥajjāj

We have already mentioned under the year 80 the presence of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad in the territory of the Zunbīl[1] and his letter to al-Ḥajjāj concerning what he had done there and what he proposed to do in the future. We shall now mention what happened to him in the year 81, this being the account of Abū Mikhnaf on the authority of Abū al-Mukhāriq.

1. The literature relating to the question of whether this title was Rutbīl (and variants) or Zunbīl (and variants) is listed by Sayed, Die Revolte des Ibn al-Aš'aṯ und die Koranleser, p. 148. The form Zunbīl has been preferred here and below (the text consistently gives the form Rutbīl).

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī: Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, in reply to his letter, "To continue: Your letter has reached me and I have understood what you have mentioned in it. Your letter is the letter of a man who wants a truce and is pleased with reconciliation, having blandished a lowly and slight foe. They have struck down Muslim troops whose performance was good and whose capacity in the cause of Islam was mighty. By your life, O son of the mother of [1053] 'Abd al-Raḥmān, if you hold back from the enemy with my troops and arms you will be heedless of those Muslims who were struck down. I do not consider the decision you claim to have reached to be based on a strategem; I think that all that impels you to do that is your weakness and your confused judgment. So do what I ordered you to do, penetrating far into their territory, destroying their fortresses, killing their fighting men, and taking their children captive."

Then he sent after [that letter] another in which he said, "To continue: Order the Muslims who are with you to till the soil and settle. That is your abode until God grants [you] victory over them."

Then he sent after [that letter] a further one in which he said, "To continue: Do what I ordered you to do, and penetrate far into their territory. Otherwise your brother Isḥāq b. Muḥammad[2] is to be the amīr of the people, and you are to let him have that to which I have appointed him."

When ['Abd al-Raḥmān] read [this] letter, he said, "Shall I bear responsibility for Isḥāq?" and he showed [the letter] to him.[3] [Isḥāq] said, "Don't do it." ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said, "By the Lord of this," meaning the copy of the Qur'ān, "if you mention [this] to anyone, I'll kill you." [Isḥāq] thought that he meant the sword and put his hand on the pommel of his sword.

Then ['Abd al-Raḥmān] summoned the people, praised God, and said, "O people, I am one who gives you sincere advice, one who has your well-being at heart, and one who is watchful of all benefit that encompasses you. My view in the matter of your dealings

2. According to al-Balādhurī (Anonyme arabische Chronik, Band XI [henceforward AAC], p. 324), Isḥāq had been sent out by al-Ḥajjāj at the head of a separate army.

3. The drift of what immediately follows is not entirely clear, and it is likely that some text is missing.

with the enemy was a view about which I consulted [both] the discerning among you and those of you who are experienced in war. They were satisfied with it in respect of you, considering it to be conducive to your well-being, and in both the short term and the long. I wrote to your amīr al-Ḥajjāj [telling him this], and he responded with a letter in which he charged me with incompetence and weakness and ordered me to hasten the business of taking you far into the territory of the enemy, that being the territory in which your brethren perished but yesterday. I am one of you: I go on when you go on, and I balk when you do." [At this,] the people were stirred up in support of him and said, "No, we balk against the enemy of God: We shall not heed him, nor shall we obey." [1054]

Abū Mikhnaf said: Muṭarrif b. ʿĀmir b. Wāthilah al-Kinānī told me that his father,[4] who was a poet and khaṭīb,[5] was the first to speak on that day. After praising God, he said, "To continue: Al-Ḥajjāj wants for you none other than what the sayer of yore[6] wanted when he said to his brother, 'Mount your servant on the mare: If he perishes he perishes, and if he escapes [then so much the better] for you.' By God, al-Ḥajjāj does not care that he is taking chances with you by forcing you into a territory of sheer cliffs and narrow passes. If you win and take booty, he will devour the territory and appropriate [its] wealth, thereby extending his dominion; while if your enemy wins, you will become hated enemies, whose distress will be of no concern to him and whom he will not pity. So disavow al-Ḥajjāj, the enemy of God, and give the oath of allegiance to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān. I [hereby] cause you to witness that I am the first to disavow [him]." [At this,] the people called out from every side, "We do so, we do so, we disavow the enemy of God."

ʿAbd al-Muʾmin b. Shabath b. Ribʿī al-Tamīmī,[7] who was in charge of [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's] police force when he arrived [in Sijistān], stood up next and said, "O servants of God, if you obey al-Ḥajjāj he will make this land your land for as long as you live. He

4. Abū al-Ṭufayl ʿĀmir b. Wāthilah: see Sezgin, Geschichte des arabischen Schrifttums [henceforward GAS], vol. II, p. 412.

5. A term signifying a tribal spokesman in pre-Islamic times and subsequently the deliverer of the Friday sermon [see *EI*², s.v.].

6. So rendering al-qāʾil al-awwal; al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 325, gives simply al-qāʾil. I have not encountered elsewhere the piece of wisdom that follows.

7. Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 118.

will keep you out in the field in the manner of Pharaoh, who, I have been informed, was the first to keep armies out in the field; I think that most of you will be dead before seeing your loved ones. So give the oath of allegiance to your amīr, set off against your [1055] enemy, and expel him from your land (that is, Iraq)." [At this] the people rose up to 'Abd al-Raḥmān and gave him the oath of allegiance. He said, "Give me the oath of allegiance to disavow al-Ḥajjāj, the enemy of God, and to help me, and to fight against him along with me until God expels him from the land of Iraq"; and they rendered the oath of allegiance to him. No mention was made at that time of any disavowal of 'Abd al-Malik.

Abū Mikhnaf said: 'Umar b. Dharr,[8] the qāṣṣ,[9] related to me that his father was there with him and that 'Abd al-Raḥmān had flogged him and imprisoned him because of his attachment to his brother al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad.[10] But when he came out in revolt, he summoned Dharr, and gave him a mount, raiment, and gifts; [Dharr] was among those who set off with him, functioning as a qāṣṣ and khaṭīb.[11]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sayf b. Bishr al-'Iṭlī—al-Munakhkhal b. Ḥābis al-'Abdī: When Ibn Muḥammad set off from Sijistān, he appointed over Bust 'Iyāḍ b. Himyān[12] al-Bakrī, from the Banū Sadūs b. Shaybān b. Dhuhl b. Tha'labah, and over Zaranj 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-Tamīmī al-Dārimī. Then he sent to the Zunbīl and made peace with him on the understanding that, if Ibn al-Ash'ath were to win, the Zunbīl would not be liable to tax (kharāj) as long as he lived, and, if Ibn al-Ash'ath were to be defeated and so desired it, the Zunbīl would give him refuge with him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Khushaynah b. al-Walīd: When 'Abd al-Raḥmān left Sijistān heading for Iraq, al-A'shā went before him on a mare, saying (rajaz):[13]

---

8. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register.
9. Teller of popular stories (see EI[2], s.v. Ḳāṣṣ).
10. A slightly fuller account of this is given in al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 326.
11. Cf. the account given by Khalīfah b. Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, p. 279.
12. Thus too in Ibn al-Athīr, but 'Iyāḍ b. 'Amr according to al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 327.
13. This is A'shā Hamdān (see EI[2], s.v., and Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 345–46). Regarding the following verses, cf. von Goutta, Der Aġaniartikel über 'A'šà von Hamdān, pp. 38, 54; Geyer, The Dīwān of al-A'shà, pp. 341–42 (Arabic text); al-Balādhurī, AAC, pp. 328–29; Aghānī,[2] vol. VI, p. 59; and al-Mas'ūdi, Murūj, vol. V, p. 356 = par. 2109.

Distant is he whose residence is at the Īwān,[14] [1056] the Īwān of Chosroes, the possessor of villages and sweet-smelling plants,
For a lover who has emerged in Zābulistān.
There have been two liars from Thaqīf,
Their past liar[15] and a second one.
May my Lord give power to Hamdān over Thaqīf,
For a day until nighttime, so consoling us for what took place [before].
We betook ourselves to the devilish infidel,
When, in unbelief after belief, he exceeded the bounds with the noble lord 'Abd al-Raḥmān.
He set forth with a throng of Qaḥṭān, like locusts, while from Ma'add b. 'Adnān he brought
A tumultuous and mighty multitude.
So tell Ḥajjāj, Satan's friend, [if he can] Stand steady against Madhḥij and Hamdān, that they will give him to drink from the goblet of poison,
And will send him off to the villages of Ibn Marwān. [1057]

He (sc. Abū Mikhnaf) said: 'Abad al-Raḥmān sent 'Aṭiyyah b. 'Amr al-'Anbarī over his vanguard. Al-Ḥajjāj sent the cavalry against him, but he defeated it at each engagement. Al-Ḥajjāj asked who it was and was told that it was 'Aṭiyyah. This is why al-A'shā said (kāmil):

When you put the mountain roads of Fārs,
one by one, behind them,
Then send 'Aṭiyyah with the cavalry to cast them down upon him.[16]

Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān advanced with the people. He asked about Abū Isḥāq al-Sabī'ī,[17] whom he had inscribed among his companions, saying, "You are my maternal uncle"; [Abū Isḥāq] was told,

14. The Sasanian palace at Ctesiphon is meant here (see *EI*², s.v.).
15. Presumably, al-Mukhtār b. Abī 'Ubayd is meant.
16. Reading 'alayhi (von Goutta, Aġaniartikel, p. 55; Geyer, The Dīwān of al-A'shà, p. 312 [Arabic text]; al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 320; and al-Mas'ūdī, loc. cit.) in place of 'alayka. Cf. Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 129.
17. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register, s.v. 'Amr b. 'Abd Allāh.

"Don't go to him, for he has asked about you," and he did not like to go. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān then went on until he passed through Kirmān and placed over them (sc. the people of Kirmān) Kharashah b. ʿAmr al-Tamīmī. Abū Isḥāq stayed there and did not take part in the civil war (fitnah) until [the battle of Dayr] al-Jamājim. When [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān] entered Fārs, the people gathered together and said, "If we have disavowed al-Ḥajjāj, the governor of ʿAbd al-Malik, then we have [as a consequence] disavowed ʿAbd al-Malik"; and they gathered around ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.[18]

Abū Mikhnaf said: Among what Abū al-Ṣalt related to me [was this]: [The first person who][19] disavowed ʿAbd al-Malik was Tayḥān b. Abjar of the Banū Taym Allāh b. Thaʿlabah. He stood up [1058] and said, "O people, I have disavowed Abū Dhibbān[20] just as I divest myself of my shirt." All but a few of the people then disavowed him, rose up to Ibn Muḥammad, and rendered the oath of allegiance to him. His oath of allegiance was: "Do you swear allegiance on [the basis of] the Book of God, the Sunnah of his Prophet,[21] disavowal of the imāms of error, and struggle against those who violate that which is sacred?" If they said "Yes," he accepted the oath.

When it reached al-Ḥajjāj that he had been disavowed, he wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik informing him about ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath and asking him to hasten the sending of troops to him. He sent his letter to ʿAbd al-Malik, citing at the end of it these verses by al-Ḥārith b. Waʿlah (basīṭ):[22]

Ask the one who is the neighbor (or: under the protection, mujāwir) of Jarm, "Have I brought upon them a war that will divide neighbors of

18. Omitting the following fa-kāna awwal al-nās.

19. Inserting kāna awwal man, as given by manuscripts O and B.

20. Literally, "father of the flies," i.e., one who has stinking breath, an epithet applied in particular to ʿAbd al-Malik (see Lane, Lexicon, p. 952b); see also al-Thaʿālibī, Laṭāʾif al-maʿārif, p. 36 [English trans. pp. 56–57]).

21. On the significance of this wording, see Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, pp. 59ff.

22. On the poet, see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, p. 147. Regarding the following verses (and their attribution), cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 333; Aghānī[2] vol. XXII, p. 219; Khalīfah, Taʾrīkh, p. 279; al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, p. 155; Ibn Ḥamdūn, Tadhkirah, vol. II, p. 454; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. III, p. 877. Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, pp. 123–24) has Ibn al-Ashʿath proclaiming these verses while in Fārs.

sincere and friendly conduct?
Have I risen up with a clamorous army full of neighing horses between the plain and the mountain?[23]
Have I left the women of the tribe exposed to the sun, out in the open, trying to make fires out of hawdaj saddles?"

And he went along until he stopped at al-Baṣrah.

[News of] the rebellion of 'Abd al-Raḥmān while he was in Sijistān reached al-Muhallab,[24] who wrote to him, "To continue: O Ibn Muḥammad, you have put your foot in a stirrup that is very [1059] wrong for the community of Muḥammad. By God, look to yourself and do not destroy it; do not spill Muslim blood; do not sunder unity; do not violate the oath of allegiance. By God, if you say, 'I fear the people for myself (nafs),' [know that] God is more properly to be feared for it than the people. Do not expose it to God['s anger] by shedding blood or by deeming licit that which is not. Peace be upon you."

Al-Muhallab [also] wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, "To continue: The people of Iraq have advanced toward you, like a flood coming down from above, unstoppable until it reaches its resting place. The people of Iraq are fierce at the start of their exodus, desiring their sons and womenfolk; nothing will stop them getting to their families and embracing (lit. sniffing)[25] their children. So encounter them there. God willing, He will give you victory over them." When al-Ḥajjāj read this letter, he said, "God damn him; he is not looking to my interests but to those of his cousin."[26]

When al-Ḥajjāj's letter came to 'Abd al-Malik, it appalled him. He descended from his throne, sent for Khālid b. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah,[27] called him [in], and had him read the letter. When 23. Reading bayna 'l-sahli wa'l-furuṭi, as given in other versions, rather than bayna 'l-jammi wa'l-furuṭi (which appears to have arisen by dittography).

---

24. Al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, the governor of Khurasan at this time (see EI², s.v. [forthcoming]).

25. Yashummū: al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 336, gives yatakassamū, which makes no obvious sense and is presumably a corruption of yashummū; cf. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, p. 280 (shammū nisā'ahum wa-awlādahum) and Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 37, line 10 (shammū awlādahum).

26. Cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 336.

27. EI², s.v.

[Khālid] saw his concern, he said,[28] "O Commander of the Faithful, if this incident [arises from] the direction of Sijistān, do not fear it; [but] if it is from the direction of Khurasan, then I [myself] fear it." Then ['Abd al-Malik] went to the people, stood [1060] up among them, praised God, and said, "The people of Iraq have found my life too long and wish to hasten my demise. O God, empower the swords of the people of Syria over them, so that they may achieve Thy pleasure; if they do so, they will fall short of Thy displeasure." Then he descended.

Al-Ḥajjāj stayed in al-Baṣrah, prepared himself for the encounter with Ibn Muḥammad, and ignored the advice of al-Muhallab. At the same time Syrian horsemen were reaching him daily from 'Abd al-Malik, borne on post-mules in groups of one hundred, fifty, ten, and less, while he daily sent to 'Abd al-Malik letters and messages with information about Ibn Muḥammad—what district he had stopped in, what district he had set off from, which people had hastened to him [and so on].

Abū Mikhnaf said: Fuḍayl b. Khadīj[29] related to me that the place where he was registered [as a soldier] (maktab) was in Kirmān, where there were four thousand Kūfan and Baṣran horsemen, and that, when Ibn Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath passed by them, [these forces] quickly went off with him. Al-Ḥajjāj [in the meantime] resolved to engage Ibn al-Ash'ath and went with the Syrians to Tustar; and [from there] he sent out advance parties led by Muṭahhar b. Ḥurr al-'Akkī—or al-Judhāmī—and 'Abdallāh b. Rumaythah al-Ṭā'ī, with Muṭahhar in overall command. These reached [the river] Dujayl, which had already been crossed by a troop sent by 'Abd al-Raḥmān—three hundred horsemen commanded by 'Abdallāh b. Abān[30] al-Ḥārithī—who formed a strongpoint for 'Abd al-Raḥmān and his army. When Muṭahhar b. 'Amr got to them, he ordered 'Abdallāh b. Rumaythah to advance on [1061] them; the cavalry of 'Abdallāh [b. Abān] was defeated and pushed back to [the river], and his companions were wounded.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Zubayr al-Hamdānī: I was among the companions of Ibn Muḥammad when he summoned and gathered the people. Then he said, "Cross to [the enemy][31] from this place." So the people impelled their horses into the Dujayl from that place which he had designated, and, by God, no sooner had most, though not all, of our horses crossed than we attacked Muṭahhar b. Ḥurr and al-Ṭā'ī and defeated them, that being on the Day of Sacrifice, 81 (January 25, 701). We killed on a large scale and took their camp.[32]

28. Preferring al-Balādhurī's fa-lammā ra'ā . . . qāl to al-Ṭabarī's wa-ra'ā . . . fa-qāl.

29. Al-Kindī (see the index to al-Ṭabarī's text).

30. Muḥammad b. Abān b. 'Abdallāh, according to al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 339.

[News of] the defeat reached al-Ḥajjāj while he was delivering the sermon. Abū Ka'b b.[33] 'Ubayd b. Sarjis ascended [the pulpit] to him and informed him of the people's defeat, at which he said, "O people, go to al-Baṣrah for a camp and a place for fighting, for grain and supplies: This place in which we are cannot support us." Then he set off, returning, and the cavalry of the Iraqis[34] followed him; whenever they came upon a straggler, they killed him and [in this way] acquired [much] baggage, which they gathered together. Al-Ḥajjāj went on, without deviating, until he stopped at al-Zāwiyah.[35] He sent for the grain of the merchants at al-Kallā',[36] took it and [had it] transported to him, and left al-Baṣrah to the Iraqis [that is, the Iraqi army], his governor over it being al-Ḥakam b. Ayyūb b. Abī 'Aqīl al-Thaqafī;[37] and the Iraqis came on until they entered al-Baṣrah. When he had suffered this setback and retreated, al-Ḥajjāj called for al-Muhallab's letter and [re]read it. Then he said, "What a man! What a general! He advised us correctly, and we did not accept [what he said]."

According to authorities other than Abū Mikhnaf, al-Ḥakam b. Ayyūb was the civilian governor of al-Baṣrah, while 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Misma'[38] was in command of the police. [1062]

---

31. Al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 339, gives aṣḥāb al-Ḥajjāj.

32. The account of this engagement given by al-Balādhurī, AAC, pp. 339–40, is rather fuller and clearer: Inter alia, it includes the information that Muṭahhar's force consisted of 7,000 Syrians; Ibn A'tham, on the other hand, opts for a force of 8,000 horsemen (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 130).

33. Al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 340, omits "Abū Ka'b b."

34. Ibn al-Athīr reads aṣḥāb 'Abd al-Raḥmān.

35. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 911) knew this as no more than a place near al-Baṣrah.

36. The river port of al-Baṣrah and one of its markets (see Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, pp. 20, 235).

37. A relative and son-in-law of al-Ḥajjāj (Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 131).

38. A member of the important Baṣran Shaybānī family known as the Masāmi'ah (ibid, p. 117, and EI[2], s.v. Masāmi'ah).

Then al-Ḥajjāj went with his army until he stopped at Rustāqubādh,[39] which was part of Dastawā, one of the districts of al-Ahwāz, and pitched camp there. Ibn al-Ashʿath advanced and stopped at Tustar, [with the result that] there was a river between them. Al-Ḥajjāj sent Muṭahhar b. Ḥurr al-ʿAkkī with two thousand men,[40] and they rushed a strongpoint of Ibn al-Ashʿath's. Ibn al-Ashʿath proceeded swiftly and attacked them, this being in the evening of ʿArafah in the year 81 (January 24, 701). It is said that they killed fifteen hundred of the Syrians, the rest of whom returned to [al-Ḥajjāj] in defeat. He had with him one hundred fifty million [dirhams], which he distributed among his commanders, making them responsible for them, and went in defeat to al-Baṣrah. [Meanwhile,] Ibn al-Ashʿath addressed his companions, saying, "As for al-Ḥajjāj, he is nothing. We want to carry the war to ʿAbd al-Malik." [At the same time, news of] the defeat of al-Ḥajjāj reached the people of al-Baṣrah, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Mismaʿ wanted to cut the bridge to prevent his passage; but al-Ḥakam b. Ayyūb bribed him with one hundred thousand [dirhams], and he desisted from this [action]. [Then] al-Ḥajjāj entered al-Baṣrah: He sent to Ibn ʿĀmir and wrested the one hundred thousand [dirhams] from him.

The account reverts to that of Abū Mikhnaf on the authority of Abū al-Zubayr al-Hamdānī: When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad entered al-Baṣrah, all of its qurrāʾ[41] and middle-aged men rendered the oath of allegiance to him to fight al-Ḥajjāj and dis-[1063] avow ʿAbd al-Malik; and a Jahḍamī of al-Azd called ʿUqbah b. ʿAbd al-Ghāfir,[42] who was a Companion, jumped up and gave the oath of allegiance to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, being strong in his conviction of the rightness of fighting al-Ḥajjāj. Al-Ḥajjāj entrenched himself against [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān],[43] and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān entrenched himself against al-Baṣrah. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's entry into al-Baṣrah took place at the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah 81 (mid-February 701).

39. On the Dujayl river between al-Ahwāz and Tustar (see Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 237, and *EI*², s.v. ʿAskar Mukram).

40. Cf. n. 32 above.

41. Generally held to have been Qurʾān reciters (see *EI*², s.v. Ḳurrāʾ). For a detailed discussion of these particular Baṣran qurrāʾ, see Sayed, Revolte, chap. v.

42. Sayed, Revolte, p. 350.

43. Where al-Ṭabarī has ʿalayhi, Ibn al-Athīr has ʿalā nafsihi.

Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik led the pilgrimage in this year: This is what Aḥmad b. Thābit related to me on the authority of he who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar; and so too said al-Wāqidī. He (sc. al-Wāqidī) [also] said: Ibn Abī Dhi'b[44] was born in this year; the governor of Medina in this year was Abān b. 'Uthmān;[45] over Iraq and the East was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf; over the military affairs (ḥarb) of Khurasan was al-Muhallab, and over its taxation (kharāj) was al-Mughīrah b. al-Muhallab,[46] [both of these being appointees acting] on behalf of al-Ḥajjāj; in charge of the judiciary of al-Kūfah was Abū Burdah b. Abī Mūsā,[47] and in charge of the judiciary of al-Baṣrah was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Udhaynah.[48]

---

44. A traditionist who died in 158 (774) or 159 (775) (Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, vol. IX, p. 306).

45. A son of the Caliph 'Uthmān b. 'Affān (see *EI*², s.v.).

46. *EI*², s.v. (Banū) 'l-Muhallab (forthcoming).

47. *EI*², s.v. al-Ash'arī.

48. 'Abd al-Raḥān b. Udhaynah b. al-Ḥārith al-'Abdī (see Caskel, Ǧamharat annasab, register; Wakī', Akhbār al-quḍāh, vol. I, pp. 304–7).

The Events of the Year 82

(FEBRUARY 15, 701–FEBRUARY 3, 702)

[Operations at al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah]

Among the events of this year were the battles that took place between al-Ḥajjāj and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad at al-Zāwiyah.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Zubayr al-Hamdānī: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's entry into al-Baṣrah took [1064] place at the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, and they fought in Muḥarram of the year 82 (February–March 702). They came together one day, and their fighting intensified. Then the Iraqis defeated [the Syrians], forcing them back to al-Ḥajjāj and fighting them in their trenches. The defeat of the whole of Quraysh and Thaqīf was such that ʿUbayd b. Mawhab, the mawlā and secretary of al-Hajjāj, said (ṭawīl):

Al-Barā' and his cousin Muṣʿab fled, and Quraysh fled, but for Āl Saʿīd.[49]

49. Cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 347, where it is clear that al-Ḥajjāj's relatives al-Barā' b. Qabīṣah b. Abī Aqīl and Muṣʿāb b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī ʿAqīl are meant; the Banū Saʿīd in question were probably the descendants of Saʿīd b. al-ʿĀṣ al-Umawī (see the reference to ʿAnbasah b. Saʿīd on p. 348).

Then they came together at the end of al-Muḥarram, on the day when the Iraqis defeated the Syrians: The [Syrian] right and left wings turned back, their spears were in disarray, and their [front] line was routed, to the extent that [the Iraqis] drew near to us. When al-Ḥajjāj saw that, he fell to his knees, drew his sword a span, and said, "How admirable Muṣ'ab was! How noble he was when there overtook him what overtook him, and I know, by God, that he did not wish to flee."

He (sc. Abū al-Zubayr) said: I signaled to my father with my eye to give me permission to smite [al-Ḥajjāj] with my sword, and he signaled back firmly [that I should not], and I kept still. Then I happened to turn, and, lo and behold, Sufyān b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī[50] had attacked them and defeated them on the right wing. So I said, "Rejoice, O amīr, for God has defeated the enemy." He said to me, "Stand up and look," so I stood up and looked and said, "God has defeated them." He said, "Stand up, Ziyād, and look"; so Ziyād stood up and looked and said, "It's true, God has certainly caused you to prosper; they have been defeated." And al- [1065] Ḥajjāj cast himself down in prostration. When I returned, my father reviled me and said, "Did you want to kill me and my family?"

The following were killed in the battle: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awsajah Abū Sufyān al-Nihmī[51] and 'Uqbah b. 'Abd al-Ghāfir al-Azdī al-Jahḍamī,[52] among those qurrā' who were all killed in the same place; 'Abdallāh b. Rizām al-Ḥārithī;[53] al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd;[54] and 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir b. Misma'.[55] The head of this last-named was brought to al-Ḥajjāj, who said, "I do not think that this [fellow] left me in order to have his head brought to me."

Sa'īd b. Yaḥyā b. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ[56] fought a duel on that day with a

---

50. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register.
51. Sayed, Revolte, p. 357 (wrongly an-Nuhmī).
52. See above, n. 42.
53. This cannot be right, for we find him alive and well below (p. 25). It can be noted that Mss. O and B (as well as al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 346) omit the words b. Rizām . . . al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd . . . 'Abd Allāh b.
54. This cannot be al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd, who had already been dead for twenty years (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register, and cf. preceding note); possibly one of his sons is meant (cf. below, p. 69, where his son Bishr is killed at Maskin).
55. Cf. above, p. 11 and n. 38.
56. Al-Umawī (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).

man who killed him; they claimed that he was a mawlā of al-Faḍl[57] b. 'Abbās b. Rabī'ah b. al-Ḥārith b. 'Abd al-Muṭṭalib,[58] a brave man called Nuṣayr. [Al-Ḥajjāj] had earlier criticized his gait, and, when he saw him going about between the [battle] lines, he said, "Never again shall I criticize him for this gait."

Al-Ṭufayl b. 'Āmir b. Wāthilah was killed.[59] It was he who had said in Fārs, while advancing on al-Ḥājjāj with 'Abd al-Raḥmān from Kirmān (ṭawīl):[60]

[The phantom of] Janūb[61] paid us a night visit at al Ghariyyān,[62] after we,
the distance being long, had become fatigued.
They (that is, our troops) have come to you leading the fates;
our vanguard[63] has been guided to you by [your] sins.
[1066] There is no good on earth for anyone who does not have a share from God in the world to come.
Inform al-Ḥajjāj that there has drawn near to him chastisement that will strike [him] through the hands of the believers.
When we come to the two miṣrs (that is, al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah), Muḥammad[64] will flee, but flight will not save the son of the accursed one.

[Al-Ḥajjāj] said [when he learned of al-Ṭufayl's death], "The fate [which you wanted for us] is a matter which God knew you to be more deserving of. He hastened it for you in this world and will chastise you in the next."

[The Iraqis] were defeated, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān set off toward al-Kūfah, followed by those Kūfans who were with him and the

57. Following the Addenda et Emendanda.

58. A Hāshimī who had been killed in 63 (683) (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).

59. For his father, see above, n. 4.

60. The fourth of the following verses is given also by al-Balādhurī (AAC, p. 346).

61. I am grateful to Professor Iḥsān 'Abbās for pointing out to me that this is to be read as a woman's name; her identity, however, remains unclear.

62. "Two well-known buildings in El-Koofeh, at El-Thaweeyeh, where is the tomb of 'Alee, the Prince of the Faithful, asserted to have been built by one of the Kings of El-Ḥeereh" (Lane, Lexicon, p. 2254b). See the discussion by Fahd, Le panthéon de l'Arabie centrale, p. 91–94.

63. Preferring ūlānā to awlānā.

64. The son of al-Ḥajjāj (cf. below, p. 48).

strongest of the Baṣran horsemen. When he had gone, the Baṣrans flocked to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbbās b. Rabīʿah b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib[65] and swore allegiance to him. For five nights he fought al-Ḥajjāj with them; it was the fiercest fighting the people had seen. Then he went off and joined Ibn al-Ashʿath, and was followed and joined by a group of Baṣrans. There also went out [of al-Baṣrah] al-Ḥarīsh b. Hilāl al-Saʿdī,[66] from the Banū Anf al-Nāqah,[67] who was wounded; he went to Safawān[68] and died of his wound. [Also] killed was Ziyād b. Muqātil b. Mismaʿ,[69] from the Banū Qays b. Thaʿlabah, who was in command of the khums[70] of Bakr b. Wāʾil with Ibn al-Ashʿath and was over the infantry. His daughter[71] Ḥamīdah stood up and lamented him, saying [1067] (mutaqārib):

Ziyād defended his two banners, and the protector of the Banū al-ʿAnbar fled.[72]

Al-Balta'[73] al-Saʿdī came and heard her lamenting her father and stigmatizing the Tamīmī. He had been selling clarified butter at al-Mirbad;[74] he left his clarified butter with his friends, came until he stood beneath her, and said (mutaqārib):

Why do you blame one who did not commit blameworthy actions?
May the night be long for a marriageable young lady such as you!

---

65. Al-Hāshimī (Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, register).

66. Who had earlier been a Tamīmī leader of importance in Khurasan (Caskel, loc. cit.).

67. I.e., the Banū Jaʿfar b. Quray' b. 'Awf of Saʿd/Tamīm (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, vol. I, chart 77).

68. A place one day's journey from al-Baṣrah on the road to the Ḥijāz (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. III, pp. 98–99).

69. Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 117.

70. One of the "fifths" into which the Baṣran fighting men were divided (Pellat, Le milieu baṣrien, p. 23).

71. According to al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 351, she was Ḥamīdah (or Ḥumaydah) bt. Muqātil, i.e., the sister of Ziyād.

72. Rāyatayhi, "banners": al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 351, reads qawmihi. Reading muḥāmī "protector," with AAC (rather than judayy, "small kid," with al-Ṭabarī), since al-Ḥarīsh was not himself a member of the Banū al-ʿAnbar.

73. The pointing is lacking or impressionistic; the name could also be al-Balīgh or al-Nabīgh or al-Tabīʿ.

74. The Baṣran halting place for caravans (*EI*², s.v. [forthcoming]).

If the spear point destroyed your father, the horses may reach he who was in flight (that is, the father)
And they may butt under the dust one who was not innocent[75] and had no excuse.
We defended the standard of al-Ḥarīsh, while the standard of the Banū Jaḥdar[76] went astray.

[1068] 'Āmir b. Wāthilah said, elegizing his son Ṭufayl (basīṭ):

Ṭufayl left care weighing upon me and departed this life, and that has crushed my strength signally.
I shall never forget the two sons of Sumayyah,[77] whatever else I may forget, [the loss of] each of whom was for me a source of fatigue.
The fates [earlier] missed me, not trying to come forward to me
until my old age, when they left me with nothing.
After Ṭufayl I have become as one from whom the waters have dried up and the water has disappeared into the earth,[78]
One who has no camel to ride in the land and who, if he strives in the track of him who has escaped him, becomes weary.
There arose from the land of Khāqān,[79] which the sons
[1069] of Fārs had subjugated like lions[80] in their squadrons,[81]
And from Sijistān a web of circumstances rendered attractive to you by fate, perdition brought for you Until you reached the basins of death and the squadrons went away from you, leaving no one behind [alive].

---

75. Al-barī: Al-shahīd, "martyred," is given as a variant.
76. The Masāmi'ah were descendants of Jaḥdar b. Ḍubay'ah (Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 116).
77. Presumably, the poet's wife.
78. The text has al-miyāh, "waters," while Ibn al-Athīr gives al-suyūl, "the floods." Reading aw naḍabā, "disappeared into the earth," as given by manuscripts O and B.
79. A title used by the Turks to signify "[supreme] ruler" (*EI*², s.v. Khāḳān).
80. Reading ghulubā in place of the ghalabā given by the editor.
81. Fī arbā'ihā: see Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'arab, vol. XIX, p. 20, who gives the definition jamā'āt min al-nās.

They left you felled, a hostage to the battlefield, where you see the vultures in groups over the dead.
They made a compact and then did not fulfill what they had undertaken, [instead] handing the captives and the plunder over to the enemy.
What a disgrace it is for a people when their women are taken captive, when they are numerous and they experience disgrace and destitution!

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām b. Ayyūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī 'Aqīl: Al-Ḥajjāj stayed put for the rest of al-Muḥarram and the beginning of Ṣafar. Then he appointed over al-Baṣrah Ayyūb b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī 'Aqīl.[82] Ibn al-Ash'ath went to al-Kūfah, where al-Ḥajjāj had left in charge 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-Ḥaḍramī, a confederate (ḥalīf) of Ḥarb b. Umayyah.[83]

Abū Mikhnaf said: As Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq related it to me, he was in command of four thousand Syrians.

Abū Mikhnaf said: Sahm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Juhanī related to me that there were two thousand of them. Hanẓalah b. al-Warrād al-Tamīmī,[84] from the Banū Riyāḥ b. Yarbū', and Ibn 'Attāb b. Warqā'[85] were over al-Madā'in, while Maṭar b. Nājiyah,[86] from the Banū Yarbū', was in charge of the ma'ūnah.[87] When [news of] [1070] the Ibn al-Ash'ath affair reached [Maṭar b. Nājiyah], he advanced until he came near to al-Kūfah. Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī fortified himself in the citadel, and the Kūfans rose up with Maṭar b. Nājiyah 82. Here, and below (pp. 46, 130), "Ayyūb b. al-Ḥakam" should be taken to signify "al-Ḥakam b. Ayyūb" (see above, n. 37, and cf. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, pp. 295, 314).

83. The text gives 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir, but the second "'Abd al-Raḥmān" appears to have arisen by dittography (cf. Ms O; al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 353; Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 132).

84. About whom al-Ṭabarī has nothing else to say.

85. Presumably Khālid b. 'Attāb (see the index to the Ṭabarī text and Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).

86. Caskel, loc. cit.

87. The exact responsibilities of such an appointment at this time remain unclear; they may have included fiscal duties, in addition to general administration and/or the maintenance of law and order (see *EI*², s.v. [forthcoming]).

against Ibn al-Ḥaḍramī and the Syrians who were with him. [Maṭar] besieged him, and they offered peace with him in return for getting out and leaving him the citadel; so he made peace with them.

Abū Mikhnaf said: Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq related to me that he saw them coming down from the citadel in haste. The door of the citadel was opened for Maṭar b. Nājiyah, the people crowded up to it, and Maṭar was crushed against it.[88] He drew his sword and with it smote the lip of one of the mules of the Syrians; then he cast its lip aside and entered the citadel. The people gathered to him, and he gave them two hundred dirhams [each].

Yūnus said: I saw [the dirhams] being divided among them; Abū al-Saqr[89] was among those who were given them. [Then] Ibn al-Ash'ath came in defeat to al-Kūfah, followed thither by the people.

Abū Ja'far said: In this year, according to one [of the authorities], there took place between al-Ḥajjāj and Ibn al-Ash'ath the battle of Dayr al-Jamājim. Al-Wāqidī said: The battle of Dayr al-Jamājim was in Sha'bān of this year (September–October 701). Others have said that it took place in the year 83.

The Reason for Ibn al-Ash'ath's Progress to Dayr al-Jamājim and [the Battle] between Him and al-Ḥajjāj

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Zubayr al-Ham-[1071] dānī al-Arḥabī: I had sustained a wound. The Kūfans went out to receive Ibn al-Ash'ath when he came, and received him after he had crossed the Zabārā[90] bridge. As he was drawing near to it, he said to me, "I'd be grateful if you would turn off the road, so that the people will not see your wound. I don't want the wounded to receive them." I did so,[91] and the people entered al-Kūfah.

---

88. According to al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 353, he was crushed against the door by a mule.

89. If this is how the name is to be read.

90. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 912) knew this as a place ("I think it was one of the nawāḥī of al-Kūfah") mentioned in connection with the Qarāmiṭah in the time of al-Muqtadir (see de Goeje, Mémoire sur les Carmathes,[2] p. 97).

91. Reading fa'altu, as proposed in the Addenda et Emendanda.

When he entered al-Kūfah, all the Kūfans inclined to him—Hamdān got to him first[92]—and surrounded him at the residence of ʿAmr b. Ḥurayth, except for a group from Tamīm which was not great in number; these last had gone to Maṭar b. Nājiyah and had wanted to fight for him, but were unable to take on the people. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān called for ladders of various kinds,[93] and these were placed in position so that the people might climb up the citadel; they did this and took [Maṭar], who was brought to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and said to him, "Spare me, for I am the worthiest of your horsemen and the most able of them to replace you." [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān] ordered that he be imprisoned. Then he called for him subsequently and pardoned him, and Maṭar rendered the oath of allegiance to him. The people entered into [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's] presence and rendered the oath of allegiance to him. The Baṣrans came to him, and the strongpoints and frontier ways of access fell to him; among those Baṣrans who came to him was ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-ʿAbbās b. Rabīʿah b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib—so he was known—who had fought al-Ḥajjāj for three [nights][94] at al-Baṣrah after the exodus of Ibn al-Ashʿath. [News of] that reached ʿAbd al-Malik, who said, "May God fight ʿUdayy al-Raḥmān![95] He has fled, and some of the young men of Quraysh [1072] have fought for three [nights] after him."

Al-Ḥajjāj set off from al-Baṣrah and went through the land until he passed between al-Qādisiyyah and al-ʿUdhayb.[96] [The Iraqis] prevented him from stopping at al-Qādisiyyah: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath sent against him ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-ʿAbbās with a large force made up of cavalry from the two miṣrs (that is, al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah), and they prevented him from stopping at al-Qādisiyyah. Then they kept pace with him until they came out at the top of Wādī al-Sibāʿ;[97] they kept pace with 92. Al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 356, notes that they were his maternal uncles (see also above, p. 7, and below, note 237).

93. So rendering al-salālim wa-al-ʿajal.

94. Cf. above (p. 17), where we are told that he had fought him for five nights.

95. Literally, "the small enemy of the Merciful," this being a play on the name ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, "the servant of the Merciful."

96. To the south-southwest of al-Kūfah. For discussion of their exact location, see *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳādisiyya (p. 384b).

97. Which receives passing attention from Yāqūt (Muʿjam, vol. IV, p. 876) as one of the nawāḥī of al-Kūfah.

each other until al-Ḥajjāj stopped at Dayr Qurrah[98] and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-'Abbās stopped at Dayr al-Jamājim.[99] Then Ibn al-Ash'ath came and stopped at Dayr al-Jamājim, while al-Ḥajjāj was [still] at Dayr Qurrah. Al-Ḥajjāj used to say subsequently, "Couldn't 'Abd al-Raḥmān augur from the birds when he saw that I had stopped at Dayr Qurrah and he had stopped at Dayr al-Jamājim?"[100]

There gathered together at Dayr al-Jamājim the Kūfans, the Baṣrans, the people of the frontier ways of access and the strongpoints, and the qurrā' of the two *miṣr*s. They were unanimous in making war on al-Ḥajjāj, being united in that by their hatred and loathing of him. They were at that time one hundred thousand stipendiary fighting men, accompanied by a like number of their mawlās.

Al-Ḥajjāj's reinforcements from 'Abd al-Malik had come to him before he stopped at Dayr Qurrah; before stopping there, he had wanted to go up to Hīt[101] and the area of the Jazīrah, out of a desire to be near[er] to Syria and the Jazīrah and so that he could be close to the rafāghah[102] of the price [of the foodstuffs] of the Jazīrah. But when he passed by Dayr Qurrah, he said, "This place isn't far from the Commander of the Faithful, and al-Falālīj[103] and 'Ayn al-Tamr[104] are nearby"; and he stopped there and entrenched himself in his camp, [just as] Ibn Muḥammad had in his.

[1073] The people would make sorties every day and fight, while at the same time advancing their trenches toward each other; and the fighting intensified. When [news of] that reached the heads of Quraysh and the Syrians with 'Abd al-Malik and his mawlās, they said, "If the only thing that will please the people of Iraq is the

98. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 685, where its location is described simply as "opposite Dayr al-Jamājim"; also *EI*², s.v. Dayr Ḳurra.

99. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 652, where it is said to have been seven parasangs from al-Kūfah. For further details, see *EI*², s.v. Dayr al-Djamādjim; and Sayed, Revolte, p. 211.

100. Dayr Qurrah means literally "the monastery of satisfaction," while Dayr al-Jamājim means literally "the monastery of the skulls" [for all that other explanations are volunteered].

101. An Iraqi town situated on the right bank of the Euphrates and generally regarded as the border town between Iraq and the Jazīrah (*EI*², s.v. al-Djazīra).

102. "Ampleness, or abundance, of the means of subsistence" (Lane, Lexicon, p. 1124c); presumably, "cheapness" is meant here (cf. below, n. 109).

103. According to Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. III, p. 908), the falālīj of the Sawād were its villages.

104. A settlement some eighty miles to the west of al-Kūfah (see *EI*², s.v.). removal of al-Ḥajjāj from them, that is easier than fighting them; so remove him from them, and that will secure obedience and spare our blood and theirs." [At this, 'Abd al-Malik] sent his son 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik to his brother, Muḥammad b. Marwān, [who was] in the territory of al-Mawṣil, ordering him to come to him. Both joined him, with their armies, and he ordered them to put it to the people of Iraq that al-Ḥajjāj would be removed from them, that they would be assigned the same stipends as those assigned to the Syrians, and that Ibn Muḥammad could stop in any part of Iraq he wished and could be governor of it for as long as he wished and as long as 'Abd al-Malik was ruler.[105] If they accepted this, al-Ḥajjāj would be dismissed and Muḥammad b. Marwān would be amīr of Iraq; and if they refused to accept it, al-Ḥajjāj would [remain] amīr of the Syrian army and war commander, with Muḥammad b. Marwān and 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik responsible to him.[106]

No order ever came to al-Ḥajjāj that was harder or more vexatious and hurtful to him than this, on account of [his] fear that they would accept and he would be dismissed. He wrote to 'Abd al-Malik, "O Commander of the Faithful, if you present the Iraqis with my removal, it will not be long before they disobey you and go against you. That will simply make them bolder against you. [1074]
Did you not see and hear of the uprising of the Iraqis with al-Ashtar against Ibn 'Affān? When he asked them what they wanted, they said, 'The removal of Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ'; and, when he had removed him, the year was not out before they went to him and killed him.[107] It takes iron to cleave iron.[108] May God be propitious to you in your deliberations. Peace be upon you." 'Abd al-Malik[, however,] insisted on proposing these conditions to the Iraqis, desiring freedom from war.

When [Muḥammad b. Marwān and 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik] had joined up with al-Ḥajjāj, 'Abdallāh went forth and said, "O people of Iraq, I am 'Abdallāh, son of the Commander of the Faithful. He will give you such-and-such," and he mentioned the

105. Wāliy^{an}: Ibn al-Athīr reads khalīfat^{an}, "caliph."

106. Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 137, gives a different version: According to him, 'Abd al-Malik's offer to the Iraqis consisted of (i) the dismissal of al-Ḥajjāj, (ii) the evacuation of the Syrians, and (iii) the appointment over them of whomever they might want.

107. Cf. Hinds, "Kûfan Political Alignments," pp. 360–61.

108. Cf. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, vol. I, pp. 9–10.

conditions which we have mentioned. [Then] Muḥammad b. Marwān said, "I am the messenger of the Commander of the Faithful to you, and he proposes to you such-and-such," and he mentioned these conditions.

They said, "We shall come back this evening," and went back and joined Ibn al-Ashʿath. Every single commander, chief, and horseman came to him. Ibn al-Ashʿath praised God and then said, "To continue: You have been presented with something which, if you take it today, [appears to be] an opportunity, and I am not sure that it will tomorrow [prove to] be a [matter for] regret for one possessed of insight. You are today all square [with them]. If they take al-Zāwiyah into account [against you], you may take the battle day of Tustar into account against them. Accept what they have offered you while you are mighty and strong, while the [Syrians] are fearful of you and you are still able to look down on them; and, by God, you will remain bold against them and mighty in their eyes if you accept, forever, as long as you live."

[1075] The people rose up on every side and said, "God has destroyed them. They are in a state of anguish, distress, famine, dearth, and abasement, while we have large numbers, [foodstuffs at] a cheap[109] price, and supplies nearby. No, by God, we shall not accept." And they repeated their disavowal of [ʿAbd al-Malik]. The first to do so at al-Jamājim were ʿAbdallāh b. Dhuʾāb and ʿUmayr b. Tayḥān. Their disavowal of him at al-Jamājim was more united than it had been in Fārs. [At this], Muḥammad b. Marwān and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Malik returned to al-Ḥajjāj and said, "Your camp and your army are your affair, so do as you think best. We have been ordered to heed and obey you." He said, "I told you that none other than the two of you are wanted for this command." Then he said, "I shall fight for you, and my authority is yours," and, whenever they met him, they greeted him as the amīr; [however,] it has been claimed by Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī that he also greeted them as amīrs when he met them. They let him get on with the war, which he took charge of.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Kalbī, Muḥammad b. al-Sāʾib: When the people gathered at al-Jamājim, I heard ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad say, "The Banū Marwān are reviled on account of 109. Al-rafīgh [cf. above, n. 102]: Ibn al-Athīr reads al-rakhīṣ.

[their] blue-eyed (that is, non-Arab) [mother].[110] By God, they have a lineage no better than that; and the Banū Abī al-ʿĀs[111] [are worse still, being] aʿlāj[112] from the people of Saffūriyyah![113] If this matter (that is, the caliphate) is among Quraysh, then I can adduce an origin from Quraysh,[114] and, if it is among the Arabs, I am the son of al-Ashʿath b. Qays!"[115] He said this at the top of his voice, to make the people hear.

They went forth to fight. Al-Ḥajjāj placed over his right wing ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym al-Kalbī,[116] over his left wing ʿUmārah [1076]
b. Tamīm al-Lakhmī,[117] over his cavalry Sufyān b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī,[118] and over his infantry ʿAbd al-Raḥmān[119] b. Ḥabīb[120] al-Ḥakamī. Ibn al-Ashʿath placed over his right wing al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah al-Khathʿamī,[121] over his left wing al-Abrad b. Qurrah al-Tamīmī,[122] over his cavalry ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbbās b. Rabīʿah b. al-Ḥārith al-Hāshimī,[123] over his infantry Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ,[124] and over his cataphracts ʿAbdallāh b. Rizām al-Ḥārithī.[125] He placed Jabalah b. Ẓahr b. Qays al-Juʿfī—who was accompanied by fifteen men from Quraysh—over the qurrāʾ, among whom were ʿĀmir al-Shaʿbī, Saʿīd b. Jubayr, Abū al-Bakhtarī, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā.[126]

---

110. Al-zarqāʾ: see Glossarium, p. CCLXXVII.

111. On this Qurashī group, see *EI*², suppl., s.v. Aʿyāṣ.

112. Singular ʿilj, a term signifying a man who is strong, sturdy, non-Arab, and an unbeliever.

113. A district in al-Urdunn, near al-Ṭabariyyah (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. III, p. 402). For some of the background to this piece of abuse, see Crone, Meccan Trade, p. 102, n. 70.

114. Fa-ʿannī fuqiʿat (or taqawwabat) bayḍat Quraysh. His grandmother, the wife of al-Ashʿath, was a sister of Abū Bakr's (*EI*², s.v. al-Ashʿath).

115. Cf. Ibn Aʿtham's (somewhat similar) version of this outburst (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 140).

116. Crone, Slaves on Horses, pp. 130–31.

117. Ibid., p. 140.

118. See above, n. 50.

119. "ʿAbdallāh" according to Mss. O and B, as well as Ibn al-Athīr.

120. "Khubayb" according to Ibn al-Athīr.

121. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register.

122. Crone, Slaves on Horses, pp. 112–13.

123. See above, n. 65.

124. Who, oddly, does not figure in Ibn al-Kalbī's Jamharah; see the index to al-Ṭabarī's text.

125. For all that we have been told above (p. 15 and n. 53) that he had been killed at the battle of al-Zāwiyah; he also reappears below (pp. 39, 43).

126. See the list of qurrāʾ provided by Sayed (Revolte, pp. 350ff., nos. 44, 15, 14, 23, and 17, respectively).

Then they began to engage each other every day and to fight. The supplies of the Iraqis came to them from al-Kūfah and its Sawād, and they were abundantly provided for as they wanted, [both the Kūfans] and their brethren the Baṣrans. The Syrians[, on the other hand,] were in dire straits: Prices went up to their disadvantage, food supplies became scarce for them, and they lacked meat; it was as if they were under siege. But, for all that, they took on the Iraqis throughout the day, fighting very fiercely. First al-Ḥajjāj would advance his trench, and then [the Iraqis] would [advance theirs, and so it went on] until the day on which Jabalah b. Zaḥr was struck down; then ['Abd al-Raḥmān] sent [word] to Kumayl b. Ziyād al-Nakha'ī,[127] who was a grave man, steadfast in war, possessed of courage, and a voice among the people. His [that [1077] is, Jabalah's] squadron was called "The Squadron of the Qurrā'." When attacked, they would scarcely move, and, when attacking, they would not retreat; they were known for that. One day, they made a sortie as usual, and the people made a sortie with them. Al-Ḥajjāj deployed his companions and then marched among his battle ranks. Ibn Muḥammad made a sortie with seven battle ranks, one after another. Al-Ḥajjāj deployed against Jabalah b. Zaḥr's squadron of qurrā' three squadrons, over which he placed al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī;[128] they advanced against them.

Abū Mikhnaf said: Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī related to me: I, by God, was among the cavalry deployed against Jabalah b. Zaḥr. We attacked him and his companions three times, one attack per squadron, and, by God, we found them in no way wanting.

[The Death of al-Mughīrah b. al-Muhallab]

In this year al-Mughīrah b. al-Muhallab[129] died in Khurasan.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad: Al-Mughīrah b. al-Muhallab was his father's deputy at Marw over the whole of his province; then he died in Rajab 82 (August–September 701). The news reached Yazīd [b. al-Muhallab], and the army learned of it, but they did not inform al-Muhallab. Yazīd 127. See Sayed's list, p. 357, no. 27.

128. EI[2], s.v. al-Djarrāḥ b. 'Abd Allāh; Crone, Slaves on Horses, pp. 132–33.
129. See above, n. 46.

wanted to let [al-Muhallab] know, so he instructed the women to cry out. Al-Muhallab said, "What is this?" and he was told, "al-Mughīrah has died." At this, he exclaimed, "Verily to God we belong, and verily unto Him we return!" and he grieved until his grief became apparent upon him and one of his intimates took him to task. He summoned Yazīd and sent him to Marw, having advised him as to what he should do, while his tears poured down onto his beard. Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to al-Muhallab, offering his condolences in respect of al-Mughīrah, who had been a sayyid. On [1078] the day when al-Mughīrah died, al-Muhallab was stationed at Kish[130] in Transoxania, for the purpose of making war on its people.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Yazīd went off with sixty—also put at seventy—horsemen, including Mujjā'ah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-'Atakī, 'Abdallāh b. Mu'ammar b. Shumayr[131] al-Yashkurī, Dīnār al-Sijistānī, al-Haytham b. al-Munakhkhal al-Jurmūzī, Ghazwān al-Iskāf the lord of Zamm[132]—who had converted to Islam at al-Muhallab's hand—Abū Muḥammad al-Zammī, and 'Aṭiyyah, [who was] a mawlā of 'Atīk. They were encountered in the desert of Nasaf by 150 Turks, who said to them, "Who are you?" and they replied, "Merchants." "Where are [your] loads?" asked [the Turks], and they replied, "We have sent them on ahead." "Well, give us something," said [the Turks]. Yazīd refused, but Mujjā'ah gave them a garment, some pieces of cloth, and a bow, and they departed. Then they acted treacherously and returned to them, and Yazīd said, "[There,] I knew best about them—fight them." The fighting between them intensified. Yazīd was on a horse near to the ground,[133] and with him was a Khārijī man whom he had taken [prisoner]. [This man] said [to him], "Allow me to live," and [Yazīd] acceded to that. Then he said to [the man], "What are you capable of?" and [the man] charged upon [the Turks] until he mingled with them; then he was behind them, having killed a man, then he rushed again and mingled with them until he came out in front of them, having killed [another] man; then he returned to Yazīd, who had [in the meantime] killed one of their lords and

130. *EI*², s.v.

131. Following the Addenda et Emendanda.

132. See below, n. 346.

133. Presumably, he was on a small horse or pony; Ibn al-Athīr omits the phrase.

been shot in the leg. [The Turks now] put on more pressure, and Abū Muḥammad al-Zammī fled; but Yazīd doggedly faced up to them, until they ultimately abstained from fighting [Yazīd and his companions]. They said, "We acted treacherously, but we shall not depart until either we all die, or you die, or you give us something."
[1079] Yazīd swore that he would not give them anything, but Mujjāʿah said, "For heaven's sake! Al-Mughīrah has perished, and you saw what an effect his death had on al-Muhallab. I beseech you by God not to be struck down today." [Yazīd] said [to him], "Al-Mughīrah did not exceed his allotted span, and I shall not exceed mine." Then Mujjāʿah threw them a yellow turban, and they took it and departed, [after which] Abū Muḥammad al-Zammī came with horsemen and food. Yazīd said to him, "You deserted us, O Abū Muḥammad," to which he replied, "I simply went off to bring reinforcements and food." The rajaz poet said:

Yazīd, you sword of Abū Saʿīd,[134] peoples and armies, together with The throng on the gathering day which is witnessed, know that you, on the battle day with the Turks, are made of stern stuff.

And al-Ashqarī[135] said (basīṭ):

The Turks know, when [Yazīd] encounters their throngs, that they have met one who is [like] a meteor that dispels darkness,
[One accompanied] by young men like lions of the thicket, who know no refuge save patience and endurance.
We see streaks of blood covering the people, but I do not see any sign of them shrinking back or fearing to advance.
Beneath them are full-grown horses that endure the adversity that they (the riders) endure, until they (the horses) are shoed[136] with blood.
[1080] In the turmoil of death, until nighttime envelops them, neither side either flees or suffers defeat.

134. I.e., al-Muhallab.
135. Kaʿb b. Maʿdān al-Ashqarī (see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 377–78).
136. Following the Addenda et Emendanda.

In this year al-Muhallab made peace with the people of Kish in return for tribute[137] and left it, heading for Marw.

The Reason for al-Muhallab's Departure from Kish

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad: Al-Muhallab was suspicious of some people from Muḍar. He accordingly imprisoned them and departed from Kish, leaving them [there]; he also left Ḥurayth b. Quṭbah, the mawlā of Khuzāʿah, saying to him, "When you have exacted the whole of the tribute, return the[ir] hostages to them." He crossed the river [Oxus] and, when he got to Balkh, he stopped there. He wrote to Ḥurayth, "I cannot be sure that, if you return the hostages to them, they will not attack you; accordingly, when you take possession of the tribute, do not set the hostages free until you reach Balkh territory." Ḥurayth said to the king of Kish, "Al-Muhallab has written to me [telling me] to detain the hostages until I reach Balkh territory." If you hasten [to let me have] what you owe, I shall hand your hostages over to you and go and tell him that his letter arrived after I had exacted the whole of what was owing and had handed the hostages over to you." [At this, the king] hastened [to pay] to [Ḥurayth and those with him the sum stipulated in] their peace agreement, and [Ḥurayth] returned to them those of them whom he held. [Ḥurayth] then set off and [was en route when he] was confronted by the Turks, who said, "Ransom yourself and those who are with you; we encountered Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, and he ransomed himself." Ḥurayth said, "Do you imagine that [1081] Yazīd's mother gave birth to me?" and he fought them and killed [some of] them and took prisoners, whom [the Turks] then ransomed; he treated them with favor, released them, and returned the ransom to them. His words, "Do you imagine that Yazīd's mother gave birth to me?" reached al-Muhallab, who said, "That slave is disdainful of [the idea] that he might have been born of his kinsmen,"[138] and he became angry.

137. So rendering fidyah (see Wellhausen, Kingdom, p. 434).

138. So rendering an talidahu raḥimuhu (Ibn al-Athīr says an talidahu ummu Yazīd); it is difficult to understand what al-Ṭabarī's version is driving at here, since Ḥurayth was a mawlā of Khuzāʿah and not of al-Azd.

When [Ḥurayth] came to [al-Muhallab] at Balkh, the latter said to him "Where are the hostages?" [Ḥurayth] replied, "I took possession of what was owing and let them go." [Al-Muhallab] said, "Didn't I write to you [telling you] not to let them go?" "Your letter reached me after I had let them go," [Ḥurayth] replied, "and after I had been spared what you feared." "You are lying," said [al-Muhallab], "you approached them and their king, and you apprised him of my letter to you," and he ordered that [Ḥurayth] be stripped. The latter exhibited much distress at being stripped, to such an extent that al-Muhallab thought that he must have leprosy; then he stripped him and gave him thirty lashes. Ḥurayth said, "I should have preferred you to have given me three hundred lashes without having stripped me," out of modesty and shame at being stripped; and he swore that he would kill al-Muhallab.

Al-Muhallab rode forth one day, and Ḥurayth also rode. While he was going along behind al-Muhallab, he ordered two ghulāms[139] of his to smite him; one of them refused and left him and departed, while the other did not dare to advance on [al-Muhallab] on his own. When he returned, [Ḥurayth] said to his ghulām, "What prevented you from [attacking] him?" [The ghulām] replied, "Fear for you, by God. I did not fear for myself, by God. I knew that, if we killed him, both you and we would be killed. My consideration was for you: Had I known that you would be safe from being killed, I should have killed him."

[Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Ḥurayth left off coming to al-Muhallab and made a show of being in pain. It reached al-Muhallab that he was feigning illness and that he wished to murder him, and he said to Thābit b. Quṭbah, "Bring me your [1082] brother, for he is to me as one of my sons. I did what I did to him only out of consideration for him and as a matter of discipline, just as I might give one of my sons a hiding in order to discipline him." Thābit accordingly came to his brother and besought him and asked him to ride to al-Muhallab. But he refused, being fearful of [al-Muhallab], and said, "I shall not go to him after he has done to me what he has done. I do not trust him, and he does not trust me." When his brother Thābit saw that, he said to him, "If that is your view, set forth with us to Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim," for Thābit feared that Ḥurayth would murder al-Muhallab and that they would then all be killed. They accordingly set forth with three hundred of their shākiriyyah[140] and Arab adherents.

139. This term has been translated as "young man" or "youth" when it clearly means no more than that, but has sometimes been left untranslated when some sort of servile or subservient status is implied (see *EI*², s.v.).

Abū Ja'far said: In this year al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah died.

The Cause and Place of the Death [of al-Muhallab]

'Alī b. Muḥammad said: Al-Mufaḍḍal related to me: When he departed from Kish, al-Muhallab went off heading for Marw, and, when he was at Zāghūl[141] [in the territory of] Marw al-Rūdh, he was struck by pleurisy—some people say by plague.[142] He summoned Ḥabīb and those of his [other] sons who were present, called for some arrows that were tied in a bundle, and said, "Do you think that you could break these while they are gathered together?" They said, "No." He said, "Do you think that you could break them when they are separated?" They said, "Yes." He said, "This is the collective body (jamā'ah). My testamentary command to you is pious fear of God and [respect for] the bond of kinship. The bond of kinship prolongs the allotted span, multiplies wealth, and increases numbers. I forbid you the forsaking of relations, for that occasions [hell]fire and brings about abasement and destitution. Love one another, relate to one another in a friendly fashion, be united and not at variance, and do good for one another; in this way your affairs will be as one. When the sons of a single mother fall out with one another, what hope is there for the sons of co-wives?! Incumbent upon you are obedience and [respect for] the collective body. Let your good-doing be nobler than your words. I like it in a man that his action be superior to [what] his tongue [says]. When answering, be on your guard against slips of the tongue: A man's foot may slip, and he [1083]

140. "Personal guard" (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 180); from Persian chākar, "servant."

141. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 907) knows it simply as one of the villages of Marw al-Rūdh, its only claim to fame being the presence there of al-Muhallab's tomb.

142. Following Lane in the rendering of shawkah; Dozy, however, defines it as "a painful ulcer, usually in the thumb" (Supplément, s.v.), which fits well with al-Ya'qūbī's akilah waqa'at fī rijlihi, "an ulcer which manifested itself in his foot" (Buldān, p. 299).

can recover himself; but his tongue may slip, and he can be destroyed. Acknowledge the entitlement of everyone who comes to you. A man's coming to you, whether in the morning or the evening, suffices to commend him to you. Prefer generosity to miserliness. Love the Arabs and do good [to them]. An Arab is a man to whom you can make [no more than] a promise and he will die in defense of you; how then [do you think] he will behave [if you have done him good]? In war, exercise patience together with trickery, which is more beneficial in war than courage. When the battle encounter takes place, [God's] decree domes down: If a man is resolute and then triumphs over his enemy, people say, 'He went about things head-on and then triumphed,' and he is praised; but if, after exercising patience, he does not triumph, people say, 'He was not remiss, nor did he throw away his chances, but [God's] decree prevailed.' Recite the Qur'ān and learn the established practices and the discipline of the virtuous. Beware of levity and of too much talking in your gatherings. I have deputed Yazīd over you and have put Ḥabīb in command of the army until he takes it to Yazīd. Do not oppose Yazīd."[143] Al-Mufaḍḍal said to him, "[Even] if you had not preferred him, we should have."

Al-Muhallab died, having made his testament to Ḥabīb. Ḥabīb prayed over him and then went to Marw. Yazīd wrote to 'Abd al-Malik with [news of] the death of al-Muhallab and his deputing of him; and al-Ḥajjāj confirmed him [in his position]. It is said that [al-Muhallab] said on the occasion of his death and testament, "If it were up to me, I should appoint Ḥabīb as the chief of my sons."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: He died in Dhū al-Ḥijjāh 82 (January [1084] 702); and Nahār b. Tawsi'ah al-Taymī[144] said (ṭawīl):

The campaigning that brought riches nigh has ended,
and generosity and munificence have died
after al-Muhallab.

143. For another version of this waṣiyyah, see Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, pp. 119ff.

144. The text wrongly says "al-Tamīmī" (a common error on the part of copyists). On this poet, see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, p. 379. The first two of the following verses are much cited: Cf., for example, al-Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, ser. ii, p. 1251 (below, p. 199); al-Zubayr b. Bakkār, al-Akhbār al-muwaffaqiyyāt, p. 386; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, vol. III, p. 298; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. IV, p. 506; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-a'yān, vol. V, p. 354; Hinds, Early Islamic Family, par. 54.

They have stayed at Marw al-Rūdh as two pledges
at his sepulcher
and have been rendered totally absent from east and west.
If anyone says, "Who of all people most deserves a blessing?"
we name him, without fear [of contradiction].
He made both flat and rugged territory available to us, with cavalry like flocks of swift sandgrouse, Exposing them to the thrusting of spears until it was as if he were honoring them with dyed purple.
He is surrounded by Qaḥṭān, who have bound themselves to him, and by their allies from the tribe[s] of Bakr and Taghlib.
The two tribes of Ma'add take refuge with his standard, offering themselves and their mothers and fathers as ransoms for him.

In this year al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf appointed Yazīd b. al-Muhallab [1085] over Khurasan after the death of al-Muhallab.

In it, too, 'Abd al-Malik dismissed Abān b. 'Uthmān[145] from Medina. Al-Wāqidī said: He dismissed him from it on 13 Jumādā II (25 July 701).

He (sc. al-Wāqidī) said: In it, too, 'Abd al-Malik appointed Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī[146] over Medina. When he was appointed there, Hishām b. Ismā'īl dismissed from the judiciary of Medina Nawfal b. Musāḥiq al-'Āmirī,[147] who had been appointed to that position by Yaḥyā b. al-Ḥakam; when Abān b. 'Uthmān took over there after the dismissal of Yaḥyā, he confirmed [Nawfal in his position] in charge of the judiciary. Abān's tenure of office lasted seven years, three months, and thirteen nights. When Hishām b. Ismā'īl dismissed Nawfal b. Musāḥiq from the

145. See above, n. 45.
146. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register; *EI*², s.v. Makhzūm.
147. From 'Āmir b. Lu'ayy of Quraysh (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).

judiciary, he appointed in his place 'Amr b. Khālid al-Zuraqī.[148]

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was Abān b. 'Uthmān: Thus it has been related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar. Over al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah and the East was al-Ḥajjāj, while over Khurasan was Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, acting on behalf of al-Ḥajjāj.

148. 'Amr b. Khaldah al-Zuraqī according to Khalīfah (Ta'rīkh, p. 299 [and 'Umar b. Khuldah al-Z., according to the 1968 Damascus edition by Zakkār, p. 390]); the clan in question is presumably Zurayq b. 'Āmir of Khazraj of the Anṣār (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, chart 192, where a certain Khaldah b. 'Āmir is to be found, albeit without a son named 'Amr/'Umar).

The Events of the Year 83

(FEBRUARY 4, 702–JANUARY 23, 703)

In it there took place the defeat of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath at Dayr al-Jamājim. [1086]

The Cause of [Ibn al-Ash'ath's] Defeat

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Zubayr al-Hamdānī: I was among the cavalry of Jabalah b. Zaḥr. When the Syrians attacked him time after time, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā, the specialist in religious law (faqīh), called to us, saying,[149] "O body of qurrā', for no one is flight more unseemly than for you. I heard 'Alī—may God raise his station among the virtuous and grant him the best reward of martyrs and those who are veracious—say on the day when we encountered the Syrians [at Ṣiffīn]: 'O Believers, he who sees aggression being committed and something disliked being enjoined and denies it in his heart, he is safe and secure; he who denies [it] with his tongue is rewarded, he being worthier than his companion [who simply denied it in his heart]; and he who denies it with the sword, so that the Word of God may be uppermost and the word of the oppressors the lowest,[150] he is the one who achieves the path of right guidance, the one whose heart is illuminated with certainty.' So fight these innovators, who deem licit that which is illicit, who neither know nor acknowledge that which is right, and who have committed an aggression which they do not deny."

149. According to Ibn al-Athīr (and al-Maqrīzī—see the Addenda et Emendanda), it was Jabalah who said this, to 'Abd al-Raḥmān and the qurrā'.

Abū al-Bakhtarī said, "Fight for your religion and for [this] world of yours. By God, if they triumph over you, they will corrupt your religion for you and take over your worldly interests."

Al-Sha'bī said, "O people of Islam, fight them. No harm will overtake you in fighting them. By God, I know of no people on the face of the earth more oppressive or tyrannical in rule than they.
[1087] So hasten against them."

Sa'īd b. Jubayr said, "Fight them. You will not sin by fighting against them and their sins with [firm] intention and certitude. Fight against their tyranny in rule, their insolent behavior in [matters pertaining to] religion, their abasing of the weak, and their 'causing the death of' ritual prayer."[151]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Zubayr: We prepared to charge them, and Jabalah said to us, "When you charge them, make the charge a true one: Do not turn your faces away from them before you fall upon their line." [Abū al-Zubayr] continued: We charged them single-mindedly and strongly. We smote the three squadrons until they split up; then we went on until we fell on their line and smote them until we removed them from [their position]; then we withdrew and passed by Jabalah, fallen, and we did not know how he had been killed.

[Abū al-Zubayr] said: That shook us. We became faint-hearted and stopped where we were. Our qurrā' were numerous,[152] and

---

150. Cf. Qur'ān 9:40.

151. Imatātihim al-ṣalāt. Cf. Hawting, First Dynasty of Islam, p. 70, to which it may be added that it was known in Baṣran and Omani Ibāḍī circles of the late second/early third century A.H. that al-Ḥajjāj had sometimes delayed the Friday prayer until sunset, when the noon, afternoon, and sunset prayers were performed together (al-Siyar wa-al-jawābāt li-'ulamā' wa-a'immat ahl 'Umān, vol. I, pp. 291, 309–10 [the source being Abū Sufyān Maḥbūb b. al-Raḥīl]); and the seventeenth-century chronicler Ibn al-'Imād (Shadharāt al-dhahab, vol. I, p. 92) was aware that al-Ḥajjāj kāna yumītu al-ṣalāt ḥattā yakhruja waqtuha, literally, "he used to cause the death of ritual prayer until the [proper] time for its performance passed."

152. According to Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 139), there were over 8,000 min al-qurrā' wa-al-zuhhād wa-al-'ubbād mimman yarā qatl al-Ḥajjāj jihād[an].

we passed the news of the death of Jabalah b. Zaḥr from one to another. For each of us, it was as if he had lost his father or his brother; indeed, on that battlefield it was an even more grievous loss. Then Abū al-Bakhtarī al-Ṭā'ī said to us, "Do not let the killing of Jabalah b. Zaḥr show its effect upon you. He was simply a man among you whose fate came to him on its [appointed] day; there was no way his [death] day could have been put either forward or back. Each of you will taste what he has tasted: [Each [1088] will be] called and will answer." [Abū al-Zubayr] continued: I looked at the faces of the qurrā', and despondency was clearly written on them. Their tongues were tied. [A sense of] failure was manifest among them. The Syrians, glad and joyful, called out, "O enemies of God, you are destroyed. God has killed your wayward leader."[153]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī: When Jabalah and his companions charged, we were put to flight, and they followed us. A group split off from us and was to one side, and we looked, and, lo and behold, his companions were following our companions, and he had stopped on top of an elevated piece of ground, [waiting] for his companions to return to him. One of us said, "That, by God, is Jabalah b. Zaḥr. Charge him while his companions are distracted from him by the fighting; perhaps you will strike him down." [Abū Yazīd] continued: So we charged him. I testify that he did not flee: Rather, he charged us with his sword. When he came down from the elevation, we transfixed him with spears and dislodged him from his horse; he fell down dead. His companions returned, and, when we saw them coming, we turned aside from them. When they saw him dead, we saw from their exclamations[154] and grief what gladdened our eyes. He continued: We distinguished that plainly [too] in their [manner of] fighting us and their coming out against us.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sahm b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Juhanī: When Jabalah was struck down, his death shook the people. Then Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah al-Shaybānī came, and his arrival encouraged the people. They said, "This man can take the place of Jabalah." Abū al-Bakhtarī heard such talk from one of them and said, "How foul that you have been made [by God]! If [1089] one man among you is killed, you think that you are surrounded; if Ibn Maṣqalah is now killed, will you surrender yourselves to destruction, and will you say that there is no one left to fight alongside? How fit you are for our hope of you to be altered!" Bisṭām had come from al-Rayy, and on the way he and Qutaybah [b. Muslim] had encountered each other. Qutaybah had invited him to [side with] al-Ḥajjāj and the Syrians, while Bisṭām had invited [Qutaybah] to [side with] 'Abd al-Raḥmān and the Iraqis. Each had declined the other's proposal, and Bisṭām had said, "I would rather die with the Iraqis than live with the Syrians"; he had stopped at Māsabadhān.[155]

153. So rendering ṭāghūt (which seems preferable to the variant ṭāghiyah).

154. Istirjā'ihim, i.e., their exclamation of the words innā li-Allāh wa-innā ilayhi rāji'ūn, "To God we belong and to Him we return!"

When [Bisṭām] arrived, he said to Ibn Muḥammad, "Give me the command of the cavalry of Rabī'ah"; and he did so. Then [Bisṭām] said to them, "O band of Rabī'ah, I have a bad disposition in war; please tolerate it for me." He was a brave man. One day, the people went out to fight and he attacked with the cavalry of Rabī'ah until he entered the [Syrian] camp. They took, among others, about thirty women—slave girls and concubines—and he brought them back with him until he drew near to his [own] camp, when he let them go, and they went off and entered al-Ḥajjāj's camp. "Woe to them!" said [al-Ḥajjāj], "Let [the Iraqis] protect their women! Had they not returned [our women], I would be taking their women captive[156] tomorrow when I triumph." Then they fought on a subsequent day, and 'Abdallāh b. Mulayl al-Hamdānī made an attack with his cavalry, entered [the Syrian] camp, and took eighteen women captive. With him was Ṭāriq b. 'Abdallāh al-Asadī, who was an archer. An old Syrian man came out of his tent, and the Asadī began to say to one of his companions, "Conceal this old man from me, lest I shoot him or attack him and transfix him." The old man said, raising his voice, "O [1090] God, gather us and them together with well-being"; the Asadī said, "I do not want to kill someone like this," and he left him. [At this] Ibn Mulayl brought the women [to a place] not far [from the Syrian camp] and let them go too. Al-Ḥajjāj said [by way of reaction] something similar to what he had said on the first occasion [when women were taken].

155. A district of Jibāl bordering Iraq (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 202).

156. Preferring Ibn al-Athīr's la-sabaytu nisā'ahum to al-Ṭabarī's la-subiyat nisā'uhum.

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—his father: Al-Walīd b. Naḥīt[157] al-Kalbī, from the Banū 'Āmir, advanced in a squadron upon Jabalah b. Zaḥr. Al-Walīd, who was a huge man, got down from his riding animal,[158] and he and Jabalah, who was a man of middling size, engaged each other. [Al-Walīd] smote [Jabalah] on the head, and he fell. His companions were defeated, and his head was brought.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf and 'Awānah al-Kalbī: When the head of Jabalah b. Zaḥr was brought to al-Ḥajjāj, he carried it on two spears and then said, "O people of Syria, rejoice. This is the beginning of victory. No sedition has ever been put down without a leading Yemeni being killed in it, and this is one of their leading men."

Then they made a sortie one day, and a Syrian came forth calling for a duel. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah went out to him, attacked him, transfixed him, and brought him off his mount. His companions charged and saved him, he being a man from Khath'am called Abū al-Dardā'. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah said, "I didn't recognize him until he fell. Had I done so, I should not have fought him; I do not want someone like him from my people to be struck down."

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Awf al-Ru'āsī, Abū Ḥumayd, went forth and [1091] called for a duel. A cousin (ibn 'amm) of his among the Syrians went out to him, and they exchanged blows with their swords. Each of them said, "I am the champion (lit. 'young man') of Kilāb," and then each said to the other, "Who are you?" When they had questioned each other, they abstained from fighting.

'Abdallāh b. Rizām al-Ḥārithī went out to the squadron of al-Ḥajjāj and said, "Come out to me one by one." A man was sent out to him, and he killed him. He did this for three days, killing a man each day. Then he arrived on the fourth day and they said, "He has come, would that God had not brought him!" He called for a duel. Al-Ḥajjāj said to al-Jarrāḥ [sc. b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī], "Go out to him," so he went out to him. 'Abdallāh b. Rizām, who was a friend of his, said to him, "Woe to you, O Jarrāḥ, whatever made you come out to me?" He said, "I have been put to the test with you." ['Abdallāh] said to him, "Are you in favor of something good?" [Al-Jarrāḥ] said, "What is that?" ['Abdallāh] said, "I shall lose for you, and you [will be able to] go back to al-Ḥajjāj having done well in his eyes, and he will praise you. As for me, I shall [be able to] put up with people's talk about you concerning my defeat, out of love for your safety. I do not want someone like you from my people to be killed." [Al-Jarrāḥ] said, "Do [that]," and attacked him; ['Abdallāh] began to simulate flight, running in front of him. The Hārithī's uvula had been cut,[159] and he was very thirsty; with him was a lad who had a skin of water and gave him to drink whenever he was thirsty. Al-Ḥārithī ran in front of him and al-Jarrāḥ [caught up and] attacked him in earnest, wanting nothing more than to kill him. The lad shouted to him, "The man is serious about killing you." But the Ḥārithī felt compassion for him, smote him on the head with an iron bar, felled him, and said to the lad, "Sprinkle some of the water in the skin on his face and give him to drink"; the lad did so. Then [the Ḥārithī] said, "O Jarrāḥ, you rewarded me badly. I wanted well-being for you, and you wanted to make me visit destiny." [Al-Jarrāḥ] said, "I did not want that." He said, "Go; I have left you on account of our kinship and [for the sake of] the clan."

157. The text gives "Nukhayt," and it can be seen from the variants that the form of this name is uncertain.

158. Preferring the variant dābbatihi to rāyatihi.

[1092] According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī Sabrah—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān—Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī:[160] I was in the battle line on that day when an Iraqi called Qudāmah b. al-Ḥarīsh al-Tamīmī came out and stood between the two lines and said, "O band of the Jarāmiqah[161] of the Syrians, we call you to the Book of God and the Sunnah of His Messenger;[162] if you refuse [to accept this], let a man come out to me." A Syrian man went out to him, and he killed him, [and more went out] until he had killed four. When al-Ḥajjāj saw that, he ordered a crier to call out, "Let no one 159. Not in the fighting, of course, but previously; presumably, because it had become swollen. Professor Iḥsān 'Abbās informs me that this practice still persists in Middle Eastern village life.

160. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register.

161. A term signifying natives (i.e., non-Arabs) of al-Jazīrah (see *EI*², s.v. Djarādjima [vol. II, p. 457b]), and hence clearly intended here as an insult.

162. See above, n. 21.

go out to this dog"; and the people held back.

Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī continued: I drew near to al-Ḥajjāj and said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! You have decided that no one should go out to this dog, at a time when these people have perished according to their allotted spans. This man too has his allotted span, and I hope that it has now run its course. Give permission to my companions who have come with me that one of them may go against him." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "This dog has turned the thing into a habit and has frightened [our] people. [But] I [nonetheless] give permission to your companions; he who wishes to stand up may do so." Al-Ḥarashī accordingly returned to his companions and informed them [of this], and, when Qudāmah called out for a duel, one of al-Ḥarashī's companions went out against him, only to be killed by him. That distressed Sa'īd and weighed heavily upon him, on account of what he had said to al-Ḥajjāj. Then Qudāmah called out [yet again] for a duel, and Sa'īd drew near to al-Ḥajjāj and said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! Give me permission to go against this dog." He said, "Are you up to it?" Sa'īd said, "Yes, I am just as you want." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Show me your sword," and he gave it to him. Al- [1093]
Ḥajjāj said, "I have with me a sword that is heavier than this one," and he ordered that the sword be his and gave it to him. Then he looked at Sa'īd and said, "You have fine armor and a strong horse, [but even so] I do not know how the matter will turn out with this dog." Sa'īd said, "I hope that God will give me victory over him." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Go forth with God's blessing."

Sa'īd said: So I went out to him and, when I drew near to him, he said, "Stop, O enemy of God!" and I stopped, pleased. He said, "Choose: Either you let me strike you three times [first], or I let you strike me three times and then you let me." I said, "Let me [go first]," and he placed his chest on his saddle bow and said, "Strike." I grasped my sword with both hands and struck [him] on the helmet as hard as I could; he did nothing, and I was displeased with both my sword and my blow. Then I decided to strike him at the base of his neck,[163] hoping thereby either to cut right through or [at the very least] to disable his hand. I struck it and did nothing, so displeasing both myself and those who were remote from me in the area of the camp, when what I had done reached them. The third [attempt was] similarly [unsuccessful]. Then he unsheathed a sword and said, "[Now] let me [have a go]." I let him and he struck me a blow with which he felled me. Then he dismounted from his horse, sat on my chest, pulled a dagger or knife out of his boot and placed it on my throat, intending to slay me. I said to him, "I beseech you by God, you will not acquire the nobility and renown by killing me that you will acquire by sparing me." He said, "Who are you?" I said, "Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī." He said, "Woe, enemy of God! Depart, and inform your master of what you have encounter¡d." Saʿīd said: I accordingly departed, [1094] hastening, until I got to al-Ḥajjāj. He said, "What do you think?" I said, "The amīr knew better."

163. So rendering aṣl al-'ātiq.

The account returns to that of Abū Mikhnaf on the authority of Abū Yazīd [al-Saksakī]: Abū al-Bakhtarī al-Ṭāʾī and Saʿīd b. Jubayr used to say, "It is not given to any soul to die, save by the leave of God, at an appointed time," to the end of the verse,[164] and then they charged until they fell upon the battle line.

Abū al-Mukhāriq said: We fought them for a full hundred days, which I counted. He went on: We stopped at Dayr al-Jamājim with Ibn Muḥammad on the morning of Tuesday, 1 Rabīʿ I, 83 (April 4, 702), and we were defeated on Wednesday, 14 Jumādā II (July 15, 702),[165] when the sun was at the highest point of the day. We were never bolder against them, nor they weaker against us, than on that day.

He continued: We went out to them, and they to us, on Wednesday, 14 Jumādā II, and we fought them for most of the day the best we had ever fought them. We felt safe from defeat, gaining the upper hand, when Sufyān b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī sallied forth with the cavalry from the [Syrian] right wing until he drew near to al-Abrad b. Qurrah al-Tamīmī, who was in command of ʿAbd al-

164. Qurʾān 3:145 = 139.

165. Ibn al-Athīr gives the same dates and correctly arrives at a total of 103 days. Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 138) knows the hundred-day report and another report to the effect that the fighting lasted for four months; cf. Khalīfah (Taʾrīkh, pp. 284–85), who states that the defeat took place on 14 Jumādā (sic) 82 (sic). For further discussion, see Périer, Vie d'al-Hadjdjadj ibn Yousof, p. 186n.; Sayed, Revolte, pp. 220–21.

Raḥmān b. Muḥammad's left wing. Then, by God, after not much fighting, [al-Abrad b. Qurrah] was defeated. This was something on his part that the people disapproved of, since he was a brave man and flight was not a habit of his; they suspected that he had been granted an assurance of safety and that an agreement had been reached with him [by the Syrians] that he would be defeated [1095] with the people. When he did that, the battle lines near him were routed, and the people rode off in all directions. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad ascended the pulpit and began to call to the people, "To me, O servants of God! I am Ibn Muḥammad!" 'Abdallāh b. Rizām al-Ḥārithī came to him and stopped under his pulpit; and 'Abdallāh b. Dhu'āb al-Sulamī came with his cavalry. ['Abd al-Raḥmān] stood near him and stayed put until the Syrians were close to him and their arrows began to get the better of him. At this, ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said, "O Ibn Rizām, attack these men and cavalry," and he did so until they ran off. Then more Syrian cavalry came, together with infantry, and he said, "Attack them, O Ibn Dhu'āb," and he did so until they ran off. ['Abd al-Raḥmān himself] stayed where he was, not leaving his pulpit, and the Syrians entered [his] camp and cried out, "God is great!" 'Abdallāh b. Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal al-Azdī—whose brother's daughter Mulaykah was the wife of 'Abd al-Raḥmān[166]—climbed up to him and said, "Come down. I am afraid you will be taken captive if you do not come down. Maybe, if you leave [now], you will [be able to] gather together a force with which God will destroy them on another day." 'Abd al-Raḥmān then came down, and the Iraqis left the camp in defeat and disorder. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad went off with Ibn Ja'dah b. Hubayrah,[167] accompanied by members of his family, and, when they were opposite the village of the sons of Ja'dah at al-Fallūjah,[168] they summoned a ferryboat and crossed in it. Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah joined them and said, "Is 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad in the boat?" but they did not

166. Mulaykah would thus be the granddaughter of Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal, rather than his daughter, as Ibn al-Kalbī thought (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, vol. I, chart 218, and vol. II, p. 427); in Ibn al-Athīr "al-Mughaffal" is wrongly rendered as "al-Mufaḍḍal."

167. Presumably, either Ja'far b. Ja'dah or 'Abdallāh b. Ja'dah (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).

168. A locality on the Euphrates downstream from al-Anbār (*EI*², s.v.).

speak to him. [Bisṭām] suspected that ['Abd al-Raḥmān] was among them and said (ṭawīl):

May a soul for which you are cautious not find refuge.

[and (mutaqārib)]:[169]

[1096] Qays set the country on fire against me, until, when it blazed, he desisted.

Then he went off until he reached his house, wearing arms and riding his horse, from which he had not dismounted. His daughter came out to him, and he clasped her; and his family came out to him, weeping. He made his testament to them and said, "Do not weep. Don't you know, if I do not leave you, how long I am likely to remain with you before I die? If I do die, then He who grants you sustenance now is alive and will not die. He will sustain you after my death, just as He sustains you in my lifetime." Then he bade his family farewell and left al-Kūfah.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Kalbī, Muḥammad b. al-Sā'ib: When they were defeated, the sun was at its highest point in the day. He went on: I set off, straining, with my spear, sword, and shield, until I reached my family on the same day without having discarded any of my arms. Al-Ḥajjāj had said, "Leave them. Let them scatter and do not follow them," and a crier called out, "Whoever returns will be given safe-conduct."

After the battle, Muḥammad b. Marwān returned to al-Mawṣil and 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik to Syria, leaving Iraq to al-Ḥajjāj. He went on until he entered al-Kūfah, seated beside him Maṣqalah b. Karib b. Raqabah al-'Abdī, who was a khaṭīb,[170] and said, "Revile in all possible ways every man to whom we have done good; revile [each one] for ingratitude and disloyalty. Stigmatize in all possible ways everyone you know to have a defect and make him slight in his own eyes." No one rendered [al-Ḥajjāj] the oath of allegiance but that he [first] said to him, "Do you testify that [1097] you have been in a state of unbelief?" If he acknowledged this, [al-Ḥajjāj] accepted the oath of allegiance; if not, he killed him. There came to him a man from Khath'am, who had kept himself apart from all [the Iraqis], on the other side of the Euphrates, and [al-Ḥajjāj] asked him what he had been up to. [The man] said, "I stayed apart, on the other side of this river, waiting to see what would happen to [the Iraqi army], until you were victorious. Then I came to you in order to render you the oath of allegiance along with the people." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Were you waiting [to see the result]? Do you testify that you are an unbeliever?" [The man] said, "What a bad man I would be—I, who have worshiped God for eighty years—if I were now to testify against myself to unbelief." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "In that case, I shall kill you." He said, "If you kill me, well, by God, there is very little life left in me anyway. I wait for death morning, noon, and night." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Behead him!" and he was beheaded. [People] have claimed that no Qurashī or Syrian or anyone of the two sides remained around [that man] but that he felt compassion for him and deplored the killing of him.[171]

169. This verse is ascribed to al-Rabī' b. Ziyād (see, for example, Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān al-'arab, vol. XIV, p. 356).

170. See above, n. 5.

[Al-Ḥajjāj] summoned Kumayl b. Ziyād al-Nakha'ī[172] and said to him, "You are the one who retaliated by killing 'Uthmān, the Commander of the Faithful. I have [long] wanted to find a way of getting at you." [Kumayl] said, "I do not know which of us you are getting angry with: With him, when he laid himself open to retaliation, or with me, when I turned away from punishing him." Then he said, "O you man of Thaqīf, do not gnash your fangs at me, do not come down on me like a sand dune, do not bare your wolfish teeth at me! By God, there is very little life left in me anyway.[173] Carry out what you have decided; the appointment [will be with] God; the killing will be followed by [divine] judgment." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "The decisive proof [will be] against you." He said, "That [will be the case only] if you are sitting in judgment." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "O yes, you were among those who killed 'Uthmān and disavowed the Commander of the Faithful. [1098] Kill him!" and he was killed, his killer being Abū al-Jahm b.

171. Dixon (Umayyad Caliphate, pp. 167–68, n. 109) correctly observes that this sentence was misunderstood by Veccia Vaglieri (*EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Ash'ath [vol. III, p. 719a]).

172. See above, n. 127.

173. Literally, "all that has remained of my life is the period between the two drinkings of the ass: He drinks in the morning and dies in the evening, and he drinks in the evening and dies in the morning."

Kinānah al-Kalbī, of the Banū 'Āmir b. 'Awf, the cousin (ibn 'amm) of Manṣūr b. Jumhūr.[174] After him, somebody else was brought, and al-Ḥajjāj said, "I see a man who will not, I think, testify against himself to unbelief." [The man] said, "Do you [think you can] trick me as if I did not know myself? I am the most unbelieving person on earth. I am even more of an unbeliever than Pharaoh, the master of the stakes!"[175] Al-Ḥajjāj laughed and let him go. He stayed in al-Kūfah for a month and kept the Syrians away from the houses of the Kūfans.[176]

In this year there took place the battle at Maskin between al-Ḥajjāj and Ibn al-Ash'ath, after [the latter] had been put to flight from Dayr al-Jamājim.

The Cause of the Battle [of Maskin], with a Description of It

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Yazīd al-Saksakī: Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ went off after the battle of [Dayr] al-Jamājim until he stopped at al-Madā'in; there he was joined by a great many people. [At about the same time] 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah b. Ḥabīb b. 'Abd Shams al-Qurashī went off to al-Baṣrah, in which was Ayyūb b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī 'Aqīl,[177] the cousin of al-Ḥajjāj, and took it.
[1099] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad [thereupon] went to al-Baṣrah, while ['Ubaydallāh] was there; the people rallied to him, and he stopped there. At this, 'Ubaydallāh went to Ibn Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath and said to him, "It was not my intention to be separate from you; I took [the city] for you." Al-Ḥajjāj [now] set forth and started with al-Madā'in. He stopped opposite it for five [nights], during which time he readied [his] men in ferryboats. When it reached Muḥammad b. Sa'd that they had crossed to them, [he

174. Who rose to prominence as a general at the very end of the Umayyad period (Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 158).

175. This being a form of reference to Pharaoh occurring in the Qur'ān (89:10 = 9 and 38:12 = 11); for some discussion of it, see *EI*², s.v. Fir'awn.

176. 'Azala ahl al-Sha'm 'an buyūt ahl al-Kūfa. Ibn al-Athīr, on the other hand, tells us just the opposite: anzala ahl al-Sha'm buyūt ahl al-Kūfah, and he goes on to say: anzalahum al-Ḥajjāj fihā ma'a ahlihā, wa-huwa awwal man anzala al-jund fī buyūt ghayrihim. . . .

177. For 'Ubaydallāh see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register. On Ayyūb see above, n. 82.

and] all [who were with him] set off and joined Ibn al-Ash'ath. Al-Ḥajjāj advanced toward him, and the people [at al-Baṣrah] went out with ['Abd al-Raḥmān] to Maskin[178] on [the] Dujayl [river]. [There] the Kūfans and the fugitive elements from the peripheral areas came to him. The people reproved each other for having taken to flight, and most of them rendered an oath of allegiance to Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah to fight to the death. 'Abd al-Raḥmān dug in around his companions and protected one flank by flooding, so making fighting [possible] in [only] one direction; he was also joined by Khālid b. Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī,[179] who came from Khurasan with people from the Kūfan contingent [there]. They fought most furiously for fifteen nights in Sha'bān (September), until Ziyād b. Ghunaym al-Qaynī, who was in charge of al-Ḥajjāj's strong-points, was killed; that shook [al-Ḥajjāj] and his companions very considerably.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū Jahḍam al-Azdī: Al-Ḥajjāj stayed awake all night, going about among us and saying to us, "You are people of obedience, and they are people of disobedience; you are striving after God's pleasure, while they are striving after His displeasure. God's wont with you concerning them is good. You will never fight them gallantly on any battlefield or show endurance against them but that God will requite you with victory against them and triumph over them. So go against them in the morning aggressively, earnestly. I do not doubt victory, God willing."

[Abū Jahḍam] continued: we went against them in the morning, having made our dispositions shortly before daybreak. We were afoot earlier than they were, and we fought them the hardest we had ever fought them. 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab came to us on an armored horse[180] at a time when the cavalry of Sufyān b. al- [1100]

178. This is not the better-known Maskin (watered by the Dujayl canal) to the north of what would later be the city of Baghdad (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, map II and p. 51), but a more obscure Maskin somewhere on or near the Dujayl (Kārūn) river (see Sayed, Revolte, p. 225, for further details; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. IV, p. 531, seems himself to be mistaken when he says, "al-Ḥāzimī mentioned that Maskin is also [a place] at the Dujayl of al-Ahwāz where al-Ḥajjāj's battle with Ibn al-Ash'ath took place, and that is a mistake on his part").

179. This appears to be the one and only reference to a person of this name (cf. Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 114); Wellhausen's reference to this name (Kingdom, p. 251) should be changed to Khālid b. 'Abd Allāh al-Qasrī.

180. Reading mujaffifan where the text has muḥaffifan.

Abrad was without armor. Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Join these oddments to you[r men], O ʿAbd al-Malik; I may be making an attack." He did so, and the Iraqis were attacked from every side and put to flight. Abū al-Bakhtarī al-Ṭāʾī and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Laylā were killed. Before being killed, they said, "Flight is always odious to us"; then they were struck down.

[Abū Jahḍam] continued: Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah al-Shaybānī went with four thousand of the most steadfast [people] from the two miṣrs (that is, al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah); they broke the sheaths of their swords. Ibn Maṣqalah said to them, "If, in fleeing from death, we might escape it, we would flee; but we know that it will come upon us soon, and where can one take oneself away from what is inevitable? O you people, you are manifesting what is right, so fight for what is right. By God, [even] if you were not in the right, death with honor would [still] be better than life in a state of abasement." He and his companions then fought fiercely and put the Syrians to flight several times. Eventually al-Ḥajjāj said, "Bring in the archers: No one else can fight them." When the archers came and the [Syrians] surrounded them on every side, all but a few of them were killed. Bukayr b. Rabīʿah b.[181] Tharwān al-Ḍabbī was taken captive and was brought to al-Ḥajjāj, who killed him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Jahḍam: I brought a captive known to al-Ḥajjāj for his bravery. Al-Ḥajjāj said, "O Syrians, [1101] it is part of God's favor to you that this young man has brought the horseman of the Iraqis as a captive. Behead him!" And he killed him.

[Abū al-Jahḍam] continued: Ibn al-Ashʿath and those who had been put to flight with him went in the direction of Sijistān. Al-Ḥajjāj sent after him ʿUmārah b. Tamīm al-Lakhmī, together with his son Muḥammad b. al-Ḥajjāj, with ʿUmārah as the amīr over the people. ʿUmārah b. Tamīm went to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and caught up with him at al-Sūs.[182] [ʿUmarāh] fought him for one hour in the daytime; then he and his companions were defeated and went off until they reached Sābūr.[183] ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b.

181. Omitting "Abī," as proposed in the Addenda et Emendanda.

182. Ancient Susa, in Khūzistān (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 240).

183. I.e., Shāpūr in Fārs (ibid., p. 262).

Muḥammad was [in the meantime] joined by the Kurds, together with the routed troops who were with him. 'Umārah b. Tamīm next fought them fiercely in the narrow pass, until he and many of his companions were wounded; then they were defeated and left the mountain road to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who went on until he passed through Kirmān.

Al-Wāqidī said: The battle of al-Zāwiyah at al-Baṣrah was in Muḥarram 83 (February 702).

[The Breakup of Ibn al-Ash'ath's Defeated Army]

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sayf b. Bishr al-'Ijlī—al-Munakhkhal b. Ḥābis al-'Abdī: When 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad entered Kirmān, he was met by 'Amr b. Laqīṭ al-'Abdī, who was his governor over it; [this 'Amr] prepared hospitality for him, and he stopped. A shaykh of 'Abd al-Qays called Ma'qil then said to him, "By God, it has reached us concerning you, O Ibn al-Ash'ath, that you were a coward." 'Abd al-Raḥmān said, "By God, I was not a coward. By God, I have advanced with infantry upon infantry, and I have wrapped up cavalry with cavalry; I have fought both horseman and infantryman, and I have not been defeated. I have not left the battlefield to the enemy at any time until I found no place in [1102] which to fight and saw no one to fight along with me; rather, [far from being a coward,] I sought a premature sovereignty."[184] Then he went with those who were with him until he entered the desert of Kirmān.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām b. Ayyūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī 'Aqīl: When Ibn Muḥammad went into the desert of Kirmān, followed by the Syrians, one of the Syrians entered a residence in the desert, and there he found, inscribed by one of the Kūfans, some of the poetry of Abū Jildah al-Yashkurī, [from] a long ode [of his] (wāfir).[185]

O woe and all [-embracing] sorrow, what anguish [there is] at what we have encountered!

184. So rendering zāwaltu mulk^{an} mu'ajjal^{an}.

185. On this poet, see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 375–76 (also Bosworth, Sīstān, p. 59 and n. 6). Regarding the following verses, cf. Aghānī^{2}, vol. XI, pp. 312–13; verses 3 and 4 also occur in Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 143.

We have left both the religion and this world, and we have abandoned [our] wives and children.
We were not religious people, that we might endure tribulation when tested,
Nor were we people of this world, able to protect it, even though we did not aspire to religion.
We have left our homes to the rabble of 'Akk and [to] the indigenous villagers and the Ash'arīs.[186]

Then Ibn Muḥammad went on until he reached Zaranj, the [chief] city of Sijistān, in which was a man from the Banū Tamīm whom he had put in charge of it, namely, 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-[1103] Na"ār,[187] from the Banū Mujāshi' b. Dārim. When 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad came to him in defeat, he shut the gate of the city in his face and prevented him from entering it. 'Abd al-Raḥmān stayed put for some days in the hope of gaining access to it, but, when he saw that he would not achieve this, he went off to Bust, in charge of which he had appointed a man from Bakr b. Wā'il called 'Iyāḍ b. Himyān Abū Hishām b. 'Iyāḍ al-Sadūsī.[188] [This 'Iyāḍ] received him and invited him to stop [at Bust], which he accordingly did; ['Iyāḍ] thereupon waited until 'Abd al-Raḥmān's companions were off guard and had strayed away from him, and then pounced upon him and put him in bonds, desiring thereby to be secure vis-à-vis al-Ḥajjāj and to achieve [good] standing in his eyes.

News of 'Abd al-Raḥmān's arrival had in the meantime reached the Zunbīl, who went to meet him. When 'Iyāḍ took ['Abd al-Raḥmān], the Zunbīl moved on Bust[189] and invested it, sending [word] to the Bakrī [as follows]: "By God, if you harm as much as a hair of his head,[190] I shall not leave the battlefield until I bring you

186. As Wellhausen points out (Kingdom, p. 249), "'Akk and Ash'ar as pars pro toto . . . seems to be an insulting phrase to dub [the Syrian troops] barbarians."

187. Reading "al-Na"ār" here and below, with the Naqā'iḍ (p. 751, line 2) and Sayed (Revolte, pp. 228, 241: an-Na'ār [sic]); na"ār means "clamorous," while the form ba"ār appears to be unattested.

188. Ibn al-Athīr names him as 'Iyāḍ b. Himyān b. Hishām, while al-Ya'qūbī (Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 333) knows him as 'Iyāḍ b. 'Amr (cf. above, n. 12).

189. Al-Ṭabarī's text is confused at this point; I have drawn inspriation from Ibn al-Athīr.

190. Literally, "If you hurt him with what casts a mote in his eye, or harm him in any way, or deprive him of a single hair."

down and kill you and all who are with you; I shall take your offspring captive and divide all you own among the troops." The Bakrī sent [word] to him [as follows]: "Give us a safe-conduct for ourselves and for what we own, and we shall hand him over to you safe and sound, together with what he owns in its entirety." [The Zunbīl] made peace with them on [that basis] and gave them a safe-conduct, and they in turn opened the gate for Ibn al-Ash'ath and set him free. He came to the Zunbīl and said to him, "This [man] was my governor over this city, and I trusted him and was satisfied with him when I appointed him; he, however, acted treacherously toward me and perpetrated against me what you have seen, so let me kill him." [The Zunbīl] said, "I have given him a safe-conduct and dislike [the idea of] acting treacherously toward him." ['Abd al-Raḥmān] said, "In that case, let me push him and punch him in the chest and neck and demean him." [The Zunbīl] agreed to this, and [1104] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad did so.[191]

['Abd al-Raḥmān] then went off with the Zunbīl until they entered the latter's territory, [where] the Zunbīl lodged him and did him honor. With ['Abd al-Raḥmān] were numerous routed troops. There were [in addition] large numbers of [other] routed troops, together with companions of 'Abd al-Raḥmān and those chiefs and leaders who had stood with Ibn al-Ash'ath against al-Ḥajjāj in every battlefield, did not hope for a safe-conduct, did not accept al-Ḥajjāj's safe-conduct[192] when it was first offered,[193] and strove wholeheartedly against him. [These people] set off after Ibn al-Ash'ath, in search of him, until they fetched up in[194] Sijistān; they, together with those of the [Arabs] of Sijistān and of the indigenous inhabitants[195] who followed them, numbered about sixty thousand. They went against 'Abdallāh b. 'Āmir al-Na"ār and besieged him; they also wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who was [still] with the Zunbīl, informing him of their advance, their

191. In Ibn A'tham's account (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 152), 'Abd al-Raḥmān kills the Bakrī.

192. Where al-Ṭabarī has wa-lam yaqbalū amān al-Ḥajjāj, Dhahabī (Ta'rīkh al-Islām, vol. III, p. 229) reads mimman lam yathiq bi-amān al-Ḥajjāj, "of those who did not trust al-Ḥajjāj's safe-conduct."

193. The text reads fī awwali marrah, which seems otiose; it is omitted by Ibn al-Athīr.

194. Ḥattā saqaṭū bi- in al-Ṭabarī; Ibn al-Athīr has fa-balaghū.

195. So rendering ahl Sijistān wa-ahl al-balad, following Bosworth (Sīstān, p. 61); wa-ahl al-balad is omitted by Ibn al-Athīr.

number, and their being together. The person who led them in ritual prayer was ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-ʿAbbās b. Rabīʿah b. al-Ḥārith b. ʿAbd al-Muṭṭalib. They [then] wrote [again] to [Ibn al-Ashʿath]: "Come to us. Perhaps we shall go to Khurasan. Many [Iraqi][196] troops are there, and they may swear allegiance to us in fighting the Syrians. It is a broad and spacious land, containing men and fortresses." At this, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad and those who were with him went forth to them, and they besieged ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Naʿʿār until they dislodged him; on ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's orders, he was beaten, tortured, and imprisoned.

[Next,] ʿUmārah b. Tamīm advanced toward them with [an army of] Syrians, and the companions of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b.
[1105] Muḥammad said to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, "Take us out of Sijistān; let us leave it to ['Umārah] and betake ourselves to Khurasan." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad said, "Over Khurasan is Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, who is a resolute and bold young man who is not going to let his authority pass to you. If you were to enter [Khurasan], you would find him hastening toward you. Nor will the Syrians leave off pursuing you. I dislike [the idea of] the Khurasanis and the Syrians combining against you, and I fear that you will not achieve what you seek." They said, "The people of Khurasan are from us,[197] and we hope that, if we were to enter it, those of them who would follow us would outnumber those who would fight us. It is a very extensive land, in which we may direct ourselves wherever we wish and remain until God destroys al-Ḥajjāj and[198] ʿAbd al-Malik, or [until] we decide otherwise."[199] ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said to them, "Go [relying] on [the mention of] the name of God," and they went off until they reached Herat. [Next, those who remained with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān were taken unawares when][200] ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah al-Qurashī departed from ['Abd al-Raḥmān's] camp with two thousand [men] and left him, taking a road different from the road [taken by those who had left for Herat]. On the following morning, Ibn Muḥammad 196. So understanding minnā; cf. Ibn al-Athīr's reference to man bihā min ʿashāʾirihim.

197. I.e., Iraqis; see the preceding note.

198. Reading the variant wa-, rather than aw.

199. So understanding narā min raʾyinā [or mā raʾyunā].

200. So rendering fa-lam yashʿurū bi-shayʾin ḥattā.

stood up among [those who remained with him], praised God, and said, "To continue: I have witnessed you in these battlefields, and among them there has been no place of witnessing but that in it I have steeled myself for you[r sakes] until no one of you has remained in it. When I saw that you would neither fight nor show fortitude in adversity, I came to a refuge and place of safety. Once I was there, there came to me your letters to the effect that I should come to you and that we were as one and would perhaps fight our enemy. So I came to you. Then you were of the opinion that I should go to Khurasan, and you claimed that you were united with me and that you would not separate from me. Now this [man] 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān has done what you have seen, and today I have had enough of you. Do as you see fit. As for [1106] me, I am going off to the friend from whom I came to you. Those of you who want to follow me may do so, and those who do not wish to do that may go wherever they want, seeking protection from God."

One group detached itself from them, and another group went off with ['Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad], but the bulk of the army stayed put. When 'Abd al-Raḥmān [b. Muḥammad] had departed, they rallied to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-'Abbās and gave the oath of allegiance to him. Ibn Muḥammad went to the Zunbīl, and they went to Khurasan, ending up in Herat, where they encountered al-Ruqād al-Azdī—from [the clan of] al-'Atīk—and killed him; [at this,] Yazīd b. al-Muhallab moved against them.

As for 'Alī b. Muḥammad al-Madā'inī, he mentioned on the authority of al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad that Ibn al-Ash'ath, when he had been defeated at Maskin, went to Kābul and that 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah came to Herat and blamed and stigmatized Ibn al-Ash'ath for his flight. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abbās [then] came to Sijistān, was joined by Ibn al-Ash'ath's routed forces, proceeded to Khurasan with a body [of men] put at twenty thousand, and stopped at Herat; [there] they encountered al-Ruqād b. 'Ubayd[201] al-'Atakī and killed him. With 'Abd al-Raḥmān [b. 'Abbās] from [the tribe of] 'Abd al-Qays was 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd,[202] to whom Yazīd b. al-

201. Or "Ziyād" [cf. al-Ṭabarī's text, ser. ii, p. 1004].
202. On his father, see above, n. 54.

Muhallab sent [the following message]: "You could have a lot of leeway in the territory, and [could be dealing with] someone a lot less sharp and strong than I. Move to a territory in which I have no authority, for I do not like [the idea of] fighting you. If you want me to support you with the wherewithal for your journeying, I shall help you." [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Mundhir] responded to him: "We have not stopped in this territory in order to wage war, nor in order to settle; all we want to do is rest up and then [1107] move on, God willing. We have no need of what you have proposed." Yazīd's messenger went off [bearing this message] to [Yazīd].

Then [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbbās] al-Hāshimī started levying taxes. [This] reached Yazīd, who said, "He who wants to rest and then pass on does not collect tax (kharāj)." He sent out al-Mufaḍḍal [b. al-Muhallab] over an advance party of four thousand—also put at six thousand—and then sent four thousand [men] after him. Yazīd weighed himself in his armor, which came to four hundred riṭls,[203] and said, "I think that I am too heavy to fight. What horse could carry me?" Then he called for his horse al-Kāmil,[204] deputed over Marw his maternal uncle, Juday' b. Yazīd,[205] and set forth for Marw al-Rūdh, where he visited the tomb of his father, stayed there for three days, and gave one hundred dirhams to each of those who were with him. Then he went to Herat and sent [word] to the Hāshimī [as follows]: "You have rested, fattened yourself, and collected taxes. You may keep the taxes you have collected. If you want more, we shall give you more. But leave, by God. I do not want to fight you."

[Al-Madā'inī] said: [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbbās al-Hāshimī, now] accompanied by ʿUbayd Allāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah, insisted on fighting. Al-Hāshimī clandestinely subverted the army of Yazīd, making them promises and calling them to himself. One of them informed Yazīd, who said, "This is no longer a matter of mere reproof: I'll have him for lunch before he has me for dinner," and he went against him. In due course, the two armies drew near to each other and prepared for battle. A chair

203. Assuming an Umayyad riṭl (or raṭl) of 400 g. (see *EI*², s.v. Makāyil and Mawāzīn), it weighed approximately 80 lbs.

204. "The Perfect."

205. Possibly Juday' b. Sa'īd is meant (see al-Ṭabarī's text, ser. ii, p. 856, and Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).

was set up for Yazīd, and he sat upon it; he put his brother al-Mufaḍḍal in command of the fighting. There advanced one of the companions of al-Hāshimī, called Khulayd 'Aynayn[206] from [the tribe of] 'Abd al-Qays, mounted on his horse, and he raised his [1108] voice and said (ṭawīl):

She[207] made a call, O Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, a grief-stricken call; then her eyes filled with tears.
If the caller were to make the call heard, [Yazīd] would respond to it with compact spears and with swords, the scabbards of which would be cast aside.
The ashrāf of Iraq have fled and have left hornless cattle there to meet their fate.

He wanted [thereby] to incite Yazīd. Yazīd remained silent for a long time, until the people thought that the poetry had moved him. Then he said to a man, "Call out and let them hear. . . ."[208] They imposed that upon them, despite its difficulty, and Khulayd said (ṭawīl):

Bad is the one whose name is called and extolled;
the virgins and non-virgins of Iraq call to him.
When Yazīd is called to a grievous battle day involving the defense of those whom he is honor-bound to defend, sexual organs are protected only by their real protectors.
I think that he will soon be committed, just as he used to commit others.
No free-born women will weep for him, only hired wailing women,
the spotted and the black (that is, the slaves)
among them will be weeping over him.

Yazīd said to al-Mufaḍḍal, "Take your cavalry forward," and he did so and they rushed upon one another. After not much fighting [1109]

206. Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. III, p. 755, explains that the 'Aynayn in question was a well or watering place in al-Baḥrayn; cf. al-Mubarrad, Kāmil, p. 498 and n. i).

207. Judging by the verses that follow these, "she" would appear to be the Arab women of Iraq.

208. It looks as if some of the text has been lost here.

between them, the people separated from ʿÂbd al-Raḥmān, and he held out, together with a group of those who were most steadfast and the ʿAbdīs. Saʿd b. Najd al-Qurdūsī[209] charged Ḥulays al-Shaybānī, who was [positioned] in front of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, and Ḥulays speared him and unseated him from his horse; his companions protected him, and then [Yazīd's] people outnumbered [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's, who] were put to flight. Yazīd ordered [his men] to desist from following them; they took what was in their camp, and they took [some] of them captive. Yazīd put ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī al-Sāʾib in charge of the camp and instructed him to collect together what was in it. They came across thirteen women, whom they brought to Yazīd; he made them over to Murrah b. ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī al-Sāʾib, who transported them [first] to al-Ṭabasayn[210] and then[ce] to Iraq. Yazīd said to Saʿd b. Najd, "Who speared you?" and [Saʿd] replied, "Ḥulays al-Shaybānī, and I, by God, as a foot soldier am stronger than he is as a cavalryman." [This] reached Ḥulays, who said, "He lies, by God! I am stronger than he is, both as a cavalryman and as a foot soldier."

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Mundhir b. Bishr b. Ḥārithah[211] fled and went to Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim.

[Al-Madāʾinī] continued: Among the prisoners were Muḥammad b. Saʿd b. Abī Waqqāṣ; ʿUmar b. Mūsā b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar; ʿAyyāsh b. al-Aswad b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī; al-Hilqām b. Nuʿaym b. al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Maʿbad b. Zurārah; Fayrūz Ḥuṣayn; Abū al-ʿIlj, [who was] the mawlā of ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar; a man from [1110] the Āl Abī ʿAqīl;[212] Sawwār b. Marwān; ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Ṭalḥah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khalaf; and ʿAbdallāh b. Fuḍālah al-Azhrānī.[213] [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-ʿAbbās] al-Hāshimī made it to Sind, while Ibn Samurah reached Marw. Then Yazīd departed to Marw and sent the prisoners to al-Ḥajjāj with Sabrah b. Nakhf b. Abī Ṣufrah,[214] having [first] let Ibn Ṭalḥah and ʿAbdallāh b. Fuḍālah go; [in addition, some] people calumniated ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbd al-

209. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register.

210. Two towns, each called Ṭabas, in Qūhistān (see Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, pp. 359ff.).

211. Possibly ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd (Bishr) is meant.

212. This identification is striking, since the Āl Abī ʿAqīl was the family of al-Ḥajjāj; it is omitted by Ibn al-Athīr.

213. On these prisoners, see Sayed, Revolte, pp. 239–41.

214. I.e., a first cousin of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's.

Raḥmān b. Samurah, and Yazīd took him and imprisoned him.

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad al-Kalbī]—al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad al-Ḥaḍramī—Ḥafṣ b. 'Umar b. Qabīṣah—a man from the Banū Ḥanīfah called Jābir b. 'Umārah: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab detained 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṭalḥah with him and kept him safe; [this] Talḥī had sworn an oath that he would never see Yazīd b. al-Muhallab on any occasion without going to him to kiss his hand by way of thanks for what he had done.

[Hishām also] said: Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ said to Yazīd, "I ask you [to free me] in return for my father's invocation for your father," and he let him go;[215] there is rather a long story behind Muḥammad b. Sa'd's words to Yazīd.[216]

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Hishām b. Ayyūb b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī 'Aqīl al-Thaqafī: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab sent the rest of the prisoners to al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. [First,] 'Umar b. Mūsā b. 'Ubaydallāh b. Ma'mar (was brought forward)[217] and [al-Ḥajjāj] said, "You are the police chief of 'Udayy al-Raḥmān."[218] [1111]
He said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! It was a sedition that engulfed both the righteous and the unrighteous, and we entered into it. God has [now] given you power over us. If you forgive, then that will be by virtue of your moderation[219] and graciousness; if you punish, you will punish sinning wrongdoers." Al-Ḥajjāj said, "As for your words 'that engulfed both the righteous and the unrighteous,' you have lied; it engulfed the unrighteous, while the righteous were preserved from it. As for your acknowledgment of your sin, perhaps it will benefit you," and he was removed; people entertained hopes for his well-being until al-Hilqām b. Nu'aym was brought forward and [al-Ḥajjāj] said to him, "Tell me what you hoped for in following 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad. Did you hope that he would become caliph?" He said, "Yes, I did hope that, and it was my aspiration that he would cause me to occupy a position the like of yours vis-à-vis 'Abd al-Malik."

---

215. But cf. below, p. 65.

216. Sa'd made the invocation after al-Muhallab had distinguished himself on al-Ḥakam b. 'Amr al-Ghifārī's expedition to Khurasan in the late 40s (660s) (see Hinds, Early Islamic Family, pars. 24–25).

217. Inserting something like fa-quddima before bi-'Umar; the Addenda et Emendanda suggest fa-lammā qadimū 'alayhi da'ā.

218. See above, n. 95.

219. So rendering ḥilm here and in what follows; see *EI*², s.v.

[Hishām] continued: Al-Ḥajjāj became angry and said, "Behead him!" and he was killed.

[Hishām] continued: He looked at ʿUmar b. Mūsā[220] b. ʿUbaydallāh b. Maʿmar, who had been set away from him to one side, and said, "Behead him!"; and the rest of them were [all] killed. He had [earlier] given a safe-conduct to ʿAmr b. Abī Qurrah al-Kindī of the clan of Ḥujr,[221] who was a sharīf from an old family. He said to him, "O ʿAmr, you used to tell me of and relate to me your dislike of Ibn al-Ashʿath and of al-Ashʿath before him. Then you followed ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath. By God, there [was] not in you [any] dislike of following them; I don't believe a word you say."[222]

[Hishām] continued: When al-Ḥajjāj had defeated the people at [Dayr] al-Jamājim, his crier had called out, "Whoever reaches [1112] Qutaybah b. Muslim at al-Rayy will be given a safe-conduct."[223] Many people reached Qutaybah, among them ʿĀmir al-Shaʿbī. Al-Ḥajjāj remembered al-Shaʿbī one day and said, "Where is he, and what has he been doing?" Yazīd b. Abī Muslim[224] said to him, "It has come to my attention, O amīr, that he has reached Qutaybah b. Muslim at al-Rayy." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "I shall send [word] to [Qutaybah]; let [al-Shaʿbī] be brought to us," and he wrote to Qutaybah: "To continue: Send al-Shaʿbī to me when you read this letter of mine. Peace be upon you." [Al-Shaʿbī] was sent to him.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Sarī b. Ismāʿīl—al-Shaʿbī: I was a friend of Ibn Abī Muslim's. When I was brought to al-Ḥajjāj, I met Ibn Abī Muslim and said to him, "Advise me." He said, "I don't know how to advise you except [to say] that you should excuse youself as much as you can"; and I was similarly advised by [other] counselors and brethren. When I entered into his presence, [however,] I adopted a view different from theirs. I saluted him as amīr and then said, "O amīr, people have told me to excuse myself to you, adducing other than what God knows to be the truth. By God, in this situation I shall not say other than what 220. The text wrongly gives "Mūsā b. 'Umar."

221. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register, s.v. 'Amr b. Salama.

222. Ibn al-Athīr makes it clear that al-Ḥajjāj killed him.

223. So rendering fa-huwa amānuhu [lit. "he [sc. Qutaybah] will be his safe-conduct"].

224. A mawlā and foster brother of al-Ḥajjāj [Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 243, n. 420].

is true. By God, we have set up a chief against you,[225] have urged [people to oppose you], and have struggled against you as hard as we could, without falling short. We were neither strong and sinful, nor pious and innocent. God gave you victory over us. If you act violently, then that is by reason of our sins and the measures we took; if you forgive us, that will be by reason of your moderation and after clear proof you possess against us." Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "By God, you are dearer to me in respect of what you say than one who enters into our presence with his sword dripping [1113] with our blood and then says, 'I did nothing and witnessed nothing.' You are safe with us, O Sha'bī. Depart."

[Al-Sha'bī] said: So I departed. When I had walked a little way, he said, "Come here, O Sha'bī."

[Al-Sha'bī] said: At that my heart sank. Then I remembered his words "You are safe, O Sha'bī," and I felt tranquil. He said, "How did you find the people, O Sha'bī, after me?"

[Al-Sha'bī] said: He had [earlier] treated me with honor,[226] and I said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper. After you, by God, I had no kohl but sleeplessness;[227] I found my place of habitation difficult, and I was in a state of unending fear; I lost upright brethren, and I found no [adequate] substitute for the amīr." He said, "Depart, O Sha'bī," and I departed.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Khālid b. Qaṭan al-Ḥārithī: Al-Ḥajjāj was brought al-A'shā—[that is,] A'shā Hamdān[228]—and said to him, "Well now, O enemy of God, recite to me your words 'bayna al-ashajj ⟨wa-⟩bayna Qays':[229] Deliver your verse." He said, "I would rather recite what I said regarding you." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Very well, recite that to me," and he recited to him (ṭawīl):[230]

God insisted on bringing His light to fulfillment and on extinguishing the light of evildoers, Making the people of truth victorious in every

225. So rendering qad sawwadnā 'alayka.
226. Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 49) adds qabla 'l-khurūj 'alayhi.
227. So rendering qad iktaḥaltu ba'daka'l-saḥar.
228. See above, n. 13.
229. See below, p. 62 and n. 237.
230. For the following verses, cf. Geyer, The Dīwān of al-A'shà, pp. 320–21 (Arabic texts); *Aghānī*², vol. VI, pp. 60–61 (which differs considerably); von Goutta, Aġaniartikel, pp. 39–41, 56–58.

battlefield; the sword blow will straighten the inclining neck of the one who was a proud king, [1114] And bring down abasement on Iraq and its people, because of their breaking of the certain and firm compact,
[Because of] their innovation and their big words, which do not ascend to God,
And [because of] their breaking of an oath of allegiance:
They make [such an oath] today and break it tomorrow.
Their Lord has filled their hearts with cowardice, and they only approach people as if threatened.
They are bereft of veracity and of fortitude in adversity;
they are full of boasting and bravado.
How do you think God disunited them and scattered them far and wide?
Their dead are the dead of waywardness and sedition, while their living have become abased and pursued.
When we advanced on Ibn Yūsuf in the early morning and the two armies flashed and thundered, [1115] We crossed toward him, over the two trenches;
we just crossed and reached the death that was waiting.
Al-Ḥajjāj confronted our lines, without having given warning,
With a line which was as if it had lightning in its ranks, when its helmets shone and gleamed.
We moved toward it in lines which were like the mountains of Sharawrā,[231] if they could be brought to move.
Al-Ḥajjāj forthwith drew his sword against us, and our army fled and broke up.
Al-Ḥajjāj never fights but that you see him well supported (i.e., by God) and provided for, accustomed to victories.
Ibn 'Abbās[232] is in a state of indecision, which we liken to a black portion of the night:
They neither pointed a spear at him nor unsheathed;

231. To the east of Tabūk (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. III, p. 282).
232. I.e., 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-'Abbās al-Hāshimi, as Ibn al-Athīr points out.

surely the coward often encountered [a foe] [1116] and unsheathed?
The cavalry of Sufyān[233] wheeled round against us with its horsemen, their lances broken (i.e., from much use).
Sufyān led them, and it was as if his standard, from [much] piercing, was a red cloth stiff with dye.
Around him were mature men and beardless youths from Quḍā'ah, furious heroes in situations where the coward would turn aside.
When he said, "Attack!" they charged as one,
and the spear points were brought to their drinking places
By the troops and cavalry of the Commander of the Faithful, and his authority became mighty and supported.
May the Commander of the Faithful be given joy by his victory over a community [of people] who were oppressors and enviers!
They leapt up complaining of oppression from their amīrs,
while it was they who were the most oppressive and obdurate of the oppressors.
We have found the Banū Marwān to be the best imāms, and the worthiest of these people in moderation and the exercise of authority,
And the best of Quraysh by way of origin, [1117] and the noblest of them, except for the Prophet Muḥammad.
When we reflect on the consequences of his rule, we find the Commander of the Faithful to have been directed aright.
People who have openly contended with God will be overcome,[234]

233. I.e., Sufyān b. al-Abrad al-Kalbī.
234. Al-Ṭabarī has sa-yughlabu qawmᵘⁿ, while Ibn al-Athīr gives sa-yaghlibu qawmᵃⁿ.

if they try to deceive Him, He [proves to be] stronger and more crafty.
Thus does God mislead him whose heart is sick and him who espouses hypocrisy and blasphemes.
They have left families and property behind them,
and fair virgins clad in gowns,
Who call to them, shedding tears on their account, and allowing those tears, together with antimony, to fall on their cheeks.
If you do not offer them compassion,
they will become captives and the[ir] menfolk slaves.
Will you perpetrate the braking of compacts, disobedience, perfidy, and abasement?
May God despise and make distant those who are despicable!
Muḥammad's chick[235] has brought ill luck upon the two *miṣr*s [of al-Baṣrah and al-Kūfah]— justly so—and he did not encounter anything more propitious from the bird of omen, [1118] Just as God brought ill luck upon al-Nujayr[236] and its people,
by reason of a grandfather of his who was [even] more wretched and troublesome.

The Syrians said, "He has done well, may God cause the amīr to prosper!" Al-Ḥajjāj said, "He has not done well. You do not know what he meant by it." Then he said, "O enemy of God, we do not praise you for these words. You only said [what you did] out of sorrow that he was not victorious and by way of incitement of your companions against us. It is not about this that we have asked you. Deliver to us your words (kāmil):

> 'Between the man with the scarred face and Qays is a proud and lofty [glory].' "[237]

---

235. I.e., 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad.

236. The castle in Ḥaḍramawt where 'Abd al-Raḥmān's grandfather al-Ash'ath finally surrendered after staging a revolt following the death of the Prophet (see *EI*², s.v. al-Ash'ath).

237. Cf. *Aghānī*², vol. VI, pp. 46, 61; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, vol. V, p. 358 = par. 2110; and Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 147. "The man with the scarred face" (al-

He did so, and, when he said (that is, reached the words) "Say, 'bravo' for his father and for the son," al-Ḥajjāj said, "No, by God, you won't say 'bravo' after this for anyone ever again"; and he sent him forward, and he was beheaded.

Regarding the matter of the prisoners taken by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and sent by him to al-Ḥajjāj, and regarding, too, the matter of Ibn al-Ash'ath's troops routed on the battle day of Maskin, there is information other than that mentioned by Abū Mikhnaf on the authority of his sources. It is mentioned on their authority in that connection that, when Ibn al-Ash'ath was defeated, these [troops] went with the rest of the routed troops to al-Rayy, which had been taken by 'Umar b. Abī al-Ṣalt b. Kanārā,[238] a mawlā of the Banū Naṣr b. Mu'āwiyah, who was one of the finest of horsemen, and they joined him. Then Qutaybah b. Muslim arrived in al-Rayy on behalf of al-Ḥajjāj, who had appointed him over it. The people whom I have mentioned as being sent by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab to al-Ḥajjāj in bonds, and the rest of the routed troops of Ibn al-Ash'ath who had gone to al-Rayy, said to 'Umar b. Abī al-Ṣalt, "We put you in command of us; with us you will wage war on Qutaybah." 'Umar consulted his father, Abū al-Ṣalt, and his father said to him, "By God, my son, if these people will go under your standard, I do not care if you are killed tomorrow," and he tied his standard. Then ['Umar] went forth and was defeated together with his companions. They fled to Sijistān, where the routed troops gathered, and wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad, who was with the Zunbīl. Then there happened to them with Yazīd b. al-Muhallab what I have mentioned. [1119]

Abū 'Ubaydah [Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā][239] mentioned: When Yazīd wanted to send the captives to al-Ḥajjāj, his brother Ḥabīb said to him, "How do you regard the Yamaniyyah, given that you ashajj) was 'Abd al-Raḥmān's paternal grandfather, al-Ash'ath, while "Qays" refers to the father of his maternal grandfather, Sa'īd b. Qays al-Hamdānī (see Wellhausen, Kingdom, p. 247; *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Ash'ath); Ibn al-Athīr mistakenly thought that al-ashajj referred to 'Abd al-Raḥmān's father, Muḥammad, and that 'Abd al-Raḥmān's maternal grandfather was Ma'qil b. Qays al-Riyāḥī.

---

238. This being the form proposed (to replace "Kannāz") in the Addenda et Emendanda (in which connection see the references given by Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, p. 155, s.v. Kanarang 4); it is also given by Khalīfah (Ta'rīkh, pp. 284, 288, where "'Amr" is read in place of "'Umar").

239. Died in 209 (824–25), or thereabouts (*EI*², s.v.).

have sent Ibn Ṭalḥah?" Yazīd said, "He is al-Ḥajjāj and he should not be thwarted." [Ḥabīb] said, "Habituate yourself to [the idea of] being dismissed, and do not send him; we do owe him a favor." [Yazīd] said, "How so?" [Ḥabīb] said, "Al-Muhallab was dunned for two hundred thousand [dirhams][240] in the congregational mosque, and Ṭalḥah[241] paid them for him." So [Yazīd] set Ibn Ṭalḥah free and sent the remaining [prisoners to al-Ḥajjāj]; al-Farazdaq said (kāmil):

Ibn Ṭalḥah found the best grouping on the day when his people encountered Qaḥṭān on the battle day of Herat.[242]

It has been said that al-Ḥajjāj, when he was brought the prisoners from Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, said to his chamberlain, "If I call upon you to bring their leader, bring me Fayrūz." Then he put his [1120] throne in a prominent position—he was at that time at Wāsiṭ al-Qaṣab, [this being] before the city of Wāsiṭ had been built—and said to his chamberlain, "Bring me their leader." [The chamberlain] said to Fayrūz, "Stand up," and al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Abū 'Uthmān, what made you rebel with these people? By God, you are not from the same flesh and blood." He said, "[It was] a sedition in which everyone was caught up, including us." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Write down for me [a list of] your assets." He said, "Then what?" [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "[Just] write them down first." He said, "Will my life then be safe?" [Al-Ḥajjāj said], "Write them down; then I'll see." He said, "O ghulām,[243] write down one million [dirhams] and[244] two million [dirhams]," and he mentioned much money. Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Where are these assets?" He said, "With me." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "So hand them over." He said, "Will my life then be safe?" [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "By God, you will hand them over, and I shall then kill you." He said, "By God, you're not going to have both my money and my life." Al-Ḥajjāj then said to the chamberlain, "Put him to one side,"

240. 100,000 dirhams, according to Ibn al-Athīr.

241. He being the distinguished Khuzā'ī general Ṭalḥah b. 'Abdallāh [Ṭalḥat al-Ṭalaḥāt], "der freigebigste Araber seiner Zeit" (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).

242. This verse does not appear in al-Farazdaq's Dīwān.

243. See above, n. 139.

244. This "and" is given by Ms B and Ibn al-Athīr.

and he did so.

Then [al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Bring me Muḥammad b. Sa'd b. Abī Waqqāṣ." [The chamberlain] called him and al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "You shadow of Satan,[245] you most wayward and arrogant of people, you decline to take the oath of allegiance to Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, you liken yourself[246] to Ḥusayn and Ibn 'Umar, and then you become muezzin for Ibn Kanārā,[247] the slave of the Banū Naṣr"—meaning 'Umar b. Abī al-Ṣalt—and he struck him on the head with a stick [which he held] in his hand until he caused it to bleed. Muḥammad said to him, "[Easy,] man! You have [already] won; so be forgiving,"[248] and [al-Ḥajjāj] stayed his hand. Then [Muḥammad] said, "If you see fit, you can write to the Commander of the Faithful; if a pardon [for me] comes to you, you will have been party to that and [will be duly] praised; and if there comes to you other than that, you will [at least] have gone to great lengths." [Al-Ḥajjāj] remained silent for a long time with downcast eyes; then he said, "Behead him!" and he was beheaded.

Then he called for 'Umar b. Mūsā and said to him: "You philanderer,[249] will you stand with an iron bar protecting the head of [1121] the son of the weaver,[250] drink [intoxicating] drink with him in the bathhouse of Fārs, and say what you said?[251] Where is al-Farazdaq? Stand and recite to him what you said about him?" And [al-Farazdaq] recited to him (kāmil):[252]

You dyed your penis for fornication and you were not about to dye the heroes (i.e., with blood) on the day of battle.

---

245. Ẓill al-shayṭān, a sobriquet explained by al-Tha'ālibī with reference to Ibn Sa'd's height, swarthiness, and stout build (Laṭā'if al-maārif, p. 40 [English trans., p. 59]).

246. Reading tatashabbahu, with Ibn al-Athīr (cf. Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 155: yatashabbahu); the Ṭabarī text has t.sh.b.h.

247. See above, n. 238.

248. Cf. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, vol. II, p. 630.

249. If this is how 'abd al-mar'ah is to be understood.

250. I.e., Ibn al-Ash'ath, this being an insult because weaving was a despised occupation (see Brunschvig, "Métiers vils en Islam," pp. 5off.) and one which Yemenis were stereotypically mocked for engaging in (al-Tha'ālibī, Laṭā'if al-ma'ārif, p. 40 [English trans., p. 59]).

251. This allusion remains in need of clarification.

252. This verse does not appear in al-Farazdaq's Dīwān.

[ʿUmar] said, "By God, I have kept it away from your secluded women." Then [al-Ḥajjāj] ordered that he be beheaded.

Then he called for Ibn ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Samurah, [who proved to be just] a young man. He said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! I am guiltless. I was a young lad with my father and mother, with no say whatever, being with them wherever they happened to be." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Was your mother with your father in all of these seditions?" He said, "Yes." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "May God's curse be upon your father!"

Then he called for al-Hilqām b. Nuʿaym and said [to him], "Supposing that[253] Ibn al-Ashʿath sought what he sought, what did you hope for with him?" He said, "I hoped that he would gain mastery and appoint me over Iraq, just as ʿAbd al-Malik has appointed you." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said (addressing one of his staff), "Stand up, O Ḥawshab, and behead him." [Ḥawshab] moved toward him, and al-Hilqām said to him, "You son of a bitch";[254] [Ḥawshab] beheaded him.

Then ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir[255] was brought. When he stood before [al-Ḥajjāj], he said, "May your eyes never see Paradise, O Ḥajjāj, if you forgive[256] Ibn al-Muhallab for what he has done." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "What has he done?" and ʿAbdallāh replied (basīṭ):[257]

Because he cleverly set his family free and drove Muḍar to you in fetters.
With your people he protected his family from death's onset, and your people were of less consequence to him.

Al-Ḥajjāj remained silent for a long time with downcast eyes, and [these words] rested in his heart. [Then] he said, "What does that have to do with you? Behead him!" and he was beheaded. [But the 253. Ibn al-Athīr reads aḥbabta anna where the Ṭabarī text gives ijʾal.

254. Reading yā ibna laṭīfati iskatay al-farj, "you son of a woman with (?)tight labia majora," and translating freely; I cannot take the credit for this inspired reconstruction of the text (which rests on what survives in Ms B).

255. Presumably, the ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Naʾār who had earlier been at Zaranj (see above, p. 00).

256. Aqalta, while Ibn al-Athīr has aflatta; cf. Khalīfah (Taʾrīkh, p. 284) and the Omani version of this story (see Hinds, Early Islamic Family, par. 61 and n. 135).

257. In Khalīfah's version and in the Omani version of this, al-Ḥajjāj's interlocutor is al-Hilqām; the following verses are given in both of these versions.

words] remained in al-Ḥajjāj's soul until he dismissed Yazīd from Khurasan and imprisoned him. [1122]

Then he gave the order and Fayrūz was tortured. As part of his torture, split Persian cane was tied to him, and he was dragged on it until it pierced his body in many places; then [a mixture of] vinegar and salt was sprinkled onto him. When he felt [the onset of] death, he said to [his] torturer, "The people will not doubt that I have been killed; owing to me are deposits of wealth with the people that will never be handed over to you. Show me to the people, that they may know that I am alive and hand over the money." Al-Ḥajjāj was informed [of this] and said, "Put him on view." So he was taken out to the city gate, and he called to the people, "Those who know me know me; [as for] those who do not know me, I am Fayrūz Ḥuṣayn. [Some] people have money owing to me. Anyone who has anything owing to me may keep it, perfectly legally. Let not anyone hand over a [single] dirham of it. Let those who have witnessed this inform those who are not present." Al-Ḥajjāj gave the order and [Fayrūz] was killed. This is part of what al-Walīd b. Hishām b. Qaḥdham related on the authority of Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī.

Ḍamrah b. Rabī'ah related on the authority of Ibn Shawdhab that al-Ḥajjāj's governors[258] wrote to him, "The land tax has become depleted. The ahl al-dhimmah have become Muslims and have gone off to the garrison cities." [Al-Ḥajjāj] wrote to al-Baṣrah and elsewhere, "Whoever originates from a village must go out [and return] to it." The people went out and camped and began to weep and call out, "O Muḥammad! O Muḥammad!" and they had no idea of where to go. Then the qurrā' of the Baṣrans began to go out to them, masked,[259] and to weep at what they heard from them and what they saw. [Ḍamrah] continued: Then [1123] Ibn al-Ash'ath came in the wake of that, and the qurrā' of the Baṣrans committed themselves to fighting al-Ḥajjāj with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath.

According to Ḍamrah b. Rabī'ah—al-Shaybānī: On the battle day of al-Zāwiyah, al-Ḥajjāj killed eleven thousand [people] and spared only one, whose son was one of al-Ḥajjāj's secretaries. [Al-

258. 'Ummāl: This may be an early example of the term in the sense of "fiscal intendants" (cf. EI², s.v. 'Āmil).

259. So rendering mutaqanni'īn.

Ḥajjāj] said to [the secretary], "Do you want us to forgive your father for you?" He said, "Yes," and [al-Ḥajjāj] left [the father] to his son. [Al-Ḥajjāj] deceived them by means of the safe-conduct: He gave orders to a crier, who called out at the defeat, "There is no safe-conduct for so-and-so, nor for so-and-so," and he named men from those ashrāf, without saying, "The people will be safe." The rank and file then said, "He has given safe-conduct to all the people except those individuals," and they advanced to his compound. When they had gathered together, he ordered them to lay down their arms. Then he said, "Today I shall order to deal with you a man to whom you are not related." He ordered 'Umārah b. Tamīm al-Lakhmī to deal with them; ['Umārah] brought them near and then killed them.

It has been related on the authority of al-Naḍr b. Shumayl that Hishām b. Ḥassān said: The number of people killed in bonds by al-Ḥajjāj reached 120,000 or 130,000.

[A Second Account of the Battle of Maskin]

Concerning the defeat of Ibn al-As'ath at Maskin, an account other than that of Abū Mikhnaf has been mentioned: Ibn al-Ash'ath and al-Ḥajjāj met at Maskin, in the territory of Abazqubādh.[260] The camp of Ibn al-Ash'ath was next to a river called Kh.dāsh[261] at the back part of al-Nahr—[that is,] Nahr Tīrā.[262]
[1124] Al-Ḥajjāj stopped at the river Afr.y.dh,[263] and the two camps were in their entirety between the Tigris, al-Sīb,[264] and al-Karkh.[265] They fought for a month—also said to be less than that—and al-Ḥajjāj did not know of any way to them other than the way on which they were engaging each other. Then he was brought an old man who was a herdsman called Zawraq, and he showed him a

260. A place lying between al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ and not far from Maysān and Dast-i Maysān, associated in the chronicles of the early conquests with al-Madhār (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. I, pp. 90–91).

261. Which remains to be identified.

262. A right-bank affluent of the lower Karkhah river in Khūzistān (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 241).

263. Which remains to be identified.

264. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. III, p. 209) knew this as "the Baṣran river" (nahr al-Baṣrah), which had a large settlement in it (fīhi qaryah kabīrah).

265. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. IV, p. 253) knew Karkh al-Baṣrah as a place in Maftaḥ (which was itself a place between al-Baṣrah and Wāsiṭ [vol. IV, p. 586]).

way round behind al-Karkh, six parasangs long,[266] through a thicket and some shallow water. [Al-Ḥajjāj] selected four thousand of the most eminent of the Syrians and said to their leader, "Let this unbeliever ('ilj) be in front of you. Here are four thousand dirhams for you to take with you. If he gets you to their camp, pay the money to him; if he [proves to have] lied to us,[267] behead him. If you see them, attack them with those who are with you. Let your battle cry be 'O Ḥajjāj! O Ḥajjāj!'" The leader set off at the time of the afternoon prayer, and al-Ḥajjāj's army and that of Ibn al-Ash'ath met when the leader moved off with those who were with him at the time of the afternoon prayer. They fought until nighttime, and al-Ḥajjāj withdrew until he crossed [the] al-Sīb [river], which he had bridged;[268] Ibn al-Ash'ath entered his camp and plundered what was in it. He was asked, "Why not follow him?" He said, "We are worn out," and he returned to his camp; his companions cast down their weapons and passed the night sure that they had won. The people [making up the force of four thousand] attacked them halfway through the night, shouting their battle cry, and the companions of Ibn al-Ash'ath did not know where to direct themselves: Dujayl to the left [or] the Tigris, with its awful eroded bank, straight ahead? Those who drowned were more numerous than those who were killed. Al-Ḥajjāj heard the noise and crossed [the] al-Sīb to his camp. Then he sent his cavalry to the [other force], and the two armies met at the camp of Ibn al-Ash'ath. [The latter] fled with three hundred [men] and went along the bank of the Tigris until he reached [the] Dujayl [river], which he crossed in boats. They hocked their riding animals and went downstream in the boats to [1125] al-Baṣrah. Al-Ḥajjāj entered [Ibn al-Ash'ath's] camp and plundered what was in it. He killed anyone he found, until he had killed four thousand [people]. It is said that among those he killed was 'Abdallāh b. Shaddād b. al-Hād;[269] also killed were Bisṭām b. Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah; 'Umar[270] b. Ḍubay'ah al-Raqāshī; Bishr b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd[271] and al-Ḥakam b. Makhramah, who were 266. About 36 kilometers.

267. Reading kadhabanā, as proposed in the Addenda et Emendanda.
268. So rendering 'aqada.
269. Sayed, Revolte, p. 355, no. 16.
270. 'Amr, according to Ibn al-Athīr.
271. See above, n. 54.

both 'Abdīs; and Bukayr b. Rabī'ah b. Tharwān al-Ḍabbī. Al-Hajjāj was brought their heads on a shield. He began to look at the head of Bisṭām and recited (basīṭ):[272]

If you pass along the valley of a male serpent, go and leave me to deal with[273] the serpent of the valley.

Then he looked at the head of Bukayr and said, "How did this wretch get to be with these? Take hold of his ear, boy, and cast it away from them." Then he said, "Place this shield in front of Misma' b. Mālik b. Misma'."[274] It was placed before him, and he wept. Al-Ḥajjāj said, "What has made you weep? Is it out of sorrow for them?" He said, "No, rather out of fear of hell fire for them."

[The Reason Why al-Ḥajjāj Built Wāsiṭ]

In this year al-Ḥajjāj built Wāsiṭ. The reason for his building it, in among what has been mentioned, was that al-Ḥajjāj raised Kūfan levies [to go] to Khurasan, and they camped at Ḥammām 'Umar.[275] A young Kūfan man from the Banū Asad, who had recently married his paternal uncle's daughter, departed from the camp to his cousin at night. Somebody knocked hard on the door, and, lo and behold, it was a drunken Syrian. The cousin said to the [Asadī] man, "We've had a lot of trouble from this Syrian. He does this sort of thing every night, wanting something not very [1126] nice. I have complained about him to the shaykhs among his companions, and they know about it." [The Asadī] said, "Let him in," and they did so. Then he locked the door, the woman having [first] seen to the house and made it pleasant. The Syrian said, "Your time has come," and the Asadī killed him and struck off his head. When the dawn call to prayer was made, the [Asadī]

272. The poet is Ḥārithah b. Badr al-Ghudānī (Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, p. 326) and another version of the following verse can be found (with others) in Aghānī[1], vol. XXI, p. 44 (= p. 425 of the supplement to vol. VIII of Aghānī[2]).

273. The Aghānī here gives umāris, which is preferred in the Addenda et Emendanda to the uqāsī given in the text.

274. Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 117.

275. A place between Jāmi'ān (later al-Ḥillah) and Niffār (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 73).

went out to the camp, saying to his wife, "When the dawn prayer has been prayed, send [word] to the Syrians that they should remove their man. They will take you to al-Ḥajjāj; tell him the truth, just as it was." She did so, and the dead man was borne off to al-Ḥajjāj. The woman was brought into his presence; with him on his throne was 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd.[276] [Al-Ḥajjāj] said to her, "What happened?" She told him, and he said, "You have told the truth." Then he said to the blood claimants[277] of the Syrian, "Bury your relative. He has been killed by God [and is headed] for hell fire; there will be no retaliation and no blood money." Then his crier called out, "No one [of the Syrians] may stop off with any one [of the Iraqis]. Move out and make camp." [Al-Ḥajjāj] sent out scouts to reconnoiter [and find] for him a place to settle. He worked assiduously until he stopped at the fringes of Kaskar, and, while he was at the site of Wāsiṭ, lo and behold, a monk advanced on a donkey of his and crossed the Tigris. When he was at the site of Wāsiṭ, the she-ass parted her legs and urinated; the monk dismounted and dug up the urine and then carried it and threw it into the Tigris, during all of which time al-Ḥajjāj was watching. Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Bring him to me," and he was brought. [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "What possessed you to do what you did?" [The monk] said, "We find [it written] in our books that there will be built in this place a mosque in which God will be worshiped as long as there remains on earth anyone who proclaims His oneness." Al-Ḥajjāj marked out the city of Wāsiṭ and built the mosque at that place.

In this year, according to what al-Wāqidī said, 'Abd al-Malik [1127] dismissed Abān b. 'Uthmān from Medina and appointed over it Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī.

Hishām b. Ismā'īl led the pilgrimage in this year: Thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of he who related it to him on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar.

The governors of the amṣār in this year, apart from Medina were [the same as] the governors of the preceding year. As for Medina, we have mentioned those who were over it in [this year].

---

276. I.e., 'Anbasah b. Sa'īd b. al-'Aṣ al-Umawī (cf. above, n. 49).
277. So rendering wulāt in this context.

The Events of the Year

84

(January 24, 703–January 13, 704)

In [this year] there took place the campaign of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān against the Byzantines, in [the course of] which he conquered al-Maṣṣīṣah.[278] Thus it was mentioned by al-Wāqidī.

In [this year, too,] al-Ḥajjāj killed Ayyūb b. al-Qirriyyah,[279] who was one of those who had been with Ibn al-Ashʿath. The reason why he killed him—in among what has been mentioned—was that, after his departure from Dayr al-Jamājim, he used to enter into the presence of Ḥawshab b. Yazīd, who was al-Ḥajjāj's governor of al-Kūfah, and Ḥawshab would say, "Look at this fellow standing with me. Tomorrow or the day after there will arrive from the amīr a letter [containing orders] that I shall have to implement." [Then] one day, while he was standing, there came to him a [1128] letter from al-Ḥajjāj [which said]: "To continue: You have become a haven and a refuge for the hypocrites of Iraq. When you read this letter of mine, send Ibn al-Qirriyyah to me with his hand tied to his neck in the company of one of your confidants." When Ḥawshab had read the letter, he threw it to [Ibn al-Qirriyyah], who read it and said, "To hear is to obey"; [Ḥawshab] sent him in bonds to al-Ḥajjāj. When [Ibn al-Qirriyyah] entered into al-Ḥajjāj's presence, [the latter] said to him, "O Ibn al-Qirriyyah, what have you prepared for this situation?" He said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, three words, like riders at a standstill:[280] this world, the next world, and doing good." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Explain yourself; otherwise you will be in trouble."[281] He said, "I shall do so. As for this world, it [consists of] available wealth, to be consumed by both the righteous and the unrighteous; as for the next world, it is a just scale and a place of assembly in which there is nothing false; as for doing good, if I am asked to do it I shall accept, and, if others are asked to do it to me, I shall take it with both hands." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "In that case, accept the sword when it falls upon you." He said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, forgive me my slip and grant me some delay.[282] Every fleet steed takes a fall, and every brave man [at some time] underachieves."[283] Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Certainly not. By God, I shall make you visit[284] hell." He said, "Then let me be at rest, for I [almost] feel its heat." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Take him forward, guard, and behead him!" When al-Ḥajjāj looked at him floundering in his own blood, he said, "If only we had left off Ibn al-Qirriyyah, so that we might hear [more] of his words." Then he gave the order and [the cadaver of Ibn al-Qirriyyah] was removed and discarded.

278. Ibn al-Athīr here gives additional information on these Arab operations at al-Maṣṣīṣah.

279. See *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Ḳirriyya.

According to Hishām—'Awānah: When al-Ḥajjāj prohibited Ibn al-Qirriyyah from speaking, Ibn al-Qirriyyah said to him, "By God, if you and I had been on an equal footing, we should both have fallen[285] or you would have found me unassailable." [1129]

280. Cf. the account given by al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, vol. V, pp. 323–24 = par. 2081. If, here and in what follows, Ibn al-Qirriyyah's remarks seem stilted, it is because they are in rhyming prose in the original.

281. So rendering ukhruj mimmā qulta.

282. So rendering wa-asighnī (which is rightly preferred in the Addenda et Emendanda to wa-asqinī) rīqī.

283. Laysa jawād illā lahu kabwah wa-lā shujā' illā lahu habwah; Ibn al-Athīr adds wa-lā ṣārim illā lahu nabwah. Cf. al-Dīnawarī, Kitāb al-akhbār al-ṭiwāl, pp. 326–27 (li-kulli jawādin kabwah wa-li-kulli ḥalīmin hafwah wa-li-kulli shujā'in nabwah), and Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, vol. II, p. 430 (li-kulli ṣārimin nabwah wa-li-kulli jawādin kabwah).

284. Reading la-uzīrannaka, with the Addenda et Emendanda (and Ibn al-Athīr), in preference to la-uriyannaka.

285. Following the Addenda et Emendanda (la-shiknā).

In this year Yazīd b. al-Muhallab conquered the fortress of Nīzak[286] at Bādghīs.

The Reason Why [Yazīd b. al-Muhallab] Conquered [the Fortress of Nīzak]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab: Nīzak was staying in a fortress at Bādghīs, and Yazīd watched for a good time to campaign against him and set spies on him. [News] reached him that [Nīzak] had sallied forth, and Yazīd went to [the fortress] in his absence. [News of this] reached Nīzak, who returned, and [Yazīd] made peace with him on condition that he would hand over to him the treasures that were in the fortress and would leave it with his dependents. [In this connection,] Ka'b b. Ma'dān al-Ashqarī said (basīṭ):[287]

Bādghīs—which [is such that] he who occupies its upper part overcomes kings and, if he wishes, may act tyrannically and oppressively—
Is well fortified: No king before [Yazīd] has taken it by guile;
[it can be taken] only when it is faced by a vast army of his.
Its fires, viewed from a distance, could be imagined to be stars, in the first third of the night.
When [Yazid] circled round it, their hearts sank until they left it to him to judge, and he decided.
He humbled its inhabitant (that is, Nīzak) after his [previous] greatness
[by making him] pay poll tax,[288] [he thereby] acknowledging abasement and oppression.
[1130] A few days thereafter, before which you had revealed grief and 286. See Gibb, The Arab Conquests in Central Asia, p. 26; Ghirshman, Les Chionites-Hephtalites, p. 102; *EI*², s.v. Bādghīs.

287. On the poet, see above, n. 135. Some of the following verses appear also in Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 225.

288. So rendering al-jizā.

oppression,
The Provider gave you that, dividing it among [God's] creatures; and the deprived one is he who is deprived.
With one of your hands you give the enemy poison to drink, while the generosity of the other is ceaseless.
Can the gift and grace of Yazīd be compared with anything other than the Euphrates and the Nile in spate?
When they are at their high points, they are no more generous than he, [even] when they rise above elevated ground and hillocks.

And he said (ṭawīl):

My praise for the clan of al-'Atīk is that they are generous in hospitality and noble of origin.
When they make an agreement with one they protect,
he occupies an elevated place of safety, securely high and well defended.
He expelled Nīzak from Bādghīs, and Nīzak was in a position which was too difficult for kings to snatch from him, [A position] soaring beneath the sky, like a white summer cloud from which the rain clouds have passed away.
Not even the mountain goats reach its uppermost parts, [1131] nor birds, save its eagle and osprey.
The children of its people have not been frightened by the wolf, nor have its dogs barked at anything save the stars.
I have desired to encounter al-'Atīk, the possessors of wisdom, made to have mastery, with their riding camels protected,
Just as the son of the soil whose lands are parched desires rain from abundant clouds,

Then, after despair, he is given to drink, to the point where [his land's] conduits cannot cope and the billows [of water] gurgle.
God has gathered together those who were remote from one another, and there have come together groups from many and varied distant places.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said: Nīzak used to glorify the fortress; when he saw it, he prostrated himself to it. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab wrote to al-Ḥajjāj concerning the conquest; Yazīd's letters to al-Ḥajjāj were written by Yaḥyā b. Yaʿmar al-ʿAdwānī,[289] who was a confederate (ḥalīf) of Hudhayl. He wrote: "We encountered the enemy, and God gave us the upper hand.[290] We killed some and took some captive, while others took themselves to the tops of the mountains, the bottoms[291] of the valleys, the low-lying fields, and the bends of the rivers." Al-Ḥajjāj asked who it was who acted as Yazīd's secretary and was told that it was Yaḥyā b. Yaʿmar. He wrote to Yazīd [telling him to send Yaḥyā to him], and [Yazīd] sent him via the messenger service. Then [this] most eloquent of [1132] people came to him, and [al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Where were you born?" He said, "In al-Ahwāz." "And this eloquence?" "I memorized the speech of my father, who was an eloquent man." "Now tell me, does ʿAnbasah b. Saʿīd make grammatical mistakes?" "Yes, often." "And so-and-so?" "Yes." "Tell me about myself; do I make grammatical mistakes?" "Yes, you make a barely perceptible mistake. You add a letter and you drop a letter: You [also] say 'inna' instead of 'anna' and 'anna' instead of 'inna.'" [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "I'll give you three days. If, after three days, I find you in Iraqi territory, I'll kill you." [Yaḥyā] returned to Khurasan.[292]

The pilgrimage in this year was led by Hishām b. Ismāʿīl al-Makhzūmī: Thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it to him on the authority of Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā on the authority of Abū Maʿshar.

The governors of the amṣār in this year were the same as those I have named above under the year 83.

289. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register.

290. Lit. "God gave us their shoulders."

291. ʿArāʿir: See the Addenda et Emendanda and the learned note in the Glossarium.

292. A briefer version of this story is given by al-Mubarrad (Kāmil, p. 158).

The Events of the Year 85

(JANUARY 14, 704–JANUARY 1, 705)

In [this year] the death of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath took place.

What [Ibn al-Ashʿath] Died of and How It Came About

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: When Ibn al-Ashʿath departed from Herat, returning to the Zunbīl, there was with him a man from [the tribe of] Awd called ʿAlqamah b. ʿAmr. [This man] said to him, "I do not want to enter [the territory of the Zunbīl] with you." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said to him, "Why?" [1133] He said, "Because I fear for you and for those who are with you. By God, in my mind's eye it is as if the letter of al-Ḥajjāj has already arrived, coming to the Zunbīl and filling him with fear, and he has either sent you (sing.) off in submission or he has killed you (pl.). Here [we] are five hundred [men]; you could make an oath with us to the effect that we shall enter the city, entrench ourselves in it, and fight until we are either given a safe-conduct or die nobly." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said to him, "If you were to enter with me, I should be munificent to you and honor you." But ʿAlqamah refused, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān entered into the presence of the Zunbīl. These five hundred [men] went off, placed over themselves[293] Mawdūd al-Naḍrī[294] and then stayed put until 'Umārah b. Tamīm al-Lakhmī advanced upon them; ['Umārah] besieged them and they fought him and resisted him until he gave them a safe-conduct and they went forth to him. He kept his word to them.

[Hishām] continued: One letter of al-Ḥajjāj's after another came to the Zunbīl concerning 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad, saying, "Send him to me; otherwise, by the One other than Whom there is no god, I shall cause a million[295] fighting men to trample your land." With the Zunbīl there was a man from the Banū Tamīm, from [the clan of] the Banū Yarbū', called 'Ubayd b. Abī Subay',[296] and he said to the Zunbīl, "I shall obtain for you from al-Ḥajjāj a compact [to the effect that] he will refrain from taxing your land for seven years on condition that you hand 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad over to him." The Zunbīl said to 'Ubayd, "If you do that, you will have of me what you ask." ['Ubayd] then wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, [telling him] that the Zunbīl would not disobey him and that he would keep on at the Zunbīl until he sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad to him. At that, al-Ḥajjāj gave him money, and he [1134] took money from the Zunbīl in that regard. The Zunbīl sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad's head to al-Ḥajjāj, [who] for seven years let him keep [the taxation stipulated in] the peace agreement that he [normally] took from him. Al-Ḥajjāj used to say, "The Zunbīl sent the enemy of God to me after he [had] cast himself off a roof and died."

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Sulaymān b. Abī Rāshid—Mulaykah the daughter of Yazīd:[297] When 'Abd al-Raḥmān died—

---

293. Reading ja'alū 'alayhim, with Ibn al-Athīr; the Ṭabarī text gives ba'athū 'alayhim.

294. Ibn al-Athīr reads "al-Baṣrī," which seems unlikely. We are told below (p. 79) that he was from the Banū al-'Anbar, but that clan does not appear to have had any subclan by the name of Naḍr; it is just possible that "al-Naḍrī" is a scribal distortion of "al-'Anbarī."

295. 100,000, according to al-Ya'qūbī (Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 333).

296. The "Abī" is missing in Ibn al-Athīr; according to the Naqā'iḍ (p. 413, ll. 1–2 [in an account that differs somewhat]), he was 'Abd Allāh or 'Ubayd Allāh b. Abī Subay' of the Banū Rabī'ah b. Ḥanẓalah b. Mālik b. Zayd[manāt] Tamīm.

297. Wife of 'Abd al-Raḥmān; see above, p. 43, where she is identified as the daughter of the brother of 'Abd Allāh b. Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal al-Azdī; Ibn A'tham, on the other hand, identifies her as the daughter of a certain Yazīd al-'Amirī (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 157). Cf. Sayed, Revolte, p. 236.

and his head was [at the time resting] on my thigh—he was suffering from tuberculosis. When he died and they wanted to bury him, the Zunbīl sent for him, cut off his head, and sent it to al-Ḥajjāj.[298] He [also] took eighteen male descendants of al-Ashʿath and detained them with him, while leaving all [the rest of] his companions who had been with [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān]. He wrote to al-Ḥajjāj about his taking of the eighteen men from ʿAbd al-Raḥmān's family, and al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him instructing him to execute them and send their heads to him. He disliked [the idea of] their being brought to him alive, [lest] a petition be made to ʿAbd al-Malik about them and [any] one of them be set free.

On the matter of Ibn Abī Subayʿ and Ibn al-Ashʿath, there has been said other than what I have mentioned on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf. This is what has been mentioned on the authority of Abū ʿUbaydah Maʿmar b. al-Muthannā, who used to say: It has been claimed that ʿUmārah b. Tamīm set forth from Kirmān and came to Sijistān, over which was a man from the Banū al-ʿAnbar called Mawdūd. He [first] besieged him and then gave him a safe-conduct. Then he gained mastery of Sijistān and sent [word] to the Zunbīl, to whom al-Ḥajjāj wrote:[299] "To continue: I have sent to you ʿUmārah b. Tamīm with [a force of] thirty thousand Syrians who have neither forsaken obedience, nor disavowed a Caliph, nor followed an imām of waywardness. He pays each of them one [1135] hundred dirhams a month. War is very much to their taste. They seek Ibn al-Ashʿath." But the Zunbīl refused to hand him over.

With Ibn al-Ashʿath was ʿUbayd b. Abī Subayʿ al-Tamīmī, whom he had singled out for his special favor. He was a messenger to the Zunbīl, for whose special favor he was also singled out and to whom he gave cheer. Al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath said to his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, "I can't be sure that this Tamīmī will not betray you; do kill him," and [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān] intended to do so. [News of this] reached Ibn Abī Subayʿ, who feared him and misrepresented him to the Zunbīl; he put [the latter] in fear of al-Ḥajjāj and called upon him to betray Ibn al-Ashʿath. [The Zunbīl] responded positively to him, and [Ibn Abī

298. Al-Dhahabī's personal view of this report is dismissive (hādhā qawl shādhdh wa-Abū Mikhnaf kadhdhāb: Taʾrīkh al-Islām, vol. III, p. 235).

299. Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 156) gives a slightly fuller version of this letter.

Subay'] went out clandestinely to 'Umārah b. Tamīm[300] and stipulated a reward[301] in respect of Ibn al-Ash'ath. He specified one million [dirhams] and stayed with ['Umārah]. 'Umārah wrote of this to al-Ḥajjāj, who replied: "Give 'Ubayd and the Zunbīl what they ask for: Come to terms [with them]." The Zunbīl stipulated that his territory should not be campaigned against for ten years and that he should thereafter pay [annual tribute in the amount of] nine hundred thousand [dirhams].[302] [The Zunbīl] and 'Ubayd were given what they asked for, and the Zunbīl sent [word] to Ibn al-Ash'ath. He had him brought into his presence together with thirty of his relatives, having prepared neck collars[303] and fetters for them. He put a neck collar on each of ['Abd al-Raḥmān] and al-Qāsim and sent them all to the nearest to him of 'Umārah's strong points; to the body of people who had been with Ibn al-Ash'ath he said, "Split up to wherever you wish." When Ibn al-Ash'ath came near to 'Umārah, he cast himself from the top of a residence[304] and died. His head was cut off, and it and the prisoners were brought to 'Umārah. He executed them and sent the head of Ibn al-Ash'ath and the heads of his relatives, together with his wife, to al-Ḥajjāj. Concerning that, one of the poets said (kāmil):[305]

[1136] How far away the place of the cadaver is from its head:
a head in Egypt and a cadaver at al-Rukhkhaj.[306]

Al-Ḥajjāj [had] sent [the head] to 'Abd al-Malik, and he [had] sent it to [his brother] 'Abd al-'Azīz, who was at that time over Egypt.[307]

---

300. Who was at Bust at this time, according to al-Ya'qūbī.

301. This being the definition given in the Glossarium.

302. Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 53) says 100,000.

303. Al-jawāmi', i.e., neck collars fitted with hand manacles (see Lane, Lexicon, s.v. jāmi'ah).

304. So rendering qaṣr; he is also said to have cast himself from a mountain (al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, p. 400).

305. Ibn Khurradādhbih (al-Masālik wa'l-mamālik, p. 40) cites this verse and puts it into the mouth of 'Abd al-Malik. Al-Mas'ūdī (al-Tanbih wa'l-ishrāf, p. 316) gives this and a second verse, but not the name of the poet.

306. The area in Sijistān watered by the Qandahār river (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 339).

307. Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 54) says that 'Abd al-Raḥmān's head was buried in Egypt; according to Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 158), the heads of 'Abd al-Raḥmān and others were taken from Egypt to Ḥaḍramawt and dropped into a well there.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—Ibn 'Ā'ishah—Sa'd b. 'Ubaydallāh: When 'Abd al-Malik was brought the head of Ibn al-Ash'ath, he sent it with a eunuch to a woman from [the family of al-Ash'ath] who was married to a man from Quraysh. When it was put in front of her, she said, "Welcome to a visitor who does not speak. He is one of the kings, who sought something of which he was worthy, but the fates decreed otherwise." The eunuch made to go off with the head, but she drew it out of his hand, saying, "No, by God, [not] until I have done what is necessary." Then she called for [some] althea[308] [with which] she washed it and smeared it[s beard]; then she said, "Now you may have it," and he took it. He informed 'Abd al-Malik [of this], and, when her husband entered into his presence, he said, "If you are able to produce a daughter[309] by her[, that will be a very good thing]."

It has been mentioned that Ibn al-Ash'ath looked at one of his companions while he was fleeing to the territory of the Zunbīl and recited (mutaqārib):[310]

Fear pursues him, and he has lost his course:
Thus is one who dislikes the heat of battle.
His boots are full of holes, [and] he complains of chafing;
the edges of sharp pumice stones[311] hurt his feet.
There would have been rest for him in death, and death is inevitable for [God's] servants.

[The man] turned to him and said, "O you insignificant blamer [of others],[312] why were you not steadfast in one of the battlefields, so that we might die in front of you? That would have been better for you than what you have come to."

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: Al-Ḥajjāj set forth in [1137]

308. Khiṭmī: see Lane, Lexicon, p. 768a.

309. Sakhlah, literally "a kid."

310. Lines 2 and 3 of the following verses are given by Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 151), where another verse is also given. Cf. also al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 391, and al-Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, ser. iii, p. 167 (in the contexts of Zayd b. 'Alī and Muḥammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyyah respectively).

311. See Dozy (Supplément, s.v.) for this definition of the term marw.

312. Reading luḥayyah (rather than liḥyah), i.e., the diminutive of (the feminine) lāḥiyah.

those days of his, going about accompanied by Ḥumayd al-Arqaṭ,[313] who said (rajaz):

He still constructs a trench and destroys it,
in protection of an army that he leads and betrays, Until his plunder is in your hands;
how far from his place of mustering is his place of defeat!
He who is fitted for vehement striving for mastery is he who does not turn away from it in disgust.[314]

Al-Ḥajjāj said, "This is truer than what the wicked Aʿshā Hamdān said (kāmil):

I have been informed [that] al-Ḥajjāj b.[315] Yūsuf slipped, fell, and perished.

Now it is clear to him who it was who slipped and perished,[316] feared and failed, and doubted and suspected." He raised his voice, and there was no one who did not fear his anger. Al-Urayqiṭ[317] was silent, and al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Go back to what you were saying. What is the matter with you, O Arqaṭ?" He said, "May I be made your ransom, O amīr; and the authority of God is mighty. You became angry, and my muscles became aquiver, my joints tight, my sight dim, and I felt giddy." Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Yes indeed, the authority of God is mighty. Go back to what you were doing." And he did so.

One day, when al-Ḥajjāj was going along accompanied by Ziyād b. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bajalī,[318] who was one-eyed, he said, "What was it you said to Ibn Samurah?" He said, "I said (rajaz):

O one-eyed man, may I be the ransom of the one-eyed;
you thought that the dug trench

313. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥumayd al-Arḳaṭ; Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, p. 333.
314. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, vol. I, p. 85; Lane, Lexicon, p. 2615a.
315. Reading Ḥajjāja 'bna in place of anna bunayya (see Geyer, The Díwán of al-Aʿshà, p. 312, line 6 [Arabic text], and p. 310 of his apparatus; *Aghānī*², vol. VI, p. 59); Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 129) reads anna 'bna at this point.
316. The arabic is wordier: zalaqa wa-tabba wa-daḥaḍa wa-ankabba.
317. Sic, being the diminutive form of al-Arqaṭ.
318. Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 114.

Would repel from you what fate had in store and [stop] calamities befalling."

It has been said that the death of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad took place in the year 84. [1138]

In this year al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf dismissed Yazīd b. al-Muhallab from Khurasan and appointed over it al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab, the brother of Yazīd.

The Reason Why al-Ḥajjāj Dismissed [Yazīd b. al-Muhallab] from Khurasan and Appointed al-Mufaḍḍal

'Alī b. Muḥammad mentioned on the authority of al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad that al-Ḥajjāj went on a delegation to 'Abd al-Malik and on his way back stopped at a monastery. He was told that in the monastery there was a learned old man of the People of the Books,[319] so he summoned him and said, "O shaykh, do you find in your books [any reference to] our current situation?" He said, "Yes, we find [references to] your past, your present, and your future." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Are names given or [just] general descriptions?" He said, "Both: [You can find] a description without a name and a name without a description." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Don't you find a description of the Commander of the Faithful?" He said, "We find it in [respect of] the time in which we are living: A bald king—whoever gets in his way is felled." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Then who?" He said, "A man called al-Walīd." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Then what?" He said, "A man whose name is the name of a prophet,[320] through whom the people will be possessed of good fortune." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Do you know me?" He said, "I have been told about you." [Al-Ḥajjāj said], "Do you know what I govern?" He said, "Yes." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "Who will govern it after me?" He said, "A man called Yazīd." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "In my life[time] or after my death?" He said, "I don't know." [Al-Ḥajjāj] [1139] said, "Do you know his description?" He said, "He will commit an act of perfidy. I don't know anything other than that."

319. Min ahl al-kutub; Ibn al-Athīr omits the phrase, while Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, pp. 55) has ahl al-kitāb here and below.

320. I.e., Sulaymān (b. 'Abd al-Malik).

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab came to his mind and he set off. He traveled for seven [nights], fearful of what the old man had said, and arrived [at Wāsiṭ]. Then he wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik, asking to be relieved of Iraq. [ʿAbd al-Malik] wrote to him, "O son of the mother of al-Ḥajjāj, I know what you are getting at and that you want to know my opinion of you. By my life, I see the influence of Nāfiʿ b. ʿAlqamah.[321] Divert yourself from this until God brings you what is coming."

Al-Farazdaq said, mentioning his journey (ṭawīl):[322]

If birds had been charged with making the like of his journey from Jerusalem to Wāsiṭ, they would have become weary!
He went by night on fleet camels from Palestine, after nighttime had drawn near to the sun of the day and [the sun] had set.
That day was not out[323] before he made [the camels] kneel in Maysān, weary and weak from their night journey.
It was as if a hungry falcon were in the saddle, when the deep gloom revealed him.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: One day, when al-Ḥajjāj was unoccupied, he summoned ʿUbayd b. Mawhab,[324] who entered striking the ground [with a stick]. [Al-Ḥajjāj] raised his head and [1140] said, "Woe, O ʿUbayd, the people of the Books mention that what I govern will be governed by a man called Yazīd. I have thought of Yazīd b. Abī Kabshah and Yazīd b. Ḥuṣayn b. Numayr and Yazīd b. Dīnār,[325] and it can't be any of those, since they are not up to it. It must be Yazīd b. al-Muhallab." ʿUbayd said to him, "You have ennobled [the Muhallabids] and have made their dominion mighty. They are possessed of numbers, endurance, obedience, 321. Presumably, this was the name of the learned old man.

322. Cf. al-Farazdaq, Dīwān, vol. I, p. 116 [where an extra verse is given and we are told that the journey took seven days], and Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. I, p. 424 [where the verses are ascribed to baʿd al-aʿrāb].

323. Preferring Yaqut's ghāba to al-Ṭabarī's [and the Dīwān's] ʿāda.

324. See above, p. 14.

325. For the first two of these, see Crone, Slaves on Horses, pp. 96 and 97, respectively; the third is mentioned only at this point by al-Ṭabarī.

and good fortune. How worthy [Yazīd] is." [But] al-Ḥajjāj decided to dismiss Yazīd; he did not, however, find any way of proceeding against him until the arrival of al-Khiyār b. Sabrah b. Dhu'ayb b. 'Arfajah b. Muḥammad b. Sufyān b. Mujāshi',[326] who had been one of al-Muhallab's horsemen and was with Yazīd. Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "Tell me about Yazīd." He said, "He is good in obedience and easygoing in his way of proceeding." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "You are lying! Tell me the truth." He said, "God is most sublime and great, [Yazīd] has saddled up without a bridle." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "You speak truly," and he thereafter appointed al-Khiyār over 'Umān.[327]

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Then [al-Ḥajjāj] wrote to 'Abd al-Malik, blaming Yazīd and the family of al-Muhallab for [their] adherence to the Zubayrids, and 'Abd al-Malik wrote to him: "I do not consider the obedience of the Muhallabids to the Zubayrids to be a shortcoming; rather, I see it as loyalty on their part to them, and that loyalty will induce them to be loyal to me." Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him making him fearful of their perfidy, on account of what the old man had told him, and 'Abd al-Malik wrote to him: "You have said a lot about Yazīd and the Muhallabids. Give me the name of a man who would be suitable for Khurasan," and he gave him the name of Mujjā'ah b. Si'r al-Sa'dī.[328] 'Abd al-Malik wrote to him: "The opinion that induced you to regard the Muhallabids as corrupt is the same as that which induced you [to name] Mujjā'ah. Look out for me a tough [1141] man who will carry out your orders," and he named Qutaybah b. Muslim. ['Abd al-Malik] wrote to him: "Appoint him."

It reached Yazīd that al-Ḥajjāj had dismissed him, and he said to his family, "Whom do you think al-Ḥajjāj will appoint over Khurasan?" They said, "A man from Thaqīf." He said, "By no means. He will write to one of you with his appointment. [Then,] when I reach him, he will dismiss [that man], and he will appoint a man from Qays: How worthy Qutaybah would be."

---

326. Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 133 [wrongly Khiyār b. Abī Sabrah].

327. For a rather fuller [if somewhat confused] account of this episode, see Hinds [Early Islamic Family, pars. 62–67], where "[Yazīd] has saddled up without a bridle" [i.e., acted without adequate preparation] comes out as "a people who have saddled up without bridles" [par. 66].

328. Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 136.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: When 'Abd al-Malik gave permission to al-Ḥajjāj to dismiss Yazīd, [al-Ḥajjāj] did not like to write to [Yazīd] about his dismissal; so he wrote to him [saying], "Appoint al-Mufaḍḍal as your deputy and come." Yazīd sought the advice of Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir,[329] who said, "Stay, and make an excuse, for the Commander of the Faithful has a good opinion of you. The order has only come from al-Ḥajjāj.[330] If you stay [here] and do not hurry off, I hope that [the Commander of the Faithful] will write to [al-Ḥajjāj instructing him] to confirm [you in your position]." Yazīd said, "We are a family that has been blessed in [respect of] obedience; I do not like disobedience and conflict," and he began to get ready. But he did so too slowly for the liking of al-Ḥajjāj, who wrote to al-Mufaḍḍal, "I have put you over Khurasan." [At this,] al-Mufaḍḍal began to nag Yazīd, and Yazīd said to him, "Al-Ḥajjāj will not confirm you in your position after I [have gone]. It was only fear that I might resist him that induced him to act as he has." [Al-Mufaḍḍal] said, "No, you are envious of me." [Yazīd] said, "O son of Bahlah![331] Would I envy you? You'll see." Yazīd went off in Rabī' II 85 (April–May 704), and al-Ḥajjāj then dismissed al-Mufaḍḍal. The poet said to al-Mufaḍḍal and to his full brother 'Abd al-Malik (kāmil):

[1142] O two sons of Bahallah, my Lord disgraced you on the morning when the shining hero went off.
You forsook your brother and fell to the bottom of a dark place, the denizen of which is exposed to harm.
Repent much and sincerely; it is only the greatest loser who refuses and disdains to repent.

Ḥuḍayn said to Yazīd (ṭawīl):

I gave you a prudent instruction and you defied me, only to become stripped of office and regretful.

329. The poet (al-)Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir al-Raqāshī: See *EI*², s.v.; Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, p. 376.

330. So understanding innama utīta min al-Ḥajjāj.

331. Bahlah (or Bahallah), as becomes apparent in the first of the following verses, was the mother of al-Mufaḍḍal. It is specified below, p. 157, that she was an Indian woman.

I am not going to weep over you out of longing, and I am not going to pray for you to return safely.[332]

When Qutaybah arrived in Khurasan, he said to al-Ḥuḍayn, "What was it you said to Yazīd?" He said, "I said:

I gave you a prudent instruction and you defied me:
if you blame, you yourself are more deserving of blame.
If it reaches al-Ḥajjāj that you have defied him, you will find yourself in deep trouble with him."[333]

[Qutaybah] said, "What was it you instructed him to do that he disobeyed?" [Al-Ḥuḍayn] said, "I instructed him to take to the amīr all the gold and silver he could find." A man said to 'Iyāḍ b. Ḥuḍayn, "As for your father, when Qutaybah tested him, he found him wise when he said, 'I instructed him to take to the amīr all the gold and silver he could find.'"

'Alī [b. Muḥammad] said, and Kulayb b. Khalaf [also] related to us: Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to Yazīd, "Campaign in Khwārazm." [Yazīd] wrote to him, "O amīr, it has little plunder and fierce dogs."[334] Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him, "Appoint a deputy and come [to me]." [Yazīd] wrote to him, "I want to campaign in Khwārazm." [Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him, "Do not campaign in it. It is as you have described it." [Yazīd] then campaigned [there] and did not obey [al-Ḥajjāj]. The people of Khwārazm made a peace agreement with him; he took captives according to the peace terms and made his return journey in the winter. The cold became intense for [Yazīd and his men], and they took the clothes of the prisoners and put them on. Those captives died of cold. [1143] ['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Yazīd stopped at Talastānah,[335] and a plague afflicted the people of Marw al-Rūdh that year. Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him, "Come," and he set off: He did not pass through any place but that [its people] spread out aromatic plants for him.

---

332. Cf. Hinds, Early Islamic Family, par. 68.
333. Ibid., par. 71.
334. A piece of rhyming prose difficult to replicate in English.
335. "A halting place six parasangs before Dandānaqān on the road from Sarakhs to Marw" [Cornu, Atlas: Répertoires, p. 155].

Yazīd was given his appointment in the year 82 and was dismissed in the year 85. He set out [to Iraq] from Khurasan in Rabī' II 85 (April–May 704), and Qutaybah was appointed.

As for Hishām b. Muḥammad, he mentioned on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf, concerning al-Ḥajjāj's dismissal of Yazīd from Khurasan, a cause other than the one mentioned by 'Alī b. Muḥammad. He mentioned in that connection on the authority of Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī and others: Al-Ḥajjāj, when he had finished with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad, had no concern save Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and his family. Al-Ḥajjāj had humbled all the Iraqis except for Yazīd and his family and those of the people of the two *miṣr*s who were with them in Khurasan; after 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad, he feared in Iraq only Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. Al-Ḥajjāj [accordingly] began to try to deceive Yazīd, in an attempt to extract him from Khurasan. He would send to [Yazīd] to come to him, and [Yazīd] would adduce to him the excuse of the enemy and the war in Khurasan. He kept on in this wise until the last part of the rule of 'Abd al-Malik. Then al-Ḥajjāj wrote to 'Abd al-Malik, advising him to dismiss Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and informing him of the obedience of the Muhallabids to Ibn al-Zubayr, [as a result of which] they would not be loyal to [1144] him. 'Abd al-Malik wrote to him: "I do not consider the obedience and loyalty of the sons of al-Muhallab to the Zubayrids to be a shortcoming; their obedience and loyalty to them is what has induced them to be obedient and loyal to me." Then [Hishām b. Muḥammad] mentioned the rest of the report along the lines mentioned by 'Alī b. Muḥammad.

In this year al-Mufaḍḍal campaigned against Bādghīs and conquered it.

[Al-Mufaḍḍal's Conquest of Bādghīs]

'Alī b. Muḥammad mentioned on the authority of al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad: Al-Ḥajjāj dismissed Yazīd and wrote in the year 85 to al-Mufaḍḍal concerning his appointment over Khurasan, which lasted for nine months. He campaigned against Bādghīs and conquered it. He took plunder, which he divided among the people: Every man received eight hundred dirhams. Then he campaigned against Akharūn and Shūmān,[336] where he was victorious, took plunder, and divided what he had taken among the people. Al-Mufaḍḍal had no treasury; he [simply] gave out to the people when anything came [his way], and, if he took anything as plunder, he divided it among them. Ka'b al-Ashqarī said, in praise of al-Mufaḍḍal (ṭawīl).[337]

You see rich and poor from every [tribal] grouping, bands of all sorts heading for al-Mufaḍḍal.
One visitor [comes] hoping for the benefits of his generosity,
while another goes off having had his needs attended to.
If we head for a land other than yours, we shall not find in it a better place to head for nor [shall we find] a place of contentment.
If we enumerate the noblest ones, those who are sagacious,
those who have provided good for themselves [with God], you are the first!
By my life, al-Mufaḍḍal has made an overpowering assault, [1145] which has made available the watering places and herbage in Shūmān.
On the battle day of Ibn 'Abbās,[338] you received the like of that,
and it was for us [as] a sharp sword between the two sides.
All of al-Muhallab's moral qualities have become clear in you,[339]
you have been clad with the same means of attaining honor as that with which he clad himself—
[He,] your father, who strove as no one else did and passed on a glory that was not falsely claimed.

336. To the southeast of Samarqand [see Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 74, for details]; Shaban, [The 'Abbāsid Revolution, p. 62] judges these operations to have been "minor raids."

337. The following verses appear not to occur elsewhere.

338. Presumably, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abbās al-Hāshimī is meant.

339. Taking laka to signify fīka.

In this year Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim al-Sulamī was killed at al-Tirmidh.[340]

[Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh's] Going to al-Tirmidh [and His Activities] until He was Killed There

It has been mentioned that the reason for his going to al-Tirmidh was that, when his father, 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, killed those of the Banū Tamīm whom he killed at Fartanā[341]—an account of his killing of them has been mentioned above[342]—the bulk of those who had remained with him separated from him. He went out to Nishapur and feared [what] the Banū Tamīm [might do] to his baggage[343] in Marw. He therefore said to his son Mūsā, "Move my baggage from Marw and cross the Balkh river (that is, the Oxus), so that you may take refuge with one of the kings or in a fortress where you may stay." Mūsā accordingly set off from Marw with two hundred and twenty horsemen. By the time he reached Āmul,[344] some down-and-out robbers[345] had taken refuge with him, and his party numbered four hundred; [at Āmul] he was joined by [some] men from the Banū Sulaym, including [1146] Zur'ah b. 'Alqamah. He then reached Zamm,[346] [whose people] fought him, and he defeated them, acquired money, and crossed the river. He then reached Bukhārā and asked its lord for refuge. [The latter] refused, fearing him, and said, "[He is] a murderer, and his companions are like him, people given to war and evil; I do not feel secure from him," and he sent him a present of gold coins and riding animals, and a set of clothes. [Mūsā next] de-

340. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 27–28; Shaban, The 'Abbāsid Revolution, pp. 59ff.; al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, pp. 417–19.

341. Described by Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. III, p. 868) as a qaṣr at Marw al-Rūdh.

342. See al-Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, ser. II, pp. 593ff. and 695ff.

343. The concern about thaqal or athqāl exhibited here and in subsequent instances makes it plain that the "baggage" in question contained items of value (cf. the observation made by Shaban, The 'Abbāsid Revolution, p. 127, n. 2).

344. A town three miles from the left bank of the Oxus, near the crossing on the way from Marw to Bukhārā (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 80; EI[2], s.v.).

345. So rendering qawm min al-ṣa'ālīk.

346. A town on the left bank of the Oxus, 125 miles upstream of Āmul (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 80; EI[2], s.v. Āmul).

scended on one of the lords of the people of Bukhārā in Nūqān,[347] and [this man] said to him, "No good will come to you from staying in this place; the people are afraid of you and do not feel secure from you." He stayed with the dihqān of Nūqān for a few months and then went off looking for [either] a king with whom he might take refuge or a fortress; but he did not come to any place but that [its people] did not want him to stay among them and asked him to move away from them.

'Alī b. Muḥammad said: Then he reached Samarqand and stayed there. Ṭarkhūn,[348] its king, honored him and allowed him to stay, and he stayed for a long time. Now the people of Soghd have a table on which are put greasy meat,[349] bread, and a ewer of something to drink. On a [particular] day every year that is set out for the Horseman of Soghd,[350] and no one but he may go near it; it is his food on that day. If anyone else eats from it, he fights a duel with him, and the table goes to whichever one kills the other. One of Mūsā's companions said, "What is this table?" and he was told about it and fell silent. Then Mūsā's companion said, "I shall eat what is on this table, and I shall fight a duel with the Horseman of Soghd; if I kill him, I shall be their Horseman"; and he sat and ate what was on it. [The Horseman of Soghd] was told [of this] and came, much angered, and said, "O Arab, fight a duel with me." The Arab said, "Yes. I don't want anything other than a duel"; [the Horseman] fought him, and Mūsā's companion killed him. [At this,] the king of Soghd said [to Mūsā and his companions], "I accommodated you and honored you, and you have killed the Horseman of Soghd. Had I not given you and your companions a safe-conduct, I would kill you. Get out of my territory," and he gave [Mūsā] a gift. [1147]

[Mūsā next] reached Kish, and the lord of Kish wrote to Ṭarkhūn asking him for help. [Ṭarkhūn] came to him, and Mūsā went out to [Ṭarkhūn] with a force of seven hundred and fought

347. This is what the text says, but Nūqān [Mashhad], to the east of Nishapur, does not fit the context.

348. The Ikhshīd of Soghd and the "leader of the native princes" (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 184).

349. Laḥm wadik; on the other hand, Ms. B and Ibn al-Athīr read laḥm wakhall, "meat and vinegar."

350. Noted by Barthold, Turkestan[3], pp. 181–82.

them until evening. Then they abstained from fighting, Mūsā's companions having sustained many wounds. In the morning, Mūsā gave them the order, and they shaved their heads, just as the Khārijīs do,[351] and cut their tent poles,[352] just as the [Iranian] foreigners do when they [decide to] fight to the death. Mūsā said to Zur'ah b. 'Alqamah, "Set off to Ṭarkhūn and try a ruse on him." He came to him, and Ṭarkhūn said to him, "Why have your companions done what they have done?" He said, "They have chosen to defy death, and what need do you have, O king, of killing Mūsā and [yourself] being killed? You will not get to him before there is killed among you[r] people the like of their number. If you were to kill him and all of them, you would not [thereby] gain good fortune, because he has high standing among the Arabs and no one will govern Khurasan without seeking to avenge his blood. If you get away safely from one [governor], you will not get away safely from another." [Ṭarkhūn] said, "There is no way that I am going to leave Kish in his hand[s]." [Zur'ah] said, "Well, desist from him, so that he may depart." He desisted, and Mūsā came to al-Tirmidh, in which was a fortress next to the river, looking out over it. Mūsā happened upon one of the dihqāns of al-Tirmidh coming from the fortress, [this] dihqān being someone who was avoiding the Tirmidh Shāh. He said to Mūsā, "The lord of al-Tirmidh is reticent and extremely shy. If you treat him kindly and give him presents, he will let you into his fortress; for he is weak." [Mūsā] said, "Certainly not. I shall ask him to let me into his fortress." He then asked him, and [the Tirmidh Shāh] [1148] refused. [At this,] Mūsā used guile on him,[353] giving him presents and treating him kindly, until relations between them became good and [the Tirmidh Shāh] came out [of his fortress]. They went out hunting together, with Mūsā going to great lengths in treating him kindly. The lord of al-Tirmidh prepared some food and sent to Mūsā, "I want to honor you. So take lunch with me and bring one hundred of your companions." Mūsā chose one hundred of his companions, and they entered [the city] on their horses. When 351. For two examples, see Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, p. 217, and Ibn al-Jawzī, Sīrat 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, p. 78.

352. So understanding ṣ.f.n.ā.t. akhibiyatihim; see the comments in the Glossarium.

353. Reading mākarahu (not mā k.r.h.), with Ibrāhīm.

[the horses] were in the city, they neighed to one another, and the people of al-Tirmidh augured evil and said to them, "Dismount! Dismount!" Then they were brought into a house fifty by fifty and given lunch. When they had finished the lunch, Mūsā reclined, and they[354] said to him, "Get out!" He said, "I shall not [in the future be able to] take a house like this one; I shall not leave it until it is either my house or my grave," and they fought them in the city. A number of the people of al-Tirmidh were killed, the others fled, and [Mūsā and his companions] entered their dwellings. Mūsā took control of the city and said to the Tirmidh Shāh, "Go forth! I shall confront neither you nor any of your companions." So the king and the people of the city set forth and went to the Turks, seeking their help. [The Turks] said to them, "A hundred men came in to you and expelled you from your land. We fought them at Kish. We shall not fight these [people again]." Mūsā stayed in al-Tirmidh, and his companions, who numbered seven hundred, came in to him. When his father was killed, he was joined by his father's companions, [they being] four hundred horsemen. He became strong and took to going out and making raids on those who were around him.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: The Turks sent some people to the companions of Mūsā to find out what he was up to. When they arrived, Mūsā said to his companions, "There has to be a stratagem for [dealing with] these [people]."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: That was [at a time of] the most intense heat. Mūsā then gave an order for fire, and it was kindled; he gave an order to his companions, and they put on winter clothes, and saddlecloths on top of those, and stretched out their hands to the fire as if warming themselves at it. Mūsā [now] gave [1149] permission to the Turks [to come in], and they entered and were fearful at what they saw. They said, "Why have you done this?" They said, "We find it cold at this time [of the year], and we find it hot in winter." [The Turks] returned and said, "[They are] jinn; we shall not fight them."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: The chief of the Turks wanted to campaign against Mūsā. He sent messengers to him, and he sent poison together with arrows in musk. He meant by the poison that fighting them was hard; the arrows [represented] war and the musk peace, [and his message was,] "Choose war or peace." [Mūsā] burned the poison, broke the arrows, and scattered the musk. The [Turks] said, "They don't want peace. [Mūsā] is letting [us] know that fighting them is like fire and that he will break us," and they did not campaign against them.

354. In Ibn al-Athīr's version, they are in the fortress, and it is the Tirmidh Shāh who says what follows.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: Bukayr b. Wishāḥ, as governor of Khurasan, neither confronted him nor sent anyone against him. Then Umayyah [b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd] came [as governor] and went in person seeking [Mūsā]; but Bukayr rebelled against him and renounced allegiance and he returned to Marw.[355] When Umayyah made peace with Bukayr, he stayed put for that year. In the following year, he sent to Mūsā a man from Khuzāʿah with a large force. The people of al-Tirmidh went back to the Turks and asked for their help, but [the Turks] refused. [The people of al-Tirmidh] then said to them, "Some of their own people have campaigned against them and have besieged them; if you help us against them, we shall overcome them." [At this,] the Turks went with the people of al-Tirmidh in a large force, and Mūsā [found himself] surrounded by the Turks and the Khuzāʿī. He would fight the Khuzāʿī in the first part of the day and the Turks in the latter part; and [in this way] he fought them for two or three months. Mūsā then said to ʿAmr b. Khālid b. Ḥuṣayn, who was a horseman, "This has gone on long [enough]. I have [1150] decided to make a night attack on the camp of the Khuzāʿī, for they think that they are safe at night. What do you think?" [ʿAmr] said, "A night action would be good, but let it be against the foreigners, for the Arabs are more wary, faster at repelling, and braver at night than the foreigners. So attack them by night, and I hope that God will help us against them. Then we shall be free to fight the Khuzāʿī, we being in the fortress and they being in the open; they are no abler in fortitude or more knowledgeable in war than we are."

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: Mūsā decided to make a night attack on the Turks. When a third of the night had passed, he set out with four hundred [men] and said to ʿAmr b. Khālid, "Set out after us and keep near us. When you hear our takbīr (that is, our call "God is great"), make one yourselves." He went along the riverbank until he was upstream of the camp. Then he went by way of the district of Guftān,[356] and, when he came near to their camp, he made his companions into "fourths" (arbā'). Then he said, "Circle their camp, and, when you hear our takbīr, make one yourselves," and he went on, with 'Amr in front of him and [the others] going behind him. When the lookouts saw them, they said, "Who are you?" They replied, "People passing through."

355. For the background on Bukayr and Umayyah [a Tamīmī and a Qurashī, respectively], see Shaban, The ʿAbbāsid Revolution, pp. 44–47.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: When they had passed the lookout post, they split up, circled the camp, and made a takbīr; the next thing the Turks knew was swords falling [upon] them, and they were stirred up, [began] killing one another, and fled. There were sixteen Muslim casualties. [The Muslims] then took possession of their camp and acquired arms and money. In the morning, the Khuzā'ī and his companions were shaken by that, feared a similar night attack, and were on their guard. 'Amr b. Khālid said to Mūsā, "You'll only win with a stratagem. They have supplies, [1151] and they are numerous. Let me go to them. Maybe I shall gain the opportunity to be alone with their leader and kill him. [First] give me a beating." [Mūsā] said, "You [want to] rush into being beaten and to expose yourself to being killed?" ['Amr] said, "As for exposing myself to being killed, I do that every day. As for being beaten, how easy that is in comparison with what I intend." So [Mūsā] gave him a beating, fifty lashes, and ['Amr] left Mūsā's camp and went to the camp of the Khuzā'ī, seeking safety. He said, "I am one of the people of the Yemen, and I was with 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim. When he was killed, I went to his son and stayed with him. I was the first to go to him. When I reached him, he suspected me, acted in a partisan fashion against me,[357] and disliked me, saying to me, 'Your partisanship is with the enemy, and you are a spy of his.' He beat me, and I was not sure that I would not be killed; so I fled." The Khuzā'ī gave him a safe-conduct, and he stayed with him.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: One day ['Amr] entered [into

356. If this is how k.ftān is to be rendered; Barthold (Turkestan[3], p. 74) says that it "was probably in the southern part of the Surkhān valley, or somewhere west of it, in the present district of Shirabad." Shaban ('Abbāsid Revolution, p. 64) opts for "Kiftān (Kifyāin)" (?).

357. So rendering ta'aṣṣaba 'alayya.

the Khuzāʿī's presence] when he was unoccupied, and he saw no weapon with him. He said, as though offering him good advice, "May God cause you to prosper, someone like you, in a situation like yours, should at no time be without a weapon." [The Khuzāʿī] said, "I have a weapon with me," and he lifted the top part of his bedding, and there was an unsheathed sword. ʿAmr took it, struck him, and killed him; [then] he set off, riding his horse. [The Khuzāʿī's companions only] realized what ['Amr] had been up to when he was far away. They sought him, but he gave them the slip and reached Mūsā. That army [of the Khuzāʿī] then broke up: Some of them crossed the river, while others came to Mūsā seeking safe-conduct, which he granted.

Umayyah [b. ʿAbdallāh] did not send anyone against [Ibn Khāzim]. ['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Umayyah was dismissed, and al-Muhallab came as amīr. He did not confront Ibn Khāzim and said to his sons, "Beware of Mūsā. You will remain [1152] governors of this march as long as this heavy-bellied[358] [fellow] stays in his place. If he is killed, the first person to come against you as amīr of Khurasan will be a man from Qays." Al-Muhallab died without having sent anyone against [Mūsā]. Then Yazīd b. al-Muhallab took over, and he did not confront him. Al-Muhallab had beaten Ḥurayth b. Quṭbah al-Khuzāʿī, and [Ḥurayth] and his brother Thābit had gone off to Mūsā. When Yazīd b. al-Muhallab became governor, he took their property and their womenfolk and killed their uterine brother al-Ḥārith b. Munqidh, together with an affine of theirs who was the husband of Umm Ḥafṣ, the daughter of Thābit. What Yazīd had done reached [Ḥurayth and Thābit].

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Thābit went to Ṭarkhūn and complained to him of what [Yazīd] had done to him. [Now] Thābit was much loved among the non-Arabs, enjoying wide renown; they honored him and guarded themselves [from anything untoward] by [invoking his name]. If one them made a compact which he wished to fulfill, he would swear by the life of Thābit and would not break his word. Ṭarkhūn became angry on his account and gathered Nīzak, al-Sabal,[359] and the people of Bukhārā and al-

358. So rendering thaṭṭ, which can also mean "thin-bearded"; Ibn al-Athīr gives thabiṭ, "stupid."

359. The title of the ruler of al-Khuttal (Marquart, Ērānšahr, pp. 69–70, 302).

Ṣaghāniyān;[360] they went, together with Thābit, to Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh. [In the meantime,] there had fetched up with Mūsā the routed troops of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-'Abbās from Herat, the routed troops of Ibn al-Ash'ath from Iraq and the vicinity of Kābul, and Khurasani Tamīmīs who had been among those fighting Ibn Khāzim in the civil war. Gathered with Mūsā were eight thousand [men] from Tamīm, Qays, Rabī'ah, and Yemen. Thābit and Ḥurayth said to him, "Go until you cross the river and expel Yazīd b. al-Muhallab from Khurasan; then we shall make you governor. Ṭarkhūn, Nīzak, al-Sabal, and the people of Bukhārā are with you." He intended to do so, but his companions said to him, [1153] "Thābit and his brother acted unfaithfully to[361] Yazīd. If you expel Yazīd from Khurasan and they become safe, they will take charge and overcome you. So stay where you are." He accepted their opinion and stayed at al-Tirmidh. He said to Thābit, "If we expel Yazīd, a[nother] governor of 'Abd al-Malik's will come; we shall [instead] expel Yazīd's governors in Transoxania, in the areas adjacent to us, and the region will be ours to devour." Thābit was satisfied with that and expelled those of Yazīd's governors who were in Transoxania. The revenues[362] were transported to them, and they and Mūsā became strong. Ṭarkhūn, Nīzak, the people of Bukhārā, and al-Sabal departed to their territories; Ḥurayth and Thābit ran affairs, while Mūsā was no more than nominal amīr. Mūsā's companions said to him, "We don't see that you are any more than nominal amīr, while Ḥurayth and Thābit are running affairs. Kill them and take charge." But he refused, saying, "I am not going to betray them after they have strengthened my rule." They, however, envied [Ḥurayth and Thābit] and pressed Mūsā in respect of them until they turned his heart [against them], making him fearful of their treachery. He [then] intended to help them in rising against Thābit and Ḥurayth, and matters became confused. While this was going on, there came against them the Hephthalites,[363] the Tibetans,[364] and the Turks, advancing in [an army numbering] seventy thousand, not counting those without 360. See *EI*², s.v. Čaghāniyān.

361. Preferring the variant khā'ināni li- to the reading khā'ifāni li-.

362. So rendering al-amwāl.

363. Al-Hayāṭilah (see *EI*², s.v.).

364. Al-Tubbat: See Dunlop, "Arab Relations with Tibet in the 8th and Early 9th Centuries A.D.," Islâm Tetkikleri Enstitüsü Dergisi, 5 (1973), p. 304.

helmets and coats of mail and those with plain helmets, but counting only those with tapering helmets.[365]

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Ibn Khāzim went out to the suburb of the city with three hundred cataphracts. A chair was set up for him, and he sat upon it.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Ṭarkhūn ordered that the wall
[1154] of the suburb be breached. Mūsā said, "Let them be," and they demolished [part of] it, and the first of them entered. Mūsā said, "Let them become [more] numerous," and he started to rotate an ax in his hand. When they had become numerous, he said, "Now resist them," and he rode and attacked them and fought them until he expelled them through the breach. Then he returned and sat on the chair. The king urged his companions to return, but they refused. He said, "This is Satan! He who wishes to look at Rustam should look at the man on the chair . . . ;[366] and he who refuses should advance upon him." Then the non-Arabs moved to the district of Guftān.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: [The Turks and their allies] made a raid on Mūsā's cattle; he grieved, did not eat, and began to play with his beard. Then he went by night with seven hundred [men] by way of a river[bed] which led to their trench; [this riverbed] had plants on both sides[367] and contained no water. In the morning, they were at the camp [of the enemy]. [Mūsā's] cattle came out, and [Mūsā himself] pounced on them and led them off; some of the [enemy] followed him and Sawwār, a mawlā of Mūsā's, turned on them and speared one of them and felled him. [The others] turned back from them, and Mūsā was safe with the cattle.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: The non-Arabs renewed the fighting in the morning. Their king stood on a hill with ten thousand perfectly equipped [men]. Mūsā said [to his followers], "If you remove these [enemies], the rest will be [as] nothing." Ḥurayth b. Quṭbah headed for them, fought them in the first part of the day, and pressed them hard until he removed them from the hill; [he] was on that day shot in the forehead by an arrow. They abstained from fighting [for a time], and Mūsā then staged a night attack. His brother, Khāzim b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, charged until he reached their king's candle bearers[368] and stabbed one of them with the pommel of his sword; his horse was speared, ran off with him, and threw him into the Balkh river, where he drowned, wearing two coats of mail. The non-Arabs[369] were killed quickly, and those who escaped were in a bad way. Ḥurayth [1155] b. Quṭbah died after two days and was buried in his yurt.[370]

365. So rendering bayḍah dhāt qūnus (see Lane, Lexicon, p. 1440a, s.v. sunbuk); the exaggeration is obvious.

366. The text seems to be corrupt here.

367. Reading ḥāfatayhi (rather than ḥāf.y.t.h), as proposed in the Addenda et Emendanda.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Mūsā set off, and they carried the heads to al-Tirmidh, where they made them face each other in two pyramids.[371] News of the battle reached al-Ḥajjāj, who said, "Praise be to God, who has helped the hypocrites against the unbelievers." Mūsā's companions said, "We had had enough of Ḥurayth being in charge; [now] relieve us of Thābit." [Mūsā] refused. [Meanwhile,] some of what they were getting up to reached Thābit, who infiltrated into Mūsā's service Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Marthad al-Khuzā'ī, the paternal uncle of Naṣr b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, [who was later] Abū Muslim's governor of al-Rayy.[372] [Thābit] said to him, "Beware of speaking Arabic. If they ask you where you are from, say, 'From the captives of al-Bāmiyān.'"[373] [This Muḥammad, then,] used to serve Mūsā and carry news about them to Thābit. [Thābit] said to him, "Remember what they say." Thābit was on his guard and used not to sleep until the young man returned. He ordered some of his shākiriyyah to guard him and spend the night with him in his house, they being accompanied by some Arabs.

The people put pressure on Mūsā and vexed him. One night he said to them, "You are going on at me too much. In what you desire [lies] your [own] destruction. You have wearied me. On what pretext will you murder him? I shall not act treacherously toward him." Nūḥ b. 'Abdallāh, the brother of Mūsā, said, "Leave him to us. When he comes to you in the morning, we shall take

368. Taking shama'ah to be the plural of shāmi', as proposed in the Glossarium and the Addenda et Emendanda.

369. Ibn al-Athīr reads al-turk where Ṭabarī has al-'ajam.

370. So rendering qubbah here and in what follows in the contexts of Khurasan and Transoxania (i.e., the round tent-like structure used by Turkomans and others).

371. Literally, "two pavilions" (jawsaqayni).

372. This would have been in the early 130s (747ff.); al-Ṭabarī makes no other reference to him.

373. EI[2], s.v.

him off to one of the houses and behead him in it before he can reach you." [Mūsā] said, "By God, it will be the end of you, and you know best." The young man heard [all this], and he went to Thābit and told him. [Thābit] set off on that same night with twenty horsemen and went on his way. In the morning, [Mūsā's men] found that he had gone and did not know how they had been outmaneuvered. [Then] they missed the young man and knew that he had spied on them for [Thābit].

Thābit reached Ḥ.shwrā[374] and stopped at the city. There came out to him many people, both Arab and non-Arab. [When] Mūsā [learned of this, he] said to his companions, "You have opened a door against yourselves; close it," and [he] went against [Thābit].
[1156] Thābit came out to him in a large group and fought them. Mūsā ordered that the stockade be set on fire, and he fought them until [his men] forced Thābit and his companions to take refuge in the city and to fight [to repel] them from the city. Raqabah b. al-Ḥurr al-'Anbarī[375] advanced, plunged through the fire, and reached the door of the city. One of Thābit's companions was standing there guarding his companions, and [Raqabah] killed him. Then he returned, passing through the blazing fire, which caught the edges of a piece of dyed clothing he was wearing; he cast it from him and stopped. Thābit fortified himself in the city, and Mūsā stayed in the suburb.

When he was traveling to Ḥ.shwrā, Thābit had sent [word] to Ṭarkhūn, and Ṭarkhūn [now] came to help him. [News of the advent of Ṭarkhūn reached Mūsā, who returned to al-Tirmidh. ⟨Thābit and Ṭarkhūn went after him, accompanied by⟩[376] the people of Kish, Nasaf, and Bukhārā, with [an army of] eighty thousand [men]. They besieged Mūsā and cut off his supplies, until [he and his followers] were severely affected. In going against Mūsā, the companions of Thābit used to cross a river in 374. Thus, too, in al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, p. 418; Kh.shwrā in Ms. P. This place remains to be identified; Shaban (The 'Abbāsid Revolution, p. 60) has it from Wellhausen that this was Khushwāragh (Wellhausen, Kingdom, p. 425, in fact says Khushwarâgh), but in neither case are we told where that may have been.

375. Caskel, Gamharat an-nasab, register.

376. This rendering is inspired by Ibn al-Athīr, where "Mūsā returned to al-Tirmidh" is followed by wa-aqbala Thābit wa-Ṭarkhūn wa-ma'ahumā; in al-Ṭabarī, however (and similarly in al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, p. 418.17), it is followed simply by a'ānahu, which suggests (wrongly, judging by the context) that the people of Kish, etc., were supporting Mūsā.

the daytime and go back to their camp at night. One day, Raqabah, who was a friend of Thābit's and had advised the companions of Mūsā against doing what they had done, came out, wearing a tunic of silk (khazz), and called Thābit to a duel. [Thābit] said to him, "How are you, O Raqabah?" [Raqabah] said, "Do not ask about a man wearing a garment made of silk in the most intense of the summer heat," and he complained to him of their condition. [Thābit] said, "You brought this upon yourselves." [Raqabah] said, "I did not [willingly] take part in what they did. I did not like what they wanted." Thābit said, "Where will you be until there comes to you what has been foreordained for you?" [Raqabah] said, "I shall be with al-Muḥill al-Ṭufāwī, a man from [the] Ya'ṣur[377] [branch] of Qays"; al-Muḥill was a drinker, and Raqabah stopped with him. [1157]

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Thābit sent five hundred dirhams to Raqabah via 'Alī b. al-Muhājir al-Khuzā'ī, [together with the message], "We have [some] merchants coming from Balkh. When it reaches you that they have arrived, send [word] to me and what you need will come to you." 'Alī came to al-Muḥill's door, and there were Raqabah and al-Muḥill sitting with a large bowl of drink between them, together with a table on which were chickens and loaves of bread. Raqabah was tousle-headed and wearing a red waist wrapper around his middle. ['Alī] handed him the bag [of dirhams] and delivered the message. [Raqabah] did not speak to him. He took the bag, gestured to him with his hand to get out, and did not speak to him.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Raqabah was a heavily built [man], sunken-eyed, prominent-cheeked, and gap-toothed, with a face [round? flat?] like a shield.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: When Mūsā's companions were in dire straits and the siege had intensified, Yazīd b. Huzayl said, "These people will stay on [besieging us] with Thābit [as long as he is alive], and it is better to be killed than to die of hunger. By God, I shall murder Thābit or die [in the attempt]," and he went out to Thābit and asked him for a safe-conduct. Ẓuhayr said to [Thābit], "I know more about this [man] than you do. He has not come to you because he likes you or because he fears you. He has come to you in order to act treacherously. Beware of him and leave him to me." [Thābit] said, "I am not going to take measures against a man who has come to me without my knowing whether he is like that or not." [Ẓuhayr] said, "Let me take hostages from him," and Thābit sent [word] to Yazīd, saying, "As for myself, I am not given to suspecting a man of treachery after he has asked for a safe-conduct, [but] your cousin knows more about you than I. So see to what he requires in order to deal with you." Yazīd said to Ẓuhayr, "O Abū Saʿīd, you are raising objections out of envy. Don't you think I have been humbled enough already? I had to leave Iraq and my family and came to [1158] Khurasan as you see. Doesn't [our] kinship make you sympathetic?" Ẓuhayr said to him, "By God, if I had had my own way, this would not have happened; but[, as it is,] give us your sons Qudāmah and al-Ḍaḥḥāk as hostages." [Yazīd] handed them over to them, and they were held by Ẓuhayr.

377. Synonymous with A'ṣur (on this, see al-Zabīdī, Tāj al-'arūs, vol. III, p. 406, line 38), the father of the Banū al-Ṭufāwah, Bāhilah, and Ghanī (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, vol. I, chart 92).

[Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Yazīd kept looking out for inadvertency on the part of Thābit, and he was not able to do to him what he desired until one of the sons of Ziyād al-Qaṣīr al-Khuzāʿī died. News of his death reached [Ziyād] from Marw, and Thābit courteously went out to console [him], accompanied by Ẓuhayr and a group of his companions, including Yazīd b. Huzayl. The sun had set. When [Thābit] reached the river of al-Ṣaghāniyān, Yazīd b. Huzayl and two men who were with him tarried, Ẓuhayr and his companions having gone ahead. Yazīd then drew near to Thābit and smote him: The sword bit into his head and reached the brain.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: Yazīd and his two companions cast themselves into the river of al-Ṣaghāniyān. [Ẓuhayr and his companions] shot at them: Yazīd escaped by swimming, while his two companions were killed. Thābit was carried to his house. In the morning, Ṭarkhūn sent [word] to Ẓuhayr, "Bring me the two sons of Yazīd," and he brought them. Ẓuhayr [first] presented al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Yazīd, and [Ṭarkhūn] killed him and threw [his cadaver] and his head into the river. [Ẓuhayr then] presented Qudāmah so that [Ṭarkhūn] might kill him. [Qudāmah] turned and the sword hit his chest instead of cutting [his head off]; [Ṭarkhūn] threw him into the river alive, and he drowned. Ṭarkhūn said, "Their father and his treachery killed them." Yazīd b. Huzayl said, "[In vengeance] for my sons, I shall kill every Khuzāʿī in the city." 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. Warqā', who was one of the routed troops of Ibn al-Ash'ath who had come to Mūsā, said to him, "If you want to do that to Khuzā'ah, it will be difficult for you." Thābit lived for seven days and then died. Yazīd b. Huzayl was a brave and generous [man], a poet, who governed the island of Ibn Kāwān[378] in the days of Ibn Ziyād. He said (ṭawīl): [1159]

I used to call upon God secretly and sincerely to grant me taxes and legal income[379]
So that I might thereby leave Ṭalḥah[380] forgotten and my gifts and actions might thereby be praised.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: After the death of Thābit, Ṭarkhūn took charge of the non-Arabs, and Ẓuhary took charge of the companions of Thābit. However, they were weak, and this became well known. Mūsā decided to attack them by night, and a man came and informed Ṭarkhūn [of this]. Ṭarkhūn laughed and said, "Mūsā is too weak to enter his [own] privy [unaided]! How can he stage a night attack against us? You have lost courage. No one will guard the camp tonight." When a third of the night had elapsed, Mūsā set out with eight hundred [men] whom he had mobilized in the daytime and had made into "fourths."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: He placed in charge of one fourth Raqabah b. al-Ḥurr, over another his brother Nūḥ b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, over [the third] Yazīd b. Huzayl, while he himself was over the fourth. He said to them, "When you enter their camp, spread out. Let no one of you pass anything without striking it." The entered their camp from four directions and did not pass any riding animal or man or tent or sack without striking it. Nīzak heard the commotion, donned his arms, stood in the dark night, and said to 'Alī b. al-Muhājir al-Khuzā'ī, "To to Ṭarkhūn, let him know where I am, and ask him what he thinks I should do with [Mūsā]." ['Alī] came to Ṭarkhūn and lo, he was in a tent, sitting on a chair, and his shākiriyyah[381] had lit fires before 378. I.e., Abarkāwān or Barkāwān or Kāwān or Banī Kāwān; also called Lāft and now Qishm, being a large island near the mouth of the Persian Gulf (see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 79, and vol. III, p. 837; Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 261); EI[2], s.v. Kishm.

379. Reading wa-ḥalālī (instead of wa-rijālī), with Ms. P.

380. See n. 241 above.

381. See above, n. 140.

him. [ʿAlī] delivered Nīzak's message to him, and [Ṭarkhūn] said, "Sit." He was raising his eyes in the direction of their camp and the noise when Maḥmiyah al-Sulamī came saying, "Ḥā', mīm,[382] [1160] they will not be given victory."[383] The shākiriyyah scattered, and Maḥmiyah entered the tent. Ṭarkhūn rose to [resist] him, and [Maḥmiyah] came to him quickly. [Ṭarkhūn] smote him and put him out of action.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said; Ṭarkhūn wounded him in the chest with the sharp edge of [his] sword, felled him, returned to his chair, and sat on it; Maḥmiyah went out at a run.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said: The shākiriyyah returned, and Ṭarkhūn said to them, "You fled from a [single] man. Do you think, if it had been a fire, it would have burned more than one of you?" No sooner had he finished speaking than his slave girls entered the tent and the shākiriyyah fled out. He said to the slave girls, "Sit," and to ʿAlī b. al-Muhājir, "Stand."

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said: The two of them went out and lo, there was Nūḥ b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim in the ancillary tent. They wheeled about for a time and exchanged a couple of blows, but did nothing, and Nūḥ fled. Ṭarkhūn followed [Nūḥ] and wounded his horse in its flank. [The horse] reared up, and both it and Nūḥ fell into the river of al-Ṣaghāniyān. Ṭarkhūn returned with his sword dripping with blood. He and ʿAlī b. al-Muhājir went into the ancillary tent and then into the main tent. Ṭarkhūn said to the slave girls, "Go back," and they went back into the ancillary tent. Ṭarkhūn sent [word] to Mūsā, "Restrain your companions. We are moving out in the morning." Mūsā returned to his camp, and in the morning Ṭarkhūn and all the non-Arabs moved out. Each people returned to its country.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said: The people of Khurasan used to say, "We have never seen or heard of the like of Mūsā b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khāzim. He fought along with his father for two years. Then he went roaming about in the land of Khurasan until he came to a king and relieved him of his city and expelled him from it. Then

382. Seven sūrahs of the Qur'ān begin with this pair of "mysterious letters" [see *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳur'ān [vol. V, pp. 412ff.]], but the words that follow it here are not matched by the words that follow it there.

383. Qur'ān 3:111=107, 28:41, 41:16=15, 59:12. Al-Balādhurī [Futūḥ, p. 414] identifies ḥā' mīm lā yunṣarūna as the battle cry of 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim.

Arab and Turkish troops went to [fight] him, and he fought the Arabs in the first part of the day and the non-Arabs in the latter part of the day. He stayed in his fortress for fifteen years. Transoxania was his and no one strove with him to gain mastery over it." [1161]

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: In Qūmis there was a man called 'Abdallāh at whose place young men (fityān) would gather to keep one another company at his trouble and expense. [This man] incurred a debt, and he came to Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh, who gave him four thousand [dirhams]; he took them to his companions. The poet said, reproving a man called Mūsā (ṭawīl):

You are not Moses, when he confided in his God, nor [are you] the giver [to] young men,[384] Mūsā b. Khāzim.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: When Yazīd [b. al-Muhallab] was dismissed and al-Mufaḍḍal took over, [al-Mufaḍḍal] wanted to enjoy al-Ḥajjāj's favor by fighting Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh. He sent out 'Uthmān b. Mas'ūd,[385] whom Yazīd had imprisoned, saying to him, "I want to send you against Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh." ['Uthmān said, "By God, he has killed people related to me without my having obtained revenge. I seek revenge for Thābit—the son of my paternal aunt—and for the Khuzā'ī. The treatment meted out to me and my family by your father and your brother has not been good. You (pl.) have imprisoned me and scared away my cousins and appropriated their property." Al-Mufaḍḍal said to me, "Put [all] this aside. Go and exact your revenge," and he sent him off with three thousand [men] saying to him, "Order a crier to cry out, 'Whoever joins us will have a regular place in the army.'"[386] He had that called out in the market, and people hastened to him. Al-Mufaḍḍal wrote to [his brother] Mudrik, who was at Balkh, instructing him to go with ['Uthmān]. ['Uthmān] set forth and, when he was at Balkh, he went out one night touring the camp and heard a man say, "I have killed him, by God." [At this,] he returned to his companions and said, "Surely I shall kill Mūsā, by [1162]

384. The text reads al-qaynāt, "singing girls," while the Addenda et Emendanda propose al-qinyān, which is presumably to be regarded as a misprint for al-fityān ("young men") in view of the preceding story.

385. On him, cf. Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, pp. 215–17, 229–30.

386. So rendering fa-lahu dīwān.

the Lord of the Ka'bah."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: In the morning he set off from Balkh—Mudrik went out sluggishly with him—crossed the river and stopped with fifteen thousand [men] at an island at al-Tirmidh which is today called the Island of 'Uthmān,[387] on account of [his] stopping there. He wrote to al-Sabal and to Ṭarkhūn, and they came to him. They besieged Mūsā and rendered him and his companions in straitened circumstances. Mūsā went out at night to Guftān, supplied himself with provisions from it, and then returned and remained for two months in a straitened condition. 'Uthmān had dug a trench and was watching out for a night attack, so that Mūsā was not able to catch him off guard. [Mūsā] said to his companions, "How much longer? Let us make a sortie and make our battle day one of either victory or death"; and he said, "Head for Soghd and the Turks." Then he made a sortie, having left al-Naḍr b. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim in the city; he had said to him, "If I am killed, do not hand the city over to 'Uthmān; hand it over to Mudrik b. al-Muhallab." He sortied and placed a third of his companions opposite 'Uthmān, saying [to them], "Do not engage him unless he fights you." He [himself] headed for Ṭarkhūn and his companions, and fought them gallantly. Ṭarkhūn and the Turks were defeated, and [Mūsā and his men] took their camp and began to carry it off.

Mu'āwiyah b. Khālid b. Abī Barzah looked at 'Uthmān, who was on a non-Arabian horse belonging to Khālid b. Abī Barzah al-Aslamī, and said, "Dismount, O amīr." But Khālid said, "Do not dismount, Mu'āwiyah brings ill luck.

The Soghdians and the Turks returned the charge and interposed themselves between Mūsā and the fortress. He fought them, and [his horse] was hamstrung and he fell. He said to a mawlā of his, "Carry me." [The Mawlā] said, "Death is disagreeable. Ride mounted behind me. If we escape, we shall both escape; if we perish, we shall both perish."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: [Mūsā] mounted behind him. 'Uthmān looked at him when he jumped up and said, "A jump [by] Mūsā, by [1163] the Lord of the Ka'bah." [Mūsā was] wearing a helmet of his which was adorned with red silk (khazz) and had a blue sapphire at its top.

387. According to Barthold (Turkestan[3], p. 75), this is "undoubtedly Aral-Payghambar."

'Uthmān came out of the trench and [he and his men] put Mūsā's companions to flight. Then ['Uthmān] headed for Mūsā. Mūsā's riding animal stumbled, and he and his mawlā fell. ['Uthmān and his men] ran up to him, gathered around him, and killed him. 'Uthmān's crier called out, "Do not kill anyone you encounter; take him prisoner."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: The companions of Mūsā scattered. Some of them were taken prisoner and were paraded before 'Uthmān. When he was brought an Arab prisoner, he said, "Our blood is licit for you and your blood illicit for us," and he ordered that he be killed. When he was brought a mawlā prisoner, he abused him and said, "These Arabs fight me. Why did you not become angry on my account?" and he ordered that he be beaten.[388] He was rough and coarse. No prisoner greeted him on that day apart from 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. 'Abdallāh b. Budayl b. Warqā'—whose mawlā he was; when ['Uthmān] saw him, he turned away from him and gestured with his hand that he should be released—and Raqabah b. al-Ḥurr;[389] when he was brought [the latter], he looked at him and said, "There was no great sin against us from this [fellow]; he was a friend of Thābit's and was with people to whom he acted loyally. The wonder is that you took him prisoner." They said, "His horse was wounded, and he fell off it into a deep hole and was taken prisoner." ['Uthmān] set him free and gave him a mount, saying to Khālid b. Abī Barzah, "Let him stay with you."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: The person who despatched Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh was Wāṣil b. Ṭaysalah al-'Anbarī. One day 'Uthmān looked at Zur'ah b. 'Alqamah al-Sulamī, al-Ḥajjāj b. Marwān, and Sinān al-A'rābī, [who were standing] to one side, and said to them, "You have a safe-conduct." The people suspected that he did not give them a safe-conduct until they wrote to him [and made an arrangement with him].

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: The city remained in the hands of al-Naḍr b. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim. He said, "I shall not [1164] hand it over to 'Uthmān b. Muḥammad, but I shall hand it over to Mudrik." He did so, and [Mudrik] gave him a safe-conduct and 388. Ibn al-Athīr makes it clear that the mawlās were set free after being beaten.

389. Al-Balādhurī (Futūḥ, p. 419) renders this name "Raqyah b. Al-Ḥ.rfānah."

handed [the city] over to 'Uthmān. Al-Mufaḍḍal wrote of the conquest to al-Ḥajjāj. Al-Ḥajjāj said, "What an astonishing fellow Ibn Bahlah is! I order him to kill Ibn Samurah, and he writes to me that he is at death's door,[390] and he [then] writes to me that he has killed Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim."[391]

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: Mūsā was killed in the year 85. Al-Bakhtarī[392] mentioned that Maghrā b. al-Mughīrah b. Abī Ṣufrah killed Mūsā. He said (ṭawīl):

The cavalry crushed Khāzim, Nūḥ, and Mūsā at al-Tirmidh, as if crushed under the[ir] chests.

One of the army struck Mūsā's leg. When Qutaybah became governor, he was told about him and said, "What induced you to [do] what you did to the young man of the Arabs after his death?" [The man] said, "He had killed my brother." [Qutaybah] gave the order, and [the man] was killed in front of him.

In this year 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān wanted to remove his brother 'Abd al-'Azīz [from the succession].[393]

['Abd al-Malik's Desire to Remove His Brother from the Succession]

Al-Wāqidī mentioned that 'Abd al-Malik intended that [removal] and Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb[394] advised him against it, saying, "Do not do this; you will raise a rebellious voice against yourself. Maybe death will come to him and you will be relieved of him." 'Abd al-Malik desisted from that, while yet yearning in his heart to remove ['Abd al-'Azīz]. [Then] there entered into his presence Rawḥ b. Zinbā' al-Judhāmī,[395] who was the person most respected by 'Abd al-Malik. He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, if you remove him, there will be no discord." ['Abd al-

390. Reading li-mā bi-hi in place of li-ma'ābihi.

391. Ibn al-Athīr adds at this point, "the killing of Mūsā did not please him because he was from Qays."

392. Correctly proposed in the Addenda et Emendanda in preference to the form given in the text.

393. See al-Ya'qūbī (Ta'rīkh, vol. II, pp. 334–35) for a different account.

394. 'Abd al-Malik's secretary and brother-in-law (Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 128).

395. Ibid., pp. 99–100 (where the form "Zanbā" is wrongly preferred).

Malik] said, "Do you think so, O Abū Zur'ah?" He said, "Yes, by God. I shall be the first to acquiesce in that." ['Abd al-Malik] said, "You advise me well, God willing." [1165]

[Al-Wāqidī] said: While this was going on—and 'Abd al-Malik and Rawḥ b. Zinbā' had fallen asleep—Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb entered into their presence at night. 'Abd al-Malik had previously instructed his chamberlains, "Qabīṣah is not to be kept from me, whatever time he may come, by night or by day, whether I am unoccupied or have a man with me. Even if I am with the women, he is to be brought into the session and I am to be informed of his position," and he would come in. He was in charge of the seal and the coinage; reports came to him before [they came to] 'Abd al-Malik, and he would read letters before him; he would bring a letter to 'Abd al-Malik unrolled and ['Abd al-Malik] would read it—[all of this] being in honor of Qabīṣah. [Qabīṣah] entered into ['Abd al-Malik's] presence, greeted him, and said, "May God reward you,[396] O Commander of the Faithful in respect of your brother!" He said, "Has he died?" [Qabīṣah] said, "Yes." 'Abd al-Malik said, "We belong to God and to Him we return!" Then he advanced upon Rawḥ and said to him, "God has sufficed us, O Abū Zur'ah, with what we wanted and what we had decided on. That was contrary to [what] you [advised], O Abū Isḥāq." Qabīṣah said, "What was that?" and ['Abd al-Malik] informed him of what had taken place. Qabīṣah said, "O Commander of the Faithful, the right opinion always lies in patience; in haste there is what there is."[397] 'Abd al-Malik said, "Many a time there can be much good in haste. You saw the affair of 'Amr b. Sa'īd al-Ashdaq. Wasn't haste in that better than patience?

In this year 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān died in Egypt in Jumādā I (May–June 704). 'Abd al-Malik assigned his governorship to his son 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik and put him in charge of Egypt.

As for al-Madā'inī, he said in among what was related to us by Abū Zayd on his authority: Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to 'Abd al-Malik commending to him the oath of allegiance to al-Walīd [as heir to the caliphate], and he sent in that regard a delegation led by 'Imrān b. [1166]

396. Ājaraka Allāh (fī-), a standard form of condolence.

397. A polite expression of objection or contradiction (see Lane, Lexicon, p. 2466c).

'Imrān b. 'Iṣām al-'Anazī.[398] 'Imrān stood up and gave an address, and the delegation spoke, and they urged 'Abd al-Malik and asked him to do that. 'Imrān b. 'Iṣām said (wāfir):[399]

O Commander of the Faithful, to you we bring from a distance a greeting and a salutation!
Acquiesce in what I want concerning your sons. Let your response to me be a noble action[400] for them and a support for us.
If I am to be obeyed in respect of al-Walīd,
I make the caliphate and rule[401] over to him.
He resembles you. Quraysh surround his qubbah;[402] through him the people seek rain from the clouds, And he is like you in piety. He has not acted childishly since the day when he took off his necklaces and amulets.
If you prefer your brother for [the caliphate], we,
by your grandfather, are not able to level any accusation against that;
But we are on our guard lest, through his sons, the sons by different mothers, we be given poison to drink.[403]
And we fear, if you place dominion among them, clouds coming back to them without water.
Let not what you have milked [belong] tomorrow to people [who are such that] after tomorrow, your [own] sons will thirst.

---

398. Sayed, Revolte, pp. 351–52, no. 7.

399. Cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 241; Aghānī[2], vol. XVII, p. 275; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 59.

400. The Balādhurī and Aghānī variant ukrūmat^{an} seems preferable to 'ādiyyat^{an} or 'āriyyat^{an}.

401. The Balādhurī and Aghānī variant wa'l-zimāmā seems preferable to wa'l-dhimāmā.

402. Presumably, some sort of audience tent is meant.

403. The Addenda et Emendanda point out that the word ma'tharat^{an}, which is given in the text at this point, "corrupta videtur," and propose instead mā'idat^{an}, i.e., "we are on our guard against . . . poisoned fare"; al-Balādhurī's an nusqā seems preferable.

I swear, if 'Iṣām[404] were to go beyond me[405] in that regard, I should not forgive him that.
If I gave my brother [something] for the sake of merit, desiring thereby good repute and standing, [That brother] would cause it to return to my sons, [1167] to the exclusion of his [own] sons; such [would be the case], or I would find some [other] way of dealing with him.
He who has cleavages among his relatives, the cleavage of dominion is the slowest to mend.

'Abd al-Malik said, "O 'Imrān, it is 'Abd al-'Azīz [whom you are talking about]." He said, "Use artifice on him, O Commander of the Faithful!"

'Alī [b. Muḥammad] said: 'Abd al-Malik wanted to have the oath of allegiance to al-Walīd [as heir] taken before the Ibn al-Ash'ath affair, because al-Ḥajjāj had sent 'Imrān b. 'Iṣām [to him] in that [connection]. When 'Abd al-'Azīz refused, 'Abd al-Malik turned away from what he wanted until 'Abd al-'Azīz died. When he wanted to remove 'Abd al-'Azīz and have the oath of allegiance taken to his son al-Walīd, he wrote to his brother, "If you think it right to make this matter over to your nephew. . . ." ['Abd al-'Azīz] refused, and ['Abd al-Malik] wrote to him, "Well, let [the caliphate] be his after you, for he is the dearest of creation to the Commander of the Faithful." 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to him, "I see in Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-'Azīz what you see in al-Walīd." 'Abd al-Malik said, "O God, 'Abd al-'Azīz has severed his relationship with me, and I shall sever mine with him," and he wrote to him, "Transport the revenue[406] of Egypt [to me]." 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to him, "O Commander of the Faithful, you and I have both reached an age that no one in your family has reached without having only a little time left. Neither of us knows which of us will be reached by death first. If you are minded to make the rest of my life unpleasant for me, [by all means] do [so, but I would prefer otherwise]." [At this,] 'Abd al-Malik became gentle and said, "By my 404. The poet's father.

405. Reading takhaṭṭānī instead of takhaṭṭa'anī.
406. Thus rendering kharāj here; Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 59) notes that 'Abd al-'Azīz used to remit nothing.

life, I shall not make the rest of his life unpleasant for him," and he said to his two sons, "If God wants to give you [the caliphate], no one of his servants will be able to avert that"; and he said to [1168] his two sons, al-Walīd and Sulaymān, "Have you ever committed anything forbidden?" They said, "No, by God." He said, "God is great! You will gain it, by the Lord of the Ka'bah."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: When 'Abd al-'Azīz refused to acquiesce in what 'Abd al-Malik wanted, 'Abd al-Malik said, "O God, 'Abd al-'Azīz has cut his relationship with me, and I shall cut mine with him," and, when 'Abd al-'Azīz died, the Syrians said, "['Abd al-'Azīz] has returned the Commander of the Faithful's affair to him; he made an invocation against him, and his call was answered."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to 'Abd al-Malik advising him to use Muḥammad b. Yazīd al-Anṣārī as a secretary. He wrote to him, "If you want a discreet, submissive, easy-tempered, intelligent, worthy, and trusty man, whom you may take for yourself and with whom you may lodge your secret[s] and that which you do not wish to be manifest, then take Muḥammad b. Yazīd." 'Abd al-Malik [accordingly] wrote to [al-Ḥajjāj], "Convey him to me," and he did so, and 'Abd al-Malik took him as a secretary.

Muḥammad said: No letter reached ['Abd al-Malik] but that he passed it to me, and he concealed nothing but that he informed me of it, while keeping it from the people; nor did he write to any one of his governors but that he told me of it. I was sitting one day, in the middle of the daytime, when an official courier came from Egypt. He said, "[I request] permission to [meet] the Commander of the Faithful." I said, "This is not a time [when] permission [can be given]. Tell me what you have come for." He said, "No." I said, "If you have a letter, give it to me." He said, "No."

[Muḥammad] continued: One of those who were present with me informed the Commander of the Faithful, and he came out and said, "What is this?" I said, "A messenger who has come from Egypt." He said, "Well, take the letter." I said, "He has claimed that he has no letter." He said, "Then ask him what he has come for." I said, "I have asked him, and he did not tell me." He said, "Bring him in," so I took him in and the messenger said, "May God reward you, O Commander of the Faithful, in respect of 'Abd al-'Azīz!" ['Abd al-Malik] said, "We belong to God and to Him we return!" and wept, and [then] remained silent with downcast eyes for a time. Then he said, "May God have mercy on 'Abd al-'Azīz! By God, 'Abd al-'Azīz has passed on and left us and this life of ours," and the women and the people of the house wept. Then he summoned me on the next day and said, "'Abd al-'Azīz, may God have mercy on him, has gone on his way, and the people must have a waymark and someone to be in charge after me. Who do you think?" I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, the lord of the people and the most pleasing and most worthy of them, al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik." He said, "You are right, may God grant you success! Who do you think should be after him?" I said, "O Commander of the Faithful, who other than Sulaymān,[407] the young man of the Arabs?" He said, "May you be granted success! If we were to leave [the caliphate] to Al-Walīd, he would make it over to his sons. Write a covenant for al-Walīd and [for] Sulaymān after him!" So I wrote an oath of allegiance to al-Walīd and then Sulaymān after him. [At this,] al-Walīd became angry with me. He did not put me in charge of anything after I had advised Sulaymān's succession to him. [1169]

'Alī [b. Muḥammad] said on the authority of Ibn Ju'dubah: 'Abd al-Malik wrote to Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī to summon the people [of Medina] to the oath of allegiance to al-Walīd and Sulaymān. They took the oath of allegiance, apart from Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab,[408] who refused and said, "I shall not take the oath of allegiance while 'Abd al-Malik is alive." Hishām beat him violently, clad him in haircloth, and sent him to Dhubāb,[409] a mountain pass at Medina where they used to kill and crucify[410] [people]. He thought that they intended to kill him; but, when they got to that place with him, they brought him back, and he said, "Had I thought that they would not crucify me, I should not have worn haircloth drawers; but I said [to myself], 'They will crucify me, [1170]

407. Literally, "Where will you turn it away from Sulaymān?"

408. For a view of Sa'īd's role in the nascent religious law of the time, see Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, pp. 15–17 and index.

409. Or Dhibāb, which Yāqūt knows simply as a mountain at Medina (Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 716).

410. As Nöldeke pointed out (ZDMG 56 [1902], p. 433), Arab crucifixion appears usually to have involved headless cadavers; for an apparent exception, see Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 232.

and [the drawers] will cover up [my private parts].'" News [of that] reached ʿAbd al-Malik, who said, "May God remove Hishām from all that is good! He should have summoned [Saʿīd] to the oath of allegiance, and, on his refusing [to take it], he should [either] have beheaded him or have desisted from him."

In this year ʿAbd al-Malik had the oath of allegiance taken to al-Walīd and then, after him, to Sulaymān; and he made them the two heirs of the covenant of the Muslims. He sent his oath for them out in writing to [all Muslim] territories, and the people took the oath. Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab[, however,] refrained from that, and Hishām b. Ismāʿīl, who was ʿAbd al-Malik's governor of Medina, beat him, paraded him around, and imprisoned him. ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to Hishām, blaming him for what he had done in that regard. The beating consisted of sixty lashes, and he paraded him as far as the top of the mountain pass [clad] in breeches made of hair.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar al-Wāqidī—ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar and other companions of ours: ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr appointed over Medina Jābir b. al-Aswad b. ʿAwf al-Zuhrī, who summoned people to the oath of allegiance to Ibn al-Zubayr. Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab said, "No. Not until the people are united," and Jābir gave him sixty lashes. That reached Ibn al-Zubayr, who wrote to Jābir blaming him and saying, "Why should we bother with Saʿīd? Leave him."

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—[1171] ʿAbdallāh b. Jaʿfar and other companions of ours: ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Marwān died in Egypt in Jumādā [sic] 84 [sic: May–June or June–July 703]. ʿAbd al-Malik then made the covenant to his two sons al-Walīd and Sulaymān, and sent the written oath to them to the territories. His governor [of Medina] at the time was Hishām b. Ismāʿīl al-Makhzūmī, who summoned the people to the oath. They took it, and he summoned Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab to take the oath. He refused, saying, "No. I'll see." Hishām b. Ismāʿīl gave him sixty lashes and paraded him in breeches made of hair as far as the top of the mountain pass. When they brought him back, he said, "Where are you bringing me back to?" They said, "To prison." He said, "By God, had I not thought it was going to be crucifixion, I should never have worn these breeches." [Hishām] returned him to the prison and detained him, and he wrote to ʿAbd al-Malik informing him of [Saʿīd's] disobedience and what had happened. ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to him blaming him for what he had done and saying, "There is more need to draw Saʿīd close [to you] by kind treatment of his kindred than to beat him. We know that he has no dissension or disobedience in him."[411]

The pilgrimage was led in this year by Hishām b. Ismāʿīl al-Makhzūmī: Thus it was related to us by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā on the authority of Abū Maʿshar; and al-Wāqidī said the same. The governor of the East, together with Iraq, in this year was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf.

411. Cf. the accounts of this episode given by Khalīfah (Taʾrīkh, pp. 290–91).

The Events of the Year 86

[1172] (JANUARY 2–DECEMBER 22, 705)

[The Death of 'Abd al-Malik]

One of [the events that took place] in [this year] was the death of 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān in the middle of Shawwāl (early–mid October).

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān died on Thursday in the middle of Shawwāl in the year 86. His caliphate [lasted] ten years and five months.

As for al-Ḥārith, he related to me on the authority of Ibn Sa'd on the authority of Muḥammad b. 'Umar, who said: Shuraḥbīl b. Abī 'Awn related to me on the authority of his father: The people became unanimous about 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān in the year 73 (692–93).

According to Ibn 'Umar—Abū Ma'shar Najīḥ: 'Abd al-Malik died in Damascus on Thursday in the middle of Shawwāl in the year 86. His rule, from the day when the oath of allegiance was taken to him until the day he died, was twenty-one years and one and a half months. For nine of these years, he was fighting Ibn al-Zubayr and was recognized as caliph in Syria; then [he was recognized as caliph] in Iraq, after Muṣ'ab had been killed, and remained [so recognized] after ʿAbdallāh b. al-Zubayr had been killed. The people were unanimous about him for thirteen years and four months, less seven nights.

As for ʿAlī b. Muḥammad al-Madāʾinī, he, according to what Abū Zayd related to us on his authority, said: ʿAbd al-Malik died [1173] in Damascus in the year 86. His rule [lasted] thirteen years, three months and fifteen days.

Report on His Age When He Died

The biographers (ahl al-siyar) differ in that [regard]. According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Saʿd—Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Abū Maʿshar Najīḥ: ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān died aged sixty.

Al-Wāqidī said: It has been related to us that he died when he was fifty-eight.[412]

[Abū Jaʿfar] said: The first [of these reports] is more secure, [since] it conforms with his birth date. He was born in the year 26, in the caliphate of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, may God be pleased with him, and he witnessed the Yawm al-Dār[413] with his father when he was ten.

Al-Madāʾinī, ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, said, in among what Abū Zayd mentioned on his authority: ʿAbd al-Malik died at the age of sixty-three.

*His Descent and His Teknonym (Kunyah)*[414]

As for his descent, [he was] ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ b. Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf. As for his kunyah, [it was] Abū al-Walīd. His mother [was] ʿĀʾishah bt. Muʿāwiyah b. al-Mughīrah b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ b. Umayyah. To [ʿAbd al-Malik] Ibn Qays al-Ruqayyāt says (kāmil):[415]

---

412. Cf. al-Balādhurī (AAC, p. 152), who cites al-Wāqidī to the effect that ʿAbd al-Malik was fifty-three when he died.

413. I.e., the occasion of the murder of the Caliph ʿUthmān in Dhū ʾl-Ḥijjah 35 (June 656).

414. See *EI*², s.v.

415. On the poet, see *EI*², s.v. Ibn Ḳays al-Ruḳayyāt, and Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 418–19; regarding the following verses, cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, pp. 152–53; Ibn ʿAbd Rabbihi, ʿIqd, vol. IV, p. 399; and Der Dîwân des ʿUbayd-Allâh Ibn Ḳais ar-Rukajjât, pp. 215–16 (where further parallels are given).

You are the son of 'Ā'ishah, who excelled her fellow women in descent.
She paid no attention to her coevals and went off on her own sweet way.

[1174] His Children and Wives

Among them were al-Walīd, Sulaymān, Marwān al-Akbar (who was without issue), and 'Ā'ishah: Their mother was Wallādah bt. al-'Abbās b. Jaz' b. al-Ḥārith b. Zuhayr b. Jadhīmah b. Rawāḥah b. Rabī'ah b. Māzin b. al-Ḥārith b. Quṭay'ah b. 'Abs b. Baghīḍ.

Yazīd, Marwān, Mu'āwiyah (who was without issue), and Umm Kulthūm: Their mother was 'Ātikah bt. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān.

Hishām, whose mother was Umm Hishām bt. Hishām b. Ismā'īl b. Hishām b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah al-Makhzūmī. Al-Madā'inī said: Her name was 'Ā'ishah bt. Hishām.

Abū Bakr, whose name [was] Bakkār. His mother was 'Ā'ishah bt. Mūsā b. Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh.

Al-Ḥakam, who died without issue. His mother was Umm Ayyūb bt. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

Fāṭimah bt. 'Abd al-Malik, whose mother was Umm al-Mughīrah bt. al-Mughīrah b. Khālid b. al-'Āṣ b. Hishām b. al-Mughīrah.

'Abdallāh, Maslamah, al-Mundhir, 'Anbasah, Muḥammad, Sa'īd al-Khayr, and al-Ḥajjāj, who [were born] to ummahāt awlād.[416]

Al-Madā'inī said: His wives, other than those we have mentioned, were (a) Shaqrā' bt. Salamah b. Ḥalbas al-Ṭā'ī, (b) a daughter of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib's,[417] peace be upon him, and (c) Umm Abīhā bt. 'Abdallāh b. Ja'far.

Al-Madā'inī mentioned on the authority of 'Awānah and others than him that Salamah b. Zayd b. Wahb b. Nubātah al-Fahmī [1175] entered into 'Abd al-Malik's presence and ['Abd al-Malik] said to

416. Plural of umm walad, a "female slave who has borne a child to her owner" (Schacht, An Introduction to Islamic law, index).

417. Thus, too, in al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 160, but according to Ibn al-Athīr this is untrue.

him, "Which time you have experienced is the noblest and which of the kings the most endowed with perfection?" [Salamah] said, "As for kings, I have only seen those who can be both blamed and praised; as for time, it raises some people and lays others low. Everyone blames his own time, because it wears out the new and renders the young decrepit; all that is in it becomes cut short, except for hope." ['Abd al-Malik] said, "Tell me about Fahm." [Salamah] said, "They are just as the one who said [the following verses] said (khafīf):[418]

Night and day crept over Fahm
b. 'Amr and they became like old bones.
Their abode became desolate, after glory, wealth and ease.
Thus does time put an end to people; their abodes remain like traces."

['Abd al-Malik] said, "And which of you says (wāfir):

I have seen people since time began, liking him who is rich among men,
Even if the rich man does little good and is niggardly, giving out small amounts.
I do not know why this should be so,
and what people can hope for from misers.
Is it for material gain? There is no material gain, nor can he be hoped [to help] when the nights bring disaster."

[Salamah] said, "I."

'Alī [b. Muḥammad] said: Abū Qaṭīfah 'Amr b. al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ said to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān (ṭawīl):[419]

I have been informed that Ibn al-Qalammas[420] has stigmatized me,

418. Cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, pp. 198–99.

419. On the poet, see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 424–25; regarding the following verses, cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, pp. 212–13; *Aghanī*², vol. I, p. 34.

420. Or al-'Amallas; according to Ibn Manẓūr (Lisan al-'arab, s.vv.), qalammas means "great lord" or "bountiful," while 'amallas means "vicious wolf" or "vicious dog." It is not clear who is meant here.

and who among people is wholly free of fault?
[1176] The chief of his people sees the paths of what is right, and the beturbaned leader may see what is right.
[But] who are you? Tell me, who are you, when things are now visible, now concealed?

'Abd al-Malik said, "I did not think that the likes of us would have 'Who are you?' said to him. By God, but for what I know, I should have said something which would have caused you to join your base ancestors and should have had you beaten to death."

'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Tha'labī said to 'Abd al-Malik (rajaz):[421]

O Ibn Abī al-'Āṣ, O best of young men, you are the preserver of the religion if the religion becomes frail.
You are the one who does not let rule be of no avail;
Quraysh are rent from you, just as the mill stone is rent [from its pivot].[422]
Abū al-'Āṣ—and in this he excelled—gave his sons advice which they heeded,
That they should kindle war and reject what he rejected, [sons] who thrust fiercely at necks and kidneys,
And advance boldly with swords to the fighting, and gather together [the like of] what he gathered.

[1177] A'shā Banī Shaybān said (kāmil):[423]

All of Quraysh acknowledge that rule belongs to the sons of Abū al-'Āṣ,
To the most pious and deserving of them, as determined by consultation.
They defend what they govern,

421. On this poet, see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 353–54; regarding the following verses, cf. Aghānī[2], vol. XIII, p. 169.

422. Reading jība and jawba in place of ḥība and ḥawba, as is suggested in the Addenda et Emendanda, the signification being that "you" are the center and "Quraysh" are around "you"; cf. Lane, Lexicon, p. 479b.

423. On the poet, see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, p. 330; regarding the following verses, cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 213; Geyer, The Dīwān of al-A'shà, p. 280.

and benefit those who are in distress.
Of Quraysh they are the most deserving of it (i.e., the Caliphate), in good times and in bad.

'Abd al-Malik said, "I do not know that anyone had a stronger hold on this rule than I. Ibn al-Zubayr prayed long and fasted much, but, because of his avarice, he was not fitted to be a leader."

The Events of the Year 86 (cont'd)

(JANUARY 2–DECEMBER 22, 705)

In this year the oath of allegiance was taken to al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik as caliph. It has been mentioned that, when he had buried his father, he departed from his grave, entered the mosque, and ascended the pulpit. The people gathered to him, and he made an address. He said, "To God we belong and to Him shall we return. God is the One Whose aid is sought against our loss at the death of the Commander of the Faithful. Praise be to God for having bountifully bestowed the caliphate on us. Stand and take the oath of allegiance." The first to stand for the oath was 'Abdallāh b. Hammām al-Salūlī. He stood, saying (rajaz):[424]

God has given you that which cannot be excelled;
heretics have wished to divert it
From you, but God insisted on leading it to you, until he invested you with its neck ring.

And he took the oath of allegiance to him. Then the people followed one another in taking the oath. [1178]

As for al-Wāqidī, he mentioned that al-Walīd, when he came back from the burial of his father—he was buried outside Bāb al-

424. Cf. al-Balādhurī, AAC, p. 27; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, vol. IV, p. 411; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 70.

Jābiyah[425]—did not go into his house but [instead] ascended the pulpit of Damascus, praised God and extolled Him as He deserves, and then said,[426] "O people, there can be no hastening of that which God has delayed, nor any delaying of that which God has hastened. Death is part of God's decree, of His prior knowledge, and of what He has written for His prophets and the bearers of His throne. The one charged with this community has taken to the dwelling places of the pious that which justifies for God [whatever He may dispense] by way of severity toward him who occasions doubt and gentleness toward the people of right and merit, [the people who] establish such of the beacon of Islam and its waymarks as God has established, by making the pilgrimage to this House, campaigning against these frontier ways of access, and waging these wars on the enemy of God. He [i.e., 'Abd al-Malik] was neither incapable nor remiss. O people, incumbent upon you are obedience and cleaving to the collective body, for Satan is with the individual. O people, he who reveals to us his inner thoughts [that is, of opposition], we shall smite that in which his eyes are; and he who remains silent will die of his malady [that is, of his rancor]."[427] Then he descended, looked at what there was of the . . .[428] of the caliphate, and took it for himself. He was a froward tyrant.[429]

In this year Qutaybah b. Muslim arrived in Khurasan as governor on behalf of al-Ḥajjāj.

[1179] According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Kulayb b. Khalaf—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās al-'Ammī and al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd—Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-'Ammī—his paternal uncle: I saw Qutaybah b. Muslim when he arrived in Khurasan in the year 86. He arrived while al-Mufaḍḍal, who intended to campaign in Akharūn and Shūmān,[430] was reviewing the army. Qutaybah addressed the people and urged them

425. The west gate of Damascus (*EI*², s.v. Dimashḳ [vol. II, p. 279]), al-Jābiyah itself being situated about 80 km to the south of Damascus (*EI*², s.v. al-Djābiya).

426. Cf. Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, vol. IV, p. 91, for what follows.

427. Also in al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 338, and Kitab al-'uyūn wa'l-ḥadā'iq, p. 2.

428. The text gives here al-dawābb, "the riding animals" (as does Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 70), which can hardly be right.

429. To use Arberry's rendering of the expression jabbār 'anīd, which occurs in the Qur'ān (11:59=62, 14:15=18); cf. al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, vol. V, p. 360 = par. 2114.

430. See above, n. 336 (first part).

to wage holy war. He said, "God has caused you to alight in this place so that He may make His religion strong, protect sacred things by means of you, and through you increase the abundance of wealth and the meting out of harsh treatment to the enemy. He promised His Prophet, may God bless him, in true speech and an articulate book and said, 'It is He who has sent His Messenger with the guidance and the religion of truth, that He may make it victorious over all religion, though the unbelievers be averse';[431] and He promised those who strive on His path the best reward and the greatest resource with Him. He said, 'That is because they are smitten neither by thirst, nor fatigue, nor emptiness on the path of God' up to where He says, 'the best of what they were doing.'[432] Then He gave the information concerning him who is killed on His path, that he is alive and provided for. He said, 'Count not those who were slain on God's path as dead, but rather living with their Lord, by Him provided.'[433] So fulfill the promise of your Lord and habituate yourselves to the greatest of distances and the sharpest[434] of pains; and beware of looking for easy ways out."[435]

What Happened to Qutaybah in Khurasan in This Year[436]

Qutaybah then reviewed the army, complete with weapons and animals, and went off, having deputed at Marw over its military affairs (ḥarb) Iyās b. 'Abd Allāh b. 'Amr and over its taxation (kharāj) 'Uthmān b. al-Sa'dī. When he was at al-Ṭālaqān, he was met by the dihqāns of Balkh and some of their dignitaries, who went with him. When he crossed the river, he was met with gifts and a gold key[437] by Tīsh[438] al-A'war, the king of al-Ṣaghāniyān, who invited him to his country. Then there came to him[439] with [1180]

431. Qur'ān, 9:33, 61:9.
432. Qur'ān, 9:120f. = 121–22.
433. Qur'ān, 3:169 = 163.
434. Reading amaḍḍ in place of amḍā.
435. This address is given in abbreviated form by Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 217).
436. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 31–32.
437. Thus too in al-Balādhurī (Futūḥ, p. 419); "keys," according to Ibn al-Athīr.
438. Following the Addenda et Emendanda (see Marquart, Ērānšahr, pp. 70, 226–27); see also the remarks of Bosworth, "The Rulers of Chaghāniyān in Early Islamic Times," Iran 19 (1981), p. 17, n. 10.

gifts and wealth the king of Guftān,[440] who [also] invited him to his country. He went with Tīsh to al-Ṣaghāniyān and handed his country [back] to him. [Now] the king of Akharūn and Shūmān had been a bad neighbor to Tīsh, having campaigned against him and hemmed him in; Qutaybah went to Akharūn and Shūmān, which [formed part] of Ṭukhāristān,[441] and Ghushtāsbān[442] came to him and made peace with him in return for tribute which he made over to him. Qutaybah accepted it and was satisfied.

Then he departed for Marw and deputed over the army his brother, Ṣāliḥ b. Muslim; he went ahead of his troops and reached Marw before them. After Qutaybah's return [to Marw], Ṣāliḥ conquered . . . ;[443] he was accompanied by Naṣr b. Sayyār, who showed valor on that day, and he gave him a village called Tinjānah.[444] Then Ṣāliḥ went to Qutaybah, who appointed him over al-Tirmidh.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: As for the Bāhilīs, they say [that] Qutaybah arrived in Khurasan in the year 85. He reviewed the army and the total of the coats of mail they counted was 350. He [1181] campaigned against Akharūn and Shūmān, and then came back; he embarked in boats, went downstream to Āmul, and left the army, which took the Balkh road to Marw. [News of that] reached al-Ḥajjāj, who wrote to him blaming him and impugning his decision to leave his army. He wrote to him, "If you are on campaign, be at the head of the people; if you come back, be among the last of them and [in] the rear guard."

---

439. Ignoring the second component of fa-atā-hu wa-atā.

440. See above, n. 356.

441. In this connection, Wellhausen noted [Arab Kingdom, p. 430] that, while Ṭukhāristān was "properly speaking, the mountainous country on both sides of the middle Oxus as far as Badakhshān . . . usually only the country south of the Oxus is understood under this name." Barthold states simply that "the term 'Ṭurkhāristān' was also used in a much broader sense to embrace all the provinces on both shores of the Amu-Darya which were economically dependent on Balkh" [Turkestan^{3}, p. 68].

442. Following Marquart's reading [Ērānšahr, p. 226], rather than the form given in the text [cf. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, p. 372].

443. Two unclear components. According to the Addenda et Emendanda, the first of these is to be read as Bāsārā or Bāsārān, on which see Marquart, Ērānšahr, p. 227 [for further discussion, see Barthold, Turkestan^{3}, p. 70, n. 1]; note, however, that the parallel passage in al-Balādhurī's Futūḥ [p. 420] reads "Kāsān and Ūrasht [leg. Ūrast] in Farghānah."

444. Not even Marquart knows more about this place.

It has been said that, before he crossed the river, Qutaybah in this year stayed [to take action] against Balkh, because some of it was in revolt against him and had waged open war against the Muslims. He accordingly fought its people, and one of the captives was the wife of Barmak, the father of Khālid b. Barmak; Barmak was in charge of al-Nawbahār.[445] [This woman] fell to the lot of 'Abdallāh b. Muslim, called al-Faqīr ["the poor one"],[446] the brother of Qutaybah b. Muslim, and he had sexual relations with her; he suffered from elephantiasis. Then the people of Balkh made peace on the day after Qutaybah had made war on them, and Qutaybah ordered that the captives be returned. Barmak's wife said to 'Abdallāh b. Muslim, "O Arab, I have conceived by you," and 'Abdallāh, who was at death's door, made a testamentary disposition that what was in her womb should be brought to him. She was returned to Barmak.

It has been mentioned that, in the days of al-Mahdī, when [the latter] arrived at al-Rayy, the descendants of 'Abdallāh b. Muslim went to Khālid [b. Barmak] and asserted his relationship to them. Muslim b. Qutaybah said to them, "If you claim him as a relative and that is formalized, you will have to provide him with a wife [from your family]," so they left him and turned away from their claim.

Barmak was a physician: He subsequently cured Maslamah [b. 'Abd al-Malik] of a malady he was suffering from.

In this year Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik made a campaign in Byzantine territory.

In it, too, al-Ḥajjāj imprisoned Yazīd b. al-Muhallab; he also [1182] dismissed Ḥabīb b. al-Muhallab from Kirmān and 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab from [the command of] his police.

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī: Thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar; and al-Wāqidī said the 445. See *EI*², s.v. al-Barāmika, and R. W. Bulliet, "Naw Barār and the Survival of Iranian Buddhism," Iran 14 (1976), pp. 140–45.

446. According to al-Tha'ālibī, he acquired this sobriquet because of his persistent pleading of poverty when importuning Qutaybah for extra shares of booty (Laṭā'if al-ma'ārif, p. 40 [English trans., p. 59]).

same. The amīr over the whole of Iraq and the whole of the East was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf; over civilian affairs (ṣalāt) at al-Kūfah was al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī ʿAqīl, and over military affairs (ḥarb) there, on behalf of al-Ḥajjāj, was Ziyād b. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh; over al-Baṣrah was Ayyūb b. al-Ḥakam;[447] and over Khurasan was Qutaybah b. Muslim.

447. See above, n. 82.

The Events of the Year 87

(December 23, 705–December 11, 706)

In this year al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik dismissed Hishām b. Ismā'īl from Medina. [Notice of] his dismissal arrived [there], according to what has been mentioned, on the night of Sunday, 7 Rabī' I (February 26) in the year 87. His governorship there lasted four years, less a month or so.

[The Appointment of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz as Governor of Medina]

In this year, too, al-Walīd put 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz in charge of Medina.

Al-Wāqidī said: He arrived there as governor in the month of Rabī' I, aged twenty-five, having been born in the year 62 (681–82). [Al-Wāqidī also] said: He arrived [with his baggage] on thirty camels and stopped at Dār Marwān.[448]

According to [al-Wāqidī]—'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī al-Zinād—

448. Which apparently served as the governor's residence. The Marwān in question was Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, who had himself served two terms as governor of Medina (de Zambaur, Manuel, p. 24); for an earlier reference to his dār, see al-Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, ser. ii, p. 164, 1.6.

[1183] his father: When ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz arrived at Medina and stopped at Dār Marwān, the people came into his presence and greeted [him]. When he had prayed the noontime prayer, he summoned ten of the jurisprudents of Medina, [namely,] ʿUrwah b. al-Zubayr, ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah, Abū Bakr b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, Abū Bakr b. Sulaymān b. Abī Ḥathmah,[449] Sulaymān b. Yasār, al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad, Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir b. Rabīʿah, and Khārijah b. Zayd. They entered into his presence and sat down. He then praised God and extolled Him as He deserves, and said, "I have summoned you for a matter for which you will be rewarded and in which you will be helpers [in achieving] what is right. I do not wish to make any decision without [knowing] your opinion or [at least] the opinion of those of you who are present. If you see anyone transgressing, or [information about] injustice on the part of [any] [sub]governor of mine reaches you, I entreat you, in such circumstances, to inform me." Then they went out, saying, "May God reward you with good," and dispersed.

[Abū Jaʿfar?] said: Al-Walīd wrote to ʿUmar, instructing him to make Hishām b. Ismāʿīl stand before the people; [al-Walīd] had a poor opinion of [Hishām].

Al-Wāqidī said: Dāwūd b. Jubayr said: The umm walad[450] of Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab informed me that Saʿīd summoned his son and his mawlās and said, "This man will be made to stand before the people, or has been, and let no one confront him or harm him with a [single] word; we shall leave that to God and [his] kindred, even if what I know is no good for him. As for speaking to him, I shall never speak to him."

[Al-Wāqidī] said: Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar related to me on the authority of his father: Hishām b.
[1184] Ismāʿīl used to be a bad neighbor and harm us; ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn[451] met with serious harm from him. When [Hishām] was dismissed, al-Walīd ordered that he be made to stand before the people, and he said, "I fear only ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn." ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn went past him when he had been made to stand at Dār Marwān, having previously told his intimates that no one of them should confront 449. Ḥathmah is proposed by the Addenda et Emendanda in preference to Khaythamah. For Khārijah cf. Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, pp. 41–42.

450. Cf. above, n. 416.

451. I.e., ʿAlī b. al-Ḥusayn Zayn al-ʿĀbidīn, grandson of ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib.

Hishām with a [single] word. When ['Alī] passed, Hishām b. Ismā'īl called out to him, "God knows very well where to place His messages."[452]

In this year Nīzak went to Qutaybah, and Qutaybah made peace with the people of Bādghīs on the basis that he would not enter it.

[Qutaybah's Peace Agreement with the People of Bādghīs][453]

'Alī b. Muḥammad mentioned that Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jushamī informed him on the authority of Khurasani shaykhs and Jabalah b. Farrūkh on the authority of Muḥammad b. al-Muthannā that there were Muslim prisoners in the hands of Nīzak Ṭarkhān. When Qutaybah made peace with the king of Shūmān, he wrote to [Nīzak] concerning those Muslim prisoners whom he had, [telling him] to release them and threatening him in his letter. Nīzak feared him, set the prisoners free, and sent them to Qutaybah. Qutaybah then sent to him Sulaym al-Nāṣiḥ, mawlā of 'Ubaydallāh b. Abī Bakrah, calling him to peace and a safe-conduct. [Qutaybah] also sent him a letter in which he swore by God that, if [Nīzak] did not go to him, he would campaign against him and pursue him wherever he might be, not turning back from him until he either defeated him or died before so doing. Sulaym brought [1185] Qutaybah's letter to Nīzak, and [Nīzak] took to seeking [Sulaym's] advice. He said to him, "O Sulaym, I do not think that your friend has any good [in mind]. He has written to me a letter [of the sort] that should not be written to someone like me." Sulaym said to him, "O Abū al-Hayyāj, this man is severe in his government, easygoing when he is treated gently, and difficult when he is treated badly. Do not let the coarseness of his letter prevent you from [going to] him. You will be very well treated by him and by all of Muḍar." Nīzak accordingly went with Sulaym to Qutaybah and, the people of Bādghīs made peace with [Qutaybah] in the year 87 on the basis that he would not enter Bādghīs.

In this year Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik campaigned in Byzan-452. Thus, too, in al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 339; cf. Qur'ān, 6:124 [which has risālatahu, in the singular]. The remark was presumably intended as a compliment to 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn in his capacity as a member of the Ahl al-Bayt.

453. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, p. 32.

tine territory accompanied by Yazīd b. Jubayr.[454] He encountered a large force of Byzantines at Sūsanah[455] in the region of al-Maṣṣīṣah.

Al-Wāqidī said: In [this year] Maslamah encountered Maymūn al-Jurjumānī[456]—with Maslamah there were about one thousand fighting men from the people of Anṭākiyah[457]—at Ṭuwānah.[458] He killed many of [the enemy], and at his hands God conquered fortresses.

It has been said that the person who campaigned against the Byzantines in this year was Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik, at whose hands God conquered the fortress of Būlaq, the fortress of al-Akhram, and the fortress of Būlus and Qumqum.[459] He killed about one thousand musta'ribah[460] fighting men and took their offspring and women captive.

In this year Qutaybah campaigned against Paykand.[461]

Report of [Qutaybah's] Campaign [against Paykand]

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū 'l-Dhayyāl—al-Muhallab [1186] b. Iyās—his father—Ḥusayn b. Mujāhid al-Rāzī and Hārūn b. ʿĪsā—Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq and others: When Qutaybah made peace with Nīzak, he stayed [put] until the time for campaigning,[462] and then in that year—the year 87—he campaigned against

454. Who seems to be otherwise unknown.

455. I.e., Sision: See Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 191, and Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, p. 115, from which it emerges (i) that this action must have taken place earlier than A.H. 87, and (ii) that the Arabs suffered a serious defeat.

456. Thus in the Addenda et Emendanda, in preference to the "al-Jurijānī" given in the text. This is Maymūn the Mardaite, who, contrary to what is implied here, was fighting on the Arab side against the Byzantines: See Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," pp. 191, 203; Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, p. 116; *EI*², s.v. Djarādjima (vol. II, p. 457a).

457. I.e., Antioch (see *EI*², s.v. Anṭākiya).

458. I.e., Tyana: See Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 191; Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, p. 116.

459. The rendering of these place names is tentative, and they appear to be unidentified (Khalīfah gives twl.q, and Ibn Kathīr gives q.myq.m).

460. Defined by Lammens (in a somewhat earlier context) as "tribus arabes raliées à Byzance at au christianisme" ("Le califat de Yazîd 1 er," pp. 606–7).

461. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 33–34; Narshakhī, The History of Bukhara, (trans. Frye), pp. 43ff.

462. Which, as becomes apparent below, was at the very beginning of spring.

Paykand. He went from Marw to Marw Rūdh to Āmul to Zamm,[463] crossed the river, and went to Paykand, which is the nearest of the cities of Bukhārā to the river and is called the City of the Merchants; it is at the end of the desert [adjacent to?] Bukhārā. When he stopped in the surrounding area, [the people of Paykand] asked the Soghdians for help and sought reinforcements from around them, and large numbers came to them, taking the road. No messenger of Qutaybah's could be sent off, nor could [any] messenger get to him; for two months no news reached him. Al-Ḥajjāj found news of him slow [in coming] and feared for the army. He ordered the people to make invocations for them in the mosques and wrote to this effect to the amṣār. [Qutaybah and his men] were fighting every day.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Qutaybah had a non-Arab spy called Tīdhar,[464] to whom the people of Upper Bukhārā gave money on [the understanding] that he would remove Qutaybah from them. [Tīdhar] came to [Qutaybah] and said, "Let me be alone with you," and the people [present] stood up [and left, although] Qutaybah kept Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ḍabbī back. Tīdhar said, "[There is] a [new] governor coming to you, for al-Ḥajjāj has been dismissed; you ought to go off with the people to Marw." Qutaybah called for Siyāh, his mawlā, and said, "Behead Tīdhar!" and he killed him. Then he said to Ḍirār, "There remains no one who knows this report but you and me, and I give God a covenant [1187] that, if this story comes out before this war of ours is finished, I shall make you join [Tīdhar]. Control your tongue, for the spreading of this story will weaken the forearms of the people."[465]

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Then [those who had earlier been present] came in and were alarmed by the killing of Tīdhar. They stayed silent, with downcast eyes, and Qutaybah said, "Do not be alarmed by the killing of a slave who has been destroyed by God." They said, "We thought that he was a sincere adviser to the Muslims." He said, "On the contrary, he was advising insincerely. God has destroyed him for his crime, and he has gone on his way. Go and fight your enemies, and encounter them with

463. See above, nn. 344 and 346.

464. This seems to be the likeliest rendering [see Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, p. 324], the other forms given being T.ndh.r, Y.tdh.r, T.nd.r, and B.nd.r.

465. Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 219, gives a longer account of this.

[something] other than that with which you have been encountering them."[466]

The people then went off, readying themselves, and formed their lines. Qutaybah went and spurred on the flag bearers, and there was some fighting with spears. [The fighters] then came together, and swords were used to good effect; God sent fortitude down to the Muslims, and they fought them until the sun had set. Then God gave the Muslims the upper hand, and [their opponents] were routed, heading for the city. The Muslims followed them and distracted them from entering [the city]. They scattered, and the Muslims came upon them, killing and taking prisoners at will.

The few who had entered the city preserved themselves in it, and Qutaybah set workmen onto the foundation [of its wall] in order to demolish it. They asked him for a peace, and he made peace with them, appointing over them one of his sons.[467] [Then] he went away from them, intending to return [to Khurasan], but, when he had gone a stage or two and was five parasangs distant from them, they broke faith, killed the governor and his companions, and cut off their noses and ears. [This] reached Qutaybah, who returned to them, they having fortified themselves, and fought them for a month. Then he set the workmen onto the foundation of [the wall of] the city, and they [excavated it and] [1188] propped it up with wood; [Qutaybah] intended, when the [work of excavating and] propping was finished, to set fire to the wood so that [the wall] might be demolished. But the wall fell down while they were still propping it up, and forty of the workmen were killed. [The people in the city now] sought peace, but he refused, fought them, took [the city] by force of arms, and killed those fighting men who were in it. Among those taken in the city was a one-eyed man who had been responsible for mobilizing the Turks against the Muslims, and he said to Qutaybah, "I shall ransom myself." Sulaym al-Nāṣiḥ said, "What will you give?" He said, "Five thousand pieces of Chinese silk worth one million [dirhams]." Qutaybah said [to his men], "What do you think?"

---

466. That is, fight them more strongly.

467. So rendering rajul^{an} min banī Qutaybah; thus too apud Khalīfah (Ta'rīkh, p. 303); however, Narshakhī (The History of Bukhara, p. 44) names the man appointed as Warqā' b. Naṣr al-Bāhilī, a name known also to al-Ya'qūbī (Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 342), albeit not specifically in the context of Paykand.

They said, "We think that his ransom will augment the booty of the Muslims. What mischief can this [fellow] possibly do?" Qutaybah said [to the man], "No, by God, no Muslim woman will ever be frightened by you," and he gave the order, and he was killed.[468]

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad]—Abū al-Dhayyāl—al-Muhallab b. Iyās—his father and al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās: When Qutaybah conquered Paykand, they there came upon innumerable gold and silver vessels. He put in charge of the booty and the division 'Abdallāh b. Wa'lān al-'Adawī, [who was] one of the Banū al-Malakān and was called by Qutaybah "the trustworthy one, the son of the trustworthy one," and Iyās b. Bayhas al-Bāhilī. They melted down the vessels and the idols and presented [the resultant bullion] to Qutaybah. They also presented to him the dross of what they had melted down, and he gave it to them. They were then given forty thousand [dirhams] for it, and they told [Qutaybah]. [At this, Qutaybah] changed his mind and ordered them to melt down [the dross]. They did so, and there emerged from it one hundred fifty thousand mithqāls, or fifty thousand mithqāls.[469]

They acquired much at Paykand. From Paykand there came into the hands of the Muslims [booty] the like of which they had never acquired in Khurasan. Qutaybah returned to Marw, and the Muslims became strong. They bought weapons and horses, and riding animals were procured for them. They competed with one another in fine attire and equipment, and they bought weapons at high prices, until the [price of a] spear reached seventy [dirhams].[470] Al-Kumayt said (basīṭ):[471] [1189]

And the battle day of Paykand, the wonders of which cannot be enumerated, and Bukhārā did not fall short of that.

468. A similar account of this one-eyed prisoner is given by Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 224).

469. A mithqāl being approximately 4.4 g (see *EI*², s.v. Makāyil and Mawāzīn). The figure of 150,000 mithqāls is reflected in Narshakhī's report (p. 45) of the total amount of treasure taken (rather than what issued from the dross, which he does not mention).

470. Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 221) adds here that the price of a coat of mail reached 700 dirhams (cf. Narshakhī's remark that "a spear was worth fifty dirhams, a shield fifty or sixty, and a coat of mail seven hundred dirhams" [p. 46]).

471. *EI*², s.v. al-Kumayt b. Zayd al-Asadī; Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 347ff. The following verse is also given in Shi'r al-Kumayt, no. 147.

In the treasuries were many weapons and much war matériel. Qutaybah wrote to al-Ḥajjāj seeking his permission to hand out these weapons to the troops, and he gave him permission. They brought out such war matériel and traveling equipment as was in the treasuries; he divided it out, and they equipped themselves. When springtime came, he summoned the people and said, "I am going to take you on campaign [now], before you need to carry provisions, and I shall bring you back before you need warm clothes"; and he set off finely equipped with riding animals and weapons. He went to Āmul and crossed from Zamm to Bukhārā; he went to Tūmushkath,[472] in Bukhārā [territory], and [its people] made peace with him.

According to 'Alī [b. Muḥammad]—Abū al-Dhayyāl—shaykhs from the Banū 'Adī: [Qutaybah's father,] Muslim al-Bāhilī, [had earlier] said to Wa'lān, "I have [some] money I should like to deposit with you." [Wa'lān] said, "Do you want it to be kept secret, or do you not mind the people knowing?" [Muslim] said, [1190] "I should like to keep it secret." [Wa'lān] said, "Send it with a man you trust to such-and-such a place and tell him that, when he sees a man in that place, he is to put down what he has with him and depart." "Yes," said Muslim, and he put the money in a saddlebag, loaded it on a mule, and said to a mawlā of his, "Set off with this mule to such-and-such a place and, when you see a man sitting, leave the mule and depart." The man set off with the mule. [Meanwhile] Wa'lān had reached the place at the appointed time, while Muslim's messenger was slow in getting to him. The time appointed by Wa'lān was past, and he thought that [Muslim must have] changed his mind; so he departed. There [now] came to that place a man from the Banū Taghlib and, [when] Muslim's mawlā came, he saw [the Taghlibī] sitting, left the mule, and returned [home]. The Taghlibī went up to the mule and, when he saw the money and did not see anyone with the mule, he led it to his house and took possession of both the mule and the money. Muslim thought that the money had gone to Wa'lān, and he did not ask him about it until he needed it. Then he met him and said, "My money." [Wa'lān] said, "I did not receive anything. I don't have any money of yours."

472. So reading nūmushakath, following Wellhausen (Kingdom, p. 434) and Gibb (Arab Conquests, p. 34); Barthold (Turkestan[3], p. 132, citing Yāqūt) identifies it as a "neighbourhood of Bukhara."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Muslim used to complain of [Wa'lān] and speak ill of him.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: He came one day to a gathering (majlis) of the Banū Ḍubay'ah and complained of him. The Taghlibī was sitting [there], went up to him, spoke to him in private and asked him about the money, and then told him [that he had it]. He took [Muslim] to his house, brought out the saddlebag, and said, "Do you recognize it?" "Yes," said Muslim. "And the seal?" "Yes," said Muslim. "Take your money," said [the Taghlibī], and he told him the story [of how he had come by it]. Muslim went to the people and the tribes to whom he had complained of Wa'lān, exonerating him and telling them the story. Concerning Wa'lān, the poet says (ṭawīl):

I am not like Wa'lān, who was a leader in piety, [1191] and I am not like 'Imrān or like al-Muhallab.

[This] 'Imrān [was 'Imrān] b. al-Faḍīl al-Burjumī.[473]

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year, according to what Aḥmad b. Thābit related to me on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar, was 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who was the amīr over Medina. Over the judiciary of Medina in this year was Abū Bakr b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm, on behalf of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. Over Iraq and the whole of the East was al-Ḥajjāj; his deputy over al-Baṣrah in this year was, according to what has been said, al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī, while 'Abdallāh b. Udhaynah was in charge of the judiciary [there]; his governor over military affairs (ḥarb) at al-Kūfah was Ziyād b. Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh, while Abū Bakr b. Abī Mūsā al-Ash'arī was over the judiciary [there]; over Khurasan was Qutaybah b. Muslim.

473. An early Arab campaigner in the East (al-Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, ser. i, pp. 2830–31).

The Events of the Year 88

(DECEMBER 12, 706–NOVEMBER 30, 707)

Among them was God's conquest for the Muslims of one of the fortresses of the Byzantines, called Ṭuwānah, in Jumādā II (May–June); they spent the winter there. In command of the army were Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik and al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.

Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī mentioned that Thawr b. Yazīd [1192] related to him on the authority of his companions: The conquest of Ṭuwānah was [effected] at the hands of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik and al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd. The Muslims inflicted an [initial] defeat on the enemy on that day. [The enemy] went to their church and then returned, and [the Muslims] suffered a defeat from which they thought they would never recover. Al-'Abbās remained with a party [of men], including Ibn Muḥayrīz al-Jumaḥī. He said to Ibn Muḥayrīz, "Where are the people of the Qur'ān who desire Paradise?" Ibn Muḥayrīz said, "If you call them, they will come to you." Al-'Abbās called, "O people of the Qur'ān!" and they all came forward. Then God defeated the enemy until they went into Ṭuwānah.[474] Al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik had required the people of Medina to provide levies in this year.

474. Cf. Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 192; Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, pp. 116ff.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—his father: Makhramah b. Sulaymān al-Wālibī said: He required them to produce two thousand [levies]. They stipulated among themselves to give pay to such of them as would serve as substitutes,[475] and fifteen hundred set out and 500 stayed behind. They made the summer campaign with Maslamah and al-'Abbās, who were in command of the army; and they wintered at Ṭuwānah and conquered it.

In [this year] al-Walīd b. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik was born.

[Reconstruction of the Mosque of Medina]

In [this year] al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik ordered the pulling down of the mosque of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, and the pulling down of the rooms of the wives of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, and the incorporation of them into the mosque.

Muḥammad b. 'Umar mentioned that Muḥammad b. Ja'far b. Wardān al-Bannā' [i.e., "the builder"] said: I saw the messenger sent by al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. He arrived in the month of Rabī' I in the year 88 [February–March 707], with a turban wound round his head. He entered into the presence of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz bearing al-Walīd's letter ordering him to incorporate the [1193] rooms of the wives of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, into the mosque, and to buy [the land, etc.] behind it and beside it so that it might [measure] two hundred cubits by two hundred cubits. He also said to him [in the letter]: "Move the qiblah [wall] forward, if you are able, and you are able, because of the standing of your maternal uncles;[476] they will not go against you. If any of them objects, order the people of the miṣr to estimate a fair value for him. Then demolish and pay them the prices. You have good precedents [for this in the actions of] 'Umar and 'Uthmān." ['Umar] had [the uncles] read the letter, they being with him; the people agreed to the price, and he gave them it and began to pull down the rooms of the wives of the Prophet, may God bless and preserve him, and to build the mosque. Soon afterward there arrived the workmen sent by al-Walīd.

475. All of this being the sense of tajā'alū; [see Lane, Lexicon, s.v.].
476. 'Umar's mother being a descendant of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Mūsā b. Yaʿqūb—his paternal uncle: I saw ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz pulling down the mosque; with him were [such] leading people [as] al-Qāsim, Sālim, Abū Bakr b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith, ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUtbah, Khārijah b. Zayd, and ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, showing him key features (al-aʿlām) in the mosque and taking measurements. They laid its foundation.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Yaḥyā b. al-Nuʿmān al-Ghifārī—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: When al-Walīd's letter came from Damascus—it took fifteen [nights][477]—with the order to pull down the mosque, ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz applied himself to the task with vigor.

Ṣāliḥ said: He put me in charge of pulling it down and [re-]building it. We pulled it down using the workers of Medina, [1194] and we began to pull down the rooms of the wives of the Prophet, may God bless and preserve him. [This went on] until there came to us the workmen sent by al-Walīd.

According to Muḥammad—Mūsā b. Abī Bakr—Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: We started pulling down the mosque of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, in Ṣafar in the year 88 (January–February 707). Al-Walīd sent [word] to the Byzantine Emperor informing him that he had ordered the pulling down of the mosque of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, and [asking him] to help him in [that regard]. [The Byzantine Emperor] sent to him one hundred thousand *mithqāl*s of gold, one hundred workers, and forty loads of mosaic; he ordered that mosaic be sought in cities that had been ruined and sent it to al-Walīd. Al-Walīd sent [all] that on to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz.[478]

In this year ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz began building the mosque.[479]

In it, too, Maslamah campaigned against the Byzantines. Three fortresses were conquered at his hands: the fortress of Qusṭanṭīn, [the fortress of] Ghazālah, and the fortress of al-Akhram; and he killed about a thousand of the mustaʿribah,[480] along with taking 477. Following the suggestions made in the Addenda et Emendanda.

478. On this locus classicus, see Gibb, "Arab-Byzantine Relations under the Umayyad Caliphate," pp. 52ff.

479. Al-Yaʿqūbī (Taʾrīkh, vol. II, p. 340 [where the same figures are given for *mithqāl*s, etc.]) notes that the work was finished in A.H. 90.

480. See above, n. 460.

the offspring captive and appropriating wealth.[481]

In this year Qutaybah campaigned against Tūmushkath and Rāmīthanah.[482]

[Qutaybah's] Campaign [against Tūmushkath and Rāmīthanah]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab—his father and Muṣ'ab b. Ḥayyān—a mawlā of theirs: Qutaybah [1195] campaigned against Tūmushkath in the year 88, having deputed over Marw Bashshār b. Muslim. Its people met him, and he made peace with them. Then he went to Rāmīthanah and its people made peace with him, and he departed from them. [At this point], the Turks, accompanied by the Soghdians and the people of Farghānah, marched on him and tried to intercept the Muslims while they were on their way. They caught up with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim al-Bāhilī, who was in command of the rear guard, there being a [distance of an Arab] mile[483] between him [on the one hand] and Qutaybah and the troops at the front [on the other]. When they drew near to him, 'Abd al-Raḥmān sent a messenger with his report to Qutaybah. The Turks came toward him and fought him. The messenger reached Qutaybah, who came back with [reinforcements] and joined 'Abd al-Raḥmān, who was [still] fighting them. The Turks had almost gained mastery over them, but when [the Muslims fighting them] saw Qutaybah, they took heart, showed fortitude, and fought them until noontime. Nīzak, who was with Qutaybah, showed valor on that day, and God defeated the Turks and dispersed them. Qutaybah went back, heading for Marw: He crossed the river by way of al-Tirmidh, heading for Balkh, and reached Marw.

The Bāhilīs said: In command of the Turks [when] they engaged the Muslims was Kūrbaghānūn[484] al-Turkī, the son of the sister 481. Cf. Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 192, where Ghazālah is identified as Gazelon. There are problems of chronology here (see Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, p. 118n.).

482. On Tūmushkath, see above, n. 472. Rāmīthanah was one of the districts of Bukhārā and contained a fortified village of the same name (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 116); cf. Khalīfah, Ta'rīkh, pp. 304–5.

483. Ca. two kilometers.

484. See Marquart, "Historische Glossen zu den alttürkischen Inschriften," p.

of the king of China. [His force numbered] two hundred thousand [men], over whom God gave the Muslims victory.[485]

In this year al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik wrote to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-Azīz concerning making the mountain passes easier and digging wells in the [Ḥijāzī] territories.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Ibn Abī Sabrah—Ṣāliḥ b.
[1196] Kaysān: Al-Walīd wrote to ʿUmar concerning making the mountain passes easier and digging wells at Medina, and his letters to that [effect] went out to [all the] Muslim territories; al-Walīd also wrote to Khālid b. ʿAbdallān [al-Qasrī] to that [effect]. [Ibn Kaysān?] said: He stopped those with elephantiasis from going out among the people and arranged for allowances to be allocated to them.

Ibn Abī Sabrah said on the authority of Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: Al-Walīd wrote to ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz [telling him] to construct the drinking fountain which is today at the house of Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. ʿUmar constructed it and caused its water to flow. When al-Walīd made the pilgrimage, he stopped at it, looked at the building and the drinking fountain [itself], and was pleased by them. He ordered that it should have superintendents to look after it and that the people of the mosque should be given to drink from it. That was done.

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz in the account of Muḥammad b. ʿUmar. He mentioned that Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh b. Jubayr, mawlā of the Banū al-ʿAbbās, related to him on the authority of Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān: ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz took out in that year—meaning the year 88—a number of Quraysh to whom he had sent gifts and baggage camels. They entered into a state of iḥrām with him at Dhū al-Ḥulayfah,[486] and he led with him animals for sacrifice. When they were at al-Tanʿīm,[487] they were met by some Qurashīs, in-182 [where [pace the Addenda et Emendanda] the readings Kūrbaghānūn and Kūrmaghānūn are proposed], and, more recently, Frye's remarks [Narshakhī, The History of Bukhara, pp. 133–34, n. 178].

485. Gibb [Arab Conquests, p. 35] casts doubt on the historicity of this report.

486. A settlement six or seven mīl [ca. twelve or fourteen km] from Medina [Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. II, p. 324].

487. A place two parasangs [ca. twelve km] from Mecca [Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. I, p. 879].

cluding Ibn Abī Mulaykah and others, who informed him that Mecca was short of water and that they feared for the pilgrims in respect of thirst; [the reason for] that [was] that the rain had been scanty. 'Umar said, "What is wanted here is clear. Come! We shall call [upon] God." [Ṣāliḥ b. Kaysān] said: I saw them doing so, and he with them, and they were insistent in the[ir] prayer. Ṣāliḥ said: And, by God, no sooner had we reached the House on that [1197] day than it was raining, which it did into the nighttime; the heavens opened, the flash flood came down the valley, and there came about a situation that the people of Mecca feared. 'Arafah, Minā, and Jam'[488] were washed out, and could only [be reached] by bridging. [Ṣāliḥ] said: Mecca produced plants that year, because of the fertility.

As for Abū Ma'shar, he said: The leader of the pilgrimage in the year 88 was 'Umar b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. That was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of he who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on his (i.e., Abū Ma'shar's) authority.

The governors over the amṣār in this year were the same as those we have mentioned as governors in the year 87.

---

488. Jam' is synonymous with al-Muzdalifah (see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 118); Ibn al-Athīr reads "Arafah and Mecca," while Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 75) gives "Arafah, Muzdalifah and Minā."

The Events of the Year 89

(DECEMBER 1, 707–NOVEMBER 19, 708)

Among them was the conquest by the Muslims in this year of the fortress of Sūriyah; in command of the army was Maslamah b. 'Abd al-malik.

Al-Wāqidī claimed that Maslamah campaigned in this year in Byzantine territory, accompanied by al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd, [that] they entered it together and then separated, and [that] Maslamah conquered the fortress of Sūriyah, while al-'Abbās conquered Adhrūliyyah and encountered a body of Byzantines and defeated them.

[An authority] other than al-Wāqidī has said that Maslamah [1198] headed for 'Ammūriyyah, where he encountered a large body of Byzantines. God defeated them, and he conquered Hiraqlah and Qamūdiyyah. Al-'Abbās made the summer campaign from the direction of al-Budandūn.[489]

In this year Qutaybah campaigned in Bukhārā and conquered Rāmīthanah.

'Alī b. Muḥammad mentioned on the authority of the Bāhilīs 489. The identifications are Isauria, Dorylaion, Amorion, Herakleia, Kamouliana, and Podendon, respectively (see Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," pp. 192–93; Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, pp. 118, 134 [map]).

that they said that and [that they said] that he returned, after he had conquered it, by way of Balkh. When he was at al-Fāryāb, there came to him al-Ḥajjāj's letter telling him to go to Wardān Khudhāh;[490] Qutaybah accordingly went back in the year 89. He went to Zamm, crossed the river, and was encountered on the desert road by the Soghdians and the people of Kish and Nasaf. They fought him, and he defeated them, went to Bukhārā, and stopped at Lower Kharqānah,[491] on Wardān's right. They engaged him with a large force, and he fought them for two days and nights; then God granted victory over them. Nahār b. Tawsi'ah said (ṭawīl):[492]

They had a [long] night from us at Kharqān, and our night at Kharqān was [even] longer.

'Alī [b. Muḥammad] said: According to (i) Abū al-Dhayyāl—al-Muhallab b. Iyās, and (ii) Abū al-'Alā'—Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah: [1199]
Qutaybah campaigned against Wardān Khudhāh, the king of Bukhārā, in the year 89, made no headway against him, and did not conquer any of his territory. He returned to Marw and wrote to al-Ḥajjāj about that. Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him, "Portray [the terrain] to me," and [Qutaybah] sent him a representation of it. Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him, "Return to your wallowing place, repent to God for what you have done, and make your approach from such-and-such a place"; and it has been said [that] al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him, "Outwit Kish, smash Nasaf, and reach Wardān;[493] beware of beating about the bush and spare me the byways."[494]

In this year Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī became governor of Mecca, according to what al-Wāqidī claimed. He mentioned that 'Umar b. Ṣāliḥ related to him on the authority of Nāfi', mawlā of the Banū Makhzūm, who said: I heard Khālid b. 'Abdallāh say on the pulpit of Mecca, while he was delivering a sermon, "O people, who is greater? A man's deputy (khalīfah) over his people or his

490. "The rulers of Wardāna, who bore the title of Wardān-Khudāts, were until the beginning of the eighth century the rivals of the Bukhār-Khudāts" (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 113).

491. One of the districts of Bukhārā (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 114).

492. Also cited by Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 76.

493. There is a play on words here; in addition, the text gives the vocalization wa-rid Wardān, which Gibb (Arab Conquests, p. 35) understood as "and drive Wardān back" (i.e., he read wa-rudda Wardān).

494. Wa-da'nī min bunayyāt al-ṭarīq; cf. Freytag, Arabum Proverbia, vol. I, p. 483.

messenger (rasūl) to them?[495] If you were not to know the superiority of the caliphate, [I would tell you] that Abraham, the friend of the Merciful, prayed for water, and He gave him bitter salt to drink, and the Caliph prayed to Him for water, and He gave him sweet water," ⟨meaning by "salt" Zamzam and by "sweet water"⟩[496] a well dug by al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik between[497] the two mountain passes of Ṭawā and al-Ḥajūn.[498] The water [of this [1200] well] used to be transported and placed in a tank made of leather beside Zamzam, so that its superiority over [the water of] Zamzam might be known. [Al-Wāqidī] said: Then the well caved in and disappeared; today it is not known where it is.

In [this year] Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik campaigned against the Turks until he reached al-Bāb[499] in the region of ʿAdharbayjān; he conquered fortresses and cities there.

The pilgrimage was led in this year by ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz: thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā on the authority of Abū Maʿshar. The governors of the amṣār in this year were [the same as] the governors in the preceding year; we have mentioned them already.

---

495. For discussion of the significance of this, see Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, p. 29.

496. The words in brackets have been added from Ibn al-Athīr.

497. The text reads bi-, "at." The parallel passage in Aghānī[2], vol. XXII, p. 18, reads bayna.

498. Al-Ḥajūn is identified as a mountain one and a half mīl (3 km) from the Kaʿbah (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. II, p. 215). Ṭawā (Dhū Ṭuwā in the Aghānī) is more problematic: Yāqūt knows it as the "most famous wādī at Mecca" (vol. III, p. 554), while Dhū Ṭuwā is simply "a place at Mecca" (vol. III, p. 553).

499. I.e., Bāb al-Abwāb (see EI[2], s.v.), modern Derbent, which could have been more accurately described as being in the region of Arrān.

The Events of the Year 90

(November 20, 708–November 8, 709)

In this year, according to what Muḥammad b. ʿUmar mentioned, Maslamah campaigned in Byzantine territory in the region of Sūriyah and conquered the five fortresses there.

In it, too, al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd campaigned, as far as al-Arzan according to some, and as far as Sūriyah according to others. Muḥammad b. ʿUmar said: It is sounder to say that he went as far as Sūriyah.[500]

In [this year] Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim al-Thaqafī, who was in command of an army on behalf of al-Ḥajjāj, killed Dāhir b. Ṣaṣṣah,[501] the king of Sind.

In it, too, al-Walīd appointed Qurrah b. Sharīk[502] over Egypt in place of ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAbd al-Malik. [1201]

In [this year] the Byzantines took prisoner Khālid b. Kaysān, the sea commander, and took him to their king; the king of the By-

500. Cf. Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 193; Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, pp. 118. "Al-Arzan" seems to constitute a problem: Brooks says that it "should be Arzanene or its chief town, but this is clearly out of place here."

501. I.e., Dāhir the son of Chach (for detailed discussion of this expedition, see F. Gabrieli, "Muḥammad ibn Qāsim ath-Thaqafī and the Arab Conquest of Sind," East and West, n.s. 15 (1965), pp. 281–95).

502. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳurra b. Sharīk.

zantines gave him to al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.[503]

In it, too, Qutaybah conquered Bukhārā and defeated the armies of the enemy there.[504]

[Qutaybah's Conquest of Bukhārā]

'Alī b. Muḥammad said: According to (i) Abū al-Dhayyāl—al-Muhallab b. Iyās, and (ii) Abū al-'Alā'—Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah: When there reached Qutaybah al-Ḥajjāj's letter—[the letter in which] he ordered him to repent of having departed from Wardān Khudhāh, the king of Bukhārā, before defeating him, [and ordered him] to go against [Wardān], informing him of the place from which he should proceed to [Wardān's] territory—Qutaybah went out to Bukhārā on campaign in the year 90. Wardān Khudhāh sent [word] to the Soghdians and the Turks and those who were around them, requesting their help, and they came. Qutaybah, however, reached [Bukhārā] first and besieged [it], and, when the reinforcements arrived, [the Muslims] went out to fight them. The Azd said, "Keep us on our own and let us fight them." Qutaybah said, "Go forward," and they went forward, fighting them, while Qutaybah sat wearing a yellow ridā'[505] over his weapons. They all showed fortitude for a long time; then the Muslims wheeled round, and the polytheists came at them, broke them, entered Qutaybah's camp, and crossed it until the women struck the faces of [the polytheists'] horses and wept. Then they returned to the charge, and the two wings of the Muslims closed in on the Turks [1202] and fought them until they repelled them to their positions.

The Turks stood on an elevation, and Qutaybah said, "Who will dislodge them from this place for us?" No one came forward; all the clans stood [stock-still]. Qutaybah went to the Banū Tamīm and said, "O Banū Tamīm, you are in the position of the ḥuṭamiyyah.[506] [All I need is one] battle day like the battle days [in your glorious past], may my father be your ransom." ['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Wakī' [b. Abī Sūd][507] took the standard 503. Cf. Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, p. 119.

504. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 35–36.
505. See below, n. 596 (first part).
506. "Coat of mail on which swords break" (see the Glossarium).
507. A leading Tamīmī in Khurasan (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register, s.v. Wakī' b. Ḥassān).

in his hand and said, "O Banū Tamīm, will you abandon me today?" They said, "No, O Abū Muṭarrif." Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah al-Mujāshi'ī[508] was in command of the cavalry of the Banū Tamīm, and Wakī' was their chief. The people were standing, and all of them held back. Wakī' said, "Forward, O Huraym," and he gave him the banner, "take your cavalry forward," and Huraym went forward, while Wakī' walked slowly behind with the infantry. Huraym got as far as a river that was between him and the enemy and then stopped. Wakī' said to him, "Press on, O Huraym."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Huraym gave Wakī' the look of a fierce camel and said, "Am I to impel my cavalry across this river? If they are defeated, that will be the end of them. By God, you are stupid!" [Wakī'] said, "You son of a stinking woman![509] I'm not going to see you disobey my order," and he struck him with an iron bar he had with him. [At this,] Huraym whipped his horse and impelled it [across the river], saying, "There can't be anything harder to take than this," and he crossed with the cavalry. Wakī' came to the river, called for wood, and bridged it. He said to his companions, "Whoever of you has accustomed himself to [the idea of] death, let him cross; he who has not, let him stay in his place." Only eight infantrymen crossed with him. He walked slowly with them until, when they were tired, he sat them down and they rested, while he went near the enemy. He made the cavalry into two wings and said to Huraym, "I am going to thrust at the [enemy]. Distract them from me with the cavalry." He said to the [infantrymen], "Attack!" and they charged straight [1203] at [the enemy] until they were mixed with them. Huraym attacked them with his cavalry, and they thrust at them with spears. By the time [the Muslims] desisted from [the Turks], they had dislodged them from their position. Qutaybah called out, "Do you not see the enemy defeated. No sooner did someone cross that river than the enemy fled in defeat." The [Muslims] followed them, and Qutaybah called out, "Whoever brings a[n enemy] head shall have one hundred [dirhams]."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: Mūsā b. al-Mutawakkil al-Quray'ī claimed: On that day eleven men from the Banū Quray' came, 508. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register, s.v. Huraym b. 'Adī.

509. I.e., a slave girl; note Ibn Qutaybah's observation that al-lakhnā' 'inda al-'arab al-amah ("Kitāb al-'arab," p. 352).

each of them bringing a head; each was asked, "Who are you?" and said, "A Qurayʿī." Then a man from al-Azd brought a head and they said to him, "Who are you?" He said, "A Qurayʿī." Jahm b. Zaḥr[510] was sitting [nearby] and said, "He is lying, by God! May God cause you to prosper, he is my cousin." Qutaybah said to [the Azdī], "Woe to you! What induced you to [say] this?" He said, "I saw that everyone who came said, 'A Qurayʿī,' and thought that everyone who brought a head had to say, 'A Qurayʿī.'" Qutaybah laughed.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said: On that day Khāqān[511] and his son were wounded.

Qutaybah returned to Marw and wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, "I sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim and God conquered at his hands." [ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: A mawlā of al-Ḥajjāj's had witnessed the conquest, and he came and told [al-Ḥajjāj] what had [really] happened. Al-Ḥajjāj was angry with Qutaybah, and [Qutaybah] grieved at that. The people said to [Qutaybah], "Send a delegation of the Banū Tamīm to [al-Ḥajjāj]; give [generously] to them and please them, and they will tell the amīr that the matter was as you [described it when you] wrote." [Qutaybah] accordingly sent [some] men, including ʿUrām b. Shutayr al-Ḍabbī, and, when they reached al-Ḥajjāj, he shouted at them and stigmatized them. He called for the cupper, [who had his] scissors in his hand, and said, [1204] "I'll cut off your tongues if you don't tell me the truth." They said, "The amīr is Qutaybah, and he sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān in command of them; the conquest belongs to the amīr and the one who is head of the people." It was ʿUrām b. Shutayr who spoke these words to him. Al-Ḥajjāj quietened down.

In this year Qutaybah renewed the peace between himself and Ṭarkhūn, the king of Soghd.

[Renewed Peace between Qutaybah and the Soghdians]

According to ʿAlī [b. Muḥammad]—Abū al-Sarī al-Marwazī—al-Jahm al-Bāhilī: When Qutaybah fell upon the people of Bukhārā and broke them up, the people of Soghd feared him. Ṭarkhūn, the king of Soghd, went back accompanied by two horsemen until he stood near Qutaybah's camp, with the Bukhārā river between the two of them. He asked [Qutaybah] to send to him a man to whom he might talk. Qutaybah ordered a man [to go], and [this man] drew near to [Ṭarkhūn].

510. Al-Juʿfī, brother of Jabalah (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register).
511. See above, n. 79.

As for the Bāhilīs, they say that Ṭarkhūn called to Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī,[512] who went to them. [Ṭarkhūn] asked for a peace in return for tribute that he would pay to them, and Qutaybah agreed to his request, made peace with him, and took from him hostages [to remain with him] until [such time as] Ṭarkhūn might send to him [the tribute] on the basis of which he had made peace with him. Ṭarkhūn departed to his country, and Qutaybah returned [sc. to Marw], accompanied by Nīzak.

In this year Nīzak broke the peace between himself and the Muslims, held out in his fortress, and reverted to war. Qutaybah campaigned against him.[513]

[Nīzak's] Perfidy and Why He Was Vanquished

'Alī [b. Muḥammad] said: According to (i) Abū al-Dhayyāl—al-Muhallab b. Iyās, (ii) al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḍabbī—his father, (iii) 'Alī b. Mujāhid, and (iv) Kulayb b. Khalaf al-'Ammī—each mentioned something and I have put [what they said] together [in a single account]; and the Bāhilīs mentioned something, and I have annexed [that] to the report of these [others] and have put it in [with the rest]: Qutaybah left Bukhārā accompanied by Nīzak, who had been alarmed by the conquests he had seen and who feared Qutaybah. [Nīzak] said to his companions and his intimates among them,[514] "I am with this [fellow], and I don't feel safe with him, for the Arab is like a dog: If you beat him, he barks, and if you feed him, he wags his tail. If you campaign against him and then give him something, he is pleased and forgets what you have done to him. Ṭarkhūn fought him several times, and when he gave him tribute, he accepted it and was pleased. He is a dissolute brute. The best thing will be for me to take my leave and return." They said, "Take your leave of him," and, when Qutaybah was at Āmul, [Nīzak] sought leave of him to return to Ṭukhāristān. [1205]

512. On him, see Shaban, The 'Abbāsid Revolution, pp. 65.
513. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 36ff.
514. Reading the variant minhum in preference to muttaham.

[Qutaybah] gave him leave, and, when he left his camp heading for Balkh, [Nīzak] said to his companions, "Hasten," and they went at great speed until they reached al-Nawbahār. He stopped to pray in it and regarded it as a blessing, and said to his companions, "I do not doubt that Qutaybah regretted it when we left his camp with his permission to me and [that] his messenger will at any moment reach al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh, ordering him to detain me. So set up a lookout, and if you see [that] the messenger has passed through the city and has gone out of the gate, he will not reach al-Barūqān before we reach Ṭukhāristān. Al-Mughīrah will send a man, but he will not catch up with us before we enter the Khulm pass." They did so.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said: A messenger set off from Qutaybah to al-Mughīrah with orders to him to detain Nīzak. When the mes-[1206] senger passed [on his way] to al-Mughīrah, who was at al-Barūqān[515]—the city of Balkh being in ruins at that time—Nīzak and his companions rode off and went on their way. The messenger reached al-Mughīrah, and [al-Mughīrah] himself went in search of [Nīzak]. [But] he found that he had entered the Khulm pass, and departed.

Nīzak [now] openly disavowed [Qutaybah]. He wrote to the Iṣbahbadh of Balkh, to Bādhām, the king of Marw Rūdh, to Suhrak,[516] the king of al-Ṭālaqān, to Tūsik,[517], the king of al-Fāryāb, and to al-Jūzjānī, the king of al-Jūzjān, calling upon them to disavow Qutaybah. They responded positively to him, and he appointed the spring as the time for them to join forces and campaign against Qutaybah. He also wrote to the Kābul Shāh, seeking his help, sent to him his baggage and money, and asked him to give him permission—if he was driven to it—to go to him and receive a safe-conduct in his country; [the Kābul Shāh] agreed to that and held his baggage.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] said: Jabghūyah, the king of Ṭukhāristān,

515. Following the destruction of Balkh, "the Arabs built a new town in the locality of Barūqān, two farsakhs from Balkh" (Barthold, Turkestan,[3] p. 77).

516. The Addenda et Emendanda point to the form S.hr.b (sc. Suhrab) below (pp. 1566, 1569 of the Arabic text), but Justi is ready to settle for Suhrak (Iranisches Namenbuch, p. 292, sub Εατράκης).

517. Following the Addenda at Emendanda and G. Schlegel, La stèle funéraire du Teghin Giogh, p. 23.

whose name was al-Shadh,[518] was weak. Nīzak took him and put him in a gold fetter, for fear that he might stir up discord against him, Jabghūyah being the king of Ṭukhāristān, and Nīzak [one] of his slaves. When he was sure [that Jabghūyah could not cause him trouble], he set watchmen over him and expelled Qutaybah's governor, Muḥammad b. Sulaym al-Nāṣiḥ, from Jabghūyah's territories. [News of] his disavowal reached Qutaybah [just] before the winter, [at a time when] the troops had gone their separate ways; only the people of Marw remained with Qutaybah. He sent his brother 'Abd al-Raḥmān to [the district of] Balkh, to al-Barūqān, [1207] with [an army of] twelve thousand [men], saying to him, "Stay there and do not initiate anything. When the winter is over, gather the army and go to Tukhāristān (sic); know that I [shall be] near you." 'Abd al-Raḥmān went off and stopped at al-Barūqān, and Qutaybah took his time until, late in the winter, he wrote to Abrashahr,[519] Bīward,[520] Sarakhs, and the people of Herat [instructing them] to come to him. They did so, this being at an earlier time than usual.

In this year Qutaybah fell upon the people of al-Ṭālaqān, according to one of the collectors of historical reports [ahl al-akhbār], and killed them on a massive scale; he crucified them in two straight parallel rows four parasangs long.[521]

[Qutaybah's Retribution against the People of al-Ṭālaqān]

The reason for that, according to what has been mentioned, was that, when Nīzak Ṭarkhān acted treacherously, disavowed Qutaybah, and resolved to make war on him, the king of al-Ṭālaqān concurred with [Nīzak] in making war on [Qutaybah], 518. As Gibb points out [Arab Conquests, p. 9], this identification of the Shadh with the Jabghūyah "is obviously impossible." Gibb takes the Shadh in question here [see below, pp. 1224–25 of the Arabic text] to be "the chief prince in Lower Ṭukhāristān," a description which "best suits the king of Chaghāniān." For more recent discussion of these titles, see Bosworth and Clauson, "Al-Xwārazmī on the Peoples of Central Asia," pp. 6, 9; Bombaci, "On the Ancient Turkish Title 'Šaδ'"; Bosworth, "The Rulers of Chaghāniyān in Early Islamic Times," p. 1.

519. I.e., Nishapur [see Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 383].

520. I.e., Abīward [ibid., p. 394].

521. Concerning al-Ṭālaqān at this point, Gibb [Arab Conquests, p. 37] remarks that "the traditions are hopelessly confused."

and he appointed a time for going to him along with those of the [other] kings who had agreed to rise with him to make war on Qutaybah. When, however, Nīzak fled from Qutaybah and entered the Khulm pass, which leads to Ṭukhāristān, he knew that he was impotent against Qutaybah, and fled. Qutaybah went to al-Ṭālaqān, fell upon its people, and did what I have mentioned earlier.

The person who said [all] this has been contradicted in what he has said; I shall come back to this in [dealing with] the events of the year 91.

[1208] The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz: Thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā on the authority of Abū Maʿshar; and so too said Muḥammad b. ʿUmar. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz was in this year al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik's governor of Mecca, Medina, and al-Ṭāʾif. Over Iraq and the East was al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf; al-Ḥajjāj's governor of al-Baṣrah was al-Jarrāḥ b. ʿAbdallāh, and in charge of its judiciary was ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Udhaynah; over al-Kūfah was Ziyād b. Jarīr b. ʿAbdallāh, and in charge of its judiciary was Abū Bakr b. Abī Mūsā. Over Khurasan was Qutaybah b. Muslim, and over Egypt was Qurrah b. Sharīk.

In this year Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and his brothers who were in prison with him fled with others and joined Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik, seeking protection through him from al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf and al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik.[522]

The Reason for [the Muhallabids'] Escape from al-Ḥajjāj's Prison and Their Going to Sulaymān

According to Hishām [b. Muḥammad]—Abū Mikhnaf—Abū al-Mukhāriq al-Rāsibī: Al-Ḥajjāj went out to Rustāqubādh to send [1209] out troops, for the Kurds had gained control over the whole of the territory of Fārs. He took with him Yazīd and his brothers al-Mufaḍḍal and ʿAbd al-Malik, brought them to Rustāqubādh, placed them in his camp, put around them something like a trench, housed them in a tent near his own quarters, placed them under Syrian guard, fined them six million [dirhams], and began to torture them. Yazīd showed great fortitude, which vexed al-Ḥajjāj. Then [al-Ḥajjāj] was told that [Yazīd] had been shot by an arrow, the head of which had lodged in his leg; if anything touched it he would scream, and if it was moved, however slightly, you would hear him exclaim. He ordered that [Yazīd] be tortured and that his leg be subjected to severe pressure;[523] when that was done to him, he screamed. His sister, Hind bt. al-Muhallab, was married to al-Ḥajjāj; when she heard Yazīd's screaming, she screamed and wailed, and al-Ḥajjāj divorced her. Then he desisted from them and started to try to get them to pay up. They started to pay, while at the same time working at escaping from their situation.

522. Similar accounts of this appear in Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-aʿyān, vol. VI, pp. 291ff.; Ibn Aʿtham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, pp. 209ff; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, vol. IX, pp. 78–79.

They sent [word] to Marwān b. al-Muhallab, who was at al-Baṣrah, instructing him to prepare horses for them by reducing them to scanty food; he was to make people think that he wanted to sell them, to exhibit them for sale, and overprice them so that they would not be bought, "so that they will be ready for us if we are able to escape from what is here." Marwān did that. Ḥabīb was in al-Baṣrah [too], also being tortured.

Yazīd ordered that much food be made for the guards, and they ate. He ordered drink, and they were provided with it and diverted one another's attention with it. Yazīd [then] put on the clothes of his cook, put a white beard over his [own] beard, and went out. One of the guards said, "[It is] as if this is the gait of Yazīd," and he went until he stood in front of him [to see] his face in the night, saw the whiteness of the beard, and departed from him; he said, "This is an old man." Al-Mufaḍḍal went out in [Yazīd's] footsteps undetected, and they reached their boats, which had been pre- [1210] pared for them in the Baṭā'iḥ.[524] They were eighteen parasangs from al-Baṣrah. When they got to the boats, 'Abd al-Malik was slow in reaching them and was diverted from them. Yazīd said to al-Mufaḍḍal, who had the same mother as 'Abd al-Malik, she being Bahlah, an Indian woman, "No, by God. I shall not leave until he comes, even if it were to mean going back to the prison." Yazīd stayed put until he came to them, and at that they embarked on the boats and traveled that night until morning. In the morning, the guards knew that they had gone, and that was referred to al-Ḥajjāj. Al-Farazdaq said concerning their exodus (tawīl):[525]

523. Yudhaq: See the Glossarium.

524. The swamps of southern Iraq between the Tigris and the Euphrates (see *EI*², s.v. al-Baṭīḥa).

I have not seen [anything] like the group who followed one another on the palm trunk,[526] while the guards were not sleeping.
They went off convinced that their allotted spans [were headed] for [immediate] destiny and death.
Not one of them did not quieten his fear with a sharp, cutting, burnished sword,[527]
And when they met, they did not meet a faint-hearted old man, nor a soft-boned youth;
[1211] They were like their father when they grew up, fifty [of them,], one after the other, [each of them replete with] courage and perfection.

Al-Ḥajjāj became fearful at [the escape] and imagined that they had gone in the direction of Khurasan. He sent the official courier to Qutaybah b. Muslim, warning him of their arrival and instructing him to be ready for them. He sent [word] to the amīrs of the frontier ways of access and the districts to be on the look out for them and to be ready for them, and he wrote to al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik informing him of their flight and [of the fact] that he did not think that they were heading [for anywhere] but Khurasan. Al-Ḥajjāj continued to suspect Yazīd for what he had done; he used to say, "I suspect that he is telling himself [to do] the like of what Ibn al-Ash'ath did."

When Yazīd drew near to Mawqū'[528] in the Baṭā'iḥ, he was met by the horses that had been prepared for him and his brothers. They went off on them, accompanied by a guide of theirs from Kalb called 'Abd al-Jabbār b. Yazīd b. al-Rab'ah;[529] he took them by way of al-Samāwah.[530] Al-Ḥajjāj was brought [information]

525. Dīwān, vol. II, p. 265.
526. 'Alā 'l-jidh'i, which must refer to the boats.
527. The Dīwān reads bi-qalb^{in} in place of bi-'aḍb^{in}.
528. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. IV, p. 688) knew this as a watering place or well (mā') in the region of al-Baṣrah.
529. See Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register and chart 283, where the name of his grandfather is given as Rabī'ah.
530. The name of the desert (and of a watering place or well) between al-Kūfah and Syria (Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. III, p. 131).

two days later and was told, "The man has taken the Syria road, and these horses [have become] tired on the way; someone has come who has seen them going along in the desert." [Al-Ḥajjāj] sent [word] to al-Walīd, informing him of that.

Yazīd went on until he reached Palestine and stopped with Wuhayb b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī, who was held in high estimation by Sulaymān; he lodged some of his baggage and family with Sufyān b. Sulaymān al-Azdī. Wuhayb b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān went and entered into the presence of Sulaymān and said, "This [man] Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and his brothers are in my house. They have come to you as fugitives from al-Ḥajjāj, taking refuge with you." [1212] [Sulaymān] said, "Bring them to me, for they are safe. They will never be got at as long as I am alive." [Wuhayb] brought them and conducted them into his presence; they were in a secure position. Their guide, the Kalbī, said concerning their journey (ṭawīl):

Surely God has made all good friends
a ransom for Ibn al-Muhallab, irrespective of what has happened!
What a fine young man [he is], O grouping of al-Azd!
Your riding camels
drew near to al-Wahb,[531] to the east of a mountain pass, They [then] turned to the right, [?alongside] the sand of ʿĀlij,[532] while on the right of the people were the heights of Ghurrab.[533]
If our riding camels do not reach Sulaymān in the morning after five [nights] from the people of al-Liwā,[534] they will return by night.[535]

531. Not known to Yāqūt.

532. Yāqūt (Muʿjam, vol. III, p. 591) knew ʿĀlij as "sands between Fayd and al-Qurayyāt . . . adjoining al-Thaʿlabiyyah on the Mecca road."

533. According to Yāqūt (Muʿjam, vol. III, p. 783), Ghurrab is "a mountain this side of Syria in the diyār of the Banū Kalb."

534. In addition to meaning "a place where the sand stops," al-Liwā is a place name signifying "one of the valleys of the Banū Sulaym" (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. IV, p. 366).

535. The sense of this is not clear to me.

We flee like[536] the sun from what is behind us and go, in the darkness of blackest night, With people who were kings. I guided them in the gloom in which no light of a star could be seen, Nor a moon, save faintly, as if it were a gilded bracelet, fashioned by a bracelet smith.

According to Hishām—al-Ḥasan b. Abān al-ʿUlaymī: While ʿAbd al-Jabbār b. Yazīd b. al-Rabʿah was journeying with them, [1213] Yazīd's turban fell off, and he missed it. He said, "O ʿAbd al-Jabbār, go back and seek it for us." [ʿAbd al-Jabbār] said "Someone like me should not be ordered [to do] this." [Yazīd] repeated [the order], and [ʿAbd al-Jabbār] refused. [Yazīd] caught him with [his] whip, and ʿAbd al-Jabbār proclaimed his genealogy to him; [Yazīd] felt ashamed, and that [is the context in which ʿAbd al-Jabbār] said:

Surely God has made all good friends
a ransom for Ibn al-Muhallab, irrespective of what has happened!

Al-Ḥajjāj wrote, "The family of al-Muhallab have embezzled God's money and have fled from me and joined Sulaymān." The family of al-Muhallab reached Sulaymān after the order had been given for people to be gathered to be sent to Khurasan, [since the authorities were sure] that Yazīd had gone in the direction of Khurasan in order to rouse those who were there to rebellion. When it reached al-Walīd that he was with Sulaymān, that made some of what he felt easier for him, [but he remained] angry about the money which [Yazīd] had taken.

Sulaymān wrote to al-Walīd, "Yazīd b. al-Muhallab is with me, and I have given him a safe-conduct. He owes three million [dirhams], al-Ḥajjāj having fined them six million and they having paid three million; I shall pay the remaining three million." [Al-Walīd] wrote to him, "No, by God, I shall not give him a safe-conduct until you send him to me." [Sulaymān] wrote to him, "If I send him to you, I shall come with him [myself]. I beseech you by God not to disgrace me and not to violate my [protection]." [Al-Walīd] wrote to him, "If you come to me, I shall not give him a safe-conduct." Yazīd said [to Sulaymān], "Send me to him, by God. I do not want to occasion enmity and war between you and him, nor [do I want] the people to see a bad omen for the two of you in me. Send me to him, and send your son with me, and write to [al-Walīd] in the kindest terms you can manage"; [Sulaymān] accordingly sent his son Ayyūb with him.

536. Reading, with Ms B, nafirru furāra, rather than taqarru qarāra.

Al-Walīd had ordered [Sulaymān] to send [Yazīd] to him in bonds, and he sent him to him saying to his son, "When you are about to enter [al-Walīd's] presence, you and Yazīd are to bind [1214] yourselves with a chain and go in to al-Walīd's presence together." [Ayyūb] did that with [Yazīd] when they got to al-Walīd, and they went into his presence [together]. When al-Walīd saw his nephew in a chain, he said, "By God, we have gone rather far with Sulaymān." Then the young man handed his father's letter over to his uncle and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, may I be your ransom, do not violate my father's protection, you being the most worthy of those who have defended it, and do not cut short the hope of one who has hoped for safety in taking refuge with us because of our [good] standing with you; do not abase one who has hoped for high rank in resorting to us because of our high rank with you."

[Al-Walīd] read the letter: "To 'Abd Allāh al-Walīd, the Commander of the Faithful, from Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik. To continue: I used to think that, even if an enemy who had thwarted you and striven against you sought my protection and I lodged him and gave him protection, you would neither abase my protégé nor violate my protection. As it is, I have only protected an obedient and compliant [man]—he and his father and his family have contributed much to Islam—and I have sent him to you. If you intend cutting off relations with me, violating my protection, and going to excess in doing me harm, you are [of course] able to do that if you want; but I would wish you to seek preservation by God from [any] intention of cutting off relations with me, violating my honor, and ignoring my solicitous regard [for you] and my connection [with you]. By God, O Commander of the Faithful, you know neither how much longer either of us has to live nor when death will part us. If the Commander of the Faithful, may God perpetuate his joy, is able [to bring it about] that the appointed time of death does not come to us but that he is [still] respecting our blood tie, giving me my due, and refraining from harming [1215] me, let him do so. By God, O Commander of the Faithful, nothing on earth—after piety to God—pleases me more than pleasing you. Your pleasure is part of that through which I seek God's pleasure. If for once, O Commander of the Faithful, you desire my joy, my friendly connection, my honor, and the exaltation of my due, pass over Yazīd for me without punishing him; everything you seek of him will be my responsibility."

When [al-Walīd] had read the letter, he said, "We have been burdensome to Sulaymān; and he summoned his nephew and brought him near to him. [Then] Yazīd spoke. He praised God and extolled Him, blessed His Prophet, may God bless him, and then said, "O Commander of the Faithful, our benefit through you is the best. Whoever may forget that, we shall not forget it; and whoever may deny that, we shall not deny it. There has issued from our benefit as a family, in [our] obedience to you, [in our] thrusting at the eyes of your enemies in great battlefields east and west, that in which there is for us a mighty grace." [Al-Walīd] said to him, "Sit," and he sat, and [al-Walīd] gave him safe-conduct and desisted from him.

[Yazīd] returned to Sulaymān, and his brothers strove to acquire the money he owed. [Al-Walīd] wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, "I could not make any headway with Yazīd. His family is with Sulaymān. Desist from them, and stop writing to me about them." When al-Ḥajjāj saw that, he desisted from them. Abū 'Uyaynah b. al-Muhallab owed al-Ḥajjāj one hundred thousand [dirhams, which al-Ḥajjāj] left to him; and he desisted from Ḥabīb b. al-Muhallab.

Yazīd returned to Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik and stayed with [1216] him, teaching him how to dress well,[537] making delicious dishes for him, and giving him large presents. He was one of those held in [Sulaymān's] highest regard. No gift reached Yazīd b. al-Muhallab but that he sent it to Sulaymān; and no gift or benefit reached Sulaymān but that he sent half of it to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. No slave girl pleased him but that he sent her to Yazīd, except for the slave girl Khaṭī'ah.[538]

That reached al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, who summoned al-

537. If this is how we are to understand yu'allimuhu al-hay'ah. Ibn al-Athīr omits it, while Ibn Kathīr [Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 79] reads ḥasan al-hay'ah.

538. About whom no more information seems to be available.

Ḥārith b. Mālik b. Rabīʿah al-Ashʿarī and said [to him], "Go off to Sulaymān and say to him, 'O you who are inimical to your family. It has reached the Commander of the Faithful that no gift or benefit comes to you but that you send half of it to Yazīd, and that one of your slave girls comes to you, and no sooner does her state of purity come to an end than you send her to Yazīd.' Show him the foulness of that and revile him for it. Do you think you can convey what I have instructed you to do?" [Al-Ḥārith] said, "Obedience [consists of] obeying you. I am simply a messenger." [Al-Walīd] said, "Go to him, say that to him, and stay with him. I shall send him a present. Hand it over to him and take from him a receipt for what you hand over to him."

[Al-Ḥārith] went until he reached [Sulaymān], who had a copy of the Qur'ān in front of him and was reciting. He entered into his presence and greeted him; [Sulaymān] did not return his greeting until he had finished his recitation. Then [al-Ḥārith] raised his head to him and said everything that al-Walīd had instructed him to say. [Sulaymān's] face became distorted [with] anger. Then he said, "By God, if I am able to get hold of you one of these days, I shall cut part of you off!" [Al-Ḥārith] said to him, "Obedience was incumbent upon me," and he went out of his presence.

When that [present] sent by al-Walīd to Sulaymān arrived, al- [1217]
Ḥārith b. Rabīʿah al-Ashʿarī entered into [Sulaymān's] presence and said to him, "Give me the receipt for what I have handed over to you." [Sulaymān] said, "What did you say to me?" He said, "I shall never repeat it to you.[539] Obedience was incumbent upon me in respect of it." [Sulaymān] was quiet and knew that the man had told him the truth. Then he went out and [those present] went out with him, and he said, "Take half of these bundles and baskets and send them to Yazīd."

[Hishām] continued: The man knew that [Sulaymān] would not obey anyone in respect of Yazīd. Yazīd stayed with Sulaymān for nine months; and al-Ḥajjāj died in the year 95, on Friday, 20 Shawwāl (July 8, 714).[540]

539. Following Ibrāhīm's ilayka abadᵃⁿ in preference to the text's seemingly unintelligible ʿāl.mā abadᵃⁿ.

540. The suspicion that something is wrong here is fortified by Ibn Kathīr's version (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 79): "Yazīd b. al-Muhallab stayed with Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik until al-Ḥajjāj died in the year 95."

The Events of the Year 91

(November 9, 709–October 28, 710)

In it, according to what Muḥammad b. 'Umar and others have mentioned, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd made the summer campaign. In command of the army was Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik.

In it, too, Maslamah campaigned against the Turks until he reached al-Bāb[541] in the region of Ādharbayjān. Cities and fortresses were conquered at his hands.

In it, Mūsā b. Nuṣayr campaigned against al-Andalus. Cities and fortresses were conquered at his hands.[542]

[Qutaybah's Capture and Killing of Nīzak]

[1218] In this year Qutaybah b. Muslim killed Nīzak Ṭarkhān.[543]

The narrative returns to that of 'Alī b. Muḥammad and the story of Nīzak and Qutaybah's victory over him until he killed him. When there reached Qutaybah those of the people of Abrashahr, Bīward, Sarakhs, and Herat to whom he had written instructing them to join him, he went with [his entire force] to

541. See above, n. 499.
542. See *EI*², s.v. al-Andalus.
543. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 36ff.

Marw Rūdh, having deputed [at Marw] over military affairs (ḥarb) Ḥammād b. Muslim and over taxation (kharāj) ʿAbdallāh b. al-Aḥtam. [When news of] the advance of [Qutaybah] into his territory reached the marzbān of Marw Rūdh, he fled to the land of the Furs.[544] Qutaybah arrived in Marw Rūdh, took two sons of his, killed them, and crucified them. Then he went to al-Ṭālaqān, the lord of which stayed put, not fighting him and desisting from him. [In al-Ṭālaqān] were brigands, whom Qutaybah killed and crucified. He appointed over al-Ṭālaqān ʿAmr b. Muslim[545] and went on to al-Fāryāb. The king of al-Fāryāb went out to him, submissively, and professing his obedience, and [Qutaybah] was satisfied with that and did not kill anyone there; he appointed over it a man from Bāhilah.

News of them reached the lord of al-Jūzjān, and he left his territory and went out into the mountains in flight. Qutaybah went to al-Jūzjān, and its people met him, compliant and obedient, and he accepted [that] from them and did not kill anyone there; he appointed over it ʿĀmir b. Mālik al-Ḥimmānī. Then he reached Balkh; the Iṣbahbadh and the people of Balkh met him, and he entered it. He stayed in it only one day and then went on, following ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [b. Muslim], until he reached the [1219]
Khulm pass. Nīzak had gone off and camped at Baghlān,[546] leaving fighting men at the mouth and the defiles of the pass in order to defend it, and placing fighting men in a strong fortress behind the pass. Qutaybah stayed for [some] days fighting them at the defile of the pass without being able to make any progress against them. He was unable to enter it, it being a defile through which the valley passed, and he did not know of any way by which he could get to Nīzak other than the pass or a desert which would not support the troops. He remained, turning his face to right and left in perplexity, looking for strategems.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: He was in this [dilemma] when there came to him the Ru'b Khān, the king of al-Ru'b[547] and 544. Which does not make sense in this context; in the Addenda et Emendanda, Marquart proposes that we should understand this as bilād al-Gharsh, i.e., Gharshistān, a territory in the mountains to the east of Herat (see EI[2], s.v. Ghardjistān).

545. This appointment (together with that of ʿĀmir b. Mālik—see the next paragraph) is also mentioned in the account of Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 232).

546. Two days' journey from Siminjān (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 67).

547. A town near Siminjān (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 427).

Siminjān,[548] seeking a safe-conduct from him on the basis that he would show him a way of getting into the fortress that was behind this pass. Qutaybah gave him a safe-conduct, gave him what he asked for, and sent with him at night men with whom he got to the fortress which was behind the Khulm pass. They fell upon [the men of the fortress] at night, they feeling perfectly secure [from attack], and killed them; those who survived and those who were in the pass fled, and Qutaybah and [his army] entered the pass and reached the fortress. Then he went on to Siminjān, Nīzak being at Baghlān, at a spring called Fanj Jāh;[549] between Siminjān and Baghlān is a desert that is not particularly difficult.

[ʿAlī b. Muḥammad] continued: Qutaybah stayed in Siminjān for [some] days and then went off to Nīzak; he sent his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān on ahead, and he reached Nīzak. [At this,] Nīzak set off from his house, crossed the Farghānah valley,[550] sent his baggage and wealth to the Kābul Shāh, and went on until he stopped at al-Kurz,[551] being followed [all the while] by ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān stopped and took control of [1220] the defiles of al-Kurz, and Qutaybah stopped at Iskīmisht,[552] two parasangs away. Nīzak took refuge in al-Kurz, having no way out save in one direction, which was difficult, since it could not be negotiated by riding animals.

Qutaybah besieged Nīzak for two months, until Nīzak's stock of grain became scanty and they were afflicted by smallpox, which Jabghūyah caught. Qutaybah feared the winter, and he summoned Sulaym al-Nāṣiḥ[553] and said, "Go off to Nīzak and use artifice to get him to come to me without a safe-conduct. If he gives you trouble and refuses, give him a safe-conduct. Know that, if I see you and you don't have him with you, I shall crucify you. So work for your own sake." [Sulaym] said, "Write for me to 548. Two days' journey from Khulm (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 67).

549. Rendered Pang-čāh, "Schneebrunnen" (rather than "Five Wells"), by Marquart (Ērānšahr, p. 219).

550. As Marquart points out (Ērānšahr, p. 220), this Farghānah must have been to the south of Baghlān.

551. Not even Marquart knows any more about this place.

552. Rendered thus by Marquart (Ērānšahr, pp. 219–20); if Wellhausen's identification (Kingdom, p. 435, n. 1) is correct, it was not far southeast of Baghlān.

553. In a roughly similar account, Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 226) identifies Sulaym al-Nāṣiḥ as Sulaym b. ʿAbdallāh.

'Abd al-Raḥmān, [telling him] not to disobey me." [Qutaybah] said, "Yes," and he wrote for him to 'Abd al-Raḥmān. [Sulaym] then went to ['Abd al-Raḥmān] and said to him, "Send men to be [stationed] at the mouth of the pass and, when Nīzak and I come out, let them slip round behind us, interposing themselves between us and the pass."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: 'Abd al-Raḥmān sent cavalry, and they were [stationed] where Sulaym instructed them [to be]. Sulaym [now] went off, carrying with him foodstuffs to last for days and loads of khabīṣ,[554] until he reached Nīzak. Nīzak said to him, "You have abandoned me, O Sulaym." Sulaym said, "I haven't abandoned you, but you disobeyed me and did harm to yourself. You disavowed [Qutaybah] and acted perfidiously." [Nīzak] said, "What is the right thing to do?" [Sulaym] said, "The right thing to do now is to go to him. You have angered him with your contention, and he is not going to leave this place of his. He is resolved to winter in situ, whether he perishes or survives." [Nīzak] said, "Am I to go to him without a safe-conduct?" [Sulaym] said, "I don't think that he will give you one, on account of what [he holds] against you in his heart, for you have filled him with wrath. I think that you should place your hand in his before he is aware of you, and I hope that, if you do that, he will be ashamed and will forgive you." [Nīzak] said, "You think that?" He said, "Yes." [Nīzak] said, "I can't bring myself to accept that. If Qutaybah sees me, he will kill me." Sulaym said to him, "I have only come to advise you to do this. If you do it, I hope that [1221] you will be safe and that your position with him will revert to what it was. If you refuse, I shall be off." [Nīzak] said, "Then let us give you lunch." [Sulaym] said, "I suspect that you (pl.) are too busy to prepare food; we have plenty of food with us."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: Sulaym called for lunch [to be served], and [his servants] brought abundant food, the like of which [Nīzak's men] had been unfamiliar with since they had been besieged. The Turks devoured it, and that grieved Nīzak. Sulaym said, "O Abū al-Hayyāj, I am one of your [most] sincere advisers. I see that your companions have been worn out. If the siege goes on for a long time and you stay as you are, I can't be sure that they won't make use of you in order to gain safe-conduct. Set off and go to Qutaybah." [Nīzak] said, "I have never felt safe with him, and I shall not go to him without a safe-conduct. My feeling about him is that he is going to kill me even if he does give me a safe-conduct, but the safe-conduct gives me more excuse from blame and more hope." [Sulaym] said, "He has given you a safe-conduct: do you have any doubts about me?" Nīzak said, "No." [Sulaym] said, "So set off with me." His companions said to him, "Accept what Sulaym has said; he would not have said but what is true." So he called for his riding animals and went with Sulaym.

554. Lane (Lexicon, p. 697c) defines this as "a kind of food, sweet, well known, made of dates and clarified butter, mixed together."

When he reached the steps by which he might descend to the plain, he said, "O Sulaym, whoever may not know when he will die, I [for one] know when I shall die. I shall die when I see Qutaybah." [Sulaym] said, "By no means. Will he kill when you have a safe-conduct?" Then [Nīzak] rode, accompanied by Jabghūyah, who had recovered from smallpox, and Ṣūl and ʿUthmān, the sons of Nīzak's brother, and Ṣūl Ṭarkhān, [who was] Jabghūyah's deputy, and Kh.n.s.[555] Ṭarkhān, [who] was the police chief.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: When he emerged from the pass, the cavalry left by Sulaym at the mouth of the pass slipped around and interposed themselves between the Turks and the exit. Nīzak [1222] said to Sulaym, "This is the first bad [sign]." [Sulaym] said, "Don't think that.[556] The [fact that] these people are staying behind[557] you is better for you." Sulaym went on, together with Nīzak and those who had had gone out with him, until they entered into the presence of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim, who sent a messenger to Qutaybah informing him [of this]. Qutaybah sent ʿAmr b. Abī Mih-zam to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [with the message], "Bring them to me," and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān brought them to him. Qutaybah imprisoned the companions of Nīzak and handed Nīzak [himself] over to Ibn Bassām al-Laythī. He wrote to al-

555. Or "Ḥ.b.s.," as in Ms P and Ibn al-Athīr.

556. So understanding lā taf'al in the text; Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 227) reads lā ʿalayka, "don't worry," at this point.

557. Reading takhallufu in place of tukhallifu (pace the Addenda et Emendanda).

Ḥajjāj asking his permission to kill Nīzak.

Ibn Bassām placed Nīzak in his yurt, dug a trench around the yurt, and set guards over him. Qutaybah sent off Mu'āwiyah b. 'Āmir b. 'Alqamah al-'Ulaymī, who removed what goods and people there were in al-Kurz and brought them to Qutaybah. [Qutaybah] imprisoned [these people], pending [the arrival of] al-Ḥajjāj's letter concerning what he had written to him about. Al-Ḥajjāj's letter instructing him to kill Nīzak reached him after forty days.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: [Qutaybah] called for [Nīzak] and said, "Do you have any commitment from me or from 'Abd al-Raḥmān or from Sulaym?" He said, "I have one from Sulaym." [Qutaybah] said, "You are lying," and he stood up and went into [an inner chamber]. He returned Nīzak to his prison and remained [indoors] for three days without appearing to the people.

According to ['Alī b. Muḥammad]—Al-Muhallab b. Iyās al-'Adawī: The people talked about the matter of Nīzak. Some of them said, "It is not lawful for [Qutaybah] to kill him," while others said, "It is not lawful for him to let him be." Much was said about this.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: On the fourth day Qutaybah came out, sat, and gave permission to the people [to come into his presence]. He said, "What do you think about killing Nīzak?" They held differing opinions: There were those who said, "Kill him," those who said, "You have given him a commitment; do not kill him," and those who said, "We are not sure [that he will not do harm] to the Muslims," Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn entered, and [1223] [Qutaybah] said to him, "What do you say, O Ḍirār?" He said, "I say that I heard you say that you had given God a covenant that if He delivered [Nīzak] into your hands, you would kill him, and that if you did not do so, [you wished that] God would never help you." Qutaybah sat silently and with downcast eyes for a long time and then said, "By God, if there were to remain of my allotted span no more than three words, I would say, 'Kill him, kill him, kill him.'" He sent for Nīzak and ordered that he and his companions be killed; he was killed along with seven hundred [others].

As for the Bāhilīs, they say that neither [Qutaybah] nor Sulaym gave him a safe-conduct. When [Qutaybah] intended to kill him, he called for him and for a Ḥanafī sword.[558] He unsheathed it, lengthened[559] his sleeves, and executed him with his [own] hand. He ordered 'Abd al-Raḥmān to behead Ṣūl, and he ordered Ṣāliḥ to kill 'Uthmān, called Shaqrān, the son of Nīzak's brother. He said to Bakr b. Ḥabīb al-Sahmī, from Bāhilah, "Have you [enough] strength [to deal with the rest]?" He said, "Yes, more than enough";[560] there was roughness in Bakr. [Qutaybah] said [to him], "Take these dihqāns."

['Alī b. Muḥammad] continued: When he was brought a man, he would behead him and say, "Begin and keep at it."[561] Those who were killed on that day [numbered] twelve thousand, according to what the Bāhilīs say. [Qutaybah] crucified Nīzak and the two sons of his brother at the source of a spring called Wakhsh Khāshān[562] in Iskīmisht. Al-Mughīrah b. Ḥabnā' said, mentioning that in a long piece (ṭawīl):[563]

By my life, what a good campaign by the army that was;
it put an end to Nīzak and became lofty [in merit].

According to 'Alī—Muṣ'ab b. Ḥayyān—his father: Qutaybah [1224] sent the head of Nīzak with Miḥfan b. Jaz' al-Kilābī and Sawwār b. Zahdam al-Jarmī. Al-Ḥajjāj said, "Qutaybah should have sent Nīzak's head with one of the sons of Muslim."[564] Sawwār said (wāfir):

I say to Miḥfan, when an auspicious [bird] has flown [from on my left] and another [bird], an inauspicious one,
from my right,
And disasters have begun to rise up all around him, and stop short of me,

---

558. According to Lane (Lexicon, p. 658), Ḥanafī swords were "certain swords, so called in relation to El-Aḥnaf Ibn-Ḳeys; because he was the first who ordered to make them."

559. Sic: unrolled? One might rather have expected him to roll his sleeves up.

560. Following the preference of the Glossarium and of the Addenda et Emendanda for wa-azīdu (rather than wa-urīdu).

561. Awridū wa-aṣdirū: cf. al-Zamakhsharī, Asās, s.v. ṣ.d.r.

562. Not even Marquart has anything to say about this place.

563. On the poet, see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 374–75. The following verse is given (in mangled form) by Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 229); Ibn al-Athīr ascribes it to Nahār b. Tawsi'ah.

564. I.e., one of his brothers.

"I beseech you, does it please you that my saddle and yours are on Bādhibīn[565] mules?"

Miḥfan said, "Yes, [both here] and in China."

'Alī said: According to (i) Ḥamzah b. Ibrāhīm, (ii) 'Alī b. Mujāhid—Ḥanbal b. Abī Ḥuraydah—the marzbān of Qūhistān, and (iii) [an authority/authorities] other than those two: Qutaybah called for Nīzak one day, while he was imprisoned, and said, "What is your opinion about al-Sabal and al-Shadh? Do you think that they will come if I send to them [to come]?" [Nīzak] said, "No."

['Alī] continued: Qutaybah sent to them, and they came to him. He summoned Nīzak and Jabghūyah, and they entered, and there were al-Sabal and al-Shadh sitting in front of him. [Nīzak and Jabghūyah] sat down opposite them, and al-Shadh said to Qutaybah, "Jabghūyah, even though he is an enemy of mine, is older that I; and he is the king, while I am as his slave. Give me permission to draw near to him." [Qutaybah] gave him permission, and he drew near to him, kissed his hand, and prostrated himself before him.

['Alī] continued: Then al-Sabal[566] asked [Qutaybah's] permission [in respect of Jabghūyah]; [Qutaybah gave him permission, and he drew near to him and kissed his hand. Nīzak said to Qutaybah, "Give me permission to draw near to al-Shadh, for I am his slave." He gave him permission, and he drew near to him [1225] and kissed his hand. Then Qutaybah gave leave to al-Sabal and al-Shadh, and they departed to their lands; he joined to al-Shadh['s party] al-Ḥajjāj al-Qaynī, who was a leading Khurasani.

Qutaybah killed Nīzak, and al-Zubayr, the mawlā of 'Ābis[567] al-Bāhilī, took a boot of Nīzak's in which there was a jewel. Owing to that jewel, which he had acquired in [Nīzak's] boot, he became the richest and most landed person in his territory. Qutaybah allowed him it, and he remained rich until he died at Kābul in the governorship of Abū Dāwūd.[568]

565. A place in Iraq to the east of Wāsiṭ (see Cornu).

566. Following Ms B. (Thumma ista'dhanahu al-sabal) in preference to the version that inserts fī before al-sabal; the latter version would involve al-Shadh's paying homage to al-Sabal, which seems less likely.

567. Ibn al-Athīr reads "'Abbās."

568. Abū Dāwūd Khālid b. Ibrāhīm al-Dhuhlī, who was governor of Khurasan from 137/754–55 to 140/757–58 (see Omar, The 'Abbāsid Caliphate, 132/750–170/786, pp. 203–4).

['Alī] continued: Qutaybah set Jabghūyah free, gave generously to him, and sent him to al-Walīd; he stayed in Syria until al-Walīd died. Qutaybah returned to Marw, and appointed his brother 'Abd al-Raḥman over Balkh. The people used to say that Qutaybah behaved perfidiously toward Nīzak. Thābit Quṭnah[569] said (ṭawīl):

Do not consider perfidy [to be the equal of] resolution; with it feet may ascend one day and then slip.

['Alī] said: Al-Ḥajjāj used to say, "I sent Qutaybah as an inexperienced young man: Whenever I gave him an extra dhirā', he gave me an extra bā'."[570]

'Alī said: According to (i) Ḥamzah b. Ibrāhīm—Khurasani shaykhs, (ii) 'Alī b. Mujāhid—Ḥanbal b. Abī Ḥuraydah—the marzbān of Qūhistān, and (iii) [an authority/authorities] other than those two: When Qutaybah b. Muslim had returned to Marw and killed Nīzak, he sought the king of al-Jūzjān, who had fled from his country. [The king] sent [word to Qutaybah], requesting a safe-conduct, and [Qutaybah] gave him one on condition that he come to him and make peace with him. [The king] requested hostages, to be held by him, while he [in turn] would give hos-[1226] tages. Qutaybah gave [him] Ḥabīb b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. Ḥuṣayn al-Bāhilī, and the king of al-Jūzjān gave [him] hostages from his family. The king of al-Jūzjān left Ḥabīb in al-Jūzjān, in one of his fortresses, and came to Qutaybah and made peace with him. Then he returned and died in al-Ṭālaqān. The people of al-Jūzjān said, "They have poisoned him," and they killed Ḥabīb; [at this,] Qutaybah killed the hostages who were with him. Nahār b. Tawsi'ah said to Qutaybah (wāfir):[571]

May God show you a judgment concerning the Turks like [His] judgment concerning Qurayẓah and al-Naḍīr![572]
A decree from Qutaybah, not tyrannical, through which thirsting bosoms are cured.

---

569. Thābit (b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān) b. Ka'b al-'Atakī (see Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 376–77).

570. I.e., he repaid him amply or fourfold. Dhirā' signifies "forearm, cubit," and the dhirā' shar'iyyah is the canonical ell of 49.875 cm; bā' signifies the "span of two outstretched arms" and is the equivalent of four canonical ells.

571. The first two of the following verses are given also by Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 233).

572. Two of the Jewish groupings at Yathrib against whom the Prophet took harsh measures (*EI*², s.v. Ḳurayẓa).

If Nīzak sees disgrace and abasement, then how many amīrs have been rendered stupid in the war?

Al-Mughīrah b. Ḥabnā' said, eulogizing Qutaybah and mentioning the killing of Nīzak, Ṣūl, and Nīzak's nephew [called] 'Uthmān or Shaqrān (kāmil):[573]

For whom have the abodes effaced at the foot of a piece [of land]
[everything] except for what remains of dry herbage and panic grass?
The winds have violently blown about the dust and rubbish there and have obliterated them, sweeping right across their open spaces.
An abode of a slave girl, whose saliva is as if it were musk, the mixture of which is mingled with wine.
Inform Abū Ḥafṣ Qutaybah of my eulogy, and recite to him my greeting and salutation.
O sword, convey it, for its praise is good, and you are witness to my deed.
He is elevated, and, when he is elevated, men are humbled to Qutaybah, the protector of the preserve of Islam.
The finest one, the one who is chosen for a matter of moment,
the experienced one, through whom the numerous enemy is taken.
He goes forth when the coward fears and the war has become hot, its fire kindled with blazing kindling grass.
The spear, with the standard before it, is given to drink blood, under flashing [weapons] and [gushing] throats;
Heads are cut off by swords as if they were [1227] broken ostrich eggs, when you see them in the hole.
You see slender steeds readied

573. The first of the following verses appears also (in mangled form) in Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 224).

in his courtyard for whatever may befall;
With them he brought Nīzak down from a high place and al-Kurz, where [Nīzak] was doing what he wanted.
You gave to his brother, Shaqrān, to drink from his cup, and you gave their two cups to Bādhām to drink from.
You left Ṣūl, when he attacked, knocked down, with the horses treading on him with the backs and edges of their hooves.

In this year—I mean the year 91—Qutaybah made his second campaign in Shūmān, Kish, and Nasaf, and he made peace with Ṭarkhān.[574]

[Qutaybah's Campaign in Transoxania]

ʿAlī said: According to (i) Bishr b. ʿĪsā—Abū Ṣafwān, (ii) Abū al-Sarī and Jabalah b. Farrūkh—Sulaymān b. Mujālid, (iii) al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd—Tufayl b. Mirdās al-ʿAmmī, (iv) Abū al-Sarī al-Marwazī—his paternal uncle, (v) Bishr b. ʿĪsā and ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—Ḥanbal b. Abī Ḥuraydah—the marzbān of Qūhistān, (vi) ʿAyyāsh b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ghanawī—Khurasani shaykhs, and (vii) my foster father—"each has mentioned something, and I have put it [all] together and have inserted some parts into other parts": Qaybishtasbān[575]—one of them said Ghushtāsbān[576]—the king of Shūmān, threw out Qutaybah's governor and withheld the tribute on the basis of which he had made peace with Qutaybah.
[1228] Qutaybah sent to him ʿAyyāsh al-Ghanawī, accompanied by one of the Khurasani ascetics, to induce the king of Shūmān to pay the tribute on the basis of which he had made peace with Qutaybah. They reached the country, and [the people] came out to them and shot at them. [The ascetic] turned back, while ʿAyyāsh al-Ghanawī stayed [where he was]. He said, "Is there no

574. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 38ff.

575. Following the proposal of Marquart in the Addenda et Emendanda (see also Ērānšahr, p. 226 [= Kai-Bištaspān; cf. Justi, Iranisches Namenbuch, p. 372]).

576. Following the proposal of Marquart in the Addenda et Emendanda (see also Ērānšahr, loc. cit. = Ghuštāspān, and cf. above, p. 128 and n. 442).

Muslim here?" and a man came out of the city to him and said, "I am a Muslim; what do you want?" ['Ayyāsh] said, "[I want] you to help me make holy war (jihād) against them." [The man] said, "Yes." 'Ayyāsh said to him, "Be behind me to protect my back," and he stood behind him; the man's name was al-Muhallab. 'Ayyāsh fought them; he charged them, and they scattered away from him. [Then] al-Muhallab attacked 'Ayyāsh from behind and killed him. They found sixty wounds on him, and his death grieved them; they said, "We have killed a brave man."

[News of this] reached Qutaybah, who went to them in person, taking the Balkh road. When he reached [Balkh], he sent his brother 'Abd al-Raḥmān on ahead and placed 'Amr b. Muslim over Balkh. The king of Shūmān was a friend of Ṣāliḥ b. Muslim's, and Ṣāliḥ sent to him a man to order him to [render] obedience and guarantee him Qutaybah's pleasure if he reverted to the [terms of the] peace. [The king] refused and said to Ṣāliḥ's messenger, "With what will you make me frightened of Qutaybah? I, among the kings, have the strongest fortress. When I shoot at the top of it—I, the strongest of people with the bow and the strongest of them in shooting—my arrow does not [even] get halfway up my fortress. I do not fear Qutaybah."

Qutaybah went on from Balkh, crossed the river, and reached Shūmān, where the king had fortified himself. Qutaybah set up mangonels against it and pounded it. When [the king] feared that he would be vanquished and saw what had befallen him, he gathered all the money and jewels he had and dropped them in a spring in the middle of the fortress, the bottom of which was not known.

['Alī] said: Then [Qutaybah] conquered the fortress. [The king] went out to them, fought them, and was killed. Qutaybah took the fortress by force of arms, killed the fighting men, and took the offspring captive. Then he returned to Bāb al-Ḥadīd,[577] and passed [1229] from there to Kish and Nasaf. Al-Ḥajjāj had written to him, "Outwit Kish, and smash Nasaf; and beware of beating about the bush."[578] He conquered Kish and Nasaf, [but] F.ryāb[579] held out

577. The famous Iron Gate, i.e., the Buzgala pass, on the road from al-Tirmidh to Kish and Nasaf (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 186; Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, pp. 441–42).

578. Cf. above, p. 147.

579. Thus, too, in Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 83), but this cannot be the against him; so he burned it, and it was called "The Burnt."[580] From Kish and Nasaf, Qutaybah sent his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim to Ṭarkhūn in Soghd. [ʿAbd al-Raḥmān] went along until he stopped at a meadow near [Ṭarkhūn and his followers], that being at the time of the afternoon prayer. [His army] broke up into groups and drank until they became silly and made mischief. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān ordered Abū Mardiyyah, a mawlā of theirs (sc. the Bāhilīs), to prevent the people from drinking the [fermented] juice;[581] he beat them, broke their vessels, and poured out their wine, which flowed into the valley. It was called "Wine Meadow." One of their poets said (kāmil):

As for wine, I do not drink it;
I fear the dog Abū Mardiyyah,
Going vigorously and violently with his ax handle,[582] jumping over walls, [looking] for drink.

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān took from Ṭarkhūn something on the basis of which Qutaybah had made peace with him, handed over to him [some] hostages that were with him, and departed [heading] for Qutaybah, who was at Bukhārā. They then returned to Marw.

The Soghdians said to Ṭarkhūn, "You have been satisfied with humiliation, and you have deemed the [paying of] tax agreeable; you are an old man, and we have no need of you."

[ʿAlī] said: They put Ghūrak[583] in charge and imprisoned Ṭarkhūn. Ṭarkhūn said, "There is nothing after being stripped of kingship other than being killed; I prefer that that should be by my [own] hand rather than that someone other than myself should take charge of it in respect of me"; and he leaned on his [1230] sword until it came out of his back.[584] [ʿAlī] said: They did this to well-known Fāryāb, since the context is Transoxanian; see Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 138 (also Wellhausen, Kingdom, pp. 435 [n. 3], 466).

580. As Barthold (Turkestan[3], p. 138, citing al-Ṭabarī, Taʾrīkh, ser. ii, p. 1041) notes, a village in this area had become known as "The Burnt" as a result of the earlier activities of Ḥabīb b. al-Muhallab.

581. So rendering al-ʿaṣīr, which was clearly alcoholic in this case (Dr. D. F. Waines has informed me that this sense of ʿaṣīr is not uncommon).

582. Preferring bi-shikkatihi, as proposed by the Addenda et Emendanda.

583. Following the Addenda et Emendanda, rather than the text (see also Gibb, Arab Conquests, p. 42 and n. 15 thereto); Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 84) gives this form and says that Ghūrak was Ṭarkhūn's brother.

584. According to al-Yaʿqūbī (Taʾrīkh, vol. II, p. 344), Ghūrak killed Ṭarkhūn.

Ṭarkhūn when Qutaybah went out to Sijistān; and they put Ghūrak in charge.

As for the Bāhilīs, they say: Qutaybah besieged the king of Shūmān and set mangonels against his fortress. He set up a mangonel that they used to call "The Pigeon-Toed," shot the first stone, and hit the [city] wall; he shot another, and it landed in the city. Then the stones followed one another, landing in the city. One of them landed in the king's court, hitting a man and killing him. [Qutaybah] conquered the fortress by force of arms. Then he returned to Kish and Nasaf, and thence to Bukhārā. He stopped at a village in which there were a fire temple and a house of gods; in [this village] there were peacocks, and they called it "The Dwelling Place of the Peacocks."[585] Then he went to Ṭarkhūn in Soghd, in order to collect from him that on the basis of which he had made peace with him. When he looked out on the valley of Soghd and saw how good it was, he recited (basīṭ):

A green and fertile valley that has been protected from people, out of caution against death and battle.[586]
I have come to it with fine horses, that are urged along, bringing at a run tousle-headed [fighters] thirsty for blood.

['Alī] said: [Qutaybah] took from Ṭarkhūn his [tribute as stipulated in the] peace. Then he returned to Bukhārā. He made a young man Bukhārā Khudhāh, and killed those he feared would oppose him. Then he went by way of Āmul to Marw.

According to ['Alī]—the Bāhilīs—Bashshār b. 'Amr—a man from Bāhilah: [Qutaybah's men] kept on bombarding their buildings until the fortress was conquered.

[Khālid al-Qasrī's Strict Governorship of Mecca]

In this year al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik appointed over Mecca Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī, who remained governor there until al-Walīd died. [1231]

585. Manzil al-ṭawāwīs. See Barthold, Turkestan[3], pp. 98–99.
586. Reading ḥadhāru 'l-mawti wa-'l-rahaji, with Ms B.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar al-Wāqidī—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm b. 'Uqbah—Nāfi', mawlā of the Banū Makhzūm: I heard Khālid b. 'Abdallāh say, "O people, you are in the most sacrosanct of God's lands. God chose it from [all] the lands and put His House in it. Then He prescribed for His servants the making of pilgrimage to it, 'he who is able to make his way there.'[587] O people, incumbent upon you are obedience and cleaving to the collective body. Beware of uncertainties. By God, no one who impugns his imām (that is, the Caliph) will be brought to me but that I shall crucify him in the Ḥaram. God has placed the caliphate in relation to Him in the position in which He has placed it. Assent, obey, and do not say, 'Thus and thus.' The only [right] view concerning what the Caliph writes about or opines is to put it into effect. Know that it has reached me that some of those [given to] disobedience are coming to you and staying in your land. Beware not to accommodate anyone you know to be deviating from the collective body. I shall not find any one of them in the house of any one of you but that I shall demolish his house. Look [carefully] at those you accommodate in your houses. Incumbent upon you are the collective body and obedience. Disunity is the great affliction."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm—Mūsā b. 'Uqbah—Abū Ḥabībah: I performed the lesser pilgrimage and stopped at the residences of the Banū Asad, in the houses of al-Zabīr. Suddenly, there was [Khālid], calling me. I went into his presence, and he said to me, "Who are you from?" I said, "From the people of Medina." He said, "What made you stop in the houses of the one who went against obedience?" I said, "It is where I stay, if I stay for a day or so. Then I go back to my [own] house. There is no disobedience in me. I am one of those who [1232] exalt the matter of the caliphate. I claim that he who disowns it will be destroyed." He said, "Where you stayed will not be held against you. But it is disliked that there stays [here] anyone who is scornful of the Caliph." I said, "God forbid!" [In addition,] I heard him one day saying, "By God, if I were to know that this wild animal that is safe in the Ḥaram had spoken without acknowledging obedience, I would expel it from the Ḥaram. No one who goes against the collective body, who scoffs at [the caliphs], may dwell in the Ḥaram of God." I said, "May God grant the amīr success."

587. Qur'ān, 3:97 = 91.

[Al-Walīd's Visit to Medina]

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. Aḥmad b. Thābit related to me on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar, who said: Al-Walīd made the pilgrimage in the year 91.

Similarly, Muḥammad b. 'Umar said: Mūsā b. Abī Bakr related to me: Ṣaliḥ b. Kaysān related to us: When the arrival of al-Walīd took place, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz ordered twenty men from Quraysh to go out with him to meet al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik; they included Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, his brother Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥman, and 'Abdallāh b. 'Amr b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān. They went out until they reached al-Suwaydā',[588] they being with 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz; with them on that day were riding animals and horses. They met al-Walīd, who was mounted. The chamberlain said, "Dismount for the Commander of the Faithful," and they dismounted. Then [al-Walīd] gave them an order, and they rode. [Al-Walīd] summoned 'Umar and went with him until he stopped at Dhū Khushub.[589] Then they were presented: [Al-Walīd] summoned them one by one, and they greeted him. [After this, al-Walīd] called for lunch, and they lunched with him; he left Dhū Khushub in the evening.

When he entered Medina, he went in the morning to the mosque, to look at its building. The people were cleared out of it, and no one was left in it except[590] Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab, whom [1233] none of the guards dared to send out. [Sa'īd] was in his place of prayer wearing only two thin garments, worth no more than five dirhams. Someone said to him, "If only you would stand," and he said, "I shall not stand until there comes the time when I usually stand." Someone said to him, "If only you would greet the Commander of the Faithful," and he said, "No, by God. I shall not stand up for him." ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz said, "I began to steer al-Walīd to the side of the mosque, hoping that he would not see Saʿīd until he stood up." But al-Walīd happened to glance toward the qiblah and said, "Who is that [person] sitting? Is he the shaykh Saʿīd b. al-Musayyab?" ʿUmar said, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful, he's unpredictable.[591] If he knew that you were here, he would stand up and greet you, [but] his sight is weak." Al-Walīd said, "I know about him. We shall go to him and greet him." He took a turn in the mosque until he stopped at the grave [of the Prophet], and then advanced until he stood before Saʿīd. He said, "How are you, O shaykh?" Saʿīd neither moved nor stood, and [then] said, "Well, praise be to God. And how is the Commander of the Faithful?" Al-Walīd said, "Well, praise be to God," and he departed, saying to ʿUmar, "This is the last of the old school."[592] I said, "Yes, O Commander of the Faithful."

588. Two stages from Medina on the way to Syria (see Cornu).
589. One stage from Medina on the way to Syria (see Cornu).
590. Literally, ". . . no one was left in it. Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab remained. . . ."

[Muḥammad b. ʿUmar] said: Al-Walīd distributed in Medina many foreign slaves,[593] vessels of gold and silver, and wealth. He gave the sermon in Medina on the Friday and led the prayer.

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Isḥāq b. Yaḥyā: I saw al-Walīd delivering the sermon on the pulpit of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, on Friday in the year when he made the pilgrimage. His troops were lined up in two rows from the pulpit to the back wall of the mosque; in their hands [1234] were iron rods, and on their shoulders were iron bars. I saw him ascend it wearing a durrāʿah[594] and a qalansuwwah,[595] without a ridāʾ.[596] He went up the pulpit, and, when he reached the top, he

591. Wa-min ḥālihi wa-min ḥālihi: Ibn al-Athīr has wa-min ḥālihi kadhā wa-kadhā, while Ibn Kathīr's version (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 82) is somewhat different at this point.

592. So rendering baqiyyat al-nās (thus, too, in al-Yaʿqūbī [Taʾrīkh, vol. II, p. 341] and Ibn al-Athīr); Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 82) more prosaically reads faqīh al-nās.

593. Raqīq^{an} kathīr^{an} ujm^{an}. Ibn al-Athīr has daqīq^{an} kathīr^{an}, but al-Ṭabarī's ʿujm^{an} is the clincher as far as the raqīq^{an} reading is concerned.

594. A "[garment of the kind called] jubba, slit in the fore part" (Lane, Lexicon, p. 872b, s.v. midraʿa), lined, according to EI^{2}, s.v. Libās (vol. V, p. 737a); see also Dozy, Dictionnaire détaillé des noms des vêtements chez les arabes, pp. 177–81.

595. Originally a close-fitting cap, this could also designate a hood or cowl (EI^{2}, s.v. Libās (vol. V, pp. 734b–735a); see also Dozy, Noms des vêtements, pp. 365–71.

596. "Garment covering the upper half of the body" (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.); al-Yaʿqūbī (Taʾrīkh, vol. II, p. 341) provides an abbreviated version of this report.

proclaimed a greeting. Then he sat, and the muezzins made the call to prayer. Then they were quiet, and he delivered the first sermon sitting; then he stood, and delivered the second standing. Isḥāq said: I met Rajā' b. Ḥaywah,[597] who was accompanying [al-Walīd], and said, "Do they [always] do it this way?" He said, "Yes. Mu'āwiyah did it in this way, and so on." I said, "Aren't you going to speak to him [about it]?" He said, "Qabīṣah b. Dhu'ayb informed me that he spoke to 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān [about it], and he refused to do [anything different], saying, 'Uthmān delivered sermons in this way.'" I said, "By God, he did not deliver sermons in this way; 'Uthmān only delivered sermons standing up." Rajā' said, "They were told this and took to it." Isḥāq said: We did not see any [Umayyad caliph] more proud than [al-Walīd].

Muḥammad b. 'Umar said: [al-Walīd] brought the incense of the mosque of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, its thurible, and the covering of the Ka'bah. [The covering] was spread out on ropes in the mosque, [it being made] of good brocade. The like of it had never been seen. He spread it out one day, and then folded [it] and moved [it].

The governors of the amṣār in this year were [the same as] those who were their governors in the year 90, except for Mecca, the governor of which in this year was Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī, according to al-Wāqidī. [An authority/authorities] other than al-Wāqidī said: The governorship of Mecca was 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz's in this year too.

597. On him, see Bosworth, "Rajā' b. Ḥaywa al-Kindī and the Umayyad Caliphs," The Islamic Quarterly 16 (1972), pp. 36–80.

The Events of the Year 92

[1235] (October 29, 710–October 18, 711)

Among them was the campaign of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik and 'Umar b. al-Walīd in Byzantine territory. Three fortresses were conquered at the hands of Maslamah; the people of Sūsanah migrated to the inner part of Byzantine territory.

In this year Ṭāriq b. Ziyād, the mawlā of Mūsā b. Nuṣayr, campaigned in al-Andalus with twelve thousand [men]. He encountered the king of al-Andalus—al-Wāqidī claimed that he was called Adrīnūq[598]—who was one of the people of Iṣbahān. He [?al-Wāqidī] said: They are the kings of the foreigners of al-Andalus.[599] Ṭāriq marched on him with all his forces, and al-Adrīnūq went forward on the king's throne, wearing his crown, his gloves, and all the adornments kings used to wear. They fought a hard battle until God killed al-Adrīnūq. Al-Andalus was conquered in the year 92.

598. I.e., Roderic; "al-Adrīq" in al-Ya'qūbī (Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 341) and both "Adhrīqūn" and "Adrūnīq" in Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 83).

599. Al-Ya'qūbī's version of what is clearly the same report (Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 341) is to be taken to mean at this point "they are the Goths, the kings of al-Andalus."

In [this year], according to what one of the biographers (ahl al-siyar) claimed, Qutaybah campaigned in Sijistān, heading for the great Zunbīl and al-Zābul.[600] When he stopped in Sijistān, the messengers of the Zunbīl met him with [a proposal for] a peace agreement.[601] [Qutaybah] accepted that, departed, and appointed over them 'Abd Rabbihi b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr al-Laythī.

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who was over Medina: Thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of he who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar; and al- [1236] Wāqidī and [an authority/authorities] other than him said the same. The governors of the amṣār in this year were [the same as] their governors in the preceding year.

---

600. I.e., Zābulistān (see Marquart, Ērānšahr, p. 247).
601. Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 234) provides some details.

The Events of the Year 93

(October 19, 711–October 6, 712)

Among [the events] in [this year] was the campaign of al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd in Byzantine territory. God conquered Samasṭiyyah[602] at his hands.

In it, too, was the campaign of Marwān b. al-Walīd against the Byzantines. He reached Khanjarah.[603]

In it was the campaign of Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik in Byzantine territory. He conquered Māsah,[604] and Ḥiṣn al-Ḥadīd, Ghazālah, and Tarḥamah[605] in the region of Malaṭyah.

In it Qutaybah killed the king of Khām Jird and made a renewed peace with the king of Khwārazm.[606]

602. Sabasṭiyya, according to Ibn al-Athīr. Brooks ("The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 193n.) and Lilie (Byzantinische Reaktion, p. 120n.) take it to signify Mistheia.

603. I.e., Gangra.

604. I.e., Amaseia.

605. Following the Mss. and Brooks ("The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 194n); Khālifah's version (Ta'rīkh, p. 309) is even more mangled.

606. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 42ff.; Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, pp. 235–37. It looks as if it remains for Khām Jird to be identified, but Gibb rightly points out that its king is to be identified with Khurrazādh (who figures in the account that follows here), "or at least with his party" (p. 43).

[The Killing of the King of Khām Jird and Renewed Peace with Khwārazm]

'Alī b. Muḥammad said: According to (i) Abū al-Dhayyāl—al-Muhallab b. Iyās, (ii) al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās al-'Ammī, (iii) 'Alī b. Mujāhid—Ḥanbal b. Abī Ḥuraydah—the [1237] marzbān of Qūhistān, (iv) Kulayb b. Khalaf, (v) the Bāhilīs, and (vi) [an authority/authorities] other than [the foregoing]—some of them mentioned what others did not mention, and I have put it all together: The king of Khwārazm was weak, and his younger brother Khurrazādh seized power. If it reached him that anyone who concerned himself with the king had a slave girl or a riding animal or fine goods, he sent and took it [from him]; or [if] it reached him that any one of them had a daughter or a sister or a beautiful wife, he sent to him and constrained him by force, taking what he wanted and withholding what he wanted. No one could hold out against him, nor could the king protect [anyone]. When [the king] was spoken to [about this], he said, "I am not strong [enough to deal] with him." [Khurraz]madh] had nonetheless filled him with anger, and, when that had gone on for a long time on the part of [Khurrazādh], to the detriment of [the king], he wrote to Qutaybah, calling him to his land [and] desiring to hand it over to him. He sent to him the keys of the cities of Khwārazm—three keys of gold—and he stipulated that [Qutaybah] should hand over to him his brother and all who had opposed him, so that he might judge concerning [them] as he saw fit. He sent messengers concerning [all] that, and he did not apprise any of his marzbāns or dihqāns of what he had written about to Qutaybah. His messengers reached Qutaybah in the last part of the winter, at the time [when] campaigning [started]; Qutaybah had [already] prepared himself for campaigning, and he made it look as if he were heading for Soghd. The Khwārazm Shāh's messengers returned to him with welcome news from Qutaybah, who went and deputed over Marw Thābit al-A'war, Muslim's mawlā.

['Alī] said: [The Khwārazm Shāh] gathered together his kings, his religious leaders (aḥbār), and his dihqāns, and said, "Qutaybah is heading for Soghd and won't be campaigning against you; come, let us take our ease in this spring of ours," and they began drinking and taking their ease, thinking themselves safe from campaigning.

['Alī] said: The next thing they knew was that Qutaybah had [1238] stopped at Hazārasp,[607] on the other side of the river. The Khwārazm Shāh said to his companions, "What do you think?" They said, "We think that we should fight him." He said, "But I do not think that. People stronger and more powerful than we are have been helpless before him. I think that we should turn him away by giving him something. We'll turn him away for this year and [then] see what we think." They said, "We agree with your view." The Khwārazm Shāh accordingly set off and stopped at the city of al-Fīl on the other side of the river.[608] [ʿAlī] said: The cities of the Khwārazm Shāh [were] three [in number], surrounded by a single moat;[609] the city of al-Fīl is the most strongly fortified of them.

The Khwārazm Shāh stopped at [al-Fīl] while Qutaybah was at Hazārasp, on the other side of the river; he had not crossed it, and [indeed] only the Balkh river (that is, the Oxus) lay between him and the Khwārazm Shah. [The latter] made peace with Qutaybah for ten thousand slaves,[610] for gold and goods, and on the conditions that [Qutaybah] would help him against the king of Khām Jird and would fulfill what he had written for him. Qutaybah accepted that from him and fulfilled [what he had said he would do] for him. [He] sent to the king of Khām Jird—who had been hostile to the Khwārazm Shāh—his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, who fought him, killed him, and gained mastery over his land. He then came to Qutaybah from [there] with four thousand prisoners; [Qutaybah] killed them. When his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān brought them, Qutaybah ordered that his throne be brought out, and he appeared before the people [sitting on it].

[ʿAlī] said: He ordered that the prisoners be killed: One thousand were killed in front of him, one thousand to his right, one thousand to his left, and one thousand behind him.

According to [ʿAlī]—al-Muhallab b. Iyās: The swords of the

---

607. EI[2], s.v.

608. I.e., at Kāth, the ancient capital of Khwārazm; "at the time of the Arab invasion the town consisted of three parts, of which the most strongly fortified, i.e., the citadel, bore the name of Fīl or Fīr" (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 144).

609. Fārqīn, which is defined in the Glossarium as "fossa quae cingit murum urbis"; according to the Glossarium (p. 82) accompanying al-Balādhurī's Futūḥ, this is the arabized form of Persian bārgīn or pārgīn.

610. Translated thus here and below; literally, "heads."

nobles were taken on that day, and heads were cut off with them. Among them were [swords] that could neither cut nor wound. [1239] They took my sword, with which nothing had been struck without being cut clean through. One of Qutaybah's family envied me [it], and he indicated to the one who was performing the executions that he should cut to one side with it; he cut a little to one side and it hit the molar of the dead man and was notched. Abū al-Dhayyāl said: I have the sword.

[ʿAlī] said: Qutaybah handed over to the Khwārazm Shāh his brother and those who had gone against him, and he killed them, appropriated their wealth, and sent it to Qutaybah. Qutaybah entered the city of Fīl[611] and accepted from the Khwārazm Shāh that on the basis of which he had made peace with him. Then he returned to Hazārasp. Kaʿb al-Ashqarī said (basīṭ):[612]

Fīl has cast to you what is in it and has not transgressed; before you, the boastful babbler[613] wanted it.
He who is weak with the spear will not suffice for the frontier, nor will the one who is soft when put to the test,
[the one with] a palpitating heart.
Do you remember the nights when you were killing Turks on the other side of Kāzah,[614] while the babbler was wrapped in his sheet?
They only rode horses once they were grown men, heavy [men], hard on their backs.
You (pl.) are Sh.bās and Mardādhān, [who is] despicable, and Baskharā', tombs filled with foreskins.[615] [1240]

611. Which has now lost its definite article.

612. Verses 1, 4, 5, and 7 occur in Aghānī[2], vol. XIV, p. 299; verse 6 occurs in Ibn Aʿtham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 237; verses 4 and 5 occur in Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. II, p. 387, and verse 1 in vol. III, p. 933.

613. Presumably, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab is meant.

614. Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. IV, p. 226 ult., knows this as one of the villages of Marw.

615. This verse calls for several comments: (i) As will become clear and as was noted by Hell ("al-Farazdak's Lieder auf die Muhallabiten," p. 591 n.), the purpose of the verse is to point to the non-Arab origins of the Muhallabids. The Persian names come in various forms: (a) Sh.bās (Ṭab.), Shunās (Agh.), and B.shāsh (Yāqūt),

I have seen that the battle days of Abū Ḥafṣ [that is,
Qutaybah] prefer him,
while the efforts of the people differ.
[He is] the pure Qaysite,[616] while some of the people[617] are allotted to villages and countryside, those with real genealogies and those with fake ones.
If you had obeyed the people of weakness, they would not have shared seventy thousand [slaves], with the glory of Soghd
commencing anew.
In Samarqand there is more [booty]: you are the one to divide it up,
if death hangs back from your soul.
You have been ahead with whatever good people have preferred, and no nobility of what they have left misses you.

['Alī] said: 'Alī b. Mujāhid recited to me [as the wording of the beginning of the first line], "Fīl has cast to you what is beyond Kāzah"; ['Alī] said: And so too said al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd al-Jūzjānī. As for [someone] other than those two, he said, "Fīl has cast while Ibn Ḥajar (Iṣābah, vol. II, p. 241) opts for Sanās; (b) M.rdādhān (Ṭab.), Mardādhā' (Agh.), B.hbwdhān (Yāqūt; and Ibn Rustah [al-A'lāq al-nafīsah, p. 206]); (c) B.skharā' (Ṭab.), Faskharā' (Agh.), Baskharah (Yāqūt and Ibn Rustah), and Y.sf.rwḥ or B.sf.rwḥ (Kitāb al-'uyūn wa'l-ḥadā'iq, p. 49). The compiler of the Aghānī (vol. XIV, p. 300) cites the view that Shunās was the Persian name of al-Muhallab's father, Abū Ṣufrah Ẓālim b. Sarrāq, while Mardādhā' was the name of Abū Ṣufrah's father, and Faskharā' was the name of Abū Ṣufrah's grandfather. On the other hand, Ibn Rustah and Yāqūt identify Abū 'Ubaydah [Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā] as their source for the information that Abū Ṣufrah's original name was Baskharah b. Bahbūdhān (and that he was a Zoroastrian weaver from Khārg Island who went to Oman, attached himself to the Azd, became a groom for 'Uthmān b. Abī al-'Āṣ al-Thaqafī, etc.); and it is pretty clear that the information in the Kitāb al-'uyūn wa'l-ḥadā'iq comes from the same source.

---

(ii) The reference to "foreskins" is of course an unambiguous suggestion that Muhallabid origins were non-Arab. (It can be noted that Ibn Ḥajar [Iṣābah, vol. I, p. 345] knew that Abū Ṣufrah was not circumcised until he was a shaykh, in the caliphate of 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb; and it can be added that, according to the Aghānī[2] [vol. XXIII, p. 230], even right at the end of the Umayyad period, "Quraysh did not think that any one of the Azd from Oman was an Arab.")

(iii) Where in al-Ṭabarī's version the word following M.rdādhān is muḥtaqar^{un}, in the Aghānī it is na'rifuhu, and in Yāqūt it is mukḥtabar^{un}.

616. Preferring the Aghānī's ṣarīḥu Qays^{in} to al-Ṭabarī's Qays^{un} ṣarīḥ^{un}.

617. I.e., Yemen.

to you what is in it." They [all] said: Fīl is the [principal] city of [the region of] Samarqand.[618] ['Alī] said: In my opinion, what 'Alī b. Mujāhid said is sounder.

According to ['Alī]—the Bāhilīs: Qutaybah acquired one hundred thousand slaves from Khwārazm.[619]

['Alī] said: Qutaybah's intimates spoke to him in the year 93 saying, "The people are becoming weary," they had come from [1241] Sijistān, "let them rest this year." He refused.

['Alī] said: When [Qutaybah] had made peace with the people of Khwārazm, he went to Soghd. Al-Ashqarī said:

If you had obeyed the people of weakness, they would not have shared seventy thousand [slaves], with the glory of Soghd
commencing anew.

Abū Ja'far said: In this year Qutaybah, on his departure form Khwārazm, campaigned against Samarqand and conquered it.[620]

[Qutaybah's Conquest of Samarqand]

We have already referred to the chain of authorities (isnād) of the people from whom 'Alī b. Muḥammad mentioned that he took [material concerning events] when Qutaybah made peace with the lord of Khwārazm. Then he mentioned, by way of insertion into that [account], that, when he took the peace [tribute] of the lord of Khwārazm, al-Mujashshar[621] b. al-Muzāḥim al-Sulamī said, "I need [to say something to you]; let me be alone with you." [Qutaybah] did so, and [al-Mujashshar] said, "If you want [to conquer] the Soghdians one of these days, do so now, for they feel secure from your moving against them this year. They are only ten days away." [Qutaybah] said, "Has anyone advised you [to suggest] this?" He said, "No." [Qutaybah] said, "Have you informed anyone of it?" He said, "No." [Qutaybah] said, "If anyone speaks of it, I shall execute you."

618. Where al-Ṭabarī has qālū: Fīl madīnat Samarqand, al-Balādhurī (Futūḥ, p. 421) has qāla 'Alī b. Mujāhid: innamā madīnat Fīl Samarqand.

619. Khalīfah (Ta'rīkh, p. 309) says ten million, which is amended in the margin to ten thousand.

620. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 44–45; Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, pp. 238ff.

621. Following the emendation proposed in the Addenda et Emendanda.

[Qutaybah] stayed put that day. On the morning of the next day he summoned ʿAbd al-Raḥmān [b. Muslim] and said, "Go with the horsemen and archers and take the baggage[622] to Marw." The baggage was sent off in the direction of Marw, and ʿAbd al-Raḥmān spent all that day following it, heading for Marw. In the [1242] evening, [Qutaybah] wrote to him, "In the morning, send the baggage to Marw and go with the horsemen and archers to Soghd. Keep [this] information secret. I shall be following [you]." [ʿAlī] said: When [this instruction] reached ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, he ordered the people in charge of the baggage to go on to Marw, and he went where he [himself] had been ordered to go.

Qutaybah addressed [his army] and said, "God has conquered this place for you at a time when campaigning in it is possible. Now this [region of] Soghd has no one to defend it. They have broken the covenant that was between us. They have withheld that on the basis of which we made peace with Ṭarkhūn, and have done to him that which has reached you. God has said, 'Whosoever breaks his oath breaks it but to his own hurt.'[623] Go with God's blessing. I hope that Khwārazm and Soghd will be like al-Naḍīr and Qurayẓah,[624] for God has said, 'And other [spoils] you were not able to take; God has encompassed them already.'"[625]

[ʿAlī] said: Qutaybah reached Soghd—ʿAbd al-Raḥān had reached it before him—with twenty thousand [men].[626] Qutaybah reached it, accompanied by Khwārazmians and Bukhārans, three or four nights after ʿAbd al-Raḥmān had stopped there, and said, "When we light on a people's courtyard, how evil will be the morning of them that are warned."[627] He besieged them for a month; in the course of being besieged, [the Soghdians] fought [Qutaybah's men] several times from a single direction. Fearful throughout the siege, the Soghdians wrote to the king of al-Shāsh and the Ikhshād[628] of Farghānah, "If the Arabs vanquish us, they will visit upon you the like of what they brought us."

622. See above, n. 343.
623. Qur'ān 48:10.
624. See above, n. 572.
625. Qur'ān 48:21.
626. Alternatively, the 20,000 men were with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.
627. Cf. Qur'ān 37:177.
628. Rather than the more usual "Ikhshīd" (see *EI*², s.f.); for further discussion of this form, see Bombaci, "On the Ancient Turkish Title 'Šaδ,'" pp. 182–83.

[The king of al-Shāsh and the Ikhshād and their followers] agreed to go to [the Soghdians] and sent [word] to them: "Send [against the Arabs] those who may distract them, so that we may make a night attack on their camp."

['Alī] said: They chose horsemen from [among] the sons of the [1243] marzbāns, the Asāwirah,[629] and heroic men of strength, and sent them off, having ordered them to stage a night attack on the [Arab] camp. The spies of the Muslims came bearing information [of this], and Qutaybah chose three hundred—or six hundred—men of courage, put Ṣāliḥ b. Muslim in charge of them, and sent them along the road from which he feared that he might be approached. Ṣāliḥ sent out spies to bring him information [about the enemy], while he [himself] stopped two parasangs away from their camp. The spies returned and informed him that [the enemy] would be coming to him that night. Ṣāliḥ split his cavalry into three groups, kept two of them hidden, and [himself] stayed on the main road. The polytheists came by night, unaware of the position of Ṣāliḥ and confident that no one would engage them before [they reached Qutaybah's] camp. They did not know about Ṣāliḥ until they ran into him.

['Alī] said: [Ṣāliḥ and his men] charged them and, when spear thrusts were being exchanged, the two hidden groups came out and fought.

According to ['Alī]—one of the Barājim:[630] I was present [on that occasion], and I have never seen people fighting more strongly or with more fortitude in adversity than the sons of those kings; only a few of them fled. We gathered together their weapons, cut off their heads, and took prisoners. We asked them about those whom we had killed, and they said, "You have killed none other than [here] a son of a king, or [here] one of the nobles, or [here] one of the heroes. You have killed men [among whom were those who were each] the equal of a hundred men; [in those cases,] we have written [their names] on their ears."[631] Then we entered the camp in the morning, and there was not a single man 629. Persian knights, "who under Persian rule were exempt of taxes together with the other higher classes" (Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, p. 171).

630. A name applied to two separate clan groupings, one in Tamīm and one in 'Abd al-Qays (Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, vol. II, p. 224).

631. The syntax is complicated here; Ibn al-Athīr simplifies and changes it.

among us who did not hang up[632] a head known by name. We took as plunder excellent weapons, fine goods, and brisk riding animals, and Qutaybah let us have all that as nafal.[633]

That broke the Soghdians. Qutaybah set up mangonels against [1244] [the Soghdians], and shot at them, fighting them without desisting. He was well advised by those of the Bukharans and Khwārazmians who were with him; they fought hard and gave of themselves unstintingly. Ghūrak[634] sent [word] to [Qutaybah]: "You are fighting me with my brothers and family from [among] the non-Arabs. Send Arabs out to me." Qutaybah became angry, summoned al-Jadalī, and said, "Review the [army] and pick out the bravest people," and [al-Jadalī] gathered the [army] together. Then Qutaybah set, reviewing them himself. He summoned the platoon commanders ('urafā') and began to call for one man after another, saying, "What do you have?" The platoon commander would say, "[This is] a brave [man]." "And what is this?" "[This is] one of limited ability." "And what is this?" "[This is] a coward." Qutaybah called the cowards "the Stinkers," took their good weapons, and gave them to the brave men and those of limited ability, and left them the most worn-out weapons. Then Qutaybah took them forward and fought [the enemy] with them, [using both] horsemen and infantrymen. He bombarded the city with the mangonels and made a breach [in the wall] which [the enemy] blocked with sacks of millet. There emerged a man who stood on top of the breach and shouted abuse at Qutaybah. Qutaybah said to the archers who were with him, "Choose two of your number," and they did so. Qutaybah said, "Which of the two of you will shoot at this man [on the understanding that,] if he hits him, he will receive ten thousand [dirhams] and, if he misses him, his hand will be cut off?" One of them held back, while the other came forward and shot him, right in the eye. [Qutaybah] ordered that he be given ten thousand [dirhams].

According to ['Alī]—the Bāhilīs—Yaḥyā b. Khālid—his father, Khālid b. Bāb, the mawlā of Muslim b. 'Amr: I was among the 632. Preferring Ibrāhīm's mu'alliq^{un} to Guidi's mu'allaq^{un}.

633. "That part of the booty which was left to the free disposal of the leader, when distributing the portions of booty that were due to the soldiers" (Løkkegaard, Islamic Taxation in the Classic Period, p. 19).

634. See above, n. 583.

archers of Qutaybah. When we conquered the city, I climbed up the wall and reached the place in which that man was. I found him dead on the wall; the arrow had gone right through his eye and come out the nape of his neck.

On the morning of the next day, they bombarded the city and breached it [again]. Qutaybah said, "Press on to [the breach], so that you may cross on it." They fought [the enemy] until they were on the breach, and the Soghdians shot them with arrows. [The Arabs] put up their shields—a man would put his shield up over his eye and then charge—until they were on the breach. [The Soghdians] said to [Qutaybah], "Depart from us today, so that we may make peace with you tomorrow." [1245]

As for Bāhilah, they say: Qutaybah said, "We shall not make peace with you without our men being on the breach and our mangonels moving up and down [bombarding] your heads and your city."

As for [authorities] other than [Bāhilah], they say: Qutaybah said, "The slaves have become frightened. Depart victorious," and they departed. He made peace with them the next day, on [the following terms]: [1] 2,200,000 [dirhams] per annum; [2] in that year, 30,000 slaves free of defect and including neither young boys nor old men;[635] [3] that they would empty the city for Qutaybah, and would not have in it any fighting men; [4] that there would be built for Qutaybah in it a mosque, so that he might enter [it] and pray, and [that] a pulpit would be set up in it, so that he might preach a sermon, eat lunch, and go forth.

['Alī] said: When the peace had been concluded, Qutaybah sent ten men—two from each fifth—and they took receipt of that on the basis of which [the Soghdians] had made peace with him. Qutaybah said, "Now they have been humbled—now that their brethren and children have fallen into our hands." Then they emptied the city, built a mosque, and set up a pulpit. Qutaybah went into the city with four thousand [men] he had chosen. When he had entered it, he went to the mosque and prayed and preached a sermon. Then he ate lunch and sent [word] to the Soghdians:

635. The first of the two preceding figures is also given by al-Balādhurī (Futūḥ, p. 421), and both of them are given by Khalīfah (Ta'rīkh, p. 309); but Ibn A'tham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 243) mentions [1a] an immediate payment of 2,000,000 dirhams; [1b] an annual payment of 200,000 dirhams; and [2] 3,000 (sic) slaves including neither young boys nor old men (see also what purports to be the 'ahd document formalizing the peace arrangements (pp. 244–46).

[1246] "Whoever of you wants to take his goods may do so, for I am not going out of [the city]. I have done this for you, and I shall not take from you more than that on the basis of which I made peace with you; but the troops will stay in [the city]."

[ʿAlī] said: As for the Bāhilīs, they say: Qutaybah made peace with them in return for one hundred thousand slaves, the fire temples, and the adornments of the idols. He took receipt of that on the basis of which he had made peace with them, and he was brought the idols, which were despoiled and then placed before him; gathered together, they were like an enormous edifice. He ordered that they be burned, and the non-Arabs said to him, "Among them are idols the burner of which will be destroyed." Qutaybah said, "I shall burn them with my [own] hand." Ghūrak came, knelt before him, and said, "Devotion to you is a duty incumbent upon me. Do not expose yourself to these idols." Qutaybah called for fire, took a brand in his hand, went out, proclaimed "God is great," and set fire to them; [others then also] set fire [to them], and they burned fiercely. In the remains of the gold and silver nails that had been in them, they found fifty thousand mithqāls.[636]

According to [ʿAlī]—Makhlad b. Ḥamzah b. Bīḍ—his father—someone who witnessed the conquest of Samarqand, or one of the districts of Khurasan: They brought out of it [some] huge copper cooking pots, and Qutaybah said to Ḥuḍayn, "O Abū Sāsān, do you think that Raqāsh[637] ever had cooking pots like these?" He said, "No, but ʿAylān[638] had a pot like these." Qutaybah laughed and said, "You have gained your revenge."

[ʿAlī] said: Muḥammad b. Abī ʿUyaynah[639] said to Salm b. Qutaybah in the presence of Sulaymān b. ʿAlī,[640] "The non-Arabs revile Qutaybah for perfidy; he acted perfidiously at Khwārazm 636. See above, n. 469, and cf. the story given at that point.

637. I.e., Ḥuḍayn's own clan.

638. ʿAylān being the grouping to which Bāhilah belonged; the wordplay seems to be that ʿaylān can signify "hungry, going about looking for sustenance."

639. I.e., Muḥammad b. Abī ʿUyaynah b. al-Muhallab (Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, p. 369).

640. I.e., Sulaymān b. ʿAlī b. ʿAbdallāh al-ʿAbbāsī, governor of al-Baṣrah from 133 (750–51) to 137 (754–55) (de Zambaur, Manuel, p. 40).

and Samarqand."

According to ['Alī]—a shaykh from the Banū Sadūs—Ḥamzah b. Bīḍ:[641] Qutaybah acquired in Khurasan—in Soghd—a slave girl [1247] who was one of the descendants of Yazdajird. He said, "Do you think that the son of this [girl] will be hajīn!"[642] They said, "Yes, he will be hajīn through his father." He sent her to al-Ḥajjāj, who sent her to al-Walīd; she bore him Yazīd b. al-Walīd.

According to ['Alī]—one of the Bāhilīs—Nahshal b. Yazīd—his paternal uncle, who was contemporary with all that: When Ghūrak saw Qutaybah's pressure against them, he wrote to the king of al-Shāsh, the Ikhshād of Farghānah, and Khāqān, "We are between you and the Arabs. If we are reached [by them], you will be weaker.[643] Exert whatever strength you have." They took stock and said, "We shall be outmaneuvered [if we use] our common people, for they do not have our ability. We, the grouping of the kings, are the ones to be concerned with this matter. Choose the sons of the kings and the people of valor from [among] the young men of their kings, and let them go forth until they reach Qutaybah's camp, which should be subjected to a night attack while he is distracted with besieging the Soghdians."

They did [this], put in command a son of Khāqān's, and went off, having agreed to make a night attack on the camp. [News of this] reached Qutaybah, who chose people of valor and courage and leading figures—among them Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr[644] and Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān; there were four hundred of them. He said to them, "Your enemies have seen God's favor with you and His support of you in your fighting and your contending. [In view of] all that, God will give you mastery over them. They have decided to use your heedlessness as an expedient and to attack you by night, and have chosen their dihqāns and kings. You are the dihqāns and horsemen of the Arabs, and God has favored you with [1248] His religion, so do Him a good deed,[645] and you will thereby merit reward, together with defense of your honor."

['Alī] said: Qutaybah set spies on the enemy [and was informed

641. *EI*², s.v.; Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, p. 333–34.
642. Baseborn, having an Arab father and a non-Arab slave mother.
643. So rendering aḍ'af wa-adhall.
644. Guidi renders this "Ẓahīr."
645. So transposing the Qur'ānic expression *ablāhu Allāhu balā'an ḥasan*an.

by them] until, when [the enemy] were near [enough] to him to be able to reach his camp in the course of the night, he brought in those whom he had chosen, spoke to them, exhorted them, and placed Ṣāliḥ b. Muslim in charge of them. They went out of the camp at sunset, proceeded [on their way], and stopped two parasangs from the camp on the road of the [enemy] described to them by [the spies]. Ṣāliḥ split his cavalry into groups, placing one in hiding on his right and one in hiding on his left; halfway—or two-thirds of the way—through the night, the enemy came, together, quickly, and silently. Ṣāliḥ stood with his cavalry, and when they saw him they attacked him. When spear thrusts were exchanged, the two hidden groups attacked from right and left, and we heard only battle cries. We have never seen people tougher than they.

According to [ʿAlī]—one of the Barājim—Zuhayr or Shuʿbah: We were repeatedly thrusting at them and smiting them when I discerned Qutaybah under the [cover of] night. I had struck a blow that had pleased me, and I looked toward Qutaybah and said, "What do you think, may you [be ransomed] by my father and mother?" He said, "Shut up, may God smash your mouth!" He continued: We killed them and only the [odd] stray escaped. We stayed, gathering plunder and cutting off heads, until morning; then we went to the camp, and I have never seen a group bring the like of what we brought. There was not a [single] man among us who did not hang up[646] a head known by name and [did not have] a prisoner in his bonds. He continued: We took the heads to [1249] Qutaybah, and he said, "May God reward you with good for [what you have done for] the religion and personal honor!" Qutaybah showed me regard, without articulating anything to me [by way of special compliment]; in the presenting of gifts and the showing of regard, he joined with me Ḥayyān al-ʿAdawī and Ḥulays al-Shaybānī, and I thought that he [must have] seen from the like of what he had seen from me. That [battle] broke the people of Soghd. They sought peace and offered tribute. [But Qutaybah] refused, saying, "I am going to avenge the blood of Ṭarkhūn, who was my mawlā and one of the people under my protection."

[The main authorities all] said: ʿAmr b. Muslim related on the authority of his father, who said: Qutaybah prolonged his stay, and the breach was made at Samarqand. [Muslim?] said: A crier who was eloquent in Arabic called out, abusing Qutaybah.

646. See n. 632 above.

['Amr b. Muslim?] said: 'Amr b. Abī Zahdam said: We were around Qutaybah. When we heard the abuse, we went out in haste and waited for a long time while he persisted in [his] abuse. I went to Qutaybah's tent and looked, and, there was Qutaybah, sitting with his knees bound to his chest (muḥtabⁱⁿ) by a wrapper, saying, as one talking to himself, "For how much longer, O Samarqand, will Satan nest in you? By God, in the morning I shall do my damnedest with your people." I departed to my companions and said, "How many intransigent souls from among us and them will die tomorrow!" and I told them [what he had said].

['Alī] said: As for Bāhilah, they say: Qutaybah journeyed, keeping the river on his right, until he arrived in Bukhārā. He rallied [the people of Bukhārā] with him and journeyed until, when he was at the city of Arbinjān[647]—the one from which Arbinjān saddlecloths come—Ghūrak, the lord of Soghd, engaged him with a large force of Turks and people from al-Shāsh and Farghānah. There took place skirmishes between them, without [any large- [1250] scale] fighting; the Muslims won all of these, and [the two sides then] desisted from fighting until they drew near to the city of Samarqand. At that point they joined in fighting: The Soghdians made an all-out charge on the Muslims, broke [their ranks, and] passed through their camp; then the Muslims wheeled round on them [and] pushed them back to their camp. God killed a large number of the polytheists; and [the Muslims] entered the city of Samarqand, [the population of which] made peace with them.

According to ['Alī]—the Bāhilīs—Ḥātim b. Abī Ṣaghīrah: I saw the cavalry on that day exchanging spear thrusts with the Muslims. Qutaybah had given the order on that day for his throne to be brought out, and he sat on it. [The enemy] exchanged spear thrusts with [the Muslims] until they got as far as Qutaybah, who was sitting with his knees up to his chest, [propping himself] with his sword; he stayed just like that, and the two wings of the Muslims swept in on those who had defeated the center, defeated them, and pushed them back to their camp. Many polytheists 647. Also called Rabinjān, to the west of Samarqand (Barthold, *Turkestan*³, p. 97).

were killed. [The Muslims] entered the city of Samarqand, [the population of which] made peace with them. Ghūrak prepared food and invited Qutaybah [to partake of it with him]; [Qutaybah] went to him with a number of his companions and, when he had finished lunch, [Qutaybah] asked [Ghūrak] to give him Samarqand. He said to the king, "Depart from it," and he did so; Qutaybah recited, "And that He destroyed 'Ād, the ancient, and Thamūd, and He did not spare [them]."[648]

According to ['Alī]—Abū al-Dhayyāl—'Umar b. 'Abdallāh al-Tamīmī: The person sent by Qutaybah to al-Ḥajjāj with [news of] the conquest of Samarqand related to me: I reached al-Ḥajjāj, and he sent me to Syria. I reached Syria, entered the mosque [of [1251] Damascus], and sat, [it being] before sunrise. Next to me was a blind man, and I asked him something about Syria. He said to me, "You are a stranger." I said, "Yes." He said, "Where are you from?" I said, "From Khurasan." He said, "What brought you?" and I told him. He said, "By Him Who sent Muḥammad with the truth, you have only[649] conquered it by perfidy. You, O people of Khurasan, are those who will strip the Banū Umayyah of their dominion, and pull Damascus down stone by stone."

['Alī] said: Al-'Alā' b. Jarīr informed us: It has reached me that, when Qutaybah conquered Samarqand, he stood on its hill, looked at the people scattering in the meadows of Soghd, and recited the words of Ṭarafah (ṭawīl):[650]

And peoples pastured; had we not alighted at Makhshiyyah, they would have taken their camels off and their tents down.

['Alī] said: Khālid b. al-Aṣfaḥ informed us: Al-Kumayt said (basīṭ):[651]

Samarqand was Yamanī for [many] years; now Muḍar are giving it a Qaysī lineage.

---

648. Qur'ān, 53:50–51 = 51–52.

649. Reading illā in place of the misprint in the text (which is noted in the Addenda et Emendanda).

650. This line is not to be found in Ṭarafah's Dīwān (ed. D. al-Khaṭīb and L. al-Ṣaqqāl, Damascus, 1975).

651. Judging by Shi'r al-Kumayt, no. 188, the following verse survives only here and in Ibn al-Athīr.

[ʿAlī] said: Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jushamī said: When Qutaybah made peace with the people of Soghd, he summoned Nahār b. Tawsiʿah and said, "[Well now,] O Nahār, what about your words (ṭawīl):[652]

The campaigning that brought riches nigh has ended, and generosity and munificence have died
after al-Muhallab.
They have stayed at Marw al-Rūdh as two pledges
at his sepulcher,
and have been rendered totally absent from both east and west.

Is this campaigning, O Nahār?" [Nahār] said, "No, this is the congregation,[653] and I am he who says (ṭawīl):

Neither in our own lifetimes, nor before us, nor after us, is the like of Ibn Muslim.
He killed Turks hither and yon with his sword, and made abundant divisions of spoil among us, one division after another."

[ʿAlī] said: Then Qutaybah set off, returning to Marw. He deputed ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim[654] over Samarqand, and left with him massive [numbers of] troops and much war matériel, saying to him, "Do not let [any] polytheist enter any of Samarqand's gates without having a seal on his hand. If the clay has dried before he goes out, kill him. If you find on him a piece of iron, [or] a knife, [or] anything else, kill him. If you close the gate at night and find any one of them in [the city], kill him." Kaʿb al-Ashqarī—or, it has been said: a man from Juʿfī—said (Khafīf):[655] [1252]

652. Cf. above, p. 32 and n. 144; Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, pp. 241–42) wrongly takes the poet in question to have been Kaʿb b. Maʿdān al-Ashqarī.

653. I.e., on the day of resurrection (reading al-ḥashr, as proposed in the Addenda et Emendanda); cf. Ibn Qutaybah, al-Shiʿr waʾl-shuʿarāʾ, p. 538; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt al-aʿyān, vol. IV, p. 87.

654. According to al-Yaʿqūbī (Taʾrīkh, vol. II, p. 344) and Ibn Aʿtham (Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 246), Qutaybah appointed his brother ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim. It can be added that al-Yaʿqūbī's account of this episode is rather muddled and that he thought that the peace was concluded in A.H. 94.

655. Thus, too, in Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 86). The Kitāb al-ʿuyūn waʾl-ḥadāʾiq (pp. 2–3) also says that the poet was Kaʿb al-Ashqarī and cites all the following verses; but al-Balādhurī (Futūḥ, p. 421) says that the poet was al-Mukhtār b. Kaʿb al-Juʿfī and cites only verse 3.

Every day Qutaybah gathers plunder and increases wealth even more A Bāhilī who has been given a crown to wear until partings of the hair that were black have become gray.
He subdued Soghd with the squadrons until he left it stripped and prone.
The infant weeps at the loss of his father, and a pained father cries for his infant.
Whenever [Qutaybah] stops in, or reaches, a place, his cavalry leaves [its] mark there.

[ʿAlī] said: Qutaybah said, "This is [real] succession, not [just] successive killing of a couple of asses [lā ʿidā' ʿayraynⁱ]," because he conquered Khwārazm and Samarqand in a single year. [The explanation of] that [expression is] that, when a horseman fells two asses in a single heat, people say, "He made a succession, one to the other, between the two asses."[656] Then [Qutaybah] departed from Samarqand and stayed at Marw. His governor over [1253] Khwārazm was Iyās b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr, over its military affairs (ḥarb)—he was weak—and over its taxation (kharāj) was ʿUbaydallāh b. Abī ʿUbaydallāh, the mawlā of the Banū Muslim.[657]

[ʿAlī] said: The people of Khwārazm thought Iyās to be weak and gathered together against him. ʿUbaydallāh wrote to Qutaybah, and Qutaybah sent ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim in the winter as governor, saying [to him], "Flog Iyās b. ʿAbdallāh and Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī, and shave [their heads]. Draw ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿUbaydallāh, the mawlā of the Banū Muslim, close to you, and listen to him, for he is loyal." [ʿAbdallāh] went on until, when he was one stage from Khwārazm, Iyās was clandestinely informed and warned, and withdrew. ʿAbdallāh then arrived, took Ḥayyān, gave him a hundred lashes, and shaved [his head].

[ʿAlī] said: Then Qutaybah sent al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh with troops to Khwārazm, after ʿAbdallāh. [News of] that reached them, and, when, al-Mughīrah arrived, the sons of those whom 656. Cf. Lane, Lexicon, p. 1978b, where my source of translational inspiration will be obvious.

657. According to al-Balādhurī (Futūḥ, p. 421), Qutaybah appointed over Khwārazm "his brother ʿUbaydallāh b. Muslim."

[the] Khwārazm Shāh had killed said, "We shall not help you," and he fled to the land of the Turks. Al-Mughīrah arrived, and took captives and killed. Those who survived made peace with him; he took the tax and went to Qutaybah, who appointed him over Nishapur.

In this year Mūsā b. Nuṣayr dismissed Ṭāriq b. Ziyād from al-Andalus and sent him to Toledo.

[Mūsā b. Nuṣayr's Dismissal of Ṭāriq b. Ziyād]

Muḥammad b. 'Umar mentioned that Mūsā b. Nuṣayr became angry with Ṭāriq in the year 93 and went to him in Rajab of that year (April–May 712), accompanied by Ḥabīb b. 'Uqbah b. Nāfi' al-Fihrī. When he went off, he deputed over Ifrīqiyah his son, 'Abdallāh b. Mūsā b. Nuṣayr. Mūsā crossed [the sea] to Ṭāriq with [a force of] ten thousand [men] and met him. [Ṭāriq] sought to please [1254] him, and he was pleased with him and accepted his excuse from him. [Mūsā] sent [Ṭāriq] from [where he was] to the city of Toledo, which was one of the great cities of al-Andalus, twenty days' [journey] from Cordova. There he acquired the table of Solomon the son of David, containing God knows how much [by way of] gold and jewels.[658]

[Muḥammad b. 'Umar] said: In [this year] the people of Ifrīqiyah suffered a terrible drought. Mūsā b. Nuṣayr went out and prayed for rain,[659] making invocations until the middle of that day, and preaching a sermon to the people. When he wanted to step down, he was asked whether he was going to make an invocation to the Commander of the Faithful. He said, "This is not a day for that." They were given to drink that which sufficed them for a time.

In this year 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz was dismissed from Medina.

Why al-Walīd Dismissed ['Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz]

The reason for that, according to what has been mentioned, is that 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to al-Walīd informing him of the harshness of al-Ḥajjāj toward the people of his governorship in Iraq, of his aggression toward them and his oppression of them, 658. Cf. al-Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 341.

659. See *EI*², s.v. Istiṣḳā'.

without any right [on his part] or offense [on theirs], and that reached al-Ḥajjāj, who held it against 'Umar and wrote to al-Walīd, "I have with me the deviant elements of the Iraqis and the people of schism. They have emigrated from Iraq and have taken refuge in Medina and Mecca. That [constitutes a point of] weakness." Al-Walīd wrote to al-Ḥajjāj, "Suggest to me [the names of] two men," and [al-Ḥajjāj] wrote to him suggesting 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān[660] and Khālid b. 'Abdallāh. Al-Walīd appointed Khālid over Mecca, and 'Uthmān over Medina, and dismissed 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz.

Muḥammad b. 'Umar said: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz went out of Medina and stayed at al-Suwaydā', saying to [his mawlā] Muzāḥim, "Does it make you fearful that you are one of those whom Ṭaybah has expelled?"[661]

[1255] In this year 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz flogged Khubayb b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr on al-Walīd's order to him and poured on his head a skin of cold water.[662]

Muḥammad b. 'Umar mentioned that Abū al-Mulayḥ related to him on the authority of someone who was present when 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz gave Khubayb b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Zubayr fifty lashes, poured a skin of water on his head on a wintry day, and made him stand at the door of the mosque; he stayed [there] all that day and then died.

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik: Thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar. The governors of the amṣār in this year were [the same as] the governors in the preceding years, except for the case of Medina, where the governor was 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī, who took over, so it has been said, in Sha'bān of the year 93 (May–June 712). As for al-

660. Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, register.

661. The reference being to the [Prophetic] ḥadīth, "innahā Ṭaybah wa-innahā tanfī al-khabath," "It is Ṭaybah (i.e., Medina) and it expels/will expel dross" (Wensinck, Concordance, vol. IV, p. 69). Ibn al-Athīr spells it out: "When 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz went out [of Medina], he said, 'I fear that I shall be one of those whom Medina has expelled,' meaning by that the saying of the Messenger of God, may God bless and preserve him, 'It will expel its dross.'"

662. Al-Ya'qūbī explains (Ta'rīkh, vol. II, pp. 339–40) that Khubayb had objected to the pulling down of the rooms of the wives of the Prophet (cf. above pp. 141–42).

Wāqidī, he said that 'Uthmān reached Medina on Shawwāl 27 in the year 94 (July 26, 713). One of [the authorities] said: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz departed from Medina, dismissed, in Sha'bān of the year 93, and campaigned in [the same year]. When he went off, he deputed over it Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī. 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān reached Medina on Shawwāl 27 (August 6, 712).

The Events of the Year 94

(October 7, 712–September 25, 713)

Among them was the campaign of al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd in Byzantine territory. It has been said that he conquered Anṭākyah[663] in [this year].

[1256] In [this year], according to what has been said, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd campaigned in Byzantine territory until he reached Ghazālah; al-Walīd b. Hishām al-Mu'ayṭī reached the land of Burj al-Ḥamām,[664] and Yazīd b. Abī Kabshah [reached] the land of Sūriyah.

In it there was an earthquake in Syria.

In it, too, al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad al-Thaqafī conquered the land of al-Hind.[665]

In [this year] Qutaybah campaigned in al-Shāsh and Farghānah 663. I.e., Antiocheia in Pisidia (Wellhausen, "Die Kämpfe der Araber," p. 437; Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, pp. 121, 134 [map]).

664. Not identified. As Wellhausen has pointed out ("Die Kämpfe der Araber," p. 437n.), it may be interchangeable with al-Ya'qūbī's "marj al-shaḥm" (s.p.; Ta'rīkh, vol. II, p. 337), which was between Malaṭyah and al-Maṣṣīṣah.

665. I.e., parts of Sind. Clearly Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim should be understood in place of al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad (see above, p. 141).

until he reached Khujandah and Kāsān,[666] the two [principal] cities of Farghānah.[667]

Qutaybah's Campaign [in al-Shāsh and Farghānah]

'Alī b. Muḥammad said that Abū al-Fawāris al-Tamīmī informed him on the authority of Māhān and Yūnus b. Abī Isḥāq that Qutaybah campaigned in the year 94. When he crossed the river, he imposed a levy of twenty thousand fighting men on the people of Bukhārā, Kish, Nasaf, and Khwārazm. ['Alī] said: They went with him to Soghd; they were then sent to al-Shāsh, while [Qutaybah] himself went to Farghānah. He went as far as Khujandah, the people of which gathered against him and engaged him. They fought several times, with the Muslims being victorious on each occasion. One day [the Muslims] were unoccupied and rode their horses [about, here and there]; one man went to the top of an elevated place and said, "By God, I haven't seen [anything] like today [for us to be caught] off guard. If there were any commotion today, with us as spread about as I see, we would be shamefully [defeated]." A man beside him said, "By no means; we are as 'Awf b. al-Khari'[668] said (mutaqārib):

We betake ourselves to the land because of love [1257] of engaging [in fighting], and we do not guard against a bird of omen
when it flies;
Whether it be auspicious or inauspicious, either way we meet with prosperity."

Saḥbān Wā'il[669] said, mentioning their fighting at Khujandah (kāmil):

Ask the horsemen in Khujandah, [who are] beneath sharp/slim spears,
"Wasn't I the one who used to gather them together

666. Reading this, as in Ms B, rather than Kāshān, as in the text; Kāshān is in Jūzjān, not Farghānah (see Cornu).

667. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 48–49.

668. Sezgin, GAS, vol. II, pp. 206–7.

669. The following verses are also given by Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, pp. 95–96), who says that Ibn al-Jawzī says in his Munaẓẓam that Saḥbān died in the caliphate of Mu'āwiyah some time after A.H. 50. Al-Ṭabarī makes no other reference to Saḥbān.

[again] when they were defeated, and came forward to fight?
Wasn't I the one who smote the head of the insolent and endured the spears?"
This, and you are the hero of all
Qays, giving out on a large scale.
You have excelled Qays in generosity,
[just as] your father did in past years.
The justice of your judgment among them in all money [matters] has become clear.
Your (pl.) manliness is complete and your (pl.)
glory has risen up to the loftiest of mountains.

[ʿAlī] said: Then Qutaybah went to Kāsān,[670] the [principal] city of Farghānah, [where] he was joined by the troops he had sent to al-Shāsh, which they had conquered and most of which they had burnt; [from Kāsān,] Qutaybah departed to Marw. Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim, "Send such Iraqis as you have with you to Qutaybah, and send to (i.e., with) them Jahm b. Zaḥr b. Qays, for he is better with Iraqis than with Syrians." Muḥammad was fond of Jahm b. Zaḥr; when Jahm bade him farewell, he wept and said, "O Jahm, [this is] the [moment of] parting." [Jahm] said, "It cannot be avoided." [ʿAlī] said: [Jahm] reached Qutaybah in the year 95 (713–14).

[1258] In this year ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī arrived in Medina as governor for al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik.

[ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī's] Governorship

We have already mentioned the reason for al-Walīd's dismissal of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz from Medina and Mecca and his appointment of ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān as amīr of Medina.

Muḥammad b. ʿUmar claimed that ʿUthmān reached Medina as amīr on 27 Shawwāl in the year 94 (July 26, 713) and stopped there at Dār Marwān,[671] saying, "By God, [this is] a repellent place;[672] he who is [really] deceived is he who is deceived by you"; and he placed Abū Bakr b. Ḥazm in charge of the judiciary.

---

670. See n. 666 above.
671. See above, n. 447.
672. So rendering miẓʾān: See the Glossarium.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Ḥurrah—his paternal uncle: I saw 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān take Riyāḥ b. 'Ubaydallāh and Munqidh al-'Irāqī; he imprisoned them, punished them, and then sent them in neck collars[673] to al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf. He let no Iraqi, whether a merchant or anyone else, [stay] in Medina. He ordered [all of] them out, from every place [in the area under his control], and I saw them in neck collars. He hounded the nonconformists and arrested Hayṣam, on whom he inflicted amputation,[674] and Manḥūr; the two of them were from Khawārij.

[The same authority] said: I heard ['Uthmān] deliver a sermon on the pulpit, saying, "O people, we have found you, both long since and more recently, to be insincere to the Commander of the Faithful. [Now] there have taken refuge with you those who will increase your unsoundness. The people in Iraq are people of schism and hypocrisy. By God, they are the nest of hypocrisy and the egg that split apart and produced it! By God, I have never put an Iraqi to the test but that I have found him who thinks most of himself to be him who says about the family of Abū Ṭālib what [1259] he says.[675] They are not [in reality] partisans of [the family of Abū Ṭālib]; [rather,] they are enemies of them and of [persons] other than them. Because of what God desires by way of spilling their blood, I shall not, by God, be brought anyone who has given refuge to any one of them, or has rented him a house, or has accommodated him, but that I shall demolish his house and shall cause to befall him what he deserves. When 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb garrisoned[676] the territories, striving after what was good for his subjects, those who wanted to make holy war would stop by him and seek his advice, [asking,] 'Is Syria dearer to you or Iraq?' and he would say, 'Syria is dearer to me. I think that Iraq is an incurable disease; in it Satan has hatched [his brood] and they have made things difficult for me.[677] I can see myself scattering them

673. See n. 303 above.

674. The text reads simply fa-qaṭa'ahu. According to the Kitāb al-'uyūn wa'l-ḥadā'iq (p. 16), 'Uthmān was ordered by al-Walīd to cut off his hand and his foot and then kill him.

675. Apparently a roundabout way of suggesting that the most arrogant and hypocritical of the Iraqis professed themselves to be extreme philo-Ṭālibids.

676. So rendering maṣṣara.

677. La-qad a'ḍalū bī: Lane, Lexicon, p. 2074, renders this "[the people of El-Koofeh have caused that] the means of effecting my object in their affair . . . have in the [various] territories. [But] then I say, "If I were to scatter them, they would corrupt those into whose presence they enter by [using] argument and contention, [saying,] 'How?' and 'Why?' and by [their] swiftness of entering into sedition.' " If they are put to the test with swords, no superiority on their part emerges. They did no good for 'Uthmān, who met with death and disaster from them. They were the first of the people to occasion this enormous breach, undoing the loops of Islam one by one and spoiling [its] territories. By God, I shall draw nearer to God with everything I do to them, because of what I know of their view[s] and their tenets. Then the Commander of the Faithful Mu'āwiyah took charge of them; he cajoled them and they did him no good. [Next,] a real man[678] took charge of them, flogging them and extending [his] sword over them; he made them fearful, and they became orderly for him, whether willingly or otherwise, that being because he tested them and knew them. O people, by God, we have never considered [any] rallying cry to be the like of security; nor have we considered [any] basis [for life] to be worse than fear. So cleave to obedience. O people of Medina, I have experience of disobedience. By God, you are not people given to [1260] fighting; keep to your houses and grit your teeth. For I have sent to your gathering (majālis) those who will hear [what you say] and will inform me about you. [Something] other than unnecessary talk is more requisite for you. Leave off the stigmatizing of governors; for [such stigmatizing causes] the situation gradually to deteriorate, until sedition comes about. Sedition is an affliction; seditions destroy the religion, property, and children."

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Khālid b. al-Qāsim—Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Anṣārī: I saw 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān's crier call out among us, "O Banū Umayyah b. Zayd,[679] God's protection will be removed from anyone who gives refuge to an Iraqi." There was with us a Baṣran of some merit, one of the pious people, called Abū Sawādah, and he said, "By God, I do not want to occasion something unpleasant for you. Convey me to somewhere where I may become strait to me . . . and the treating them with gentleness has become difficult to me."

678. Rajul min al-nās: Presumably, al-Ḥajjāj is meant.

679. Presumably, the Aws and Anṣār clan of Umayyah b. Zayd b. Mālik is meant.

be safe." I said, "There is no good for you in going out. God will protect both you and us." [Sa'īd b. 'Amr] continued: I took him into my house, and [news of that] reached 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān, who sent guards. I removed him to my brother's house, and [the guards] came across nothing; [the person] who had got me into trouble was an enemy. I said to the amīr, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! He is bringing [to your attention] a falsehood. Do not punish on the basis of it." He continued: ['Uthmān] gave the person who had got me into trouble twenty lashes. We got the Iraqi out. He used to perform the ritual prayer with us, not missing a single day. The people of our house showed kindness to him and said to him, "We shall die in defense of you." He did not leave until 'Uthmān was dismissed.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Abd al-Ḥakīm[680] b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Farwah: Al-Walīd sent 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān to [1261] Medina to expel those Iraqis who were there and to scatter the nonconformists and those who controlled them and those who espoused their cause. He did not send him as governor; he neither ascended the pulpit nor gave a sermon on it. When ['Uthmān] had done what he did to the Iraqis and to Manḥūr and others, [al-Walīd] established him over Medina [as governor], and he [thenceforward] used to ascend the pulpit.

In this year al-Ḥajjāj killed Sa'īd b. Jubayr.[681]

The Report of [Sa'īd b. Jubayr's] Death

The reason why al-Ḥajjāj killed him was that he had gone against [al-Ḥajjāj], together with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath. Al-Ḥajjāj had put [Sa'īd] in charge of the troops' stipends when he sent 'Abd al-Raḥmān to fight the Zunbīl. When 'Abd al-Raḥmān disavowed al-Ḥajjāj, Sa'īd was among those who disavowed him with him; and, when 'Abd al-Raḥmān was defeated and fled to the Zunbīl's country, Sa'īd [also] fled.

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Bakr b. 'Ayyāsh: Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to so-and-so, who was in charge of Iṣbahān—and Sa'īd was [there]: Abū Ja'far said: I think that, when he fled from al-Ḥajjāj, 680. Following the Addenda et Emendanda.

681. For other versions, see Sayed, Revolte, p. 353 and n. 546 thereto.

he went to Iṣbahān. [Al-Ḥajjāj] wrote to [this governor], "Saʿīd is with you. Arrest him." The order came to a man who held himself aloof from doing wrong, and he sent [word] to Saʿīd, "Move yourself away from me." Saʿīd did so and went to Ādharbayjān, where he remained [for some time]. Then he felt that he had been there long enough, and he made the lesser pilgrimage; he went out to Mecca and stayed there. [In Mecca] there were people of his sort, lying low and not revealing their names.

[1262] [Abū Kurayb?] continued: Abū Ḥuṣayn said, relating this to us: It reached us that so-and-so had been made amīr of Mecca, and I said to [Saʿīd], "O Saʿīd, this man cannot be trusted; he is a man of evil nature, and I am on my guard against him for you. Go off! Depart!" [Saʿīd] said, "O Abū Ḥuṣayn, by God, I have been a fugitive until I have become ashamed before God. Let there come to me what God has prescribed for me." I said, "By God, I think that you are happy (saʿīd), just as your mother named you." [Abū Ḥuṣayn] continued: That man came to Mecca and sent [for Saʿīd], who was arrested. Then he treated [Saʿīd] gently and spoke to him and tried him this way and that.[682]

According to Abū ʿĀṣim—ʿAmr b. Qays: Al-Ḥajjāj wrote to al-Walīd, "The people of hypocrisy and schism have taken refuge in Mecca. If the Commander of the Faithful sees fit to allow me [to get] at them[, that will be a good thing]." Al-Walīd wrote to Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī, who arrested ʿAṭāʾ, Saʿīd b. Jubayr, Mujāhid, Ṭalq b. Ḥabīb, and ʿAmr b. Dīnār.[683] As for ʿAmr b. Dīnār and ʿAṭāʾ, they were released, since they were Meccans. As for the others, they were sent by [Khālid] to al-Ḥajjāj; Ṭalq died on th eway, Mujāhid was held in prison until al-Ḥajjāj died, and Saʿīd b. Jubayr was killed.

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Bakr—al-Ashjaʿī: When the two guards brought Saʿīd b. Jubayr, he was accommodated in a house near to al-Rabadhah.[684] One of the guards went off to answer a call of nature, while the other remained. The one who was with [Saʿīd] woke up, having had a dream, and said, "O Saʿīd, by

682. Reading yudīruhu, as proposed by the Addenda et Emendanda.

683. ʿAṭāʾ b. Abī Rabāh (d. 114/732), Mujāhid b. Jabr (d. ± 102/721), ʿAmr b. Dīnār (d. 125/742)—see Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, p. 40; on Ṭalq, cf. Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, vol. V, pp. 31–32.

684. Near Dhāt al-ʿIrq on the road from Fayd to Mecca (Yāqūt, Muʿjam, vol. II, p. 749); see S. A. A. al-Rashid, Al-Rabadhah. A Portrait of Early Islamic Civilization in Saudi Arabia, Riyadh, 1985.

God, I'll have nothing to do with killing you. In my dream I was told, 'Woe to you, have nothing to do with killing Sa'īd b. Jubayr.' [1263] Go where you want. I shall never pursue you." Sa'īd said, "I hope for well-being and [keep on] hoping," and he refused. Then [the other guard] came, and on the next day he had a similar dream and was told, "Have nothing to do with killing Sa'īd." He said, "O Sa'īd, go where you wish. I'll have nothing to do with killing you," [and he kept on saying this?] until he brought him to his house; the house in which Sa'īd was is this house of theirs.[685]

According to Abū Kurayb—Abū Bakr—Yazīd b. Abī Ziyād, the mawlā of the Banū Hāshim: I entered into [Sa'īd's] presence in this house of Sa'īd's, and he was brought in fettered. Then the Kūfan qurrā' entered into his presence. I said, "O Abū 'Abdallāh, did he speak to you?" [686] He said, "Yes, by God," laughing and talking to us, with a little daughter of his on his lap. She glanced and saw the fetter, and wept. I heard him say, "My daughter, be careful not to take [it] as a bad omen," and, by God, that was hard on him. We followed him, saying goodbye to him, until we got to the bridge with him. The two guards said, "We shall never take him across until he gives us a surety. We are afraid that he may drown himself." [Yazīd] continued: We said, "Sa'īd drown himself?" but they did not cross until we made ourselves responsible for him.

According to Wahb b. Jarīr—his father—al-Faḍl b. Suwayd: Al-Ḥajjāj sent me off for something. Sa'īd b. Jubayr was brought [in my absence], and I then returned and said [to myself], "I'll see [1264] what [al-Ḥajjāj] does," and I stood by al-Ḥajjāj's head. Al-Ḥajjāj said to him, "O Sa'īd, did I not cause you to partake of my trust? Did I not appoint you? Did I not do [such-and-such]?" until I thought that he was going to let him go. [Sa'īd] said, "Yes." "Then what induced you to go against me?" [Sa'īd] said, "It was enjoined upon me [to do so]." [The narrator] continued: [At this, al-Ḥajjāj] flew into a rage and said, "Hah! You thought that the enjoining of the Enemy of the Merciful[687] [constituted] a duty incumbent upon you, and you did not think that you had any duty to God, to the Commander of the Faithful, and to me. Behead him!" and he was beheaded; his head fell, attired in a small white item of headgear.

685. Presumably, the narrator was in, or in sight of, the relevant house at this juncture in his narrative. The text is rather tangled here.

686. The identity of the subject here is unclear.

687. 'Aduww al-raḥmān: Cf. above, n. 95.

According to Abū Ghassān Mālik b. Ismāʿīl—Khalaf b. Khalīfah—a man who said: When Saʿīd b. Jubayr was killed and his head fell, he called out "There is no god but God" three times; the first time he articulated it clearly, and the next two times he said something like that, without clear articulation.

According to Abū Bakr[688] al-Bāhilī—Anas b. Abī Shaykh: When al-Ḥajjāj was brought Saʿīd b.Jubayr, he said, "May God curse the son of the Christian woman"—[Anas] said: Meaning Khālid al-Qasrī, who had sent [Saʿīd] from Mecca—"didn't I know the place where he was? Yes, by God, and the [very] house in Mecca where he was." The he advanced upon Saʿīd and said, "What induced you to go out against me?" He said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper, I am simply a Muslim man who makes a mistake on one occasion and gets it right on another." [Anas] continued: Al-Ḥajjāj cheered up, and his face brightened, and he hoped that he might find a way out of [this] situation. [Anas] continued: Then he came back at [Saʿīd] about something, and Saʿīd said, "But I was bound by an oath of allegiance to ['Abd al-Raḥmān]." [Anas] continued: Then [al-Ḥajjāj] became filled with rage, to the extent that one of the ends of his ridā'[689] fell from his [1265] shoulder, and he said, "O Saʿīd, did I not go to Mecca and kill Ibn al-Zubayr, and then take its people's oath of allegiance and your oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful, ʿAbd al-Malik?" He said, "Yes." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "And did I not then arrive in al-Kūfah as governor of Iraq and renew the oath of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful and take your oath of allegiance to him for a second time?" He said, "Yes." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "And you then forswear two oaths of allegiance to the Commander of the Faithful and fulfill one to the weaver, the son of the weaver? Behead him!" [Anas?] said: It was [Saʿīd] that Jarīr meant with his words (kāmil):[690]

How many a breaker of two oaths of allegiance have you left, with his beard dyed with the blood of [his] jugular veins.

688. Following the Addenda et Emendanda.
689. See above, n. 596.
690. Dīwān, p. 90.

According to 'Attāb b. Bishr—Sālim al-Afṭas: Al-Ḥajjāj was brought Sa'īd b. Jubayr when he was about to go riding and had put one of his feet in the stirrup.[691] He said, "By God, I shall not ride until you occupy your sitting place in hellfire. Behead him!" and he was beheaded. Then al-Ḥajjāj's mind became confused on the spot, and he started saying, "Our fetters, our fetters."[692] [The people present] thought that he was referring to the fetters on Sa'īd b. Jubayr; they cut his legs at the knees and removed the fetters.

Muḥammad b. Ḥātim said: 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Abdallāh related to us on the authority of Hilāl b. Khabbāb:[693] Sa'īd b. Jubayr was brought to al-Ḥajjāj, who said [to him], "Did you write to Muṣ'ab b. al-Zubayr?" He said, "No, Muṣ'ab wrote to me." [Al-Ḥajjāj] said, "By God, I shall kill you." [Sa'īd] said, "In that case I shall be happy (sa'īd), just as my mother named me."

[The narrator] said: [Al-Ḥajjāj] killed him and then [himself] lasted only about forty days after him. When he slept, he would see [Sa'īd] in his sleep, taking hold of the front part of his clothing and saying, "O enemy of God, what did you kill me for?" and he would say, "What concern is Sa'īd b. Jubayr of mine? What concern is Sa'īd b. Jubayr of mine?" [1266]

Abū Ja'far said: This year was called the year of the specialists in religious law (fuqahā'), [for] in it most of the Medinan fuqahā' died, [starting with] 'Alī b. al-Ḥusayn, peace be upon him, at the beginning of it, then 'Urwah b. al-Zubayr, and then Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab and Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām.[694]

In this year al-Walīd placed Sulaymān b. Ḥabīb[695] in charge of the judiciary in Syria.

There is disagreement about who led the pilgrimage in this year. Abū Ma'shar said, according to what Aḥmad b. Thābit related to me on the authority of him who mentioned it on the author-

691. Thus rendering simply al-gharz aw al-rikāb.

692. Quyūdunā quyūdunā, and thus, too, in the Kitāb al-'uyūn wa'l-ḥadā'iq (p. 10) and Ibn Kathīr (Bidāyah, vol. IX, p. 97); the variants suggest an alternative possible reading qayyidūnā qayyidūnā, "fetter us, fetter us!"

693. Following the Addenda et Emendanda.

694. Cf. Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, pp. 41–42.

695. Al-Muḥāribī. Cf. Wakī', Akhbār al-quḍāh, vol. III, pp. 210–12, where we are told that he was 'Abd al-Malik's judge over Ḥimṣ and that he was a judge for 'Umar II and Hishām, but where no mention is made of al-Walīd.

ity of Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā on his (Abū Maʿshar's) authority: Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik led the pilgrimage in the year 94. [However,] al-Wāqidī said: In the year 94 ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik led the pilgrimage. [Al-Wāqidī] added: It is said [that] Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik [did so].

The governor of Mecca in [this year] was Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī; over Medina was ʿUthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī; over al-Kūfah was Ziyād b. Jarīr, with Abū Bakr b. Abī Mūsā in charge of the judiciary; over al-Baṣrah was al-Jarrāḥ b. ʿAbdallāh, with ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Udhaynah over the judiciary; over Khurasan was Qutaybah b. Muslim; and over Egypt was Qurrah b. Sharīk. Over Iraq and the East in its entirety was al-Ḥajjāj.

The Events of the Year 95

(SEPTEMBER 26, 713–SEPTEMBER 15, 714)

In it there took place the campaign of al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik in Byzantine territory. At his hands God conquered [1267] three fortresses, according to what has been said, they being Ṭūlus, al-Marzbānayn,[696] and Hiraqlah.

In it the rest of al-Hind was conquered, except for al-Kayraj and al-Mandal.[697]

In it Wāsiṭ al-Qaṣab was built, in the month of Ramaḍān (May–June 714).

In it Mūsā b. Nuṣayr left al-Andalus for Ifrīqiyah. He performed the rites of the Feast of the Sacrifice (10 Dhū al-Ḥijjah/August 26, 714) at Qaṣr al-Mā', one [Arab] mile from al-Qayrawān.

In it Qutaybah b. Muslim campaigned against al-Shāsh.

---

696. It remains for these two places to be identified with any certainty (Brooks, "The Arabs in Asia Minor," p. 194; Lilie, Byzantinische Reaktion, p. 121).

697. Yāqūt knows Mandal (sic) as a place in al-Hind from which fine aloes come (Mu'jam, vol. IV, p. 660); he does not mention al-Kayraj. Both places figure in al-Balādhurī's account of Arab operations in Sind (Futūḥ, pp. 440, 442).

The Report of [Qutaybah's] Campaign [in al-Shāsh]

The narrative returns to that of 'Alī b. Muḥammad, who said: Al-Ḥajjāj sent from Iraq an army that joined Qutaybah in the year 95; and [Qutaybah] went on campaign. When he was at al-Shāsh or at Kushmāhan,[698] [news of] the death of al-Ḥajjāj in Shawwāl reached him. That grieved him; he turned back to Marw and recited (ṭawīl):[699]

By my life, how good is the man from the Āl Ja'far, who was caught by snares in Ḥawrān.
If you live, I shall not tire of my [own] life, and if you die, there will be no avail in life after your death.

['Alī b. Muḥammad] said: He returned with [his army] and dispersed them; he left some people in Bukhārā and sent some people to Kish and Nasaf. Then he reached Marw and stayed there.
[1268] There came to him al-Walīd's letter: "The Commander of the Faithful knows your testing and your striving in the waging of holy war against the enemies of the Muslims, and the Commander of the Faithful raises you[r station] and does to you what ought to be done. [Now] consolidate your campaigns and await the reward of your Lord; let not your letters to the Commander of the Faithful fall short, so that it may be as if I can see your territory and the frontier on which you are."

In [this year] al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf died in Shawwāl (mid-June–mid-July 713), aged fifty-four years, also put at fifty-three years; it has [also] been said that his death took place in this year on 25 Ramaḍān (June 13, 713).

In it, when death was imminent, al-Ḥajjāj deputed over the ritual prayer his son 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥajjāj. According to al-Wāqidī, al-Ḥajjāj's rule over Iraq lasted for twenty years.

In this year al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd conquered Qinnasrīn.[700]

---

698. One stage from Marw on the Bukhārā road (Le Strange, Lands of the Eastern Caliphate, p. 400).

699. The poet is al-Ḥuṭay'ah. Cf. Aghānī[2], vol. XVI, p. 295 (where an extra verse is given); Yāqūt, Mu'jam, vol. II, p. 358 (where two extra verses are given).

700. This cannot be right (and is ignored by Brooks, Wellhausen, and Lilie); there is no evidence that Qinnasrīn (see EI[2], s.v. Ḳinnasrīn) had fallen out of Arab control. Possibly this is a mangled version of the report that al-'Abbās raised levies from Qinnasrīn (see al-Balādhurī, Futūḥ, p. 189).

In it, al-Waḍḍāḥī[701] and about one thousand men with him were killed in Byzantine territory.

In it, according to what has been mentioned, al-Manṣūr, 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Alī was born.

In it al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik put Yazīd b. Abī Kabshah in charge of military affairs (ḥarb) and civilian affairs (ṣalāt) in the two *miṣr*s of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah; and he put Yazīd b. Abī Muslim in charge of their taxation (kharāj). And it has been said that, when his death was imminent, al-Ḥajjāj deputed Yazīd b. Abī Kabshah over the military affairs of the two places and [over] the civilian affairs of their people and Yazīd b. Abī Muslim over their taxation and [that], after the death of al-Ḥajjāj, al-Walīd confirmed them [in their positions] over what al-Ḥajjāj had deputed them over. He did the same with all of al-Ḥajjāj's governors; after [his death], he confirmed them [in their positions] over the governorships they occupied during his lifetime. [1269]

The leader of the pilgrimage in this year was Bishr b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik: Thus it was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit on the authority of him who mentioned it on the authority of Isḥāq b. 'Īsā on the authority of Abū Ma'shar; and al-Wāqidī said the same. The governors of the amṣār in this year were the same as those who were [governors] in the preceding year, except for al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah, which were joined to those whom I have mentioned, after the death of al-Ḥajjāj.

---

701. This (together with the parallel reference in Ibn al-Athīr) appears to be the sole reference to him; presumably, he was one of the lieutenants of al-Waḍḍāḥ, the Berber freedman of 'Abd al-Malik who commanded the force known as the Waḍḍāḥiyyah (Crone, Slaves on Horses, p. 38).

The Events of the Year 96

(SEPTEMBER 16, 714–SEPTEMBER 4, 715)

In it there took place, according to what al-Wāqidī said, the winter campaign of Bishr b. al-Walīd; he returned after al-Walīd had died.

[The Death of al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik]

In it there took the place the death of al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik on Saturday in the middle of Jumādā II in the year 96 (late February 715), according to what all the biographers (ahl al-siyar) say. There has been disagreement about the length of his caliphate. According to Ibn Wahb—Yūnus—al-Zuhrī: Al-Walīd ruled for ten years less one month. According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: The caliphate of al-Walīd lasted for nine [1270] years and seven months. Hishām b. Muḥammad said: The rule of al-Walīd lasted for eight years and six months. Al-Wāqidī said: His caliphate lasted for nine years, eight months, and two nights. There has also been disagreement about the length of his life.

Muḥammad b. ʿUmar said: He died at Damascus aged forty-six years and six months. Hishām b. Muḥammad said: He died aged forty-five. ʿAlī b. Muḥammad said: He died aged forty-two and a few months. 'Alī said: The death of al-Walīd took place at Dayr Murrān;[702] he was buried outside Bāb al-Ṣaghīr,[703] and it has been said: in the al-Farādīs graveyards.[704] And it has [also] been said that he died aged forty-seven.

According to what 'Alī said, he had nineteen sons: 'Abd al-'Azīz, Muḥammad, al-'Abbās, Ibrāhīm, Tammām, Khālid, 'Abd al-Raḥmān, Mubashshir, Masrūr, Abū 'Ubaydah, Ṣadaqah, Manṣūr, Marwān, 'Anbasah, 'Umar, Rawḥ, Bishr, Yazīd, and Yaḥyā. The mother of 'Abd al-'Azīz and Muḥammad was Umm al-Banīn bt. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān, and the mother of Abū 'Ubaydah was a Fazāriyyah; the rest of [the sons] were by various mothers.[705]

Report of Some of What He Did [1271]

According to 'Umar [b. Shabbah]—'Alī: In the opinion of the Syrians, al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik was the worthiest of their caliphs. He built mosques—the mosque of Damascus and the mosque of Medina—set up pulpits,[706] gave out to the people, and gave to those afflicted with elephantiasis, telling them not to beg from the people; he gave every cripple a servant and every blind person a guide. During his rule massive conquests were effected: Mūsā b. Nuṣayr conquered al-Andalus, Qutaybah conquered Kāshghar, and Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim conquered al-Hind. [The narrator] continued: Al-Walīd would stop by at the greengrocer's, take a bunch of greens, and say, "How much is this?" [The greengrocer] would say, "[One] fals,"[707] and [al-Walīd] would say, "Put more [greens] in it."

[The narrator] continued: A man from the Banū Makhzūm came to him asking him [for help] in respect of a debt of his. [Al-Walīd] said, "Yes, if you are deserving of that." [The Makhzūmī] said, "O Commander of the Faithful, how can I not be deserving 702. A monastery near Damascus (see *EI*², s.v.).

---

703. A gate on the south side of Damascus (*EI*², s.v. Dimashḳ, vol. II, p. 279a; for the graveyard in question, p. 281a).

704. Yāqūt (Mu'jam, vol. III, p. 862) says that al-Farādīs is "a place near Damascus"; presumably, what is meant here is the graveyard near the Bāb al-Farādīs, on the north side of Damascus (*EI*², s.v. Dimashḳ, vol. II, pp. 279a, 281a).

705. Cf. Kitāb al-'uyūn wa'l-ḥadā'iq, p. 12; Ibn 'Abd Rabbihi, 'Iqd, vol. IV, p. 422; al-Mas'ūdī, Murūj, vol. V, p. 361 = par. 2114.

706. Reading al-manābir with the 'Iqd (vol. IV, p. 424); the text has al-manār.

707. A copper or bronze coin (*EI*², s.v.).

of that, given my relationship [to you]?"[708] [Al-Walīd] said, "Have you recited the Qur'ān?" He said, "No." [Al-Walīd] said, "Draw near to me." He drew near, and al-Walīd knocked off his turban with a rod he had in his hand and struck him several times with it; he said to a man [in attendance], "Keep this [fellow] with you, and do not let him part from you until he has recited the Qur'ān."

ʿUthmān b. Yazīd b. Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd[709] betook himself to [al-Walīd] and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, I have a debt." [Al-Walīd] said, "Have you recited the Qur'ān?" He said, "Yes," and [al-Walīd] asked him to recite ten verses from [the Sūrah of] the Spoils and ten from Repentance. He did so, and [al-Walīd] said, "Yes, we'll pay up for you, and we shall [1272] make close our ties of relationship thereby."

[The narrator] continued: Al-Walīd became ill and fell unconscious. He remained most of that day thought by [those who were in attendance] to be dead. He was wept over, and the official couriers went off with [news of] his death. When a messenger reached al-Ḥajjāj, [the latter] said, "We belong to God and to Him shall we return!" and called for a rope, which was tied to his hand and then secured to a pillar; he said, "O God, do not empower over me one who has no mercy; how often have I asked you to make my death [take place] before his!" and he began to make invocations. He was thus engaged when an official courier reached him with [the news of al-Walīd's] regaining of consciousness.

ʿAlī said: When al-Walīd regained consciousness, he said, "No one will be happier at the well-being of the Commander of the Faithful than al-Ḥajjāj." ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz said, "How great is God's bounty to us through your well-being! In my mind's eye I envisage a letter coming to you from al-Ḥajjāj, in which he mentions that, when [news of] your recovery reached him, he sank to the ground prostrating himself to God, freed every mamlūk of his, and sent out [as gifts] bottles of Indian preserved fruit." A few days later there arrived a letter saying just that.

[ʿAlī] said: Al-Ḥajjāj did not die before becoming burdensome to

708. Presumably, because the mother of Hishām, al-Walīd's brother, was a Makhzūmiyyah.

709. Of the Banū Abī'l-ʿĪṣ of ʿAbd Shams of Quraysh (see Caskel, Ǧamharat an-nasab, chart 8).

al-Walīd. A servant of al-Walīd's said: One day I was washing al-Walīd for lunch. He stretched out his hand, and I began pouring the water on him; he was inattentive, the water was flowing, and I couldn't speak. Then he splashed the water in my face and said, "Are you dozing?" and he raised his head up to me and said, "You don't know what happened last night?" I said, "No." He said, "Woe to you! Al-Ḥajjāj died." I said, "We belong to Him and to Him shall we return!" He said, "Be quiet. It wouldn't please your master [any more] if he had an apple in his hand to smell."

ʿAlī said: Al-Walīd was an enthusiast for building and making constructions and estates. When people met in his time, they would ask one another about building and constructions. Then [1273] there took charge Sulaymān, who was an enthusiast for sexual intercourse and food, and people took to asking one another about coupling and slave girls; and, when ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz took charge, they would meet, and one man would say to another "What is your wird[710] tonight? How much of the Qur'ān have you memorized? When will you complete memorizing [it]? When did you complete memorizing [it]? For how much of the month will you fast?" Jarīr said, elegizing al-Walīd (basīṭ):[711]

O eye, weep copious tears aroused by remembrance;
after today there is no point in your tears' being stored.
The Caliph's noble qualities have been concealed by earth in which a burial niche has been dug, a niche the side of which inclines.
When the catastrophe had become clear, his sons were like stars whose central moon has fallen.
They were all [together]; neither ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz, nor Rawḥ, nor ʿUmar, repelled his fate.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAlī: Al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik made the pilgrimage, and Muḥammad b. Yūsuf[712] did likewise from the Yemen, carrying presents for al-Walīd. Umm al-Banīn said to [her husband] al-Walīd, "O Commander of the Faithful, make Muḥammad b. Yūsuf's present over to me!" and he ordered that it should be delivered to her. The messengers of Umm al-Banīn 710. A section of the Qur'ān recited privately.

711. Dīwān, pp. 296–97 (where two additional verses are given).
712. The brother of al-Ḥajjāj (see *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdjāj b. Yūsuf [p. 42a]).

reached Muḥammad concerning [this matter], and Muḥammad refused [to hand the presents over], saying, "Not until the Commander of the Faithful takes a look at them and decides," for there were many presents. [Umm al-Banīn] said, "O Commander of the Faithful, you ordered that Muḥammad's presents were to be delivered to me; I have no need of them." [Al-Walīd] said, "Why?" She said, "It has reached me that he took them from [1274] people by force, required them to make them, and oppressed them." Muḥammad transported the goods to al-Walīd, who said, "It has reached me that you acquired [these] by force." [Muḥammad] said, "God forbid." [Al-Walīd] gave the order, and [Muḥammad] was required to swear fifty oaths by God, between the Corner [in which the Black Stone is accommodated] and the Standing Place [of Abraham],[713] that he had not taken any of [the gifts] by force, had not oppressed anyone, and had only acquired them lawfully. He swore; al-Walīd accepted [his oaths] and handed [the presents] over to Umm al-Banīn. Then Muḥammad b. Yūsuf died in the Yemen, afflicted by a disease from which he became decomposed.[714]

[Al-Walīd's Desire to Remove Sulaymān from the Succession]

In this year al-Walīd had wanted to go to his brother Sulaymān to remove him from the succession, desiring [that] the oath of allegiance [be taken] to his son as his successor; that was before the illness from which he died.

According to ʿUmar—ʿAlī: Al-Walīd and Sulaymān were the two designated successors of ʿAbd al-Malik. When power passed to al-Walīd, he wanted to have the oath of allegiance taken to his son ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz [as his successor] and to remove Sulaymān from the succession. [Sulaymān] refused, and [al-Walīd then] endeavored to induce him [to agree] on the basis that he would make the succession his after [ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz]. [Sulaymān] refused, and [al-Walīd] offered him large amounts of money. [Sulaymān still] refused. [Al-Walīd] wrote to his governors, [instructing them] to take the oath of allegiance to ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. No one responded to 713. See *EI*², s.v. Maḳām Ibrāhīm.

714. Which is presumably intended to suggest that he had sworn a false oath.

that except for al-Ḥajjāj and Qutaybah and some of the notables of the people. 'Abbād b. Ziyād[715] said [to al-Walīd], "The people are not responding to you positively in this matter; and, even if they were to do so, I would not be sure that they would not act perfidiously toward your son. Write to Sulaymān to come to you, for he does owe you obedience, and endeavor to induce him [to agree] to the oath of allegiance being taken to 'Abd al-'Azīz as his successor. He won't be able to hold out while he is with you; and, if he does refuse, the people will be against him." Al-Walīd accordingly wrote to Sulaymān, ordering him to come [to him]. [Sulaymān] delayed, and al-Walīd resoled to go to him and remove him from the succession. He ordered [his retinue] to get ready, and he gave the order for his mare,[716] which was brought out. Then he became ill, and died before he could go, still desiring that.

According to 'Umar—'Alī—Abū 'Āṣim al-Ziyādī—al-Hilwāth al-Kalbī: We were in al-Hind with Muḥammad b. al-Qāsim. God killed Dāhir, and a letter came to us from al-Ḥajjāj [instructing us] to disavow Sulaymān. When Sulaymān had taken charge, a letter came to us from him: "Sow and till; no Syria for you." We stayed in that land until 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz came to power. Then we returned. [1275]

According to 'Umar—'Alī: Al-Walīd wanted to build the mosque of Damascus, in which there was a church.[717] He said to his companions, "I beg of you nothing but that each of you bring me one brick," and each man began to do so. An Iraqi brought him two bricks, and he said to him, "Whom are you from?" He said, "From the people of Iraq." [Al-Walīd] said, "O people of Iraq, you go to excess in everything, even in obedience." They demolished the church and built it into a mosque. When 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz took charge, [some of the Christians] complained to him of that. It was said [to him], "Everything outside the city was conquered by force of arms," and he said to [the people who had complained], "We'll return your church to you and demolish the church of Thomas, which was conquered by force of arms, and 715. 'Abbād b. Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān [see *EI*², s.v.].

716. Reading ḥajr or ḥijr, where Guidi has understood ḥujar; Ibn al-Athīr gives khiyām.

717. This is what the text says. In fact, al-Walīd wanted to enlarge the existing mosque onto adjoining land occupied by the church of St. John the Baptist [see *EI*², s.v. Dimashḳ, at vol. II, pp. 280–81].

build it into a mosque." When he said that to them, they said, "Never mind. We'll leave you to what al-Walīd demolished and you leave the church of Thomas to us." 'Umar did that.

In that year Qutaybah conquered Kāshghar and campaigned in China.[718]

[Qutaybah in Kāshghar and China]

The narrative returns to that of 'Alī b. Muḥammad with the list of authorities I mentioned earlier. He said: Then Qutaybah campaigned in the year 96, taking with [his troops] their dependents and desiring to afford his dependents a safe refuge in Samarqand, [1276] out of fear of Sulaymān. When he had crossed the river, he put one of his mawlās, a man called al-Khwārazmī, in charge of the river crossing and said, "No one may cross except with a pass." He went to Farghānah and sent [ahead] to the 'Iṣām pass[719] [troops] to facilitate for him the road to Kāshghar, the nearest of the cities of China; [news of] the death of al-Walīd reached him while he was at Farghānah.

According to ['Alī]—Abū al-Dhayyāl—al-Muhallab b. Iyās—Iyās b. Zuhayr: When Qutaybah crossed the river, I went to him and said to him, "I didn't know your view about the dependents, so that we might make preparations in that regard. My older sons are with me, but there are dependents I have left behind, and an old mother, and they do not have with them anyone to take care of them. If you see fit, [I hope] that you will write a letter for me [to go] with one of my sons, whom I shall send to bring me my family." He wrote the letter and gave it to me. I then reached the river, the man in charge of the [crossing] being on the other side. I beckoned with my hand, and some people came [across] in a boat. They said, "Who are you, and where is your pass?" I informed them, and some of them sat with me while others took the boat back to the man in charge and informed him. [Iyās] went on: Then they returned to me and transported me, and I reached [the people 718. Cf. Gibb, Arab Conquests, pp. 52–53, and "The Arab Invasion of Kashgar in A.D. 715," Bulletin of the School of Oriental Studies, 2 (1923), pp. 467–74, who disputes the historicity of this report; also Ibn A'tham, Futūḥ, vol. VII, p. 251.

719. Named after 'Iṣām b. 'Abd Allāh al-Bāhilī, who is reported to have been appointed in this area by Qutaybah (Barthold, Turkestan[3], p. 186, and Gibb, Arab Conquests, p. 49, both citing al-Ṭabarī, Ta'rīkh, ser. ii, p. 1440).

on the other side]; they were eating, and I was hungry, so I hurled myself [at the food]. [The man in charge] asked me things while I was eating and not answering him. He said, "This bedouin is [half-] dead from hunger." Then I rode, reached Marw, transported my mother, and returned, heading for the camp. [News of] the death of al-Walīd came, and I departed for Marw.

According to [ʿAlī]—Alū Mikhnaf—his father: Qutaybah sent Kathīr[720] b. fulān to Kāshghar; he took captives from it and sealed their necks [with the words] "Part of what God has granted to Qutaybah." Then Qutaybah returned, and [news of] the death of al-Walīd reached them.

[ʿAlī] said: According to (i) Yaḥyā b. Zakariyyā' al-Hamdānī—Khurasani shaykhs, and (ii) al-Ḥakam b. ʿUthmān—a Khurasani [1277] shaykh: Qutaybah penetrated far, until he drew near to China. [ʿAlī] continued: The king of China wrote to [Qutaybah], "Send to us one of the nobles who are with you, [that] he may tell us about you and we may ask him about your religion." Qutaybah chose twelve—one of them said: ten—men from his army, from assorted tribes,[721] good-looking, beefy men, eloquent, hirsute, and brave, [this being] after he had asked about them and found them to be the best of those from among whom they came. Qutaybah spoke to them and contended with them in sagacity; he perceived intellects and good looks, and he ordered that they be well equipped with weapons, fine silks, embroidered garments, soft delicate white clothing, sandals, and perfume. He mounted them on fine horses, to be led with them, and riding animals for them to ride.

[ʿAlī] said: Hubayrah b. al-Mushamraj al-Kilābī was eloquent, unconstrained with his tongue. [Qutaybah] said to him, "O Hubayrah, how are you going to conduct [this]?" [Hubayrah] said, "May God cause the amīr to prosper! I have a sufficiency of self-discipline. Say what you wish, and I shall say [that] and hold to it." [Qutaybah] said, "Go with God's blessing; through God comes success. Do not remove your turbans until you reach [the king's] country. When you enter into his presence, inform him that I have sworn that I shall not depart until I tread on their land, seal [the necks of] their kings, and collect their tax."

[ʿAlī] said: They went off, led by Hubayrah b. al-Mushamraj.

720. Ibn al-Athīr has "Kabīr."

721. Taking this to be the sense of min afnā' al-qabā'il here.

When they arrived, the king of China sent to them, summoning them. They entered the bathhouse, and then emerged and donned white clothes with tunics underneath; they applied ghāliyah[722] perfume to themselves, censed themselves, put on sandals and *ridā'*s,[723] and entered into [the king's] presence; with him were the grandees of his kingdom. They sat down, and neither the king nor any of those sitting with him spoke to them; then they stood up [and went out]. The king said to those who were present with [1278] him, "What do you think of these [people]?" They said, "We think they are people who are nothing but women; there was not one of us who, on seeing them and smelling their perfume, did not have an erection."

['Alī] said: On the next day the king sent for them, and they donned embroidered garments, silken turbans, and maṭārif[724] and went to him in the morning. When they entered into his presence, they were told, "Return." [The king said to his companions, "What do you think of this attire?" They said, "This attire is more like the attire of men than that first one was. They are [indeed men]."

On the third day the king sent for them, and they strapped on their weapons, donned their head mail and helmets, girded themselves with their swords, took up their spears, shouldered their bows, mounted their horses, and went [to him] in the morning. The king of China looked at them, and he saw what resembled mountains advancing. When they drew near [to him], they fixed their spears into the ground. Then they advanced toward [the king and his companions], tucking up their garments. Before they could enter, they were told, "Return," on account of the fear of the [Arabs] that had entered the hearts of [the king and his companions].

---

722. Which is variously defined as "a sort of perfume, well known"; "a certain compound of perfumes"; "musk mixed or boiled [with other perfumes]"; and "a perfume composed of musk and ambergris and camphor and oil of ben" (Lane, Lexicon, s.v.).

723. See above, n. 596.

724. The miṭraf is defined by Lane (Lexicon, s.v.) as "a garment, . . . or [such as is termed] ridā', . . . of [the kind of cloth called] khazz, . . . square, or four-sided . . . having ornamental or coloured or figured, borders (a'lam): . . . or a garment having, in its two ends, or sides, (fī ṭarafayhi) two such borders ('alamān): . . . or a square, or four-sided, garment of khazz."

['Alī] said: They departed; they mounted their horses, pulled up their spears, and urged on their horses, as if pursuing one another with them. The king said to his companions, "What do you think of them?" They said, "We have never seen the like of these." In the evening the king sent [word] to them: "Send me your leader, the worthiest of you as a man." They sent Hubayrah to him. When [Hubayrah] had entered into his presence, [the king] said to him, "You have seen the might of my dominion and that no one can protect you from me while you are in my country. You are in the position of an egg in the palm of my hand. I am going to ask you about something, and, if you do not tell me the truth, I shall kill you." [Hubayrah] said, "Ask!" He said, "Why did you do what you did with [your] dress on the first, second, and third days?" [Hubayrah] said, "As for our dress on the first day, that is what we wear among our families, and the perfume we use when with them. As for the second day, [that is what we wear] when we go to our amīrs. As for the third day, [that is] our dress for our enemies. When we are aroused and provoked, we [dress] thus." [The king] said, "How well you organize your customs. Depart to your master and tell him to depart, for I know his cupidity and the small number of his companions; otherwise I shall send against you someone who will destroy both you and him." Hubayrah said, "How can one whose front cavalry are in your country, while the last of them are in the places where the olive trees grow, be said to have a small number of companions? How can one who has left the world behind him, under his control, and has campaigned against you, be charged with cupidity? As for your [attempt] to frighten us with being killed, we have allotted spans; when [their ends] come about, the noblest of them [involves] being killed. We do not dislike [that], nor do we fear it." [The king] said, "What then will satisfy your master?" [Hubayrah] said, "He has sworn an oath that he will not depart until he treads your land, seals your kings, and is given tax." [The king] said, "We shall extricate him from his oath. We shall send some soil from the soil of our land, so that he may tread on it; we shall send him some of our sons so that he may seal [their necks]; and we shall send him some tax, so that he may be pleased with it." [The narrator] said: He called for some dishes of gold with soil in them, and he sent silk and gold and four young men from [among] the sons of their [1279] kings; he gave them leave [to depart] and presented them with fine gifts, and they went off and reached [Qutaybah] with what [the king] had sent. Qutaybah accepted the tax, sealed the young men and returned them, and trod on the soil. Sawādah b. 'Abdallāh al-Salūlī said (kāmil):[725]

There is no disgrace in the delegation you sent to China, if they followed the right way.
They broke their eyelids against the motes, out of fear of death,
except for the noble Hubayrah b. Mushamraj.
He wanted nothing but to seal their necks and [to take] hostages, handed over [as a pledge] for the remission of tax.
[1280] He transmitted the message you asked him to be mindful of,
and brought a way out of violating the oath.

['Alī] said: Qutaybah sent Hubayrah to al-Walīd, and he died at Qaryah[726] in Fārs. Sawādah elegized him, saying (kāmil):

To God be attributed [the excellence of] the grave of Hubayrah b. Mushamraj; what generosity and beauty it contains!
And eloquence that the eloquent fall short of,
when people gather to witness what men say.
He was [like] spring, when the droughts had followed one another, and [like] a lion, when heroes quailed.
May clouds raining torrents give water to Qaryah, where his grave is.
The pawing[727] steeds wept at the loss of him, as did every straight and waving spear,

725. Both the poet and the verses that follow are apparently known only here (and in the parallel passage in Ibn al-Athīr).

726. In her entries on Fārs, Cornu (Atlas: Répertoires, p. 55) lists twelve place names in which the first component is Qaryah.

727. Ṣāfināt. More exactly, Lane (Lexicon, s.v.) defines ṣāfin as [a horse] "standing upon three legs and the extremity of the hoof of the fourth leg: . . . or standing upon three legs, and turning back the extremity of the fore part of the fourth hoof, that of his foreleg: . . . or standing upon three legs. . . ."

And there wept for him tousle-headed women, who did not find anyone to console them in the year that was affected by drought and barrenness.

According to ['Alī]—The Bāhilīs: When Qutaybah returned from campaigning each year, he would buy twelve fine mares and twelve dromedaries, paying no more than four thousand [dirhams] per mare, and have them looked after until the time for campaigning [came round again]. When he was ready for the campaign and was encamped, he had [the mares] tethered and made lean; he would not cross a river with horses until their flesh was lean. He used to mount his advance parties on them; he used to send on his advance parties horsemen from [among] the ashrāf, together with non-Arabs he thought to be faithful, [these latter being mounted] on the dromedaries. When he sent out an advance scout, he would order that a tablet be inscribed; then he would break it into two pieces and give him one piece and keep the other, which he would not be able to simulate, and would order [1281] him to bury [his piece] in a place that he would describe to him, such as a well-known ford or tree, or a ruin. Then he would send someone to search it out, so that he might know whether his advance scout was telling the truth or not. Thābit Quṭnah al-'Atakī said, concerning those of the kings of the Turks whom [Qutaybah] killed (wāfir):[728]

The killing of Kāz.r.nk and K.shbyz gladdened the eye, as did what B.yār encountered.[729]

Al-Kumayt said, concerning the campaign in Soghd and Khwārazm (basīṭ):[730]

Afterwards, in a campaign that was blessed, [a campaign that] destroys peoples' agriculture and reaps,

728. Cf. above, n. 569; the following verse appears not to occur elsewhere.

729. The forms and significations (if any) of these names/titles remain to be elucidated ("B.yār" is given in the Addenda et Emendanda in preference to the "Y.bād" given in the text).

730. If we are to judge by Shi'r al-Kumayt, no. 146, the following verses are found only here.

The cloud [of this campaign] brought Fīl its heavy rain, and Soghd, when its cold shower poured on them.
[Fīl] still has plunder to give as booty at the divisions of spoil—[and] nothing mean or paltry.
Those [are the] conquests by which the Câliph is afforded the proof that we are people who exert our fullest efforts.
You did not avert your face from [any] people in [any] campaign against them, until they were told, "May you die!" and they were killed.
You were not pleased with any fortress of theirs
if it was holding out, until the One, the Everlasting, could be proclaimed in it with the words "God is great!"

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXIV

The Empire in Transition

TRANSLATED BY DAVID STEPHAN POWERS

The Events of the Year 96 (cont'd)

(SEPTEMBER 16, 714–SEPTEMBER 4, 715)[1]

[1281]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year, the oath of allegiance was rendered to Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik as Caliph.[2] This took place in al-Ramlah on the day on which al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik died.[3]

In this year, Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik dismissed the governor of Medina, 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān.[4] Muḥammad b. 'Umar mentioned that Sulaymān removed 'Uthmān from Medina on the twenty-fourth of Ramaḍān in the year 96 (June 3, 715). Abū Ja'far con- [1282] tinued: He served as governor of Medina for three years. It is also said: His term of office was two years, less seven nights.

According to al-Wāqidī: 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān consented to a

---

1. For other sources on the caliphate of Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik, see Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 360–61; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 38–45; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 252–306; FHA, 16–37; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 173–81; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 166–84; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 257ff.

2. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 314; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 166.

3. Al-Walīd died on a Saturday in the middle of Jumādā II in the year 96 (February 23, 715). See text above, II/1269–70.

4. That is, 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī, who al-Walīd had appointed in Sha'bān of the year 93 (May 13—June 10, 712) or Shawwāl of 94 (June 30—July 28, 713). See text above, II/1255, 1258ff.; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 39.

request from Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm[5] for permission to sleep (late) the following morning and not to grant an audience to the people, so that he might observe the twenty-first night of Ramaḍān.[6] Ayyūb b. Salamah al-Makhzūmī, who was on bad terms with Abū Bakr b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm, was with ʿUthmān at that time, and he said to him, "Have you not considered what that one is saying? He is merely making a show of piety." ʿUthmān answered, "I thought of that, but, if I do not find him holding court tomorrow morning when I send for him, then as surely as I am my father's son, I shall flog him one hundred lashes and shave his head and his beard." Ayyūb said, "Pleasantly surprised by his statement, I hastened at dawn to his house, through which I found my way by candlelight. I said (to myself), 'al-Murrī (that is, ʿUthmān) has also come in haste (to fulfill his oath).'" But lo and behold, Sulaymān's messenger had already arrived, carrying orders to appoint Abū Bakr as governor and to have ʿUthmān dismissed and flogged.[7] Ayyūb continued, "I entered the governor's residence, and there was Ibn Ḥayyān sitting on the floor, while Abū Bakr was sitting on a chair saying to the blacksmith, 'Put the chains on this man's feet.' ʿUthmān looked at me and recited:

They turned their backs and fled
But things are not forever the same."

In this year, Sulaymān removed Yazīd b. Abī Muslim from Iraq, replacing him with Yazīd b. al-Muhallab.[8] He put Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān in charge of the fiscal administration and ordered him to torture and kill the family of Abū ʿAqīl.[9]

---

5. Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm was chief qāḍī of Medina, apparently from the year 88 (706–07). See text above, II/1191, 1255.

6. It is particularly meritorious to undertake the iʿtikāf—a period of retreat in a mosque during which the believer fasts, prays, and recites the Qurʾān. It occurs during the last ten days of the month of Ramaḍān, when the laylat al-qadr (night on which the Qurʾān was first revealed) is presumed to have taken place. See EI, s.v. Ramaḍān; *EI*², s.v. Iʿtikāf.

7. ʿUthmān was reportedly flogged twice, once for drinking wine, and a second time in retaliation for an accusation he had leveled against ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAmr b. ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 39.

8. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 40.

9. That is, the family of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, who had slain Ṣāliḥ's brother, Ādam. See Crone, Slaves, 43; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdjādj b. Yūsuf; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 540.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad: Ṣāliḥ reached Iraq, where he took charge of the fiscal administration, [1283] while Yazīd was in charge of military affairs. Yazīd then sent Ziyād b. al-Muhallab to serve as governor of 'Umān,[10] saying to him, "Correspond with Ṣāliḥ, and, when you write to him, mention his name first." (Upon reaching Iraq) Ṣāliḥ seized the family of Abū 'Aqīl and tortured them; 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab administered the torture.

In this year, Qutaybah b. Muslim[11] was slain in Khurāsān.[12]

The Slaying of Qutaybah b. Muslim

The circumstances surrounding this: Al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik wanted to designate his son, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Walīd, as the heir apparent, and he secretly conveyed his intent to the generals and the poets.[13] Jarīr[14] said with regard to this:

When they ask, "Which man would be the best Caliph?"
the fingers point to 'Abd al-'Azīz.
They consider him the most deserving of all the people, and they were not mistaken when they hurried and swore the oath of allegiance to him.[15]

Jarīr also recited, urging al-Walīd to nominate 'Abd al-'Azīz:

Toward 'Abd al-'Azīz the eyes of the people turned,
when the rulers were at a loss about whom to choose.
To him his merits call attention, when the pillars of state and the heavens fall down.
And the leaders of Quraysh say,

---

10. See EI, s.v. 'Oman.

11. Qutaybah is Abū Ḥafṣ Qutaybah b. Abī Ṣāliḥ Muslim b. 'Amr al-Bāhilī. He was an Arab commander who extended Arab power over the boundaries of Khurāsān. See EI², s.v. Ḳutayba b. Muslim; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 434–35; Ibn Khallikān, Wafayāt, IV, 86–91.

12. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 318; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 519–22; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 40–41; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 253–80, FHA, 17–19; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 167–69; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 439ff.

13. 'Abd al-Malik had stipulated in his succession covenant that Sulaymān was to succeed al-Walīd as Caliph. See text above, II/1170.

14. Jarīr b. 'Aṭiyyah b. al-Khaṭafah (Ḥudhayfah) b. Badr (d. 110/728–29) was one of the most famous poets of the Umayyad period. See EI², s.v. Djarīr.

15. Fa-bāyi'ūhu wa-sārī'ū; read fa-bāya'ūhu wa-sāra'ū, following Band P. See Naḳā'iḍ Jarīr wa-l-Farazdaq, I, 351.

"We must swear the oath of allegiance now that the race has reached its end."
They consider ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz to be the heir apparent, and they have not made a mistake or done wrong.
What do you wait for, when you are the ones that bear onerous deeds and rise to glory?
So pass it (that is, the caliphate) on to him wholly,
O Commander of the Faithful, if you so desire.
[1284] For the people have already extended their hands to him, and the matter has become generally known.
And had they given the oath of allegiance to you as heir apparent, the balance would have been even and the building would have been straight.[16]

Al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf and Qutaybah concurred in the renunciation of Sulaymān. Then al-Walīd died, and Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik assumed power. This was why Qutaybah feared him.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Bishr b. ʿĪsā, al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd and Kulayb b. Khalaf—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās and Jabalah b. Farrūkh—Muḥammad b. ʿUzayz al-Kindī, Jabalah b. Abī Rawwād,[17] and Maslamah b. Muḥārib—al-Sakin b. Qatādah: When Qutaybah learned of the death of al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik and the accession of Sulaymān, he feared Sulaymān because, together with al-Ḥajjāj, he had worked for the nomination of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Walīd. Thus, he feared that Sulaymān would appoint Yazīd b. al-Muhallab as governor of Khurāsān.[18]

Qutaybah wrote a letter to Sulaymān in which he congratulated him on becoming Caliph, consoled him about al-Walīd, and informed him of his achievements and of his obedience to ʿAbd al-Malik and al-Walīd. He also indicated that Sulaymān could count on the same measure of obedience and sincere advice as had the former two, provided he did not remove him from Khurāsān. He (also) wrote him another letter in which he informed him of his conquests and his ferocity against the enemy, of his exalted 16. Ibid., I, 350–51.

17. Text: Dāwūd; read Rawwād, following the Cairo ed.
18. Ten years earlier, in 86/705, al-Ḥajjāj had dismissed Yazīd b. al-Muhallab as governor of Khurāsān and appointed Qutaybah in his place. See text above, II/1178ff., sub anno 86.

standing among the non-Arab rulers, of the awe he inspired in their hearts, and of his great renown among them. He also disparaged al-Muhallab and his family and swore by God that if Yazīd b. al-Muhallab were appointed governor of Khurāsān, he (that is, Qutaybah) would throw off his allegiance to Sulaymān. And (finally) he wrote a third letter in which he renounced his allegiance to him. [1285]

Qutaybah sent the three letters with a man from the tribe of Bāhilah, saying: "Give the first letter to the Caliph. If Yazīd b. al-Muhallab is present and the Caliph reads it and then hands it to him, give him the second letter. If the Caliph reads it and gives it to Yazīd, give him the third letter. But if he reads the first letter and does not give it to Yazīd, hold on to the other two."

Qutaybah's messenger arrived and presented himself to Sulaymān, who was with Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. The messenger gave the letter to the Caliph, who read it and then showed it to Yazīd. The messenger gave the Caliph another letter, which he read and threw at Yazīd. Then he gave him the third letter. The Caliph read it, and the color of his face changed. He called for some clay, sealed the letter, and kept it in his possession.

According to Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā: The first letter contained slanderous remarks about Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, noting his perfidy, infidelity, and ingratitude. The second letter contained praise of Yazīd. The third letter contained the following statement: "If you do not confirm me in my present position and if you do not grant me a writ of safe conduct, I will renounce my allegiance to you as quickly as one removes a shoe, and I will fill the earth around you with horsemen and foot soldiers."

He also said: When Sulaymān read the third letter, he put it between two mattresses under him and made no comment.

Returning to the account of 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Then he—that is, Sulaymān—ordered that Qutaybah's messenger be provided with accommodations, whereupon the latter was transferred to the guest house. That evening, Sulaymān called for him. He gave him a purse containing some dīnārs and said, "Here is your reward, and here is your master's document of appointment as governor of Khurāsān. Be on your way in the company of my messenger, who is carrying Qutaybah's document of appointment." [1286]

The Bāhilī tribesman set out, and Sulaymān sent with him a man from the tribe of ʿAbd al-Qays, one of the Banū Layth by the name of Ṣaʿṣaʿah or Muṣʿab. When they reached Ḥulwān,[19] the people informed them that Qutaybah had renounced the Caliph. The ʿAbdī tribesman turned back, having given the document of appointment to Qutaybah's messenger, although Qutaybah had already renounced the Caliph. There was considerable confusion.[20] The messenger gave the document of appointment to Qutaybah, who then sought the counsel of his brothers. They said, "Sulaymān will not trust you, after this."

According to ʿAlī—one of the ʿAnbarīs—some of their shaykhs—Tawbah b. Abī Asīd al-ʿAnbarī: Ṣāliḥ[21] arrived in Iraq and sent me to Qutaybah in order to find out about the latter's situation. I was accompanied by a man from the Banū Asad, who asked me about the nature of my journey, but I concealed it from him. While we were traveling, a bird passed from our left to our right, causing my companion to look at me and say, "I think that you are on an important mission and that you are hiding it from me." I continued on my way. When I reached Ḥulwān, the people informed me that Qutaybah had been slain.

According to ʿAlī—Abū al-Dhayyāl, Kulayb b. Khalaf and Abū ʿAlī al-Jūzjānī—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās, Abū al-Ḥasan al-Jashamī, and Muṣʿab b. Ḥayyān[22]—his brother, Muqātil b. Ḥayyān, Abū Mikhnaf, and others: When Qutaybah was contemplating renouncing his allegiance to the Caliph, he sought the counsel of his brothers. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān said to him, "Dispatch an army and include in it all those whom you fear: Send one contingent to Marw;[23] then you set out, until you reach Samarqand.[24] Then say to those who are with you, 'Whoever wants to stay will receive his share of the booty; whoever wants to leave will not be com-[1287] pelled to stay, and no evil will befall him.' In this way, only those

19. An ancient town situated near the entrance to the Paytak Pass through the Zagros range, on the Khurāsān highway. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥulwān.

20. According to Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 258–59, the Caliph's messenger returned to Syria, taking the document of appointment with him, thereby causing Qutaybah to regret his actions.

21. That is, Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān.

22. Text: Ḥabbān; read Ḥayyān, following the Cairo ed.

23. Marw was the capital and most famous city in Khurāsān. See EI, Supplement, s.v. Merw al-Shāhidjān; Le Strange, Lands, 397ff.

24. Samarqand and Bukhārā were the principle towns of Transoxiana. See EI, s.v. Samarḳand; Le Strange, Lands, 463ff.

who are loyal will remain with you."[25] 'Abdallāh said to him, "Repudiate the Caliph right here, and call on the soldiers to repudiate him, for no one will oppose you."

Qutaybah accepted 'Abdallāh's advice: He renounced his allegiance to Sulaymān and called on the troops to repudiate him, saying:

> I have brought you together from 'Ayn al-Tamr[26] and Fayḍ al-Baḥr.[27] I have united brother with brother and son with father. I have distributed your booty among you, and I have paid you your stipends in full and without delay. You have had experience with the governors who preceded me: Umayyah[28] came to you and wrote to the Commander of the Faithful, saying, 'The tribute of Khurāsān does not support[29] the expenses of my kitchen.' Then Abū Sa'īd[30] came to you and he spun you around for three years, during which time you did not know whether you were in obedience or in disobedience. He did not collect any levies or hurt an enemy. Then his son, Yazīd,[31] came to you, after him, a stallion for whom women compete.[32] Your Caliph is (as foolish as) Yazīd b. Tharwān Habbanaqat al-Qaysī.[33]

---

25. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 260, adds: "Then renounce your allegiance to Sulaymān."

26. 'Ayn al-Tamr was a small town in Iraq on the borders of the desert, between Anbār and al-Kūfah, that commanded the military approaches to Iraq. See *EI*², s.v. 'Ayn al-Tamr.

27. Fayḍ al-Baḥr was a well-known canal in al-Baṣrah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 285.

28. Umayyah b. 'Abdallāh was the governor of Khurāsān under 'Abd al-Malik until 78/697–98. See text above, II/1032ff.; Crone, Slaves, 232, n. 289.

29. Text: lā yuqīmu. The Cairo ed. has lā yaqūmu.

30. Abū Sa'īd al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, deputy governor of Khurāsān under al-Ḥajjāj, reopened the campaigns towards Central Asia. He died in 82/701–02 and was succeeded by his son, Yazīd. See text above, II/1033ff., sub anno 78; *EI*², s.v. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.

31. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was appointed governor of Khurāsān by al-Ḥajjāj in the year 82/701–02, upon the death of his father, al-Muhallab. See text above, II/1085ff.

32. Text: faḥlun tabārā ilayhi al-nisā'. If one were to read tabāzā instead of tabārā the sense would be, "a stud to whom women raise their hips." Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 134, has thumma atākum banūhu ba'dahu mithla aṭbā'i-l-kalbah minhum Ibn al-Daḥmah, "Then their sons came to you, after him, like bitch's teats, among them Ibn al-Daḥmah (that is, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab)."

33. Yazīd b. Tharwān (his nickname was Dhū al-Wada'āt) would give his fat camels much fodder and pasture, to the neglect of his thin ones. Likewise, Sulaymān would confer favors on the wealthy and prosperous and neglect others. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 519–20.

Our source continued: But no one responded, so Qutaybah became angry and said:

> May God never give strength to whomever you support. By God, were you to unite in order to attack a goat, you would not break its horn. O people of lowly places—I do not say people of elevated places[34]—O rabble of the alms tax, I have gathered you, just as the camels of the alms tax are brought together from all directions. O tribe of Bakr b. Wā'il, O people of pretense, lying, and stinginess, during which of your two days do you boast? The day you go out to war or the day you make peace? By God, I am more powerful than you, O followers of Musaylimah,[35] O blameworthy ones—I do not call you upright ones[36]—O people of weakness and perfidy. You used to call "perfidy," during the pre-Islamic era (jāhiliyyah), "Kaysān."[37] O followers of Sajāḥ,[38] O tribe of 'Abd al-Qays, the farters,[39] you have taken up the pollination of palm trees in exchange for horses' reins. O tribe of Azd, you have taken [1288] ships' cables in exchange for the reins of fleet[40] stallions. This is innovation in Islam! And the Bedouins? What are the Bedouins? May the curse of God be on the Bedouins. O refuse of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah, I have brought you together from the places where wormwood, southernwood, and wild senna[41] are grown.[42] You were riding 34. Text: yā ahl al-sāfilah wa-lā aqūlu ahl al-'āliyah. It is a pun.

35. Musaylimah was a prophet of the Banū Ḥanīfah in al-Yamāmah; he was contemporary with Muḥammad. See EI, s.v. Musailimah.

36. Text: yā banī dhamīm wa-lā aqūlu tamīm. This is a pun on the tribe of Tamīm, who are being addressed here.

37. Kaysān is a name for perfidy. It is not related to Kaysān, the companion of al-Mukhtār. See Lisān, s.v. k-y-s.

38. Sajāḥ, Umm Ṣādir bt. Aws b. Ḥikk b. Usāmah, or Bint al-Ḥārith b. Suwayd b. 'Uqfān, was a prophetess and soothsayer who appeared in Arabia during the riddah wars. See EI, s.v. Sadjāḥ.

39. Text: qusāt, "the cruel ones"; read fusāt. I owe this point to Professor Ihsan Abbas.

40. Text: al-ḥuṣun, "horses." This should be amended to read al-ḥuḍur. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

41. Text: al-filfil, "pepper." Read: al-qilqil, as in Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 133. There are no pepper trees in Arabia.

42. These three plants grow in the desert.

cows and donkeys on the island of Ibn Kāwān,[43] and, when I gathered you, just as the scattered portions of clouds[44] are brought together at the beginning of winter, you started saying such and such! By God, I am the son of his father and the brother of his brother. By God, I will draw you together and beat you as one does the salamah tree.[45] Verily, around the ṣilliyān plant is neighing.[46] O army of Khurāsān, do you know who your leader is? Your leader is Yazīd b. Tharwān. It is as if I am confronted by a commander from the Ḥā' and the Ḥakam[47] who came to you and displaced you from your homes and your abodes.[48] There is a fire over there. Shoot at it, and I will shoot with you. Aim for your farthest mark! Abū Nāfi', Dhū al-Wada'āt, has been put in charge of you.[49] Syria is a father who is treated with filial respect, while Iraq is a father who is treated with ingratitude. How long will the Syrian army[50] continue to lie in your courtyards and under the roofs of your homes? O army of Khurāsān, if you investigate my ancestry, you will find that I have an Iraqi mother, an Iraqi father, an Iraqi birthplace, and Iraqi inclinations, opinions, and religion. Today, as you know,

---

43. The largest island in the Persian Gulf, situated off the southern coast of Persia between 'Umān and al-Baḥrayn; it takes its name from a certain al-Ḥārith b. Imru 'l-Qays. See EI[2], s.v. Kishm; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 139, s.v. Jazīrat Kāwān.

44. Text: qara'; read qaza', following the Cairo ed.

45. A salamah tree has thorns and leaves; the latter are used to tan hides. The leaves are removed by drawing the branches of the tree together, binding them tightly with a rope, and beating them with a staff. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 4, p. 1414.

46. The ṣilliyān is a plant known as "the bread of the camels." The phrase ḥawl al-ṣilliyān al-zamzamah is a proverbial expression applied to a man who hovers round a thing without making apparent his desire. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 3, p. 1248.

47. The Ḥā' are a tribe from the Madhḥij, and the Ḥakam are a tribe from the Yemen. See Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 132, n. 7.

48. Text: ka-annī bi-amīr miẓjā' wa-ḥakam qad jā'akum fa-ghalabakum 'alā fay'ikum wa-aẓlālikum. My translation follows Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 132–33: ka-annī bi-amīr min ḥā' wa-ḥakam qad atākum. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 14, has ka-annī bi-amīr jā'akum fa-ghalabakum 'alā fay'ikum wa-ẓilālikum.

49. That is, Yazīd b. Tharwān.

50. Text: ahl al-Shām. The Imperial Army were composed of warriors from Syria unequivocally loyal to the Umayyad rulers; they were stationed in fortified cities and sensitive areas where disturbances were expected to break out. See Sharon, Black Banners, 61–2.

you enjoy a state of safety and well-being. God has laid open countries to you and made your roads secure, so that a woman can travel in a litter from Marw to Balkh[51] [1289] without an escort. So praise God for the blessing He has bestowed on you and ask Him for forgiveness and increase.

Then Qutaybah stepped down and entered his house. The members of his household came to him and said: "We have never seen a day like today.[52] By God, you did not limit yourself to the Ahl-ʿĀliyah, who are your close friends, but you even included the Bakr, your followers. Not satisfied with that, you included the Tamīm, your brothers. Still not satisfied, you included the Azd, your supporters."

Qutaybah said: "When I spoke, and not a single person responded, I became angry, and I did not know what I was saying. The Ahl al-ʿĀliyah are like the camels of the alms tax that have been gathered from every direction;[53] the Bakr are like a slave girl who does not ward off a sexual advance; the Tamīm are like mangy camels; the ʿAbd al-Qays are that part of the wild ass that he hits with his tail; and the Azd are wild asses—the worst that God created. Were I their master, I would brand them."[54]

The troops were angry and unwilling to throw off allegiance to Sulaymān, and the tribes were also angry, because of the abusive terms that Qutaybah had cast at them. They all agreed to oppose and denounce Qutaybah. The first to speak in this matter were the Azd, who approached Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir[55] and said, "That one has called for what he has called for, namely, throwing off allegiance to the Caliph; however, that way will lead to corruption in matters of both religion and the temporal world. Not

51. An important city in Khurāsān situated at the meeting place of the trade routes; the city was subdued by Qutaybah b. Muslim. See *EI*², s.v. Balkh; Le Strange, Lands, 420ff.

52. Text: mā raʾaynā ka-l-yawmi qaṭṭ. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 14, has mā raʾaynāka ka-l-yawmi qaṭṭ: "We have never seen you behave as you did today."

53. The Ahl al-ʿĀliyah were a heterogeneous group made up of sundry tribes.

54. This statement may be an allusion to al-Ḥajjāj, who branded peoples' hands. For parallel versions of Qutaybah's speeches, see al-Jāḥiẓ, Bayān, II, 132–35; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 261–65.

55. Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir was a notable and poet of al-Baṣrah, who was head of the Bakr b. Wāʾil; he died ca. 100/718–19. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir; Crone, Slaves, 113.

satisfied with this, he has humiliated and reviled us. What do you recommend, O Abū Ḥafṣ?" His nom de guerre was Abū Sāsān; it is also said that his patronymic is Abū Muḥammad. Ḥuḍayn said to them, "The Muḍar in Khurāsān are equal to the other three tribal groups (khums), and within the Muḍar the Tamīm form the majority. They are the heroes of Khurāsān who will never agree that the ruling power pass from the Muḍar. Thus, if you exclude them from power, they will support Qutaybah."[56] The Azd said, "Qutaybah wronged the Banū Tamīm by the slaying of Ibn al- [1290] Ahtam."[57] Ḥuḍayn said, "Do not pay any attention to that, for the Banū Tamīm are partisans of the Muḍar confederation." The Azd left, rejecting Ḥuḍayn's advice. They wanted to put 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawdhān al-Jahḍamī[58] in charge, but he refused. After arguing among themselves, with each refusing to be the leader, they went back to Ḥuḍayn and said, "We have debated the question of leadership and decided to put you in charge of us, for the Rabī'ah will not oppose you." He said, "I will have nothing to do with this matter." They said, "What do you suggest?" He said, "If you give the leadership to the Tamīm, you will be powerful." They said, "Whom do you recommend from the Tamīm?" He said, "Only Wakī'."[59]

Ḥayyān, a client of the Banū Shaybān, said: "Only that Bedouin, Wakī', will take charge of this affair, enduring its heat, shedding his blood, and exposing himself to death, and, if a governor comes, he will punish him for what he has done though the credit goes to somebody else, for he is a brave man who neither cares what he mounts nor what the consequences will be. He has many loyal kinsmen and a score to settle; he has a claim against Qutaybah because of the leadership that the latter took from him and gave to Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn b. Zayd al-Fawāris b. Ḥuṣayn b. Ḍirār

56. See Sharon, Black Banners, 60.

57. During the campaign against Bukhārā in the year 91 (709–10), Qutaybah had appointed 'Abdallāh b. al-Ahtam as his deputy governor in Marw. 'Abdallāh had taken the opportunity to intrigue with al-Ḥajjāj against Qutaybah, but fared badly and was forced to flee to Syria. Qutaybah made 'Abdallāh's brothers pay the penalty in his stead—he slew some of them and cut off the arms and legs of the others, thereby calling down upon himself the revenge of Tamīm. See text above, II/1218; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 40; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 522–23; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 441–42.

58. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥawdhān al-Jahḍamī was one of the chiefs of the Azd. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 266.

59. Abū Muṭarrif al-Ghudānī, Waqī' b. Ḥassān b. Qays b. Abī Sūd al-Tamīmi.

al-Ḍabbī."[60] The troops then began to consult with one another in secret.

Someone said to Qutaybah, "No one creates dissension among the troops except Ḥayyān." Qutaybah therefore wanted to murder him; however, Ḥayyān had ingratiated himself with the servants of the governors,[61] who would not conceal anything from him. Qutaybah summoned a man and ordered him to kill Ḥayyān. But one of the servants heard him, came to Ḥayyān and told him of the order. Thus, when Qutaybah sent a message to Ḥayyān, summoning him, the latter was on his guard and feigned illness. Meanwhile, Wakīʿ accepted the soldiers' request that he serve as their leader.

(Wakīʿ) cited the verse of al-Ashhab b. Rumaylah:

I will reap what I have sown. Verily, my power rests on a solid foundation.

In Khurāsān there were at that time nine thousand warriors [1291] from the Baṣran army representing the Ahl al-ʿĀliyah; seven thousand from the Bakr, headed by al-Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir; ten thousand from the Tamīm, led by Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn al-Ḍabbī; four thousand from the ʿAbd al-Qays, led by ʿAbdallāh b. ʿAlwān al-ʿAwdhī;[62] and ten thousand from the Azd, headed by ʿAbdallāh b. Ḥawdhān. There were seven thousand from the Kūfan army, led by Jahm b. Zaḥr or ʿUbaydallāh b. ʿAlī, and seven thousand of the clients (mawālī),[63] led by Ḥayyān. Some say that Ḥayyān is from al-Daylam,[64] while others say that he is from Khurāsān. He is called "Nabaṭī" (the Nabataean) because of his mispronunciation of Arabic.[65]

---

60. Wakīʿ had sworn to take vengeance on Qutaybah because the latter had removed him from his position as head of the Banū Tamīm in Khurāsān, replacing him with al-Ḍabbī. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 523; *EI*², s.v. Ḍabba.

61. Text: ḥasham al-wulāt. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 15, has khadam al-wulāt, which means the same thing.

62. Text: ʿAwdhī; read al-ʿAwdhī, following the Cairo ed.

63. A mawlā (pl. mawālī) was a non-Arab convert to Islam who attached himself to an Arab tribe. See Crone, Slaves, 49ff.

64. A region encompassing the entire southern coast of the Caspian and the lands forming a belt to the south of the Alburz range. See *EI*², s.v. Daylam.

65. Text: li-luknatihi. Ḥayyān apparently had difficulty pronouncing the guttural consonants of the Arabic language, such as ḥā and ʿayin. See FHA, 68–69, where examples of his speech are quoted.

Ḥayyān sent to Wakīʿ, saying, "If I leave you alone and lend you my support, will you assign me the land tax of one side of the Balkh River for as long as I am alive and you are governor?" When Wakīʿ agreed, Ḥayyān said to the non-Arabs, "Those (Arabs) are fighting over something other than religion, so let them kill one another." They agreed and swore allegiance to Wakīʿ in secret.

Ḍirār b. Ḥuṣayn approached Qutaybah, saying, "The troops are going back and forth to Wakīʿ, swearing allegiance to him." Now Wakīʿ was in the habit of visiting ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim al-Faqīr at his house, where the two of them would drink together. ʿAbdallāh said, "That one (that is, Ḍirār) is envious of Wakīʿ, and this claim is false. Wakīʿ is in my house, drinking, becoming intoxicated, and shitting in his clothes, yet Ḍirār claims that they are swearing allegiance to him."

Wakīʿ then came to Qutaybah and said, "Beware of Ḍirār, for I do not trust him with you." Qutaybah therefore attributed what they said to their mutual envy. Wakīʿ pretended to be sick, whereupon Qutaybah sent Ḍirār b. Sinān al-Ḍabbī to Wakīʿ as a spy. Ḍirār swore allegiance to Wakīʿ secretly. In this manner, Qutaybah learned that the soldiers were, in fact, swearing allegiance to Wakīʿ, and Qutaybah now said to Ḍirār (b. Ḥuṣayn), "You spoke the truth." He replied, "I reported to you nothing but what I knew, but you attributed what I said to my envy. I have [1292] fulfilled my obligation." "You were right," said Qutaybah.

Now Qutaybah sent a message to Wakīʿ, summoning him, but Qutaybah's messenger found him with a sticky substance smeared on his foot and beads and shells placed on his leg.[66] He was attended by two men from the Zahrān, who were uttering incantations over his foot. When the messenger said to Wakīʿ, "Answer the governor," the latter replied, "You see the problem with my foot." The messenger then returned to Qutaybah, who sent him back to Wakīʿ, saying, "Qutaybah says to you, 'Come to me carried on a litter.'" Wakīʿ answered, "I cannot." Qutaybah said to Sharīk b. al-Ṣāmit al-Bāhilī, one of the Banū Wāʾil—the commander of his guard—and to a man from the Ghanī, "Go to Wakīʿ and bring him to me. If he refuses, cut off his head." He sent horsemen with them—some say that Warqāʾ b. Naṣr al-Bāhilī was the commander of the guard in Khurāsān.

66. Text: wa-ʿalā sāqihi kharazan wa-wadaʿan. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 16: wa-ʿallaqa ʿalā raʾsihi ḥirzan, "He tied an amulet on his head."

According to ʿAlī—Abū al-Dhayyāl—Thumāmah b. Nājidh al-ʿAdawī: Qutaybah sent someone to fetch Wakīʿ, and I said, "I will bring him to you, may God cause you to prosper." Qutaybah said, "Bring him to me." So I went to Wakīʿ, who had already been informed that the horsemen were on their way. When he saw me, he said, "O Thumāmah, summon the troops." I called out, and the first one to arrive was Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah, with eight men.

Al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd al-Jūzjānī related: Qutaybah sent for Wakīʿ, and Huraym said, "I will bring him to you," whereupon Qutaybah replied, "Go." Huraym reported: "I mounted my horse, fearing that he would recall me, and I went to Wakīʿ. But he had already set out."

Kulayb b. Khalaf said: Qutaybah sent Shuʿbah b. Ẓahīr,[67] one of the Banū Ṣakhr b. Nahshal, to Wakīʿ. When he arrived, Wakīʿ
|1293| exclaimed, "O Ibn Ẓahīr, wait a while until the cavalry catch up." Then Wakīʿ called for a knife and cut off the beads that were on his legs. Next, he put on his armor and quoted the verse:

Tightly tie my navel so that it will not burst.
One day for the Hamdān and one day for the Ṣadif.[68]

Wakīʿ set out by himself, and some women who noticed him said, "Abū Muṭarrif[69] is alone." It was at this moment that Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah arrived with eight men, including ʿAmīrat al-Barīd[70] b. Rabīʿah al-ʿUjayfī.

According to Ḥamzah b. Ibrāhīm and others: Wakīʿ set out and was met by a man who asked, "What is your tribe?" He answered, "The Banū Asad." The man then asked, "What is your name?" He replied, "Ḍirghāmah." He asked, "The son of whom?" He answered, "Ibn Layth." The man said, "Take this banner."

According to al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī: Wakīʿ gave his banner to ʿUqbah b. Shihāb al-Māzinī.

Then returning to our original chain of transmission, our 67. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 16: Ẓuhayr; cf. below, pp. 150–53, 159.

68. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 270.
69. Wakīʿ's patronymic was Abū Muṭarrif. See note 59 above.
70. Text: ʿAmīrah b. al-Barīd; read ʿAmīrat al-Barīd, following the Cairo ed.

source said: When Wakīʿ set out, he ordered his servants, saying, "Take my baggage to (my) paternal cousins." They replied, "We do not know where their camp is." He said, "Look for two spears that have been tied together, one on top of the other, with a nosebag on top of them. They are my paternal cousins." There were five hundred of them in the army.

Wakīʿ called out to the troops, who approached him, one company after the other, from every direction. He set out, leading the troops, saying:

A brave man who, when he is required to carry out an onerous task, keeps his ribs and his bosom tightly drawn.[71]

Some people said that when Wakīʿ set out he recited:

Do we face Luqmān b. ʿĀd[72] and his type?
Bring me my sword. They shall not carry off an unarmed man.

Qutaybah was joined by the members of his household and the chiefs from among his companions and trusted supporters, including: Iyās b. Bayhas b. ʿAmr, Qutaybah's paternal cousin, who was closely related, and ʿAbdallāh b. Waʾlān al-ʿAdawī, with men from his tribe, the Banū Wāʾil. Ḥayyān b. Iyās al-ʿAdawī came to him with ten men, including ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. al-Ḥārith. [1294]

Maysarah al-Jadalī, who was a brave man, came to him, saying, "If you want, I will bring you Wakīʿ's head." He said, "Stay where you are." Qutaybah ordered one of his men, saying, "Call out among the soldiers, 'Where are the Banū ʿĀmir?'"[73] He called out, "Where are the Banū ʿĀmir?" Miḥfan b. Jazʾ al-Kilābī[74] said, "Where you placed them"—Qutaybah had treated them roughly. Qutaybah then said, "Call out, 'I remind you of God and our kinship.'" But Miḥfan called out, "You severed the ties of rela-

71. This saying means that a brave man gets himself fully ready for the task. See text below, II/1298, where the verse is repeated with a slight variant; see also Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 271.

72. Luqmān b. ʿĀd was a legendary hero of pre-Islamic Arabia, famous for his wisdom and longevity. See *EI*², s.v. Luḳmān.

73. The Banū ʿĀmir b. Ṣaʿṣaʿah, of the Qays. See Caskel, Ǧamharah, I, 92.

74. Ibn al-Athīr (Kāmil, V, 16) gives his name as Muḥaqqir b. Jazʾ al-ʿAlāʾī. Both men were from the Qays.

tionship." Qutaybah said, "Call out, 'Accept our conciliation.'" But Miḥfan, or someone else, called out, "No, may God never forgive us if we do." Qutaybah then recited:

O my soul, endure the pain with patience, since I have not found equals to the tribe's eminent ones.

Then Qutaybah called for a turban that his mother had sent him, put it on—it was his custom to wear it in times of difficulty—and called for one of his well-trained horses that he considered lucky in war.[75] The horse was brought close to him so that he might mount it, but it started to jump about until it exhausted him. When Qutaybah saw this, he returned to his couch, lay down, and said, "Let it be, for this is God's will."[76]

Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī approached, leading the non-Arabs, and made his stand, even though Qutaybah was angry with him, and ʿAbdallāh b. Muslim[77] made his stand next to him. ʿAbdallāh said to Ḥayyān, "Attack both wings." When he answered, "It is not time for that," ʿAbdallāh became angry and said, "Give me my bow." Ḥayyān said, "This is not a day for the bow." Wakīʿ then sent a message to Ḥayyān that said, "I am waiting for you to fulfill your [1295] promise." Ḥayyān said to his son, "When you see me turn my cap around and move in the direction of Wakīʿ's troops, bring to me the non-Arabs who are with you." Ibn Ḥayyān stood with the non-Arabs and, when Ḥayyān turned his cap around, they moved in the direction of Wakīʿ's troops, whereupon his followers exclaimed, "God is great."

Qutaybah sent his brother, Ṣāliḥ, to the soldiers, but he was wounded in the head by a man from the Banū Ḍabbah known as Sulaymān al-Zanjīrī, that is, the Carob[78]—some say that he was shot by one of (Wakīʿ's) paternal cousins.[79] Ṣāliḥ was carried to Qutaybah, his head leaning to the side, and placed in his prayer room. Qutaybah shifted his position and sat with Ṣāliḥ for a while. Then he went back to his couch.

---

75. Text: kāna yataṭayyir ilayhi fi-l-zuḥūf.

76. Text: fa-inna hādha amrun yurād. Compare text below, II/1295, where a parallel passage specifies inna lahu la-sha'n.

77. That is, Qutaybah's brother.

78. Text: al-Khurnūb. Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 273) gives his nickname as Barīḥ Atranj.

79. Text: Bal'amm, an abbreviated form of banū-l-'amm, "the paternal cousins."

Abū al-Sarī al-Azdī said: Ṣāliḥ was shot and felled by a man from the Banū Ḍabbah; he was then stabbed by Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī, one of the Banū Sharīk b. Mālik.

Abū Mikhnaf said: A man from the Ghanī attacked the troops and saw a man who was wearing a coat of mail.[80] He mistook him for Jahm b. Zahr b. Qays and stabbed him, saying:

The Ghanī are mighty and trustworthy when they go to war, even if the other soldiers quarrel among themselves.

But the man who was stabbed was a non-Arab, and the troops were aroused. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muslim advanced toward them, but he was stoned to death by the market people and the rabble. The soldiers set fire to an enclosure containing Qutaybah's camels and riding animals; they closed in on him. Fighting for him was a man from the Bāhilah, from the Banū Wā'il, and Qutaybah said to him, "Save yourself." But he replied, "How miserable a repayment, in that case, for you gave me bread to eat and soft clothes to wear."[81]

Qutaybah now called for a riding animal. A horse was brought to him, but it would not stand still long enough for him to mount it. He said, "There is something the matter with it."[82] So he did not mount the horse but sat, and the troops advanced toward the tent. When the troops reached the tent, Iyās b. Bayhas and 'Abdallāh b. Wa'lān fled, abandoning Qutaybah. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥārith went out looking for his son, 'Amr—or 'Umar; al-Ṭā'ī met him but was wary of engaging him, so that 'Abd al-'Azīz found his son, who mounted the horse behind his father. [1296]

Qutaybah observed al-Haytham b. al-Munakhkhal, who was one of those who had plotted against him, and said:

I used to teach him to shoot every day.
However, when his arm became well-trained with the bow,[83] he shot at me.

---

80. Text: mujaffaf, from tijfāf, which Lane defines as "a kind of armor with which a horse is clad in war, in the manner of a coat of mail." See Lexicon, pt. 2, p. 432.

81. Kūfī, who identifies the man as a certain Junādah, adds: "So he fought and was slain." See Futūḥ, VII, 275.

82. Text: inna lahu la-sha'n. See note 76, above.

83. Text: istadda; the Cairo ed. has ishtadda, "when he became powerful."

Slain along with Qutaybah were his brothers, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, ʿAbdallāh, Ṣāliḥ, Ḥuṣayn, and ʿAbd al-Karīm, the sons of Muslim. His son, Kathīr b. Qutaybah, was also slain, as were several members of his household. But his brother, Ḍirār, escaped, having been saved by his maternal uncles—the latter's mother was Gharrāʾ bt. Ḍirār b. al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Maʿbad b. Zurārah.

Some people said: ʿAbd al-Karīm b. Muslim was killed in Qazwīn.[84]

According to Abū ʿUbaydah—Abū Mālik: They slew Qutaybah in the year 96/715. Eleven of Muslim's descendants were slain—Wakīʿ crucified them. Seven of them were the sons of Muslim, and four were grandsons: Qutaybah, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, ʿAbdallāh al-Faqīr, ʿUbaydallāh, Ṣāliḥ, Bashshār, and Muḥammad, the sons of Muslim; and Kathīr b. Qutaybah and Mughallis b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān (and two others, the grandsons).[85] None of Muslim's sons escaped, except for ʿAmr, who was the governor of al-Jūz-[1297] jān,[86] and Ḍirār, whose mother was al-Gharrāʾ bt. Ḍirār b. al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Maʿbad b. Zurārah; his maternal uncles came and removed him (from his position), thereby saving him.[87]

Al-Farazdaq recited about this:

The evening that Ibn Gharrāʾ did not wish—when he called out—that he had parents from a tribe other than us.[88]

Iyās b. ʿAmr, the nephew of Muslim b. ʿAmr, was wounded in the collarbone, but he lived.

The source continued: When the tribe overran the great tent, they cut its ropes.

According to Zuhayr: Jahm b. Zaḥr said to Saʿd,[89] "Dismount and cut off his head, for he has been weakened by the wounds."

---

84. A famous city 102 km. from al-Rayy and 72 km. from Abhar. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 342–44; *EI*², s.v. Ḳazwīn; Le Strange, Lands, 218–20.

85. Compare Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 274–75; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 17.

86. Al-Jūzjān was one of the districts of Balkh, in Khurāsān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 182–83.

87. Text: najjawhu; read naḥḥawhu, following the Cairo ed. Compare Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 17–18, where it is ʿUmar [sic] b. Muslim, who is saved by his maternal uncles.

88. See Dīwān, II, 332. "Ibn Gharrāʾ" refers to Ḍirār b. Muslim, Qutaybah's brother, who was dismissed as governor of Khurāsān by Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik. Compare text below, II/1301.

89. This man was probably Saʿd b. Najd al-Azdī. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 275.

Sa'd replied, "I fear that the horses will bolt." Jahm exclaimed, "You are afraid, though I am next to you!" Sa'd dismounted, split the top of the tent, and cut off his head. Ḥuḍayn b. al-Mundhir recited:

Verily, Ibn Sa'd and Ibn Zaḥr took turns with their swords on the head of the crowned hero.
The evening that we brought Ibn Zaḥr and you brought a black-nosed (man) with brands on his arms, blackish, Deaf, from the Ghudānah, as if his forehead were a blot of ink on a skin that had been scrawled over.[90]

When Maslamah slew Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, he appointed Sa'īd Khudhaynah b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ governor of Khurāsān, and Yazīd's subgovernors were imprisoned.[91] Among those imprisoned was Jahm b. Zaḥr al-Ju'fī, who was tortured by a man from the Bāhilah. Someone said to the Bāhilī tribesman, "This is Qutaybah's murderer," whereupon he tortured him to death. Sa'īd criticized him for this, but the man retorted, "You ordered me to extract money from him; I tortured him, and it was his time to die."

On the day that Qutaybah was slain, one of his Khwārazmian slave girls was with him; when he was slain, she fled. Subsequently, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab captured her. She is Umm Khulaydah. [1298]

According to 'Alī—Ḥamzah b. Ibrāhīm and Abū al-Yaqẓān: When Qutaybah was slain, 'Umārah b. Junayyah[92] al-Riyāḥī ascended the pulpit and spoke at length. Wakī' said to him, "Spare us your filth and gossip." Then Wakī' began to speak, saying, "The likes of me and the likes of Qutaybah are as the first one said:

He who fucks an ass fucks a catamite.[93]

Qutaybah sought to slay me, but I am deadly.

---

90. Text: ka-anna jabīnahu luṭakhat niqs fī adīm mumajmaj. See Naḳā'iḍ Jarīr wa-l-Farazdaq, I, 362.

91. See text below, II/1417, sub anno 102.

92. The vocalization of Junayyah is conjectural.

93. See text above, I/901.

They tried me once; then they tried me again, from a distance of two bow shots and from a distance of a hundred bow shots.
Until, when I grew old and they gave me white hair, they gave up on my rein and avoided me.

I am Abū Muṭarrif!"

According to Abū Muʿāwiyah—Ṭalḥah b. Iyās: Wakīʿ recited on the day that Qutaybah was slain:

I am the son of Khindif.[94] Her tribes ascribe good deeds to me. And my paternal uncle is Qays ʿAylān.[95]

Then he grabbed his beard and recited:

A shaykh who, when he is required to carry out an onerous task, keeps his ribs and his bosom tightly drawn.[96]

"By God, I will slay, indeed I will slay, and I will crucify, indeed I will crucify. I want to taste blood. This Marzubān[97] of yours, the son of the adulteress, has inflated the prices of your goods. By God, if he does not set the price of one qafīz[98] in the market tomorrow at four (dirhams), I will crucify him. Remember the Prophet in your prayers." Then he stepped down from the pulpit.

According to ʿAlī—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad and a shaykh [1299] from the Banū Tamīm, and Maslamah b. Muḥārib: Wakīʿ demanded Qutaybah's head and his signet ring but was told, "The Azd have taken it." Wakīʿ emerged, saying, "You have added falsehood to falsehood, O Saʿd the blacksmith."[99]

---

94. The Khindif was a major division of the Muḍar that included the Hudhayl, the Tamīm, and the Kinānah. See *EI*², s.v. Djazīrat al-ʿArab.

95. Qays ʿAylān was one of the two subdivisions of Muḍar. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳays ʿAylān.

96. Compare text above, II/1293.

97. By referring to Qutaybah as a Marzubān, the Arabic form of the title of provincial governors in the Sasanian Empire, Wakīʿ likened him to an alien grandee after the Iranian fashion. See EI, s.v. Marzubān.

98. A qafīz is a measure of dry goods equivalent to eight makākīk or twelve ṣāʿ. See Kazimirski, Dictionnaire, II, 788; Hinz, Islamische Masse und Gewichte, 48–50.

99. Text: Duh durrayni Saʿd alqayni, a proverbial expression. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 3, pp. 922–23, s.v. dahdara.

On which of my two days will I escape[100] from death, a day that has not been ordained or a day that has been?
There is no good in a broad-breasted horse, the fleet ones that run in the races,
Is there a day on which I will neither frighten (others) nor be frightened (myself)?

"By God—than Whom there is no other God—I will not leave until either Qutaybah's head is brought to me, or my head is added to his." Then he brought some wooden stakes and said, "These horses must have riders"—thereby alluding to the threat of crucifixion. Ḥuḍayn said to him, "O Abū Muṭarrif, it will be brought to you, so calm down."

Ḥuḍayn came to the Azd and said, "Are you fools? We swore allegiance to Wakī' and accepted his leadership. He exposed himself to danger, and then you take Qutaybah's head! Give it up," that is, the head, "may God curse it." They brought out the head, saying, "O Abū Muṭarrif, this person is the one who cut it off, so reward him." He agreed and gave him three thousand dirhams. He sent the head (to Sulaymān) with Salīṭ b. 'Abd al-Karīm al-Ḥanafī and men from the various tribes—who were led by Salīṭ—but he did not send anyone from the Banū Tamīm.

According to Abū al-Dhayyāl: Among those who accompanied the head was Unayf b. Ḥassān, one of the Banū 'Adī.

According to Abū Mikhnaf: Wakī' paid Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī in return for what the latter had given him.[101] [1300]

According to Khuraym b. Abī Yaḥyā—shaykhs from the Qays: Sulaymān asked al-Hudhayl b. Zufar, when Qutaybah's head and the heads of the members of his household were put in front of him, "Does this distress you, Hudhayl?"[102] He replied, "If it distresses me, it distresses many others as well." Then Khuraym b. 'Amr[103] and al-Qa'qā' b. Khulayd[104] spoke to Sulaymān saying, 100. Text: afir; read afirru, following the Cairo ed.

101. See text above, II/1291.

102. Zufar's family were considered to be the very incarnation of Qaysiyyah. See Crone, Slaves, 108.

103. Khuraym b. 'Amr al-Murrī seems to have been implicated in Qutaybah's revolt. See text below, II/1312, sub anno 97; Crone, Slaves, 98, no. 6.

104. Al-Qa'qā' appears to have supported al-Walid's efforts to deprive Sulaymān of the succession. See text below, II/1312, sub anno 97; Crone, Slaves, 105–6, n. 15.

"Grant permission to bury their heads." He said, "Certainly, for I did not want any of this."

According to ʿAlī—Abū ʿAbdallāh al-Sulamī—Yazīd b. Suwayd: A Persian from the army of Khurāsān said: "O ye Arabs, you have slain Qutaybah. By God, had Qutaybah been one of us and had he died among us, we would have put him in a coffin that would have served as a mascot for us in our raids. Nobody ever accomplished in Khurāsān what Qutaybah did. Nevertheless, he betrayed (us). This is because al-Ḥajjāj wrote to him, saying, 'Lay a trap for them and slay them, for the sake of God.'"

According to al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd: The iṣbahbadh[105] said to a man, "O ye Arabs, you have slain Qutaybah and Yazīd,[106] the two lords of the Arabs." The man asked, "Which of the two, in your opinion, was more awesome and commanded more respect?" The iṣbahbadh replied, "If Qutaybah were in the Maghrib, in the deepest hole in the earth, tied up in chains, and Yazīd was with us, in our country, serving as our governor, Qutaybah would still be more awesome and more highly respected than Yazīd."

According to ʿAlī—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad al-Ḍabbī: A man approached Qutaybah on the day he died, while he was holding court, and said, "Today the King of the Arabs will be slain"—they considered Qutaybah to be the King of the Arabs. Qutaybah said to him, "Sit down!"

According to Kulayb b. Khalaf—a man from among those who were with Wakīʿ when Qutaybah was slain: On Wakīʿ's order, a [1301] man called out, "No spoils are to be taken from any corpse." But Ibn ʿAbīd al-Hajarī passed by Abū al-Ḥujr al-Bāhilī and stripped him. When Wakīʿ was informed of this, he cut off the man's head.

According to Abū ʿUbaydah—ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar from the Taym Allāt: Wakīʿ mounted his horse one day, and they brought him a man who was drunk. On his order, the man was killed. Someone said to Wakīʿ, "He deserved to be flogged,[107] not killed." He replied, "I punish with the sword, not the whip."

---

105. Iṣbahbadh in Persian means "army chief"; it is the Islamic form of a military title used in the pre-Islamic Persian Empires. See *EI*², s.v. Ispahbadh.

106. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was slain in the year 102/720–21. See text below, II/1405, sub anno 102.

107. Text: ḥadd, a term that refers to certain acts, namely, unlawful intercourse, false accusation of unlawful intercourse, drinking wine, theft, and highway robbery, which have been forbidden or sanctioned by punishments in the Qur'ān. The punishment for drinking wine is eighty lashes. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥadd.

Nahār b. Tawsi'ah[108] recited:

We used to cry because of al-Bāhilī, but this Ghudānī is much more evil.[109]

He also recited:

When we saw al-Bāhilī, Ibn Muslim, acting tyrannically, we struck him on the head with a sharp sword.

Al-Farazdaq recited, recalling the battle of Wakī':

To us belongs the one who drew swords and sheathed them, the evening of the battle of the Gate of al-Qaṣr, from Farghānah.[110]
The evening that no tribe could defend its sons by invoking an Iraqi or Yemenite glory.
The evening that Ibn Gharrā' did not wish—when he called out—that he had parents from a tribe other than us.
The evening that the Hawāzin of 'Āmir and Ghaṭafān did not cover the nakedness of Ibn Dukhān.[111]
The evening that the people wished to be our slaves, when the two armies were fighting.
They saw one mountain towering over the others,[112] when the heads of their two leaders met, butting together.
Men for Islam who, as soon as they fought [1302] for religion, caused it to spread in every place.
Until a herald called out from the walls of every city, issuing the call to prayer.
But Wakī' will be rewarded in the name of the community, since he realized
its solidarity with a cutting sword and spearhead.
A reward for the deeds of men, just as a reward was given at Badr and al-Yarmūk from the shades of Paradise.[113]

---

108. See Ibn Qutaybah, Shi'r, I, 448–49, no. 95.
109. "Al-Bāhilī" refers to Qutaybah, and "Ghudānī" to Wakī'.
110. See *EI*², s.v. Farghānā.
111. Ibn Dukhān is the nickname of Bāhilah, Qutaybah's tribe.
112. The text is ya'lū-l-jibāl. Dīwān, II, 332, has daqqa-l-jibāl, "They saw one mountain crushing the others."
113. See Dīwān, II, 331–32.

Al-Farazdaq also recited about this:

I received the news, when my saddlebags were in Medina, about a battle waged by the family of Tamīm; it was satisfying and comforting.[114]

According to ʿAlī—Khuraym b. Abī Yaḥyā—one of his paternal uncles—shaykhs from the Ghassān: We were in the gap of al-ʿUqāb[115] when suddenly we encountered a man carrying a stick and a leather bag who looked like one of the Caliph's messengers. We asked, "Where have you come from?" He replied, "From Khurāsān." We asked, "Is there any news?" He replied, "Yes, Qutaybah b. Muslim was slain yesterday." We were amazed at his statement, and, seeing that we did not believe him, he asked, "How far shall I be from Ifrīqiyah tonight, do you think?" He set off and we followed him on our horses, but he was so fast that he disappeared at the blink of an eye.

Al-Ṭirimmāḥ[116] recited:

Had it not been for the horsemen of Madhḥij, the daughter of Madhḥij, and (the horsemen of) Azd, the army would have been discomfited and plundered And dispersed in the lands, and nobody bringing news about them would have returned to the army of Iraq.
The bonds of the community would have been loosened, scorn heaped on the authority of the Caliph, and illicit doings would have become permissible.
People who slew Qutaybah by violence, while the horses were racing inclined to the ground, covered with dust.
In the meadow, the meadow of al-Ṣīn, where the Muḍar of Iraq understood who was the noblest and greatest.
[1303] When all of Rabīʿah gave themselves up to despair, 114. Text: aqʿadat kulla qāʾim, literally, "It caused every standing person to sit down." See ibid., II, 310, l.4.

115. A gap in the mountains overlooking the oasis of Damascus. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 133.

116. Al-Ṭirimmāḥ b. Ḥakīm al-Ṭāʾī was a celebrated poet of the first century of Islam. See EI, s.v. al-Ṭirimmāḥ; Ibn Qutaybah, Shiʿr, II, 585–90, no. 160.

and the Muḍar and those who claimed to belong to the Muḍar were scattered abroad.
And the Azd of Iraq and the Madhḥij advanced toward death, one common ancestor uniting them both.
The Qaḥṭān were smiting the head of every full-armed warrior;
they protect their eyes, but they do not see.[117]
And the Azd know that under their standard is either a glorious sovereignty or bloody death.
For by our strength the Prophet Muḥammad triumphed, and through us it has come to pass that the pulpit is firmly established in Damascus.[118]

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Jumānah al-Bāhilī recited:

It is as if Abū Ḥafṣ Qutaybah never led one army to the other, and never ascended a pulpit.
And the flags did not flutter when the tribe was standing around him, and the people never witnessed an army under his command.
The Fates called him, so he answered his Lord and went to Paradise, chaste and pure.
Islam did not suffer a loss—after Muḥammad—like that of Abū Ḥafṣ. So mourn him, 'Abhar.[119]

"'Abhar" refers to an umm walad[120] belonging to Qutaybah.
Al-Aṣamm b. al-Ḥajjāj recited, elegizing Qutaybah:

Is it not time for the living to recognize (our distinction) for us?
Surely we are the people most deserving of praise and glory.
We lead the Tamīm, the clients, and the Madhḥij, the Azd, 'Abd al-Qays, and the tribe from Bakr.
We massacre whomever we wish by the power of our [1304] sovereignty,

117. Text: taḥmī baṣā'irahunna idh lā tubṣiru. See Dīwān al-Ṭirimmāḥ, p. 251, where the text is wa-'alā baṣā'irihā wa-idh lā tubṣiru "(smiting the head of every full-armed warrior) and their eyes, and so they become unable to see."

118. See The Dīwāns of aṭ-Ṭufail and aṭ-Ṭirimmāḥ, 147 (Arabic text), and 62 (translation).

119. See Naḳā'iḍ Jarīr wa-l-Farazdaq, I, 363.

120. An umm walad is a slave girl who has borne her master a child; she becomes free on the death of her master. See EI, s.v. Umm al-Walad.

and force whomever we wish to succumb to disgrace and subjugation.
Sulaymān—Many are the soldiers that we rounded up for you by our spears while our horses were riding at full speed.
Many are the impregnable fortresses that we ravaged.
And many are the lowlands and the rocky mountains.
And towns which no soldiers had raided before us, we raided, driving the horses month after month.
Our horses became used to protracted raids, and to be quiet at the sight of charging warriors so that they were no longer frightened by them.
Even if the fire is kindled, and they are forced toward the fire, they rush into the brunt of fire in war.
With their breasts they toy with spearheads and lances, while death is surging with black waves.
With these horses we have ravaged many a city of unbelievers, until they passed beyond the place where the dawn breaks.
And if Fate had not hurried us, they would have carried us beyond Dhū al-Qarnayn's wall of rock and molten brass.[121]
But the good Banū ʿAmr met their preordained fate when their life-span came to an end.

[1305] In this year, Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Mālik dismissed Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī as governor of Mecca, replacing him with Ṭalḥah b. Dāwūd al-Ḥaḍramī.

In this year, Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Mālik raided Byzantium in a summer expedition and conquered a fortress (ḥiṣn) known as "Ḥiṣn ʿAwf."[122]

In this year, Qurrah b. Sharīk al-ʿAbsī, the governor of Egypt, died, in the month of Ṣafar (October 16–November 13), according to some of the biographers. Others said: Qurrah died during the 121. Text: wa-l-qaṭri, "and rain"; read wa-l-qiṭri, which means molten brass. Dhū al-Qarnayn ("the two-horned one") refers to Alexander the Great who, according to Qur'ān 18:82–98, was given power on earth. In response to an appeal from oppressed people, he built a rampart of iron and brass against the incursions of Gog and Magog. See *EI*², s.v. al-Iskandar.

122. I have not been able to identify Ḥiṣn ʿAwf.

lifetime of al-Walīd (b. ʿAbd al-Malik), in the year 95/714, in the month in which al-Ḥajjāj died.[123]

In this year, the pilgrimage was led by Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm al-Anṣārī—as I was told by Aḥmad b. Thābit, on the authority of the one he mentioned—on the authority of Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—on the authority of Abū Maʿshar; and the same was related by al-Wāqidī and others.

The governor of Medina in this year was Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. Ḥazm, and the governor of Mecca was ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd.[124]

In Iraq, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was in charge of military and religious affairs, and Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was in charge of the fiscal administration. Sufyān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Kindī, serving on behalf of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, was governor of al-Baṣrah. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Udhaynah was in charge of the judiciary there. In charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah was Abū Bakr b. Abī Mūsā. Wakīʿ b. Abī Sūd was responsible for military affairs in Khurāsān.[125]

123. Al-Ḥajjāj died in Ramaḍān. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḥadjdjādj b. Yūsuf.

124. The identification of ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz as the governor of Mecca may be a mistake. See text below, II/1314, sub anno 97, where Ṭabarī indicates that Ṭalḥah b. Dāwūd continued to serve as governor of Mecca until the year 97/715–16, at which time he was replaced by ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd.

125. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 41; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 444–45.

The Events of the Year

97

(SEPTEMBER 5, 715—AUGUST 24, 716)

Among the events taking place in this year: Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-[1306] Malik equipped the armies and dispatched them to Constantinople. He put his son, Dāwūd b. Sulaymān, in charge of the summer campaign, which resulted in the capture of Ḥiṣn al-Marʾah.[126]

According to al-Wāqidī, in this year Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik raided Byzantium and conquered the fortress that had previously been taken by al-Waḍḍāḥ, the leader of the Waḍḍāḥiyyah.[127]

In this year, ʿUmar[128] b. Hubayrah al-Fazārī undertook a naval expedition against Byzantium, where he spent the winter.

In this year, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Mūsā b. Nuṣayr was killed in al-Andalus and Ḥabīb b. Abī ʿUbayd al-Fihrī brought his head to Sulaymān.

In this year, Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik appointed Yazīd b. al-Muhallab as governor of Khurāsān.[129]

126. "The Woman's Fortress" was in the region of Malaṭyah. See text below, II/1335, sub anno 98.

127. The Waḍḍāḥiyyah were a separate military regiment of non-Arabs, named after their commander, a Berber freedman of ʿAbd al-Malik. See Crone, Slaves, 38.

128. Text: ʿAmr; read ʿUmar, following the Cairo ed.

129. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 319; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 41; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 278–85; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 170.

The Appointment of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab as Governor of Khurāsān

The circumstances: When Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik became Caliph, he put Yazīd b. al-Muhallab in charge of military, religious, and fiscal affairs in Iraq.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: Upon being given these responsibilities in Iraq, Yazīd reflected as follows: "Iraq has been ruined by al-Ḥajjāj. Today I am the hope of the people of Iraq. But if I go there and force the people to pay the tribute and punish them for nonpayment, I will have become just like al-Ḥajjāj, throwing the people into conflict and returning them to those prisons from which God had released them. On the other hand, if I do not send Sulaymān an amount equal to what was collected by al-Ḥajjāj, he will not be pleased with me." Therefore, Yazīd approached Sulaymān, saying, "I should like to bring to your attention a man who is very skillful in collecting the tribute, and whom you may want to put in charge of that function, so that you will receive it from him: Ṣāliḥ b. 'Abd al- [1307] Raḥmān, a client of the Banū Tamīm." Sulaymān said to him, "We accept your suggestion." Whereupon Yazīd set off for Iraq.

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī: Ṣāliḥ preceded Yazīd to Iraq, where he established himself in Wāsiṭ.[130]

According to 'Alī—'Abbād b. Ayyūb: Yazīd approached, and the troops went out to meet him. Someone said to Ṣāliḥ, "Yazīd is here, and the troops have gone out to meet him." However, he did not go out until Yazīd drew near to the city. Then Ṣāliḥ went out, wearing a tunic (durrā'ah)[131] and (carrying) a small, yellow mace. He was leading four hundred men from the Syrian army. He met Yazīd and traveled along with him. When Yazīd entered the city, Ṣāliḥ pointed to a house, saying, "I have emptied this house for you." Yazīd dismounted and Ṣāliḥ went to his residence.

Ṣāliḥ placed severe restraints upon Yazīd, refusing to transfer any money to him. Yazīd prepared one thousand tables to feed his 130. Wāsiṭ was built by al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf in 83–84/702–3 and served as the capital of Iraq for most of the Umayyad period; the city was called "Wāsiṭ" (middle) because it was equidistant between al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah. See EI, s.v. Wāsiṭ.

131. See Dozy, Vêtements, 177–81.

men, but Ṣāliḥ seized them. Yazīd said to him, "Charge the cost of the tables to me." Yazīd purchased many goods and wrote checks[132] to Ṣāliḥ for the benefit of the vendors; however, Ṣāliḥ would not accept the checks, and they referred to Yazīd. Yazīd became angry and said, "I have brought this upon myself." Soon thereafter, Ṣāliḥ came, and Yazīd set aside a place for him. He sat down and said to Yazīd, "What are these checks? The levies are not to be used for those purposes. Several days ago I cashed a check for one hundred thousand dirhams, and I have paid your (soldiers') stipends promptly, and when you asked for money for the army, I gave it to you. But this expense cannot be covered.[133] [1308] The Commander of the Faithful will not be pleased, and you will be questioned about it." Yazīd said to him, "O Abū al-Walīd, accept these checks, just this once." And he joked with him. Ṣāliḥ asked, "If I allow them, will you not ask me again?" Yazīd replied, "No, I will not."

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Maslamah b. Muḥārib, Abū al-ʿAlāʾ al-Taymī, al-Ṭufayl b. Mirdās al-ʿAmmī, and Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī—his source—Jahm b. Zaḥr b. Qays and al-Ḥasan b. Rushayd—Sulaymān b. Kathīr and Abū al-Ḥasan al-Khurāsānī—al-Kirmānī, ʿĀmir b. Ḥafṣ, and Abū Mikhnaf—ʿUthmān b. ʿAmr b. Miḥṣan al-Azdī, Zuhayr b. Hunayd, and others—the reports of some of these men contain details not contained in the reports of others, and I (that is, Ṭabarī) have collated them: Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik appointed Yazīd b. al-Muhallab as governor of Iraq, not of Khurāsān. Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik asked ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab, when the latter was in Syria and Yazīd was in Iraq, "What would you think, O ʿAbd al-Malik, if I appointed you as governor of Khurāsān?" He replied, "The Commander of the Faithful will find me wherever he wants." Subsequently, however, Sulaymān's attention was diverted from that.

Our source continued: ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab wrote to Jarīr b. Yazīd al-Jahḍamī and to some of his close associates, saying, "The Commander of the Faithful has offered me the governorship of Khurāsān." The news reached Yazīd b. al-Muhallab in 132. On the use of checks and other instruments of credit, see Dictionary of the Middle Ages, s.v. Banking, Islamic.

133. Ṣāliḥ is referring to the expense for the one thousand tables.

Iraq, where he was greatly vexed because Ṣāliḥ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was placing severe constraints upon him in such a way that Yazīd could not attain anything he wanted. Yazīd summoned ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ahtam, saying, "I need your assistance in a matter that has been troubling me and I want you to resolve it for me." He said, "I [1309] am at your command." He said, "As you see, I am in straitened circumstances, and this has made me uneasy. At the same time, Khurāsān has no governor, and I have learned that the Commander of the Faithful has offered this position to ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab. Is there any stratagem we might employ (to get it)?" He said, "Yes. Send me to the Commander of the Faithful, and I hope to bring you your document of appointment as governor of Khurāsān." Yazīd said, "Don't tell anyone about our conversation." Yazīd wrote two letters to Sulaymān: In the first, he mentioned the condition of Iraq and spoke highly of Ibn al-Ahtam, stressing the latter's knowledge of the country. He dispatched Ibn al-Ahtam on a post-horse, giving him thirty thousand dirhams. He traveled for seven nights bringing Yazīd's letter to Sulaymān. When he reached Sulaymān, the Caliph was dining, so he sat off to the side and ate two hens that were brought to him.

Ibn al-Ahtam entered, and Sulaymān said to him, "I will receive you on another occasion." Then Sulaymān summoned him three nights later and said to him, "Yazīd b. al-Muhallab wrote to me, praising you and mentioning your expertise with regard to Iraq and Khurāsān. What is the extent of your knowledge about these countries?" Ibn al-Ahtam replied, "I know more about them than anyone, for I was born and raised there, and I have knowledge and information about them and their people." Sulaymān said, "The Commander of the Faithful needs someone like you to advise him about Iraq and Khurāsān. Whom do you recommend that I appoint as governor of Khurāsān?" Ibn al-Ahtam answered, "The Commander of the Faithful knows best whom he wants to appoint as governor, but if he mentions the name of a candidate, I will tell him whether or not I think he is qualified for the appointment."

Sulaymān mentioned the name of a man from the Quraysh, and Ibn al-Ahtam said, "O Commander of the Faithful, he is not the real man for Khurāsān." Sulaymān then said, "Then ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab." He said, "No." The Caliph enumerated the names of many men, the last one being that of Wakīʿ b. Abī Sūd. Ibn al-Ahtam said, "O Commander of the Faithful, although Wakīʿ is bold, fearless, courageous, and brave, he is not right for [1310] the job, for he has neither led three hundred men nor acknowledged that he owes submission to anyone."[134] The Caliph responded, "You are right, woe unto you, so whom?" Ibn al-Ahtam said, "There is one man whom I know and whose name you have not mentioned." He asked, "Who is he?" Ibn al-Ahtam replied, "I will not disclose his name unless the Commander of the Faithful assures me that he will keep this matter secret, and that he will protect me from the person in question should the latter learn of it." The Caliph said, "Agreed. Name him. Who is he?" He said, "Yazīd b. al-Muhallab." [The Caliph] said, "But he is in Iraq, which he prefers to Khurāsān." He said, "That is true, O Commander of the Faithful, but if you compelled him to transfer, he would appoint a deputy governor over Iraq and go." At that, the Caliph said, "That is a good idea." Sulaymān then wrote a document in which he appointed Yazīd as governor of Khurāsān. He also wrote him a letter, saying: "I found Ibn al-Ahtam to be as intelligent, pious, virtuous, and as wise as you mentioned." He gave the letter to Ibn al-Ahtam, together with Yazīd's document of appointment. Seven nights after setting out, Ibn al-Ahtam reached Yazīd, who asked him, "What news have you brought me?"

Ibn al-Ahtam gave him the letter, causing Yazīd to exclaim, "Woe is you! Don't you have anything better than this?" Then he gave him the document of appointment, whereupon Yazīd ordered that provisions be made for setting out immediately; he summoned his son, Makhlad,[135] sending him ahead to Khurāsān.

Makhlad set out that very day, and Yazīd set out soon thereafter, having designated al-Jarrāḥ b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥakamī as his representative in Wāsiṭ, and ʿAbdallāh b. Hilāl al-Kilābī as his deputy in al-Baṣrah. He assigned to Marwān b. al-Muhallab,

---

134. Text: fa-raʾā li-aḥad ʿalayhi ṭāʿatan. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 279: wathiqa bi-thalāthimiʾah rajul min aṣḥābihi lā yarā li-aḥad ʿalayhi ṭāʿah, "If he trusts three hundred of his soldiers, he will not obey anyone who is over him."

135. The text gives Makhlad, here, but Mukhallad below, II/1312. I vocalize this name as Makhlad throughout the translation.

whom he considered the most trustworthy of his brothers, the responsibility for his personal wealth and affairs in al-Baṣrah.

Abū al-Bahā' al-Iyādī recited to Marwān:

I found Abū Qabīṣah every day to be the most noble among them under all circumstances.
When they refused to undertake [1311]
the heavy part of the affair, he took on what he could.
And if they are overwhelmed by something, you excel them in magnanimity and generosity.

As for Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā—Abū Mālik: When Wakī' b. Abī Sūd sent an expression of his obedience, together with Qutaybah's head, to Sulaymān, that made a great impression on the Caliph. But Yazīd b. al-Muhallab promised 'Abdallāh b. al-Ahtam one hundred thousand dirhams on the condition that he denounce Wakī' in the presence of Sulaymān. Therefore, Ibn al-Ahtam said to the Caliph: "May God cause the Commander of the Faithful to prosper! By God, there is no one who is more deserving of my gratitude and no one who has rendered me greater services than Wakī'. He took blood revenge on my behalf and dealt with my enemy to my contentment. Nevertheless, my duty to the Commander of the Faithful is greater and more compelling, and the obligation to provide good counsel requires me to inform the Commander of the Faithful that Wakī' never assembled one hundred horsemen without thinking of an act of perfidy. He is nobody where the collective good is concerned, but remarkable in mischief." Sulaymān said, "He is not, therefore, one of those upon whom we can call for help."

Now the Qays were claiming that Qutaybah had not thrown off allegiance to the Caliph. When Sulaymān put Yazīd b. al-Muhallab in charge of military affairs in Iraq, he gave him the following order: "If the Qays can prove that Qutaybah did not throw off allegiance and did not withdraw obedience, then retaliate against Wakī' for him." But Yazīd acted treacherously. He did not give 'Abdallāh b. al-Ahtam what he had promised him and he sent his son, Makhlad b. Yazīd, against Wakī'.

The transmission of the account returns to 'Alī. According to 'Alī—Abū Mikhnaf—'Uthmān b. 'Amr b. Miḥṣan and Abū al-

Ḥasan al-Khurāsānī—al-Kirmānī: Yazīd sent his son, Makhlad, to Khurāsān. When Makhlad approached Marw, he sent ahead ʿAmr [1312] b. ʿAbdallāh b. Sinān al-ʿAtakī (also, al-Ṣunābiḥī). Upon his arrival in Marw, ʿAmr sent a message to Wakīʿ, saying, "Meet me." But he refused, and ʿAmr sent to him, saying, "You stupid, foolish, crude Bedouin, come out to meet your commander." The leading men from the army of Marw went out to meet Makhlad, but Wakīʿ held back from going out until ʿAmr al-Azdī forced him to go out. When they reached Makhlad, all of the soldiers dismounted, except for Wakīʿ, Muḥammad b. Ḥumrān al-Saʿdī, and ʿAbbād b. Laqīṭ, one of the Banū Qays b. Thaʿlabah. Eventually, however, they were forced to dismount. When Makhlad reached Marw he put Wakīʿ in prison and tortured him, and he seized his followers and tortured them. This took place prior to the arrival of his father.

According to ʿAlī—Kulayb b. Khalaf—Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah: When Makhlad reached Khurāsān, he put me in prison, whereupon Ibn al-Ahtam came to me, saying, "Do you want to save yourself?" I said, "Yes." He said, "Take out the letters that al-Qaʿqāʿ b. Khulayd al-ʿAbsī and Khuraym b. ʿAmr al-Murrī wrote to Qutaybah about throwing off allegiance to Sulaymān." I asked him, "O Ibn al-Ahtam, are you tricking me out of my religion?" Then Ibn al-Ahtam called for some papyrus and said, "You are a fool." He wrote letters to Qutaybah in the name of al-Qaʿqāʿ and certain men from the Qays, saying, "Al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik has just died, and Sulaymān will send this Mazūnī[136] to Khurāsān. So renounce your allegiance to Sulaymān." I said, "O Ibn al-Ahtam, by God, you are destroying yourself. By God, if I enter into his presence, I will surely tell him that the letters were written by you."

In this year, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab went to Khurāsān as its governor.

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—Abū al-Sarī al-Azdī—his paternal uncle: After Qutaybah was slain, Wakīʿ served as governor [1313] of Khurāsān for nine or ten months. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab arrived in the year 97/715–16. According to 'Alī—al-Mufaḍḍal b. Muḥammad—his father: Yazīd drew near to himself the army of Syria[137] and a group from the army of Khurāsān. (With respect to this,) Nahār b. Tawsi'ah recited:

136. Mazūnī refers to an ʿUmānī or southern Arab; Mazūn is one of the names of ʿUmān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 122. The allusion is to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab.

We never expected from any governor what we expected from Yazīd.
But we were wrong about him and it has been our custom to abstain from dealing with the unworthy.
If a governor did not give us justice, we set out toward him like lions.
So gently, O Yazīd, come back to us, and let aside the company of slaves.
We come, but you turn away from us,
although we send greetings from afar.
And we return disappointed, without any gifts.
What is the reason for the sour face and aversion?

According to 'Alī—Ziyād b. al-Rabī'—Ghālib al-Qaṭṭān: I saw 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz standing at 'Arafāt[138] during the Caliphate of Sulaymān—Sulaymān had performed the pilgrimage that year—saying to 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd, "How strange that the Commander of the Faithful appointed (such) a man as governor of the Muslims' best frontier post! I have learned from one of the merchants coming from that direction that that governor gives one of his slave girls a stipend equal to that of a thousand soldiers. By God, the Caliph's appointment of him as governor was not done for the sake of God!" Knowing that 'Umar was referring to Yazīd and the Juhanī woman,[139] I said to him, "He is rewarding them for their tribulations during the war against the Azāriqah."[140]

137. The Syrian government troops had been kept away from Khurāsān by al-Ḥajjāj, who employed them exclusively in India. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 446.

138. 'Arafāt is a plain about twenty-one km. east of Mecca; it is the site of the central ceremonies of the annual Pilgrimage. See *EI*², s.v. 'Arafa.

139. The Juhanī woman was Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's concubine.

140. The Azāriqah were a Khārijite sect named after their leader, Nāfi' b. al-Azraq, who maintained that all adversaries should be put to death with their wives and children. The Azāriqah were defeated by Yazīd's father, al-Muhallab b. Abī Ṣufrah, in 78/692, after several years of fighting. See *EI*², s.v. Azāriḳa; Dixon, The Umayyad Caliphate, 181.

Our source continued: Yazīd bestowed a gift upon ʿAbd al-Malik b. Sallām al-Salūlī, whereupon the latter recited:

Your copious rain, O Yazīd, kept falling on my need[141] until my thirst was quenched, and your generosity cannot be denied.
You are the spring by means of which, when starvation prevails, the sick and the destitute live.
[1314] The cloud of spring has spread over all your lands, so they drank their fill; and rain-bearing clouds yielded copious rain.
May God send you, wherever you are, a cloud full of rain, every evening and every morning.[142]

In this year, Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik led the pilgrimage. I was told that by Aḥmad b. Thābit—his source—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar.

In this year, Sulaymān dismissed Ṭalḥah b. Dāwūd al-Ḥaḍramī as governor of Mecca.[143]

According to al-Wāqidī—Ibrāhīm b. Nāfiʿ—Ibn Abī Mulaykah: When Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik returned from the pilgrimage, he dismissed Ṭalḥah b. Dāwūd al-Ḥaḍramī as governor of Mecca after the latter had served in office for six months, and he appointed in his place ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd b. Abī al-ʿĪṣ b. Umayyah b. ʿAbd Shams b. ʿAbd Manāf.

The governors of the garrison towns in this year were the same as they had been in the previous year, with the exception of Khurāsān, where Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was responsible for military, fiscal, and religious affairs. His representative in al-Kūfah—according to some—was Ḥarmalah b. ʿUmayr al-Lakhmī, who served for a few months, after which he was dismissed; he was replaced by Bashīr b. Ḥassān al-Nahdī.

141. Text: ḥawbah, which means the same as ḥājah.
142. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 285.
143. But see text above, II/1305, sub anno 96.

The Events of the Year 98

(AUGUST 25, 716—AUGUST 13, 717)

Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik Besieges Constantinople

Among the events which took place that year: Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik sent his brother, Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik, to Constantinople, and ordered him to stay there until he either conquered the city or received Sulaymān's order to return. So he spent the winter and the summer there.[144]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Thawr b. Yazīd—Sulaymān b. Mūsā: When Maslamah approached Constantinople, he ordered every horseman to load two mudds[145] of food on the back of his horse so that he might bring it to Constantinople. Upon his command, the food was heaped as high as certain mountains. Then Maslamah said to the Muslims, "Do not eat any of this food; rather, attack their lands and sow for yourselves." He built houses made of wood and passed the winter in them. The soldiers [1315]

144. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 44; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 298–306; FHA, 25ff.; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 174–75; Maqdisī, Bad', VI, 43–44.

145. Text: muddayn. The Cairo ed. has mudyayn. A mudd is a dry measure for grain, used in Syria and Egypt. See Ṭabarī, Glossary, CDLXXXII; Hinz, Islamische Masse, 45–47.

cultivated the land, while the aforementioned food remained in the desert, totally exposed; the soldiers ate what they obtained from raiding and, later, from what they had sown. Maslamah remained, besieging Constantinople and oppressing its inhabitants; he was accompanied by the most illustrious commanders of the Syrian army: Khālid b. Ma'dān, 'Abdallāh b. Abī Zakariyyā' al-Khuzā'ī, and Mujāhid b. Jabr. He remained there until he learned of Sulaymān's death. A poet recited:

> It carries her two *mudd*s and the two *mudd*s of Maslamah.

According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad: When Sulaymān became Caliph he raided the Byzantines, setting up camp in Dābiq[146] and sending Maslamah ahead. The Byzantines feared him. Leo[147] came up from Armenia[148] and said to Maslamah, "Send someone to negotiate with me." Maslamah sent Ibn Hubayrah, who asked Leo, "What do you consider to be the height of stupidity?" He replied, "The man who fills his stomach with everything that he finds."[149] Ibn Hubayrah said to him, "We are men of religion, and our religion calls for obedience to our leaders." Leo said, "You are right. In the past, we used to fight one another and get angry for the sake of religion. Today, however, we fight for the sake of conquest and sovereignty. (But, if you with-[1316] draw) we will give you one dīnār for the head of every (soldier who leaves)." Ibn Hubayrah returned to the Byzantines the next day and said, "Maslamah does not accept your terms. I approached him after he had eaten the morning meal, filled his stomach, and taken a nap. When he woke up, he was groggy[150] and did not understand what I said."

The Byzantine commanders said to Leo, "If you rid us of Maslamah, we will make you emperor." And they bound themselves to him by the oath. Then Leo came to Maslamah and said, "The 146. A village in the 'Azāz district north of Aleppo, situated on the edge of a plain where the Umayyad armies prepared for their annual summer raids into Byzantine Anatolia. See *EI*², s.v. Dābiḳ.

147. Leo III, the Isaurian.

148. See *EI*², s.v. Arminiya.

149. This saying is an allusion to Sulaymān, who reportedly consumed one hundred raṭl of food daily. See Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 175; FHA, 34; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 180.

150. Literally, this means, "The phlegm had overcome him."

people (of Constantinople) know that you will not advance against them in a bold attack and that you intend to prolong the siege as long as you have food. But if you were to burn the food, they would submit." So Maslamah burned it. Then the enemy became strong, while the Muslims entered into dire straits until they were on the point of death. This was their situation until Sulaymān died.

When Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik set up camp in Dābiq, he swore to God that he would not leave until the army that he had sent against the Byzantines entered Constantinople.

When the Byzantine emperor died, Leo came to (Sulaymān), gave him the news, and assured him that he would deliver the land of the Byzantines (to the Caliph). So the latter sent Maslamah with Leo, and Maslamah set up camp there, collected all the food around Constantinople, and laid siege to the city. But Leo went to the inhabitants of the city, who made him emperor. He then wrote to Maslamah informing him of what had taken place and asking him to allow enough food to enter the city to feed the people; in this way, the people would believe that his word and Maslamah's word were one and that they were safe from being captured and expelled from their lands; he also asked Maslamah to give them permission to gather food one night. Meanwhile, Leo had prepared ships and men. Maslamah agreed to his request, and the inhabitants of the city carried away large quantities of food from those enclosures in a single night. At this point, Leo began to act in a hostile manner, having deceived Maslamah by means of a trick that would shame even a woman. The Muslim army suffered what no army had suffered previously, to the extent that a soldier was afraid to leave camp by himself. They ate animals, skins, tree roots, leaves—indeed, everything [1317] except dirt. Meanwhile, Sulaymān, who was residing in Dābiq, was unable to send reinforcements due to the arrival of winter. This was the situation until Sulaymān died.[151]

In this year, Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik had the oath of allegiance taken to his son, Ayyūb b. Sulaymān, making him his heir apparent.[152]

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī b. Muḥammad: 'Abd al-

151. For the Byzantine perspective, see The Chronicle of Theophanes, 82–90.
152. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 43; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 175.

Malik had charged al-Walīd and Sulaymān to take the oath of allegiance on behalf of Ibn 'Ātikah,[153] and to Marwān b. 'Abd al-Malik after him.

According to Ṭāriq b. al-Mubārak: Marwān b. 'Abd al-Malik died during the Caliphate of Sulaymān, on his way out of Mecca, whereupon Sulaymān took the oath of allegiance on behalf of Ayyūb. He withheld (the nomination) from Yazīd, waiting for something bad to happen to him and hoping that he would die. But (it was) Ayyūb (who) died while he was heir apparent.

In this year, the city of the Slavs[154] was conquered.

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar: In the year 98/716–717, Burjān[155] attacked Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik when he was short of men. Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik dispatched either Mas'adah or 'Amr b. Qays with reinforcements, but the Slavs tricked them. Then God put them to flight after they had slain Sharāḥīl (b. 'Abd) b. 'Abdah.[156]

According to what has been claimed by al-Wāqidī, in this year al-Walīd b. Hishām and 'Amr b. Qays carried out a raid in which some soldiers from the army of Antioch were killed. Al-Walīd killed people living on the outskirts of Byzantium, taking many of them captive.

[The Conquest of Jurjān and Ṭabaristān][157]

In this year, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab raided Jurjān[158] and Ṭabaristān.[159]

---

153. Ibn 'Ātikah is Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, whose mother was 'Atikah bt. Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah b. Abī Sufyān.

154. The city of the Slavs was a city immediately beyond the Byzantine border. See *EI*², s.v. Slavs.

155. Burjān is the name of the most important Bulghār state and its inhabitants. See *EI*², s.v. Bulghār.

156. Sharāḥīl is Abū 'Āmir al-Sha'bī. The words within parentheses (b. 'Abd) are added by the Cairo ed.

157. The text lacks the rubric, which is supplied by the Cairo ed. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 319–20; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), II, 412–17; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 41; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 286–98; Maqdisī, Bad', VI, 42–43; FHA, 21–24; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 175–76; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 446–48.

158. Jurjān is a province situated at the southeastern corner of the Caspian Sea. See *EI*², s.v. Gurgān; Le Strange, Lands, 376–81.

159. Ṭabaristān is a Persian province north of Mount Alburz, called "the land of Ṭabar" because of the thick forests that cover the country. See EI, s.v. Ṭabaristān; Le Strange, Lands, 368–76.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab reached Khurāsān, where he remained for three or four months; then he advanced toward Dihistān[160] and Jurjān, sending his son, Makhlad, to serve (as deputy governor) over Khurāsān. When he reached Dihistān, which was inhabited by a tribe of Turks, he established himself there and besieged its inhabitants. With him were the armies of al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, and Syria, together with the leading men from the armies of Khurāsān and al-Rayy.[161] He had one hundred thousand soldiers, not including clients, slave soldiers, and irregular volunteers.[162] The Muslims attacked the enemy, quickly putting them to flight and causing them to return to their fortress. Later, they would emerge from time to time and fight with intensity. [1318]

Jahm and Jamāl, the two sons of Zaḥr, had a favored position with Yazīd, who honored them. Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Sabrah al-Ju'fī was an eloquent and courageous man, except for the fact that he used to corrupt himself with drink. However, it was not his custom to visit Yazīd and his household frequently. Perhaps the good influence they had on the two sons of Zaḥr, Jahm and Jamāl, kept him away. Now, when the herald would cry out, "O ye horsemen of God, mount up and rejoice at the good news," Muḥammad b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Abī Sabrah would be the first horseman from among the troops to hasten to the brunt of battle. One day, the call went out to the soldiers, and Ibn Abī Sabrah preceded all the others. He was standing on a mound when 'Uthmān b. al-Mufaḍḍal passed by him and said, "O Ibn Abī Sabrah, I have never been able to beat you to the muster." He replied, "What good is that to me, when you prefer the boys of the Madhḥij and ignore the worth of the elderly men of experience and prowess?" He said, "Had you wanted what we have, we would not have withheld from you what you deserve." [1319]

Our source continued: The troops went out and fought with

160. A rich agricultural region located to the north of the lower Atrek. Its capital, Akhūr, was a four-day journey to the north of Jurjān, on the road to Khwārazm. See *EI*², s.v. Dihistān; Le Strange, Lands, 379–80.

161. The capital of al-Jibāl; its ruins can be seen five miles south-southeast of modern Tehran. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 116–22; EI, s.v. Raiy; Le Strange, Lands, 214–17.

162. Text: wa-l-mutaṭawwi'īn. On these unpaid and/or irregular volunteers, see Crone, Slaves, 53.

intensity. Muḥammad b. Abī Sabrah attacked a Turk, whom the other soldiers had avoided. They exchanged blows, and the Turk's sword became fixed in Ibn Abī Sabrah's helmet. But Ibn Abī Sabrah struck him dead. Then he advanced, bloody sword in hand, with the Turk's sword stuck in his helmet, and the soldiers witnessed the finest spectacle that they had ever seen on the part of a horseman. When Yazīd saw the glitter of the two swords, the helmet, and the armor, he asked, "Who is that?" They answered, "Ibn Abī Sabrah." He said, "How excellent a father who gave birth to such a son![163] What a man he would be, were it not for the fact that he drinks to excess!"

Subsequently, Yazīd went out one day, seeking a place from which he might attack the enemy. Suddenly, a band of Turks attacked him from out of nowhere. With him at the time were the leading soldiers and their horsemen. He had approximately four hundred men, while the enemy had approximately four thousand. After fighting the Turks for a while, Yazīd's men said to him, "O Commander, leave and we will fight for you." But he refused. Yazīd himself engaged in the fighting on that day, like one of his soldiers. Ibn Abī Sabrah, the two sons of Zaḥr, al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah al-Khath'amī, and his most distinguished followers fought valiantly. Finally, when they wanted to leave, Yazīd put al-Ḥajjāj b. Jāriyah in charge of the rear guard; he fought those who were behind him until the others reached water, for they were thirsty. They drank, and the enemy moved away without gaining anything from them.

Sufyān b. Ṣafwān al-Khath'amī recited:

[1320] Were it not for Ibn Jāriyah, the white-faced one, you would have been given a bitter cup to drink.
He protected you with his horsemen and his horses until you reached water, unafflicted.

Then Yazīd persisted in the siege, stationing the troops on every side of the city,[164] thereby cutting off its supplies. When the Turks tired and were unable to fight the Muslims, for the 163. Text: lillāhi abūhu, which means, to God alone belongs the power to create the likes of this man from whom has proceeded this wonderful action. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 1, p. 11.

164. Probably the city of Dihistān.

siege and trial weighed heavily on them, Ṣūl, the dihqān[165] of Dihistān, sent to Yazīd, saying, "I will make peace with you on the condition that you provide safe-conduct for me, for the members of my household, and for my animals, in which case, I will deliver the city to you, together with its contents and its inhabitants." Yazīd made peace with Ṣūl, who submitted to him; he carried out the agreement. He entered the city and seized the animals, treasures, and numberless captives, and put to the sword fourteen thousand defenseless Turks. He wrote about this to Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik.

Then he set out, making his way to Jurjān. Now, it had been customary for the Jurjānīs to pay the army of al-Kūfah one hundred thousand, two hundred thousand, and sometimes even three hundred thousand (dirhams) in return for peace. These were the terms upon which they would make peace with them. When Yazīd came to them, they presented themselves to him with the peace treaty, for they regarded him with awe, and they offered him more than they were accustomed to paying. He appointed a man from the Azd by the name of Asad b. ʿAbdallāh as their governor.

Yazīd then entered the territory of the iṣpahbadh in Ṭabaristān, accompanied by laborers who cut down trees and smoothed the roads. Finally, they reached him, and Yazīd set up camp, besieging the iṣpahbadh and occupying his land. The iṣpahbadh sued Yazīd for peace, offering him more than it was his custom to pay. But Yazīd refused, hoping to conquer the land by force. One day, he sent out his brother, Abū ʿUyaynah, leading the armies of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah; he climbed into the mountains making his way toward the iṣpahbadh. Meanwhile, the iṣpahbadh had sent to Daylam, summoning additional military forces. The two armies met in battle, and the Muslims prevailed over them for a [1321] while, putting them to flight. When the chief of al-Daylam[166] came forward, challenging the Muslims, Ibn Abī Sabrah went out to engage him in combat and he slew him. The rout continued until the Muslims reached the opening of the mountain pass. As they began their ascent, the enemy soldiers, who were looking down on them, opened fire on them with arrows and stones. The soldiers fled from the opening of the mountain pass without suffering great losses, for the enemy did not have the strength to pursue them and search for them. But the Muslims began to press on one another, to the point that they began to fall over one another into the ravines, and the men rolled from the top of the mountain until they reached Yazīd's army, oblivious to their misfortune.[167]

165. The dihqān was the village head and a member of the lesser feudal nobility of Sassanian Persia who, after the Arab conquest, continued to be responsible for local administration and the collection of tribute. In Transoxiana, the local rulers were designated by the term dihqān. See *EI*², s.v. Dihḳān.

166. The chief of Daylam is identified by Kūfī (Futūḥ, VII, 290) as Sulaymān al-Daylamī.

Yazīd held his ground, unperturbed. Meanwhile, the iṣpahbadh wrote to the army of Jurjān, asking them to attack Yazīd's followers and to cut off his supplies and the roads between him and the Arabs, and promising to compensate them for their efforts. Accordingly, they fell upon the Muslims that Yazīd had left behind, slaying those that they could. The survivors assembled and fortified themselves in a secluded spot, where they remained until Yazīd rescued them. Yazīd continued to press against the iṣpahbadh in his land until he made peace with him in return for seven hundred thousand dirhams, four hundred thousand in cash,[168] two hundred thousand (garments),[169] four hundred donkeys loaded with saffron, and four hundred slaves; on the head of each slave, he requested a cloak, and on the cloak a scarf, a silver cup, and a piece of fine white silk[170]—previously they had sued for peace in exchange for two hundred thousand dirhams. Then Yazīd and his followers left, looking as if they had been defeated! Had it not been for the actions of the Jurjānīs, he would not have [1322] left Ṭabaristān until he had conquered it by force.

As for sources other than Abū Mikhnaf on the subject of the encounter between Yazīd and the Jurjānīs: According to Aḥmad b. Zuhayr—'Alī b. Muḥammad—Kulayb b. Khalaf and others: Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ[171] made peace with the people of Jurjān.[172] Subse-

167. Text: sharr, which may also mean "danger."
168. Text: naqdan. Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 176, has dīnārs.
169. The text states "two hundred thousand." Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 176, adds the word thawb, "garments."
170. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), II, 414.
171. Sa'īd b. al-'Aṣ died in 59/768–9. See EI, s.v. Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ.
172. For further details on the initial conquest of Jurjān, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), II, 411.

quently, however, they refused to pay and violated their treaty.[173] No Muslim went to Jurjān after Sa'īd, for they blocked that road. Indeed, no one could travel the Khurāsān road from that direction except in fear and dread of the Jurjānīs. This was the road to Khurāsān from Fārs[174] to Kirmān. The first person to traverse the road from Qūmis[175] was Qutaybah b. Muslim, when he became governor of Khurāsān. Then Maṣqalah raided Khurāsān, in the days of Mu'āwiyah, leading ten thousand soldiers. But he was slain when his army was in Rūyān,[176] which is adjacent to Ṭabaristān. They died in one of the wādīs of that region when the enemy attacked them in the mountain passes, killing all of them. Therefore, it is called "Maṣqalah's Wādī." Our source said: He is the one referred to in the proverb, "Until Maṣqalah returns from Ṭabaristān."[177]

According to 'Alī—Kulayb b. Khalaf al-'Ammī—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās al-'Ammī and Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah: Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ concluded a peace treaty with the people of Jurjān. Sometimes they would bring one hundred thousand (dirhams) and say, "This is our settlement." And sometimes two hundred thousand, and sometimes three hundred thousand. Sometimes they would pay one of these amounts; at other times they would refuse to pay. Then they refused to pay and violated the treaty.[178] They failed to pay the tribute until Yazīd b. al-Muhallab came to them, for no one opposed him when he reached Jurjān. When he made peace with Ṣūl and conquered al-Buḥayrah and Dihistān, he concluded a peace treaty with the people of Jurjān on the same terms they had received from Sa'īd b. al-'Āṣ. [1323]

According to Aḥmad—'Alī—Kulayb b. Khalaf al-'Ammī—Ṭu-

173. The text specifies wa-kafarū, which literally means "and they turned away from Islam." But since the Jurjānīs had not become Muslims upon payment of the poll tax, the word kafarū here should be taken in the sense of naqaḍū-l-'ahd, "they violated the treaty." I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

174. A Persian province bounded on the northwest by Khūzistān, on the northeast by Iṣfahān, on the east by Kirmān, and on the west and southwest by the Persian Gulf. See *EI*², s.v. Fārs; Le Strange, Lands, 248–98.

175. A small province lying to the south of the Alburz chain watershed between al-Rayy and Nishābūr. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳūmis; Le Strange, Lands, 264–68.

176. Rūyān was an independent district attached to Ṭabaristān. See EI, s.v. Rūyān; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 104–5; Le Strange, Lands, 373–74.

177. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), II, 411–12.

178. See note 173 above.

fayl b. Mirdās and Bishr b. ʿĪsā—Abū Ṣafwān[179]—ʿAlī said (I was told this also by Abū Ḥafṣ al-Azdī—Sulaymān b. Kathīr, and others): Ṣūl the Turk used to camp at Dihistān and at al-Buḥayrah, an island in the (Caspian) sea five farsakhs (30 km.) from Dihistān, both of which were part of Jurjān, on the side of Khwārazm. Ṣūl used to carry out raids against Fayrūz b. Qūl, the Marzubān of Jurjān—they were twenty-five farsakhs (150 km.) apart—during which he would kill their noble men and then return to al-Buḥayrah and Dihistān. Now, a dispute broke out between Fayrūz and one of his paternal cousins, who was called, "the Marzubān," as a result of which the Marzubān separated himself from Fayrūz and settled in al-Bayāsān.[180] Fearing that the Turks would carry out raids against him, Fayrūz set out for Yazīd b. al-Muhallab in Khurāsān. Meanwhile, Ṣūl seized Jurjān. When Fayrūz reached Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, the latter asked him, "Why have you come here?" Fayrūz replied, "I was afraid of Ṣūl, so I fled." Yazīd asked him, "Is there any stratagem we might use to fight him?" Fayrūz answered, "Yes, there is one thing which, if you attain it, either you will kill him or he will submit." Yazīd asked, "What is it?" Fayrūz counseled, "If he leaves Jurjān in order to establish camp in al-Buḥayrah, and then you come to him there and lay siege to the island, you will be victorious over him. Therefore, write a letter to the iṣpahbadh in which you ask him to trick Ṣūl by having him remain in Jurjān. Pay him something for this and promise him more. He will then send your letter to Ṣūl, seeking to ingratiate himself with him, because he regards him with great honor. As a result, Ṣūl will leave Jurjān and set up camp in al-Buḥayrah."

[1324] Yazīd b. al-Muhallab therefore wrote to the leader of Ṭabaristān: "I intend to carry out a raid against Ṣūl while he is in Jurjān, but I fear that if he learns of my intention he will leave for al-Buḥayrah and set up camp there. If he does go there, I will not be able to attack him. Now, he listens to you and considers you to be a faithful adviser. If you were to confine him in Jurjān this year, so that he would not go to al-Buḥayrah, I will convey to you fifty thousand mithqāls.[181] So devise some stratagem to keep him in Jurjān, for, if he stays there, he will be mine." When the iṣpahbadh saw the letter, he sought to ingratiate himself with Ṣūl by sending the letter to him. When the letter arrived, Ṣūl ordered the troops to depart for al-Buḥayrah; he loaded foodstuffs so that he would be secure there.

179. Text: Ṣafwān. The Cairo ed. specifies Abū Ṣafwān.
180. A village in Marw al-Shāhijān. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, I, 528.

Yazīd learned that Ṣūl had traveled from Jurjān to al-Buḥayrah; he determined to leave for Jurjān. He set out, leading thirty thousand men, accompanied by Fayrūz b. Qūl. He appointed Makhlad b. Yazīd as his deputy in Khurāsān, designated his son, Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd, as his deputy in Samarqand, Kiss,[182] Nasaf,[183] and Bukhārā, and appointed Ḥātim b. Qabīṣah b. al-Muhallab as his deputy in Ṭukhāristān.[184] He marched to Jurjān which, at that time, was not a city, but rather a locality surrounded by mountains, with gates and rugged roads[185]—when a man stood at one of the gates, no one could advance against him. Yazīd entered Jurjān without encountering any resistance and he captured great wealth. The Marzubān fled, and Yazīd set out, with his soldiers, for al-Buḥayrah, where he laid siege to Ṣūl.

When he attacked them, he recited:

The sword flashed and his hands trembled;
By him, himself, souls were saved.

Our source continued: He besieged them. Ṣūl would come out toward him during the day and fight, and then return to his fortress. With Yazīd were the armies of al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah.

Then he mentioned the story of Jahm b. Zaḥr and his brother, and Muḥammad (b. Abī Sabrah), more or less as was reported by

---

181. A unit of weight for gold, taken over by 'Abd al-Malik from the Roman solidus of the Constantinian system, equivalent to 65.6 grains or 4.25 grams. "Mithqāl" is used as a synonym for "dīnār." See EI, s.v. Mithḳāl.

182. A town near Samarqand. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 460.

183. A town in the district of Bukhārā. See EI, s.v. Nakhshab; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 285.

184. Ṭukhāristān was the region situated between Balkh and Badakhshān. See *EI*², s.v. Badakhshān.

185. See Balādhurī Futūḥ (Cairo), II, 413: "Surrounded by a wall of baked bricks that reached to the sea." See also Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 286; FHA, 21; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 29.

[1325] Hishām, except that he said, regarding the Turk's striking of Ibn Abī Sabrah: "The Turk's sword became caught in Ibn Abī Sabrah's shield."[186]

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—ʿAnbasah: Muḥammad b. Abī Sabrah fought the Turks in Jurjān. They surrounded him, taking turns against him with their swords. Three swords broke in his hand.

Then, returning to our original chain of transmission, our source said: They, that is, the Turks, were under siege for six months, during which time they would emerge, fight, and then return to their fortress.[187] Finally, they were reduced to drinking ground water, whereupon they were afflicted with a disease known as al-suʾād[188] and began to die. At this point Ṣūl sued for peace, but Yazīd b. al-Muhallab said, "No, not unless he submits to my rule." Ṣūl refused and sent a message to Yazīd, saying: "I will make peace with you on behalf of myself, my belongings, and three hundred members of my household and companions, on the condition that you provide safe passage for me. If you accept these terms, you may occupy al-Buḥayrah." Yazīd agreed to these terms, and Ṣūl emerged with his belongings and three hundred of his favorites and joined Yazīd. Then Yazīd put to the sword fourteen thousand defenseless Turks, letting the others go without killing any of them. The soldiers said to Yazīd, "Give us our stipends," so he summoned Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah al-ʿAmmī, saying, "O Ibn Ḥanẓalah, give us an account of al-Buḥayrah's wealth so that we may pay the troops." Idrīs entered al-Buḥayrah, but he was unable to estimate the value of its wealth. He said to Yazīd, "I am unable to assess its wealth because it is stored in receptacles. We will have to count the sacks, make a sign indicating the contents of each sack, and say to the soldiers, 'Enter and take.' In this way, when someone takes something, we will announce what he took, that is, wheat, barley, rice, sesame, and honey." At that, Yazīd said, "That is a good idea." They determined the 186. See text above, II/1319, where it is stated that the sword became stuck in Ibn Abī Sabrah's helmet.

187. Wellhausen argues that the siege could not have lasted six months. See Arab Kingdom, 447, n. 1.

188. A disease that attacks the liver as a result of drinking brackish water. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 4, p. 1462.

number of sacks, put a sign on each sack indicating its contents, and said to the soldiers, "Take." As each man left al-Buḥayrah, having taken clothing, food, or whatever could be carried away, the number of sacks he had taken would be recorded in his name. They took considerable amounts. [1326]

According to 'Alī—Abū Bakr al-Hudhalī: Shahr b. Ḥawshab,[189] who was in charge of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's coffers, was accused of stealing a leather purse.[190] Yazīd asked him about it, and Shahr brought it to him. Then Yazīd summoned the person who had made the accusation, rebuked him, and said to Shahr, "It's yours." Shahr said, "I have no need for it."

The following was recited by al-Quṭāmī al-Kalbī[191]—some say by Sinān b. Mukammal al-Numayrī:

Shahr sold his religion for a purse of leather.
Now who will trust the Qur'ān reciters[192] after you, O Shahr?
You received for it something insignificant and sold it to Ibn Jūnabūdh. Verily, this is perfidy.

Murrah al-Nakha'ī recited, with regard to Shahr:

O Ibn al-Muhallab, what did you have in mind for a man who,[193]
were it not for you, would have been an upright reciter (of the Qur'ān)?

According to 'Alī—Abū Muḥammad al-Thaqafī: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab acquired a crown in Jurjān in which there was a precious stone and he asked, "Do you know anyone who would not desire this crown?" They replied, "No." Yazīd then summoned Muḥammad b. Wāsi' al-Azdī and said, "Take this crown—it's yours." He said, "I have no need for it." Yazīd said, "I insist." So Muḥammad took it and left. Then Yazīd ordered someone to 189. Abū Sa'īd Shahr b. Ḥawshab al-Ash'arī (d. 111 or 112/730 or 731), a Syrian transmitter of ḥadīth. See Ibn Ḥajar al-'Asqalānī, Tahdhīb, IV, 369–72.

190. Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 176, adds: "With one hundred dīnārs in it."

191. Al-Ḥuṣayn b. Jammāl b. Ḥabīb al-Quṭāmī al-Kalbī, d. 101/720. See Sezgin, GAS, II, 339; and *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳuṭāmī.

192. Text: al-qurrā', which could also mean "officials." See note 408 below.

193. Text: mā aradta ilā-mri'in.

observe what he would do with the crown. Muḥammad met a [1327] beggar and gave it to him. Yazīd's agent took the beggar, brought him to Yazīd, and told him what had happened. Yazīd took the crown and gave the beggar a large sum of money in return.

According to ʿAlī: Every time that Qutaybah made a new conquest, Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik would say to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, "Don't you see what God is accomplishing through Qutaybah?" Yazīd would reply, "What about Jurjān, which separated the soldiers from the 'Main Road,'[194] and thus disrupted things in Qūmis and Abrashahr?"[195] Yazīd would also say, "These conquests are nothing. Jurjān is what counts." Thus, when Yazīd b. al-Muhallab became governor, his sole ambition was to conquer Jurjān. It is said: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab had one hundred and twenty thousand fighting men, including sixty thousand soldiers from the Syrian army.

According to ʿAlī—the one who mentioned the Jurjān report—on their authority, supplemented by ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—Khālid b. Ṣubayḥ: After Yazīd b. al-Muhallab made peace with Ṣūl, he had a great desire to conquer Ṭabaristān. Having resolved to travel there, he designated ʿAbdallāh b. al-Muʿammar al-Yashkurī as his governor in al-Bayāsān and Dihistān, leaving him with four thousand men. Then he advanced toward the nearest parts of Jurjān, adjacent to Ṭabaristān. He designated Asad b. ʿAmr—or b. ʿAbdallāh b. al-Rubʿah—as his governor in Andarastān,[196] which is adjacent to Ṭabaristān, leaving him with four thousand men. Then Yazīd entered the lands of the iṣpahbadh, who sent to him, suing for peace and asking him to leave Ṭabaristān. But Yazīd refused, [1328] for he hoped to conquer it by force. He then sent his brother, Abū ʿUyaynah, in one direction, his son, Khālid b. Yazīd, in another, and Abū al-Jahm al-Kalbī in a third, saying, "When you join forces, Abū ʿUyaynah is to be in command of the troops." Yazīd said to Abū ʿUyaynah, as the latter set out leading the armies of

194. Text: al-ṭarīq al-aʿẓam. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 287, has "Khurāsān" instead of "the Main Road."

195. Abrashahr, the ancient name of Nīshāpūr, was the capital of one of the four quarters of the province of Khurāsān. See *EI*², s.v. Abrashahr; also EI, s.v. Ṭūs; Le Strange, Lands, 383.

196. A village in Khwārazm, about one day's march south of Jurjāniyyah. See Le Strange, Lands, 453.

al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah, accompanied by Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah, "Take counsel with Huraym, for he is a faithful adviser." Yazīd remained in the camp.

The iṣpahbadh sought support from the people of Jīlān and al-Daylam, and they came to him. The two opposing armies met near the foot of a mountain.[197] The polytheists were put to rout, and the Muslims pursued them until they reached the mouth of the mountain pass. But when the Muslims entered the passageway, the polytheists climbed up into the mountains, pursued by the Muslims. The enemy then shot at them with arrows and stones, putting Abū 'Uyaynah and the Muslims to flight. They pressed on one another, falling over one another from the mountain, not stopping until they reached Yazīd's troops. At this point, the enemy gave up the chase.

The iṣpahbadh, fearing the Muslims, wrote to the Marzubān, the paternal cousin of Fayrūz b. Qūl, who was at the farthest reaches of Jurjān, adjacent to al-Bayāsān, saying, "We have slain Yazīd [sic] and his followers,[198] so kill the Arabs in al-Bayāsān." The Marzubān and his men joined the army of Bayāsān, having reached a consensus to kill the Muslims, who were (carelessly asleep) in their dwellings. They were all slain during a single night. 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'ammar was slain, together with four thousand Muslims—not one of them escaped; fifty of the Banū-l-'Amm were slain, among them al-Ḥusayn b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān and Ismā'īl b. Ibrāhīm b. Shammās. The Marzubān wrote to the iṣpahbadh that he should take control of the mountain passes and the roads.

When Yazīd learned that 'Abdallāh b. al-Mu'ammar and his followers had been slain, his men were distressed and frightened. Yazīd, therefore, sought the assistance of Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī, saying, "Do not let the misunderstanding between us prevent you from serving the Muslims.[199] We have heard the news from Jurjān, where that one (that is, the iṣpahbadh) has seized control of [1329]

197. Text: fī sanad jabal, "near the face of a mountain." The translation follows Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 31, who specifies fī safḥ jabal, "near the foot of a mountain."

198. Text: Yazīd wa-aṣḥābahu. Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), II, 413, has aṣḥāb Yazīd, "Yazīd's followers," which makes better sense.

199. The misunderstanding will be explained below.

the roads, so make peace." Ḥayyān agreed and approached the iṣpahbadh, saying, "I am one of you, even if religion has separated us.[200] I will give you good advice, for you are dearer to me than Yazīd. He has summoned reinforcements, and his soldiers are nearby. Since the Jurjānīs eliminated only one segment of his army, I am concerned that you will not be able to withstand him. So relieve yourself from him and make peace with him, for, if you make peace with him, he will turn his weapons against the Jurjānīs,[201] who deceived and killed many Muslims." The iṣpahbadh made peace with Yazīd, agreeing to pay seven hundred thousand dirhams.

According to 'Alī b. Mujāhid: The terms were five hundred thousand dirhams,[202] four hundred loads of saffron or their value in ready money, and four hundred slaves—each slave wearing a cloak and a scarf and carrying a silver vessel, a piece of silk cloth and a suit of clothes.[203]

Then Ḥayyān returned to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, saying, "Send some people to carry away the terms of the agreement that I have concluded with them." He asked, "Who is paying, we or they?" He replied, "They are." Yazīd, who would have been happy to give them whatever they asked for and return to Jurjān, sent some people to carry away the terms of the agreement that Ḥayyān had worked out with them, and he set out for Jurjān. Previously, Yazīd had penalized Ḥayyān two hundred thousand dirhams. This was why he feared that Ḥayyān would not provide him with good counsel.

The circumstances of his having penalized Ḥayyān in this manner were related to me as follows by 'Alī b. Mujāhid—Khālid b. Ṣubayḥ: I was serving as a tutor to Ḥayyān's son, when he summoned me, saying, "Write a letter to Makhlad b. Yazīd." Makh-[1330] lad, at that particular time, was in Balkh, while Yazīd was in Marw. I took up a scroll of papyrus, and he said, "Write: 'From Ḥayyān, the client of Maṣqalah, to Makhlad b. Yazīd.'" But Mu-

200. It is reported that Ḥayyān was originally from al-Daylam. See text above, II/1291.

201. Text: ṣayyara ḥaddahu 'alā ahl Jurjān. Kufi, Futūḥ, VII, 292, has yakūnu ḥarbuhu wa-saṭwatuhu 'alayhim, "His war and attack will be against them."

202. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 320, mentions seven hundred thousand dirhams.

203. See text above, II/1321, for another version of the agreement.

qātil b. Ḥayyān gestured to me, indicating, "Don't write that." Then he approached his father and said, "O my father! You write to Makhlad and yet mention yourself first!" He said, "Yes, my son, and if he does not like it he will suffer the same fate as Qutaybah." Then he said to me, "Write." So I wrote. He had Makhlad bring the letter to his father. This was why Yazīd made Ḥayyān pay two hundred thousand dirhams.

In this year, Yazīd reconquered Jurjān after the Jurjānīs had treacherously waylaid his army and broken the agreement.[204]

According to 'Alī—the group that transmitted to him the report about Jurjān and Ṭabaristān: Then, when Yazīd made peace with the army of Ṭabaristān, he headed for Jurjān. He swore to God that if he triumphed over them, he would neither loosen his hold on them nor raise the sword from them until he mixed blood into the wheat, made bread out of the mixture, and ate the bread.

When the Marzubān learned that Yazīd had made peace with the iṣpahbadh and was making his way toward Jurjān, he gathered his supporters and went to al-Wajāh,[205] where he fortified himself. Whoever controls al-Wajāh needs no reserves of food or water. Meanwhile, Yazīd arrived and surrounded the place, while the Marzubān and his men fortified themselves inside. Al-Wajāh was surrounded by dense thickets, so that only one way in and out was known. Yazīd maintained the siege for seven months[206] without making any progress against them, for he did not know of any way to approach them except from the one side. The Marzubān and his men would emerge during the day, fight, and then return to their fortress. Now, while matters were like this, it [1331] happened that a man—one of the Persians from Khurāsān who was with Yazīd—went out to hunt, accompanied by members of his Shākiriyyah corps.[207]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: One of his soldiers, from the tribe of Ṭayyi', went out to hunt and spotted an antelope climbing in the mountains. He followed it, saying to his companions, "Stay where you are." He climbed the mountain following the tracks. Suddenly he came upon their army, where-

204. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 320–21; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 41; FHA, 23.
205. Apparently, the name of a fortress in the mountainous region of Jurjān.
206. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 293–94, specifies "four months."
207. On this term, see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 496.

upon he turned back seeking his companions. Afraid that he would not be able to find his way back, he began to tear up his garment and tie markers on the trees. Finally, he reached his companions and then returned to the army camp. It is said: the man who was hunting was al-Hayyāj b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī, a resident of Ṭūs[208] and an avid hunter. When he returned to the army camp, he approached 'Āmir b. Aynam al-Wāshijī, who was the commander of Yazīd's guard. But they would not let him enter, so he cried out, "I have important information."

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: Finally, he brought the matter to the attention of the two sons of Zaḥr b. Qays, who took him and brought him to Yazīd. Al-Hayyāj gave him the report, and Yazīd gave him an assurance, confirmed by al-Juhaniyyah, a slave girl of his who had borne him a child,[209] to pay him an agreed-upon sum.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his companions: Yazīd called for al-Hayyāj and asked, "What information do you have?" He replied, "Do you want to enter Wajāh without a fight?" He said, "Certainly." He said, "What will you give me?" He said, "Name [1332] your price." He said, "Four thousand." He said, "You are entitled to blood payment (diyah)."[210] He said, "Give me four thousand now and whatever you give me later will be a gratuity." Whereupon Yazīd gave an order to pay him four thousand dirhams. Then he called out to his soldiers, fourteen hundred of whom responded. Al-Hayyāj said, "Due to the density of the thickets, the path will not bear such a large group." Yazīd therefore chose three hundred and sent them off under the command of Jahm b. Zaḥr.

Some sources said: He put his son, Khālid b. Yazīd, in command of them, saying, "You may be deprived of life, but you cannot be deprived of death.[211] God help you if I see you in my presence after having been put to flight." He sent Jahm b. Zaḥr along with him. Yazīd asked the man who called out to the sol-

208. A district in Khurāsān containing the towns of Nawqān and Ṭābarān. See EI, s.v. Ṭūs; Le Strange, Lands, 388–90.

209. See text above, II/1313, sub anno 97.

210. A specified amount of money (either one thousand dīnārs or twelve thousand dirhams), or goods, due in cases of homicide or other injuries unjustly committed upon the person of another. See *EI*², s.v. Diya.

211. Text: in ghulibta 'alā-l-ḥayāt fa-lā tughlibanna 'alā-l-mawt, that is, "Do not let fear of death dampen your courage."

diers, "When will you reach them?" He replied, "Tomorrow at noon, in the interval between the two prayers."[212] He said, "Go, with the blessing of God, and I will endeavor to engage them tomorrow at the time of the noon prayer." They set out. The next day, shortly before the time of the afternoon prayer, Yazīd ordered his men to set fire to some wood that he had collected and put into piles during the course of the siege. They set fire to the piles of wood, and before the sun had declined from the meridian, his army was surrounded by mountain-like flames of fire. When the enemy saw the fire, they were frightened by the magnitude of what they saw and they came out toward them. When the sun had declined from the meridian, Yazīd ordered his men to pray, and they combined the two prayers. Then they marched off toward them, and the two armies met in battle.

Meanwhile, the other contingent marched for the remainder of that day and the morrow, and attacked the Turk's army shortly before the time of the afternoon prayer. The Jurjānīs, engaged in combat with Yazīd on the one side, and, believing themselves to be secure on the other, did not sense anything until the moment when they heard the takbīr[213] behind them, whereupon they all headed for their fortress, with the Muslims in hot pursuit. They surrendered, submitting to Yazīd's rule. He captured their women and children and slew their soldiers, crucifying them at a distance of two *farsakh*s (12 km.) to the left and right of the road. He also drove twelve thousand of them to al-Andarhaz,[214] the Wādī of [1333]
Jurjān,[215] and said, "Whoever seeks blood revenge from them may slay whomever he wishes." A single Muslim slew as many as four or five men in the wādī, turning the wādī's water into blood. There was a millstone by the wādī, and Yazīd was able to mix blood into the ground wheat, thereby releasing himself from his oath.[216] He ground wheat, made bread, ate, and built the city of Jurjān.

Some sources said: Yazīd killed forty thousand of the people of 212. The noon and midday prayers.

213. The takbīr is the formula "God is great." See EI, s.v. Takbīr.
214. Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 321, has al-Andar rather than al-Andarhaz.
215. The Wādī of Jurjān is the modern Gurgān river. See *EI*², s.v. Gurgān; Le Strange, Lands, 376–77.
216. See text above, II/1330.

Jurjān. There had been no city there previously. Then he returned to Khurāsān, leaving Jahm b. Zaḥr al-Juʿfi as his governor of Jurjān.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad–Abū Mikhnaf: Yazīd summoned Jahm b. Zaḥr and sent four hundred men with him. They began with the place to which they had been directed, having been instructed by Yazīd as follows: "When you reach the city, wait until daybreak, then pronounce the takbīr and proceed toward the city gate. You will find me there, having already rushed all of the men to the gate." Accordingly, when Ibn Zaḥr entered the city he waited until the hour at which Yazīd had ordered him to attack and then ordered his men to advance. They slew every single one of the guards that they encountered and pronounced the takbīr. The inhabitants of the city were filled with terror the likes of which they had never experienced previously. All of a sudden they saw the Muslims with them in their city pronouncing the takbīr, which astonished them. God cast terror in their hearts until they didn't know in which direction they were turning. However, one group of men—not a large one—advanced toward Jahm b. Zaḥr, and the two sides fought for a while. Jahm's hand was broken, but he and his men held their positions; it was not long before they killed most of them. When [1334] Yazīd b. al-Muhallab heard the takbīr, he drove the soldiers toward the gate, where they found that the guards had been drawn away by Jahm b. Zaḥr; thus, there was no one there to keep Yazīd from entering, or to put up serious resistance. He stormed the gate and entered the fortress at that very hour. He brought out the soldiers that were inside and, after erecting palm trunks at a distance of two farsakhs (12 km.) to the right and left of the road, he crucified them over the course of four farsakhs (24 km.). Yazīd then captured the inhabitants of the fortress and took possession of its contents.

According to ʿAlī—his authorities: Yazīd wrote to Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik: "Now then, God has made a great conquest on behalf of the Commander of the Faithful and He has performed the greatest favor for the Muslims. Praise be to our Lord for His blessings and His kindness, for He has granted us victory, during the caliphate of the Commander of the Faithful, over Jurjān and Ṭabaristān—something which had escaped Sābūr Dhū al-Ak-tāf,[217] Kisrā b. Qubādh,[218] and Kisrā b. Hurmuz.[219] Likewise, al-Fārūq 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān, and the Caliphs of God who succeeded them were unable to achieve this, until God made this conquest on behalf of the Commander of the Faithful, in order to bestow His honor upon him, and in order to increase the blessing He has bestowed upon him. Now, I have in my possession the fifth[220] that God has bestowed upon the Muslims, after every man took the share of the booty to which he was entitled, which amounts to six million (dīnārs),[221] and I shall bring this to the Commander of the Faithful, if God wills."

But his scribe, al-Mughīrah b. Abī Qurrah, a client of the Banū Sadūs, said to him, "Do not mention a specific amount of money, for you will be caught between two possible responses: Either he will consider it to be a large sum of money, in which case he will order you to bring it to him; or he will express disdain for it[222] and confer it on you, in which case you will be obligated to make a gift. In the latter case, he will find whatever he receives from [1335] you to be insignificant.[223] It seems to me that you would risk all that you have named without impressing him. The amount you name will remain forever in their records as a debit against you. Thus, if someone assumes authority after him, he will claim it from you; furthermore, if the person who assumes authority does not favor you, he will not accept even twice that sum from you. Therefore, do not send your letter; rather, write about your victory and ask him for permission to appear before him so that you can speak to him directly about whatever you desire. But shorten your account, for it is more appropriate to abbreviate the account 217. Shāpūr II b. Hurmizd (A.D. 310–79) was called Dhū al-Aktāf because he had the shoulders of Arab prisoners dislocated or pierced. See EI, s.v. Shāpūr.

218. Khusraw I b. Kawādh (r. 531–79), a Sāsānian King of Persia, known in Persian sources as Anūshirvān (of the immortal soul). See EI, s.v. Sāsānians.

219. Khusraw II Parviz (The Victorious) b. Hurmizd (r. 590–628), a Sāsānian King of Persia. See EI, s.v. Sāsānians.

220. The khums is the share of God and the Prophet that is to be spent on the community as a whole. See *EI*², s.v. Bayt al-Māl.

221. The translation follows FHA, 24, where dīnārs are specifically mentioned. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 297, mentions "twenty million dirhams."

222. Text: sakhat nafsuhu laka bihi. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 35, has samaḥat nafsuhu laka bihi, "He will treat you generously regarding it."

223. Text: istaqallahu; the Cairo ed. has istaqbalahu: "He will accept it."

you wish to make than to exaggerate it." But Yazīd refused and he sent the letter.

Some said: The letter mentioned the figure of four million dirhams.[224]

Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year, Ayyūb b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik died.[225] According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—ʿAlī b. Mujāhid—a shaykh from al-Rayy who was a contemporary of Yazīd: After finishing with Jurjān, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab went to al-Rayy, where he learned of Ayyūb b. Sulaymān's death while he was walking in the vineyard of Abū Ṣāliḥ, near the gate of al-Rayy. A poet recited some rajaz verse[226] in his presence:

Although Ayyūb has died,
Dāwūd has taken his place,
Restoring whatever power had been lost.[227]

In this year, the city of the Slavs was conquered.[228]

In this year, Dāwūd b. Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik raided the land of the Byzantines and conquered "Ḥiṣn al-Marʾah,"[229] which is near Malaṭyah.[230]

In this year, the pilgrimage was led by ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd who, at that time, was governor of Mecca. I was [1336] informed of this by Aḥmad b. Thābit—on the authority of the one he mentioned—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar.

The governors of the garrison towns in this year were the same as in the year 97/715–716, as noted earlier, except that Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's governor over al-Baṣrah in this year was, according to some, Sufyān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Kindī.

---

224. Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), II, 414, mentions the figure of twenty-five million dirhams.

225. Ayyūb was the heir apparent. See text above, II/1317.

226. Rajaz verse is the simplest and, according to the tradition, the oldest meter of Arabic poetry. See *EI*², s.v. ʿArūḍ.

227. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 307.

228. See text above, II/1317, note 154. See also Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 321; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 44; FHA, 25.

229. See text above, II/1306, sub anno 97, note 126.

230. An old city, not far from the upper Euphrates, that served as headquarters for the summer campaign against Byzantium. See EI, s.v. Malaṭya; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, V, 192–93.

The Events of the Year

99

(AUGUST 14, 717—AUGUST 2, 718)

[The Death of Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik][231]

Among the events taking place that year was the death of Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik.[232] I was told on the authority of Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf, that he died in Dābiq, in the province of Qinnasrīn,[233] on Friday the nineteenth of Ṣafar (October 1, 717). Thus, his term of office was two years and eight months, less five days.

It is said that he died on the tenth of Ṣafar (September 22, 717).[234] According to some, his caliphate lasted two years and seven months, while others maintain that it lasted two years, eight months, and five days.

According to al-Ḥasan b. Ḥammād—Ṭalḥah Abū Muḥam-

231. The text lacks the rubric, which is supplied from the Cairo ed.

232. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 322; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 44; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 306; Masʿūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 173; FHA, 33–34; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 177–79.

233. One of the provinces of Syria. See *EI*², s.v. Ḳinnasrīn.

234. The discrepancy in the date is apparently due to confusion as to whether Sulaymān died ten days into the month of Ṣafar, or ten days before the end of the month. (Ṣafar has twenty-nine days.)

mad—his shaykhs: Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik served as caliph after al-Walīd for three years. ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz prayed over his body.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—his source—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar: Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik died on Friday the nineteenth of Ṣafar in the year 99 (October 1, 717). His caliphate lasted three years, less four months.

[1337] Aspects of His Character

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad: The people used to say, "Sulaymān is the key to goodness." When al-Ḥajjāj left them and Sulaymān assumed power he freed the captives, released the prisoners, treated the people well, and designated ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz as his successor.[235]

Ibn Bīḍ recited:

Your grandfather and your father both assumed the caliphate, amidst the anger of the malcontent, or the obedient one.[236]
Your grandfather and your father, then your brother became the third, and on your forehead is the light of the kingship of the fourth.

According to ʿAlī—al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab: I went in to see Sulaymān at Dābiq on Friday, and he called for some robes. He put them on, but he did not like them, so he called for others—for green Sūsī[237] robes that had been sent by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. After he put them on and arranged his turban, he asked, "O Ibn al-Muhallab, do you like them?" I replied, "Yes." He uncovered his forearms and said, "I am a king in the prime of his manhood." Then he prayed the Friday prayers for the last time. He wrote his last will and testament and summoned Ibn Abī Nuʿaym, the bearer of the seal, who sealed it.

According to ʿAlī—some of the scholars: One day Sulaymān

235. Sulaymān was called "the key to goodness" (miftāḥ-l-khayr) because his reign opened and closed with acts of goodness. See FHA, 17.

236. This is a conjectural translation. The text gives min bayna sukhṭati sākhiṭ aw ṭāʾiʿ.

237. Sūs was a town in Khūzistān famous for its weaving and silk. See EI, s.v. al-Sūs; Le Strange, Lands, 240.

put on a green robe and a green turban and he looked in the mirror and said, "I am a king in the prime of his manhood." He lived only one week after that.

According to 'Alī—Suḥaym b. Ḥafṣ: A slave girl belonging to Sulaymān looked at him one day, and he asked, "How do you like what you see?" She recited:

You are the best object of delight—if only you would last.
But man does not possess immortality.
I do not know of any blemish in you [1338]
that other people have, except that you will pass away.

He then unwound[238] his turban.

According to 'Alī: Sulaymān's qāḍī was Sulaymān b. Ḥabīb al-Muḥāribī. Ibn Abī 'Uyaynah used to tell stories in his presence.

According to Abū 'Ubaydah—Ru'bah b. al-'Ajjāj: Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik performed the pilgrimage, accompanied by the poets, myself included. When he was in Medina, on the way back, the troops came to meet him with approximately four hundred Byzantine prisoners. Sulaymān sat down and the person sitting closest to him was 'Abdallāh b. al-Ḥasan b. al-Ḥasan b. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. The Byzantine commander was brought forward, and Sulaymān said, "O 'Abdallāh, strike off his neck." 'Abdallāh stood up, but no one gave him a sword; eventually, one of the guards handed him his sword, and 'Abdallāh smote the commander, severing his head and cutting off his forearm and part of the chains. Sulaymān exclaimed, "By God, it is not because of the excellence of the sword that the stroke was exquisite, but because of his ancestry." Sulaymān continued to hand over the rest of the prisoners to the commanders and men for execution. Eventually, he gave one of the prisoners to Jarīr, into whose hand the Banū 'Abs thrust a sword sheathed in a white scabbard, whereupon he smote him and severed his head. Then one of the prisoners was given to al-Farazdaq, but he could not find a sword. Into his hand they thrust a crooked,[239] blunt sword that would not cut, and he smote the prisoner with it several times, but nothing happened. Sulaymān and the people laughed, and the Banū 'Abs, Sulaymān's

238. Text: fa-nafaḍa, "to shake off." This should be amended to read fa-naqaḍa. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

239. Text: matīn, "strong, solid"; read muthniyyan, following the Cairo ed.

maternal uncles, delighted in al-Farazdaq's misfortune. He threw down the sword and began to speak, making excuses to Sulaymān [1339] and recalling how the sword of Warqā' glanced off the head of Khālid:

If there was ever an unreliable sword, or a fate which delayed the soul of someone whose destiny has yet to arrive.
Then it is the sword of the Banū 'Abs; they struck with it, through the hand of Warqā', and it glanced off Khālid's head.
Such are the swords of India; sometimes their edges have no effect.
Although sometimes they cut necks.[240]

Warqā' is Warqā' b. Zuhayr b. Jadhīmah al-'Absī, who struck Khālid b. Ja'far b. Kilāb. Khālid was on top of Warqā's father, Zuhayr, smiting him with the sword and felling him. Warqā' b. Zuhayr approached and struck Khālid, but the blow had no effect, and so the former recited:

When I saw Zuhayr under Khālid's chest,
I approached, running, like a mother bereft of her child, hurrying.
May my right hand be paralyzed if I smite Khālid, and double armor protects him from me.[241]

Al-Farazdaq recited at the same session:

Are the people surprised that I made the best of them laugh,
God's Caliph, by whom rain is invoked?
The sword did not fail due to cowardice or bewilderment in the presence of the Imām; rather, his day was delayed by fate.
Had I struck his neck with the intent to kill,[242] his body would have fallen separated from his head.
[1340] (It would have rolled away from him when I smote him,

240. See Dīwān al-Farazdaq, I, 157.
241. See Aghānī (Beirut), XI, 84.
242. The text is 'alā 'Amrin. This should be amended to read 'amdan. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

like a stone that rolls off a slippery spot).[243]
The soul is not hastened before its preordained time of death by a two-handed grip, or by the sharp sword itself.[244]

Jarīr recited in connection with this:

With the sword of Abū Raghwān, the sword of Mujāshi', you struck. But you did not strike with the sword of Ibn Ẓālim.
You struck with it in the presence of the Imām, and your hands trembled. So they said, "That is an inexperienced sword, not a cutting one."[245]

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. 'Uyaynah—Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays: Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik attended a funeral in Dābiq at which the corpse was buried in a field. He picked up some of the soil and said, "How good and how fine is this soil!" Before a week or so had passed, he was buried next to that grave.

243. This verse, omitted by Ṭabarī, is supplied from Dīwān al-Farazdaq, I, 291, where the text has idhan tadahda' 'anhu ḥīna aḍribuhu kamā tadahdā 'ani-l-zuḥlūfati al-ḥajaru.

244. See Dīwān al-Farazdaq, I, 291.

245. See Naḳā'iḍ Jarīr wa-l-Farazdaq, I, 413, ll. 15–16.

The Caliphate of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz

The Events of the Year

99 (cont'd)

(AUGUST 14, 717–AUGUST 2, 718)[246]

In this year 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam was appointed as Caliph.[247]

The Reason Why Sulaymān Appointed 'Umar as Caliph[248]

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—al-Haytham b. Wāqid: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz was appointed as Caliph at Dābiq, on Friday, the tenth of Ṣafar, in the year 99 (September 22, 717).

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Dāwūd b. Khālid b. [1341]

246. For other sources on the caliphate of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, see Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 362–63; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 332; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 45–53; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 306–23; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 182–95; FHA, 37–64; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 184–219.

247. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 322; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 44–45; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 182; FHA, 37.

248. See Ibn Qutaybah, Ta'rīkh, I, 92–96; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 183; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 181–83.

Dīnār—Suhayl b. Abī Suhayl—Rajā' b. Ḥaywah:[249] On Friday, Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik put on green robes made of silk and looked in the mirror, saying, "By God, I am a king in the prime of his manhood." Then he went out to lead the people in the Friday prayers. Upon his return, however, he fell ill. When his condition deteriorated, he entrusted the succession, in a document he wrote himself, to one of his sons, a youth who had not yet attained puberty.[250] I said to him, "What are you doing, O Commander of the Faithful? One of the things that preserves a caliph in his grave is the appointment of an upright man[251] to serve as his successor over the Muslims." Sulaymān replied, "I will ask God for guidance, and I will consider the matter, for I have not made up my mind yet."

Sulaymān tarried a day or two and then tore up the document. He called for me and asked, "What is your opinion of Dāwūd b. Sulaymān?" I replied, "He is away in Constantinople, and you do not know whether he is dead or alive." He asked me, "Whom would you propose, then?" I replied, "The decision is yours, O Commander of the Faithful." I wanted to see whom he would mention. He asked, "What is your opinion of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz?" I replied, "By God, I know him to be a worthy, excellent man and a sincere Muslim." He said, "By God, he is exactly as you describe him." Then he said, "But if, by God, I appoint him and do not appoint anyone else, there will surely be civil strife, for (the Banū 'Abd al-Malik) will never allow him to rule over them, unless one of them is put next in succession." Now Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik was away at that moment on the pilgrimage. Sulaymān said, "Therefore, I will appoint Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik to be Caliph after him; that should placate them, and they will accept him." I said, "The decision is yours."

[1342] Then Sulaymān wrote, "In the name of God, the Merciful, the Compassionate. This is a document from the servant of God, 249. Abū al-Miqdām Rajā' b. Ḥaywah b. Khanzal al-Kindī (d. 112/730). On this figure see C. E. Bosworth, "Rajā' ibn Ḥaywa al-Kindī and the Umayyad Caliphs," 36–80. The translation of the following section, from p. 70 to p. 74, may be compared to that by Bosworth in the aforementioned article, pp. 52–59.

250. According to Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 332, Sulaymān's oldest son, Muḥammad, was twelve years old when his father died.

251. An allusion to 'Umar, who was known as al-rajul al-ṣāliḥ, "the upright man." See text below, II/1375.

Sulaymān, Commander of the Faithful, to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. I have appointed you to be my successor to the caliphate, and you are to be succeeded by Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. Therefore, hearken to him, O people, and obey; fear God and avoid dissension, lest enemies take advantage of you." He sealed the document and sent a message to Ka'b b. Ḥāmid al-'Absī, his Commander of the Guard, saying, "Order the members of my household to assemble." Ka'b ordered them to assemble, and they did so. After they had gathered, Sulaymān said to Rajā', "Take this document of mine to them, tell them that it is my document, and order them to swear the oath of allegiance to whomever I have appointed." Rajā' did as he was told. When Rajā' said that to them they asked, "May we go in to greet the Commander of the Faithful?" He replied, "Yes." They entered, and Sulaymān said to them, "This document"—to which he was directing their attention and at which they were looking, in the hand of Rajā' b. Ḥaywah—"is my succession covenant, so listen, obey, and swear allegiance to the person I have named in this document." Accordingly they swore allegiance to him, individually. Then the document was taken out, still sealed, in the hand of Rajā' b. Ḥaywah.[252]

Rajā' said: After they had dispersed, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz approached me and said, "I fear that Sulaymān has involved me in this matter. I beseech you by God, and by your deference to and your affection for me, let me know if this is the case so that I might ask to be excused now, before a situation develops in which I am unable to accomplish what I can accomplish at the present moment." Rajā' answered, "No, by God, I will not tell [1343] you a single word." Thus, 'Umar went away, furious.

Rajā' continued: Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik met me and said, "O Rajā', you have a long-standing feeling of deference to and affection for me, and I owe you a debt of gratitude, so tell me about this affair. If I have been appointed, I will be aware of it; and if someone else has been appointed, I can speak up, for a man like me cannot be sold short. Tell me, and I swear to you in the name of God that I will never mention anything about this." Rajā' said: But I refused, saying, "By God, I will not tell you a single word of what has been confided to me." Hishām departed in despair, striking one hand over the other and saying, "In favor of whom have I been passed over? Will the caliphate pass out of the hands of the sons of 'Abd al-Malik?"

252. The validity of this document, for which there were apparently no witnesses, was subsequently disputed by the jurists. See Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 197.

Rajā' said: I went in to see Sulaymān and found him dying. When the agony of death came over him, I set about turning him toward the qiblah, but whenever he recovered his senses he would say, "The time for that has not yet arrived, Rajā'." I did this twice, and on the third attempt he said, "Do it now, Rajā', if you wish to do something. I bear witness that there is no God but God and I bear witness that Muḥammad is His servant and His messenger."[253] I turned him toward the qiblah and he died. After shutting his eyes, I covered him with a green velvet coverlet and locked the door. His wife sent a messenger to me, asking, "How is he?" I replied, "He is sleeping and has covered himself." The messenger looked at him, wrapped in the coverlet. He returned and told her this report, which she accepted, imagining that he was asleep.

Rajā' said: I stationed a trustworthy man in front of the door [1344] and ordered him not to leave until I returned and not to let anyone go in to the Caliph. I left and sent a message to Ka'b b. Ḥāmid al-'Absī, who gathered the household of the Commander of the Faithful. When they had assembled in the mosque of Dābiq, I said, "Swear the oath of allegiance." They replied, "We have already sworn once. Why should we swear again?" I said, "This is the Commander of the Faithful's command, so swear allegiance, in accordance with his command, to the person named in this sealed document." They then swore the oath of allegiance a second time, individually.

Rajā' continued: When they had sworn the oath of allegiance after Sulaymān's death, and I realized that I had put the matter on a solid footing, I said, "Rise out of reverence for your master, for he has just died." They recited, "Surely we belong to God, and to him we return."[254] Then I read the document to them. When I reached the point at which 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz is mentioned, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik cried out, "We will never swear allegiance to him." I said, "By God, then I will cut off your head. Rise and swear allegiance." Reluctantly, he stood up.

253. That is, he died with credo of the faith (shahādah) on his lips.
254. Qur'ān 2:156.

Rajā' said: While he was reciting innā lillāhi on account of what had happened to him, I took 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz by the arms and seated him on the pulpit. At the same time Hishām was reciting innā lillāhi on account of what had escaped him. When Hishām finally reached 'Umar, the latter exclaimed, "'Surely we belong to God, and to Him we return,'[255] when what I dislike has come to me,"—because he did not want to become Caliph. Meanwhile, (Hishām) was reciting, "'Surely we belong to God, and to him we return,' when I have been passed over."

Sulaymān's body was washed and wrapped in a shroud, and 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz prayed over him. When the burial ceremony had been completed, the caliphal stable of animals was brought out to 'Umar: There were slow-paced horses, swift riding horses, and mules, each animal with its own groom. 'Umar asked, "What is this?" They replied, "The Caliph's stable." He said, "My own mount will suffice." Then 'Umar mounted it and, after [1345] those animals had been sent away, he departed.[256] Someone asked, "Will you occupy the Caliph's residence?" 'Umar replied, "The family of Abū Ayyūb (that is, Sulaymān) is still living there, and my own pavilion will suffice until they leave." He therefore remained in his own living quarters until they eventually vacated the Caliph's residence.

Rajā' said: On the evening of the same day, 'Umar said, "O Rajā', summon a scribe for me." I called one. Now up to this point I was pleased with everything that he had done, that is, the actions he had taken with regard to the riding animals and Sulaymān's residence. I said to myself, "How is he going to handle writing? Will he make drafts or what?" When the scribe had taken his seat, 'Umar dictated a single letter, directly from his mouth to the hand of the scribe, without any preliminary drafts. He dictated in the finest, most eloquent and most succinct manner possible. He then decreed that copies of the letter should be sent to every land.

---

255. Qur'ān 2:156.

256. Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 183, adds: "Then he rode to Damascus with the soldiers."

Meanwhile, 'Abd al-Azīz b. al-Walīd, who was away at the time, learned of the death of Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik. Since he was unaware of the fact that the people had sworn allegiance to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz and that Sulaymān had designated 'Umar as his successor, he unfurled the banner and summoned the people to acknowledge him as the next Caliph. Subsequently, when he learned that the people had sworn allegiance to 'Umar in accordance with Sulaymān's succession covenant, he went to see 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. 'Umar said to him, "I have been informed that you made your supporters swear the oath of allegiance to you and that you wanted to enter Damascus." 'Abd al-'Azīz replied, "Both of those things are true, but I only acted in that manner because I was told that the Caliph, Sulaymān, had not appointed a successor; I feared that the holdings of the treasury would be plundered." 'Umar said, "If the oath of allegiance had been sworn to you[257] and if you had taken power, I would not have opposed you; indeed, I would have remained in my house." 'Abd al-'Azīz said, "There is no one beside you that I would like to have seen assume power." He then swore the oath of allegiance to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. People invoked God's blessings upon Sulaymān because he appointed 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz as his successor and passed over his own children.[258]

[1346] In this year, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz sent a message to Maslamah, who was in Byzantine territory, ordering him to return together with the Muslims who were accompanying him.[259] 'Umar sent him swift and excellent horses and considerable quantities of food; he urged the people to render assistance to Maslamah and his men. According to some sources, the number of purebred horses that he sent to him was five hundred.

In this year, the Turks attacked Ādharbayjān,[260] killing a group of Muslims and causing serious damage.[261] 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz dispatched Ibn Ḥātim b. al-Nu'mān al-Bāhilī,[262] who killed those 257. Text: bāya'ta; read būyi'ta, following the Cairo ed.

258. See note 250 above.

259. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 326; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 307–11; FHA, 39; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 184.

260. Ādharbayjān was a Persian province. See *EI*², s.v. Ādharbaydjān; Le Strange, Lands, 159–71.

261. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 326.

262. Some sources give his name as 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Ḥātim, others as Ḥātim b.

Turks; only a small number managed to escape. He brought fifty of them as prisoners to 'Umar in Khunāṣirah.[263]

In this year, 'Umar dismissed Yazīd b. al-Muhallab from Iraq.[264] He sent 'Adī b. Arṭāt al-Fazārī to serve as governor of al-Baṣrah and its surrounding territory. He dispatched 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb al-A'raj al-Qurashī, one of the Banū 'Adī b. Ka'b, to serve as governor of al-Kūfah and its surrounding territory, accompanied by Abū al-Zinād, who was 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān's scribe. 'Adī b. Arṭāt sent Mūsā b. al-Wajīh al-Ḥimyarī in pursuit of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab.

In this year, the pilgrimage was led by Abū Bakr Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm, who was 'Umar's governor in Medina.

'Umar's governor in Mecca in this year was 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd. Al-Kūfah and its surrounding territory were governed by 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, while al-Baṣrah and its surrounding territory were governed by 'Adī b. Arṭāt. Khurāsān was governed by al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh. The judiciary of al-Baṣrah was in the charge of Iyās b. Mu'āwiyah b. Qurrah al-Muzanī. As mentioned earlier, 'Adī had initially appointed al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan,[265] but when the latter complained, he asked Iyās b. Mu'āwiyah to take charge of the judiciary. The judiciary of al-Kūfah in this year was reportedly in the charge of 'Āmir al-Sha'bī. [1347]

Al-Wāqidī had reported: Al-Sha'bī was in charge of al-Kūfah's judiciary in the days of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, serving on behalf of 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, while al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī was in charge of al-Baṣrah's judiciary, serving on behalf of 'Adī b. Arṭāt. But when al-Ḥasan asked 'Adī to excuse him from that office, the latter complied with his request and appointed Iyās in his place.

---

al-Nu'mān. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 326; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 47; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 43; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 183.

263. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 326; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 185. Khunāṣirah is a settlement located sixty km. to the southeast of Aleppo and one hundred km. to the northeast of Ḥamāh where 'Umar had a stronghold constructed in which he resided frequently. See *EI*², s.v. Khunāṣira.

264. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 326; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 46; FHA, 39–40.

265. That is, Abū Sa'īd b. Abī al-Ḥasan Yasār al-Baṣrī, known as Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, d. 110/728. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥasan al-Baṣrī.

The Events of the Year

100

(August 3, 718—July 23, 719)

Among those events was the revolt of the Khārijites,[266] who rebelled against 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz in Iraq.[267]

The Revolt of the Khārijites

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—Ibn Abī al-Zinād: The Ḥarūriyyah[268] in Iraq rose up in rebellion, and 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb, his governor in Iraq, ordering him to summon the rebels to act in accordance with the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet.[269] When they ignored his summons,[270] 'Abd al-Ḥamīd sent an [1348]

266. The Khārijites were members of the earliest religious sect in Islam. See *EI*², s.v. Khārijites.

267. See Ibn Qutaybah, Ta'rīkh, I, 99–100; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 190–93; FHA, 41–47; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 187.

268. That is, the Khārijites, who are also known as the Ḥarūriyyah, after a town two miles from al-Kūfah, where they first assembled. See *EI*², s.v. Khārijites.

269. Text: al-'amal bi-kitāb allāh wa-sunnat nabīhi. On the significance of this phrase, see Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, 62.

270. Text: fa-lammā a'dhara fī du'ā'ihim.

army against them, but it was defeated by the Ḥarūrīs. Upon being informed of this, 'Umar sent Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik against them leading a regiment of the Syrian army that he had equipped in al-Raqqah.[271] 'Umar wrote to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd as follows: "Having learned of the defeat of your army—the evil army—I have dispatched Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik, who is to be given free access to the rebels." Maslamah engaged them in battle, leading the Syrian army, and it was not long before God granted him victory over them.

Abū 'Ubaydah Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā mentioned that the person who headed the revolt against 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, in Iraq, during the caliphate of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, was Shawdhab—his real name was Bisṭām—one of the Banū Yashkur. His rebellion was based in Jūkhā,[272] where he commanded eighty horsemen,[273] most of them from the tribe of Rabī'ah. 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, saying, "Do not engage them in combat unless they shed blood or[274] cause corruption in the earth. But if they do act in that manner, intervene so as to prevent that. Choose a man who is strong and endowed with good judgment and send him against them with a detachment of soldiers, having charged him as I have commanded you." As a result, 'Abd al-Ḥamīd put Muḥammad b. Jarīr b. 'Abdallāh al-Bajalī in command of two thousand Kūfans, charging him as he had been charged by 'Umar.

Meanwhile, 'Umar wrote to Bisṭām, summoning him and asking him about his revolt. Bisṭām received 'Umar's letter after Muḥammad b. Jarīr had arrived and deployed his troops opposite him, without, however, engaging him in combat or provoking him. 'Umar's letter to Bisṭām contained the following statement: "I have been informed that you have rebelled in anger for the sake of God and His Prophet. But you have no better right to that than I do. Come to me, then, so that I may discuss the matter with you:

271. Capital of Diyār Muḍar in al-Jazīrah, on the left bank of the Euphrates. See EI, s.v. Raḳḳa; Le Strange, Lands, 101–3.

272. A district in the Sawād of Baghdad, between Khāniqīn and Khūzistān. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 179; Morony, Iraq, 137ff. According to Mas'ūdī, the revolt took place in al-Jazīrah. See Murūj (Beirut), II, 190.

273. It is also reported that Bisṭām commanded either three hundred or six hundred horsemen. See FHA, 47.

274. Text: aw. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 45, has wa, "and."

[1349] if we are in the right, you will join (the community) in what the people (believe); but if you are in the right, we will reconsider our position."[275] As a result, Bisṭām did not engage the Caliph's forces in combat and he wrote to 'Umar, saying, "You have been fair, and I am therefore sending you two men who will confer and debate with you."

According to Abū 'Ubaydah: One of the two men who were sent by Shawdhab to 'Umar was Mamzūj, a client of the Banū Shaybān,[276] and the other was a descendant of the Banū Yashkur.

Our source continued: It is reported that Bisṭām sent a group of men that included the aforementioned two, but that 'Umar sent a message to the group calling upon them to choose two men. They chose these two, who then went in to visit 'Umar. They engaged him in debate, saying, "Tell us about Yazīd. Why do you acknowledge him to be your successor as Caliph?"[277] 'Umar replied, "Someone else appointed him as my successor." They said, "Consider the following case: Suppose you were administering some property that belonged to someone else and you then entrusted it to someone who was unreliable. Do you think that you would have conveyed the trust to its owner?"[278]

'Umar said, "Give me three days," and the two men left. The Banū Marwān[279] were afraid that 'Umar would confiscate the properties that they owned and administered and that he would renounce Yazīd; therefore, they had someone poison his drink. He died less than three days after the two men left him.[280]

---

275. A longer version of 'Umar's letter is cited in FHA, 41–42.

276. Some sources give the client's name as 'Āṣim and indicate that he was an Ethiopian. See Mas'ūdī Murūj (Beirut), III, 190; FHA, 43.

277. For longer versions of this debate, see Ibn Qutaybah, Ta'rīkh, I, 99–100; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 191–92; FHA, 43–46; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 45–47.

278. Text: a-turāka kunta addayta al-amānah ilā man ītamanaka. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 48, has a-tarāhu addā-l-ḥaqq alladhī yalzamuhu lillāhi aw tarāhu qad salama, "Do you think that he fulfilled the obligation incumbent upon him (in the eyes) of God, or do you consider him blameless?" See also FHA, 46.

279. The Banū Marwān were the descendants of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, the fourth Umayyad Caliph and father of the Marwānid branch of the Umayyad family. See EI, s.v. Marwān b. al-Ḥakam.

280. It is also reported that one of the two messengers acknowledged the validity of 'Umar's arguments and stayed with the Caliph, who awarded him a stipend; and that 'Umar died not three, but fifteen days later. See Ibn Qutaybah, Ta'rīkh, I, 100; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 192–93; FHA, 47; and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 48. The claim that 'Umar was poisoned by the Marwānids was discounted by Well-

In this year, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz sent al-Walīd b. Hishām al-Mu'ayṭī and 'Amr b. Qays al-Kindī, from the army of Ḥimṣ,[281] on the summer campaign.

In this year, 'Umar b. Hubayrah al-Fazārī went to al-Jazīrah[282] in order to serve as 'Umar's governor over that province.

In this year, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was transported from Iraq to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz.[283]

The Capture of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab [1350]

The biographers disagree on this subject. According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: When Yazīd b. al-Muhallab made his way to Wāsiṭ and then embarked on ships with the intention of sailing to al-Baṣrah, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz sent 'Adī b. Arṭāt to al-Baṣrah to serve as governor. 'Adī dispatched Mūsā b. al-Wajīh al-Ḥimyarī, who arrested Yazīd after overtaking him at the Baṣrah bridge of the Ma'qil Canal.[284] 'Adī sent Yazīd to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz in the custody of Mūsā b. al-Wajīh. When the prisoner arrived, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz summoned him. Now 'Umar, who detested Yazīd and his household, used to say, "They are tyrants, and I do not approve of people like them." Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, likewise, hated 'Umar and used to say, "I suspect that he is a hypocrite." But when 'Umar came to power Yazīd learned that 'Umar was anything but a hypocrite. 'Umar summoned Yazīd and asked him about the moneys that the latter had mentioned in his letter to Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik.[285] Yazīd replied, "You know what my position was in the eyes of Sulaymān. I wrote to Sulaymān only in order to augment his reputation among the people; I knew that Sulaymān would not hold me accountable for something that I said (and I did not fear that he would treat me) in an hausen (Arab Kingdom, 311), but more recently supported by Crone and Hinds (God's Caliph, 76–77).

281. Ḥimṣ is a town (Ḥoms) in Syria on the eastern bank of the Orontes; it is situated midway along the route joining Aleppo and Damascus. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥimṣ.

282. The northern part of the territory situated between the Tigris and the Euphrates. See *EI*², s.v. al-Djazīra; Le Strange, Lands, 86–114.

283. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 326; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 46; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 311–22; FHA, 47–50; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 188.

284. A canal in al-Baṣrah named after Ma'qil b. Yasār al-Mazanī. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 323–24.

285. See text above, II/1334–35, sub anno 98.

unpleasant manner."[286] 'Umar said to him, "I see no alternative in your case but to put you in prison. Fear God and hand over whatever is in your possession, for it belongs to the Muslims and it is not in my power to abandon it." The Caliph returned Yazīd to his place of confinement.[287] Then he sent a message to al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī,[288] ordering him to leave for Khurāsān (where he would serve as governor).

Meanwhile, Makhlad b. Yazīd advanced from Khurāsān, dis-[1351] tributing stipends to the soldiers and bestowing large sums of money on the inhabitants of every district through which he passed. Then he left Khurāsān and made his way to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. When he went in to see the Caliph, he praised God and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, God has favored the Muslim community by putting you in charge. But we (that is, the Muhallabids) have been smitten by you. Let us not be reduced to the utmost destitution on account of your taking power. On what grounds have you imprisoned this old man? I will take responsibility for whatever he owes. Make an agreement with me for (part of) the amount that you are asking from him." 'Umar said, "No, not unless you take responsibility for the entire amount that we seek from him." He replied, "O Commander of the Faithful, if you have clear proof, produce it, but if you do not have clear proof, accept what Yazīd says as the truth. If you do not believe him, ask him to swear the oath; if he refuses to swear, work out a compromise with him." 'Umar said to him, "I have no alternative but to hold him accountable for the entire sum of money." When Makhlad left, 'Umar said, "I prefer him to his father." But Makhlad died shortly thereafter. Thus, when Yazīd refused to give any of the money to 'Umar, the latter had him dressed in a wool garment and placed on a camel. Then he said, "Take him to Dahlak."[289] When Yazīd had been taken out and paraded in front

286. Text: wa-lā bi-amrin akrahuhu. I suspect that the text is defective here. My translation follows Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 318: wa-lā kuntu akhāfu an ya'tiyanī min qibalihi amrun akrahuhu.

287. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 49, adds: "in the fortress of Aleppo."

288. Abū 'Uqbah al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī, an Umayyad general, called "hero of Islam" and "cavalier of the Syrians." See *EI*², s.v. al-Djarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh; Crone, Slaves, 132, no. 16.

289. A group of islands off the west coast of the Red Sea, opposite Eritrea; Dahlak al-Kabīr, one of the largest islands, was used as a place of exile or prison by the Umayyad caliphs. See *EI*², s.v. Dahlak.

of the soldiers, he exclaimed, "Have I no kinsmen? Why should I be transported to Dahlak? Only sinners, disquieters, and thieves are sent to Dahlak. Praise be to God! Have I no kinsmen?" Then Salāmah b. Nu'aym al-Khawlānī approached 'Umar and said, "O Commander of the Faithful, send Yazīd back to his place of confinement, for I fear that if you send him away, his tribe will attempt to recover him. Indeed, I know that his tribe is angry on his behalf."[290] 'Umar therefore sent him back to prison. And it happened that Yazīd was still in prison when he learned that 'Umar had taken ill. [1352]

As for sources other than Abū Mikhnaf: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to 'Adī b. Arṭāt, ordering him to arrest Yazīd b. al-Muhallab[291] and deliver him to the soldiers at 'Ayn al-Tamr. 'Adī b. Arṭāt sent Yazīd with Wakī' b. Ḥassān b. Abī Sūd al-Tamīmī, bound in chains, on a boat. When he had been brought as far as the Abān Canal,[292] some men from the tribe of Azd confronted Wakī' in an effort to seize Yazīd. But Wakī' leapt down, drew his sword and cut the ship's cable. Then he took Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's sword and swore a weighty oath[293] to the effect that he would strike off Yazīd's head unless they dispersed. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab called out to them, informing them of Wakī''s oath, whereupon they dispersed. Wakī' proceeded until he had delivered Yazīd to the soldiers at 'Ayn al-Tamr, and he then returned to 'Adī b. Arṭāt. The soldiers who were at 'Ayn al-Tamr took Yazīd b. al-Muhallab to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who threw him into prison.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz dismissed al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh from Khurāsān, replacing him with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al-Qushayrī.[294] Al-Jarrāḥ's term of office in Khurāsān had been one year and five months; he had

290. Text: qad ghaḍibū lahu. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 50, has qad 'aṣabū lahu, "has rallied to his defense."

291. Text: bi-tawjīh Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 48, has bi-infādh Yazīd b. al-Muhallab ilayhi mūthaqan, "to deliver Yazīd b. al-Muhallab to him in shackles."

292. The Abān Canal, below Wāsiṭ, was one of the navigable waterways by means of which the Tigris flowed into the Great Swamp. See Le Strange, Lands, 40–41.

293. Literally: "On the condition that he divorce his wife."

294. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 524; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 46–47; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 188.

gone there in the year 99/717–718 and left toward the end of the month of Ramaḍān in the year 100 (March 27–April 25, 719).

The Dismissal of al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh

The reason for this, according to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Kulayb b. Khalaf—Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah and al-Mufaḍḍal—his grandfather and [1353] 'Alī b. Mujāhid—Khālid b. 'Abd al-'Azīz: When Yazīd b. al-Muhallab left Jurjān, he designated Jahm b. Zaḥr as governor of that province.[295] But when Yazīd's fate took a turn for the worse,[296] the governor of Iraq sent someone from Iraq to serve as governor of Jurjān. The (new) governor approached Jurjān from the direction of Iraq, but Jahm b. Zaḥr seized him, together with a group of men who had accompanied him, and bound them in shackles. Then Jahm set out, leading fifty of the Yaman, headed for al-Jarrāḥ in Khurāsān, whereupon the people of Jurjān released their governor from prison. Al-Jarrāḥ said to Jahm, "Were it not for the fact that you are my paternal cousin, I would not have allowed you to do that." To which Jahm replied, "Were it not for the fact that you are my paternal cousin, I would not have come to you" (Jahm was related to al-Jarrāḥ by ties of marriage, since their respective wives were the daughters of Ḥuṣayn b. al-Ḥārith; the two men were also paternal cousins, because their respective fathers, al-Ḥakam and Ju'fī, were the sons of Sa'd). Al-Jarrāḥ said to Jahm, "You have defied your Imām and risen up in rebellion. Carry out a raid; perhaps, if you are successful, you can improve your position with your Caliph." He therefore sent him toward Khuttal.[297] Jahm left and, upon approaching them, he traveled in disguise together with three men, having left in command of his army his paternal cousin, al-Qāsim b. Ḥabīb, who was also the husband of his daughter, Umm al-Aswad. When he finally made his way into the presence of the leader of the Khuttal, he said to him, "Come with me so that we can speak privately." They met privately. Jahm claimed to be the son of so-and-so, whereupon the leader of the Khuttal came down from his throne and gave him whatever he needed. They say: The Khuttal are the clients of al-Nu'mān; thus, he acquired booty.

295. See text above, II/1333, sub anno 98.

296. Text: fa-lammā kāna min amri Yazīd mā kāna. The reference is to Yazīd's imprisonment.

297. A region on the right bank of the Oxus River, lying between the Wakhsh and the Panj Rivers. See *EI*², s.v. Khuttalān.

Al-Jarrāḥ then wrote to 'Umar. He also sent a delegation that included two Arab tribesmen and a client of the Banū Ḍabbah. The latter went by the patronymic of Abū al-Ṣaydā' and his name was Ṣāliḥ b. Ṭarīf; he was virtuous in matters of religion. According to one source: The client was Sa'īd, the brother of Khālid or Yazīd al-Naḥwī. The two Arab tribesmen spoke, while the other delegate remained in his seat. 'Umar asked him, "Are you not a [1354] member of the delegation?" He replied, "Yes, I am." He said, "Then what prevents you from speaking?" He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, there are twenty thousand clients who make raids without receiving any stipend or allowance, and there are a similar number of 'protected people' [ahl al-dhimmah][298] who have converted to Islam, yet are still made to pay the tribute. Our governor is a partisan of the Arabs, a rough man who stands on the pulpit and proclaims, 'I come to you out of solicitude. Today, I am a partisan of the Arabs and, by God, one man from my tribe is dearer to me than a hundred men who are not.' His harshness reached the point that the sleeve of his coat of mail is equal in value to one-half of another's coat of mail.[299] He is, after all,[300] one of the swords of al-Ḥajjāj, who committed acts of tyranny and oppression." 'Umar said, "Let them send messengers like you."

'Umar then wrote to al-Jarrāḥ, saying, "Whoever prays with you in the direction of the qiblah is to be relieved of the poll tax." As a result, many people hastened to accept Islam. Someone said to al-Jarrāḥ, "The people are rushing to accept Islam in order to avoid the poll tax, so test them by requiring that they submit to circumcision." Al-Jarrāḥ conveyed this suggestion to 'Umar, who wrote back, "God sent Muḥammad in order to summon people to Islam, not to circumcise them."

'Umar said, "Find me a trustworthy man who can advise me about the situation in Khurāsān." Someone replied, "You have already found him. You must summon Abū Mijlaz." 'Umar then wrote to al-Jarrāḥ, saying, "Come here and bring Abū Mijlaz with you. Put 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al-Ghāmidī in charge of military affairs in Khurāsān and put 'Ubaydallāh—or 'Abdallāh—b. Ḥabīb in charge of fiscal affairs."

298. That is, non-Muslim adherents of a revealed religion. See EI[2], s.v. *Dh*imma.
299. Text: yablaghu niṣf dir'ihi. The translation is conjectural.
300. Text: ba'du. The reading yu'addu, "He is considered," is also possible.

Al-Jarrāḥ then addressed the soldiers, saying, "O army of Khurāsān, I came to you wearing the clothes that are on my back and riding my own horse. I have not taken any of your wealth, except for the ornamentation on my sword." Indeed, he had noth-[1355] ing except a horse and a she-mule whose faces had turned white. He set out in the month of Ramaḍān (March 27–April 25), leaving 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym as his deputy. When he arrived, 'Umar asked him, "When did you set out?" He replied, "In the month of Ramaḍān." He said, "Whoever described you as being coarse spoke the truth! Why didn't you wait there until you had broken the fast before setting out?" Al-Jarrāḥ used to proclaim, "By God, I am a partisan of the Arabs who travels during Ramaḍān in order to promote the cause of the Arabs."[301]

Now, when al-Jarrāḥ first arrived in Khurāsān, he had written to 'Umar, saying, "I have reached Khurāsān and found people who have become arrogantly seditious, leaping and bounding in mischief. There is nothing that they would like better than to revolt so that they might withhold what they owe God. Nothing will check them except the sword and whip, but I would not want to undertake that without your permission." 'Umar wrote back, saying, "O son of the mother of al-Jarrāḥ, you desire sedition even more than they do! Do not apply the whip to a believer or to one of the tributaries unless he deserves it and do not inflict punishment, for you will arrive in the presence of one who 'knows the treachery of the eyes and what the breasts conceal'[302] and you will recite a Book 'that leaves nothing behind, small or great, but it has numbered it.' "[303]

When al-Jarrāḥ was preparing to leave Khurāsān on his way to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, he took twenty thousand dirhams—according to some sources: ten thousand—from the Public Treasury and said, "I am borrowing this until I turn it over to the

301. Text: 'aṣabī 'aqabī yurīdu min al-'aṣabiyyah. The translation is conjectural.

302. Qur'ān 40:20.

303. Qur'ān 18:49.

Caliph." He reached 'Umar, who asked him, "When did you set out?" He replied, "At the end of the month of Ramaḍān. I owe money, so settle the debt."[304] He said, "Had you set out after you broke the fast, I would have settled it for you." As a result, his kinsmen paid for him out of their stipends.

'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz Appoints 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh al-Qushayrī over Khurāsān [1356]

The reason for this, according to what was reported to me: al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh was dismissed from his position in Khurāsān at the time that the complaint was lodged against him. He was summoned by 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz and went to see him, as I have already reported above.[305]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Khārijah b. Muṣ'ab al-Ḍabbī and 'Abdallāh b. al-Mubārak, and others: Then, when 'Umar wanted to appoint someone as governor of Khurāsān, he said, "Find me a trustworthy man who might advise me about conditions in Khurāsān." Someone said to him, "Abū Mijlaz Lāḥiq b. Ḥumayd." The Caliph wrote a letter summoning Abū Mijlaz, who came to him. Abū Mijlaz, who was not the type of man who stands out in a crowd, went in to see 'Umar, together with a group of people. But 'Umar did not recognize him, and he left with the other men. Later, when 'Umar asked about him, he was told, "He entered with the group of men and then left." 'Umar then summoned him and said, "O Abū Mijlaz, I did not recognize you." He responded, "When you failed to recognize me, why didn't you ask about my identity?" He said, "Tell me about 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh." He said, "He rewards those who are competent but treats enemies with hostility. He is a military commander who acts independently and will advance boldly if he finds supporters." 'Umar asked, "What about 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym?" He replied, "Soft, flexible, forgiving, and gentle."[306] 'Umar said, "I prefer the one who is

304. Text: wa-'alayya dayn fa-qḍihi. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 524, where the text is kāna 'alayhi dayn fa-qaḍāhu, which Murgotten (Origins, II, 197) translates as "'Umar owed him a debt, but paid him."

305. See text above, II/1352–55.

306. Text: ta'attā lahu. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 52, has wa-l-ta'annī. The two verbs are synonymous.

forgiving and gentle." He therefore put 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym in charge of prayer and military affairs and 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī—he was one of the Banū al-A'war b. Qushayr—in charge of the fiscal administration. 'Umar wrote to the army of Khurāsān as follows: "I have put 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym in charge of your military affairs and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh in charge of your fiscal administration, not on the basis of any personal knowledge of them and without choosing them from a list of candidates, but rather on the basis of what was reported to me about them. If you [1357] are satisfied with them, praise God; but if they act in a manner that displeases you, seek help from God, for there is no power and no strength, save in God."

According to 'Alī—Abū al-Sarī al-Azdī—Ibrāhīm al-Ṣa'īgh: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym as follows: "Now then, if you are a sincere servant of God with regard to His servants, no reproach that anyone might utter will have any effect on you in the cause of God, for God is closer to you than the people are, and what you owe Him is greater than what you owe them. Do not commission anything in the affairs of the Muslims except that which is known to be good for them and that which promotes their welfare, and be faithful to what is entrusted to you. Beware lest you incline toward anything but what is right, for the unseen is not concealed from God.[307] And do not walk along a path that leads away from God, for there is no refuge from God, except with Him."

According to 'Alī—Muḥammad al-Bāhilī—Abū Nuhayk b. Ziyād and others: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz sent the document of appointment in which he put 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym in charge of military affairs in Khurāsān and Sijistān[308] in the hands of 'Abdallāh b. Ṣakhr al-Qurashī. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym was still in office in Khurāsān when 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz died, and he remained in office until Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was slain, at which time Maslamah appointed Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam.[309] Thus, 'Abd al-Raḥmān's term of office was more than a year and a half; he took office in the month of Ramaḍān in 307. See Qur'ān 69:18.

308. The border district between Persia and Afghanistan. See *EI*², s.v. Sistān; Le Strange, Lands, 334–51.

309. That is, Sa'īd Khudhaynah. See text below, II/1417ff., sub anno 102.

the year 100 (March 27–April 25, 719) and was dismissed in the year 102/720–721, after Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was slain.

According to 'Alī: 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym's term of office in Khurāsān was sixteen months.

The Beginning of the Da'wah[310] [1358]

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year, that is to say, the year 100/718–719, Muḥammad b. 'Alī b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abbās sent Maysarah[311] from the land of the Sharāt[312] to Iraq, and he[313] sent Muḥammad b. Khunays, Abū 'Ikrimah al-Sarrāj, that is, Abū Muḥammad al-Ṣādiq,[314] and Ḥayyān al-'Aṭṭār, the maternal uncle of Ibrāhīm b. Salamah, to Khurāsān. At that time, Khurāsān was governed by al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī, on behalf of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. Muḥammad b. 'Alī ordered them to recruit for him and for the members of his household. They met with certain people and then departed, bearing letters to Muḥammad b. 'Alī from those people who had responded to their call. They conveyed these letters to Maysarah, who sent them on to Muḥammad b. 'Alī. Abū Muḥammad al-Ṣādiq chose for Muḥammad b. 'Alī the following twelve chiefs: Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzā'ī; Lāhiz b. Qurayẓ al-Tamīmī; Qaḥṭabah b. Shabīb al-Ṭā'ī; Mūsā b. Ka'b al-Tamīmī; Khālid b. Ibrāhīm Abū Dāwūd, one of the Banū 'Amr b. Shaybān b. Dhuhl; al-Qāsim b. Mujāshi' al-Tamīmī; 'Imrān b. Ismā'īl Abū al-Najm, a client of the family of Abū Mu'ayṭ; Mālik b. al-Haytham al-Khuzā'ī; Ṭalḥah b. Zurayq al-

310. Da'wah refers to propaganda for an 'Abbāsid descendant of the Prophet's family. See *EI*², s.v. Da'wa; Maqdisī, Bad', VI, 59–60; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 189; Cahen, "Points de vue"; F. Omar, The Abbāsid Caliphate, 67–74; Sharon, Black Banners, 73–99; Lassner, Islamic Revolution, 62ff.

311. Abū Riyāḥ Maysarah al-Nabbāl (or al-Raḥḥāl), a client of the Azd (or of the Banū Asad). See Sharon, Black Banners, 134, 149–50.

312. Text: arḍ al-sharāt, a reference to the homeland of the 'Abbāsids in Jordan. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 53; Sharon, Black Banners, index, s.v. Ḥumaymah.

313. The subject here could be either Muḥammad or Maysarah. See text below, II/1434, sub anno 102, where Maysarah is specifically mentioned. But according to Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 334, and Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 189, it was Muḥammad b. 'Alī who sent Abū 'Ikrimah and Ḥayyān al-'Aṭṭār to Khurāsān. See Akhbār al-dawlah for the fullest version of this report.

314. Abū 'Ikrimah al-Sarrāj Muḥammad b. Ṣāliḥ b. Dīnār al-Madanī, d. 168/784–85. See Dhahabī, Kāshif, III, 53.

Khuzā'ī; 'Amr b. A'yan Abū Ḥamzah, a client of the Khuzā'ah; Shibl b. Ṭahmān Abū 'Alī al-Harawī, a client of the Banū Ḥanīfah; and 'Īsā b. A'yan, a client of the Khuzā'ah. Abū Muḥammad al-Ṣādiq also chose seventy men, and Muḥammad b. 'Alī wrote a letter to them so that they might have a plan of action to follow.[315]

[1359] In this year, the pilgrimage was led by Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm. This was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit—the person he mentioned—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. The same was reported by al-Wāqidī.

The governors of the garrison towns in this year were the same as in the previous year, as mentioned above,[316] with the exception of Khurāsān, for its governors, at the end of the year, were 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym, who was in charge of prayer and military matters, and 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh, who was in charge of the fiscal administration.

315. Compare text below, II/1988, sub anno 130, where Ṭabarī mentions a second list of twelve chiefs. References to 'Abbāsid propaganda in the years following A.H. 100 have been collected by Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 506–14. The problem of the organization of the Da'wah is discussed in Sharon, Black Banners, 153–200.

316. See text above, II/1346–47, sub anno 99.

The Events of the Year

101

(July 24, 719—July 11, 720)

These events include the escape of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab from the prison of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz.[317]

The Escape of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, upon being addressed on behalf of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab at the time that he wanted to banish him to Dahlak—that is, when someone said to him, "We fear that his tribe will attempt to recover him"—sent Yazīd back to prison,[318] where he remained until he learned that 'Umar had taken ill. At this point, Yazīd began to plot his escape from prison, due to his fear of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, whose in-laws, the family of Abū 'Aqīl,[319] had been tortured by him.[320] Umm al-Ḥajjāj, the daugh-

317. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 328; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 52; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 322. Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 3; FHA, 50; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 191; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 313.

318. See text above, II/1351, sub anno 100.

319. The text specifies 'Uqayl.

320. See text above, II/1282, sub anno 96.

ter of Muḥammad b. Yūsuf, the brother of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, was married to Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik and she bore him al-Walīd b. Yazīd, who would later be slain.[321]

[1360] Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik had sworn to God that if God would enable him to overcome Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, he would cut off one of his limbs. Fearing such an outcome, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab sent a message to his clients, who prepared some camels for him. Now 'Umar had taken ill in Dayr Sim'ān,[322] and when his illness became more severe Yazīd called for his camels, which were brought to a spot near the prison. When it became clear to Yazīd that 'Umar was seriously ill, he slipped out of the prison and set off on foot until he reached the place that he had agreed upon with his clients.[323] But he did not find them there, and his comrades-in-flight became anxious and annoyed.[324] Yazīd said to them, "Do you think that I am going to return to prison? No, by God, I will never return." Finally, the camels arrived, and he mounted and set off, accompanied by his wife, 'Ātikah, the daughter of al-Furāt b. Mu'āwiyah al-'Āmiriyyah, one of the Banū al-Bakkā, who rode in the enclosure of the camel litter. He traveled for a while and when he had gone a certain distance he wrote to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz as follows: "By God, if I knew that you were going to live, I would not have left my place of confinement; but I do not trust Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik." 'Umar exclaimed, "O God, if Yazīd (b. al-Muhallab) wishes evil on this community, ward off his evil deed, and turn this hostile action back on his own neck." Yazīd b. al-Muhallab proceeded until he passed by Ḥadath al-Zuqāq,[325] where al-Hudhayl b. Zufar, accompanied by tribesmen from the Qays, was present. The Qaysīs pursued Yazīd b. al-Muhallab at the point where he had passed by them and managed to capture part of his traveling apparatus and some of his

321. Umm al-Ḥajjāj had been tortured by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, despite Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik's efforts to intervene on behalf of his wife. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 57. On al-Walīd b. Yazīd, see text below, II/1775ff., sub anno 126.

322. Site of a Christian monastery near Damascus named after Simon Peter. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 517; EI², s.v. Dayr Sam'ān.

323. Yazīd reportedly secured his release from prison by bribing both the guards and the governor of Aleppo. See FHA, 50; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 58.

324. Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 191, states that Yazīd escaped with a group of people, including his wife.

325. A site in the Palmyra Desert. See EI², s.v. al-Ḥadath.

young slaves. But al-Hudhayl b. Zufar sent after the Qaysīs, and when they had come back, he asked, "Tell me what you want. Do you seek blood revenge from Yazīd b. al-Muhallab or from one of his kinsmen?" They replied, "No." He asked, "Then what do you [1361] want? He is merely a man who fled from captivity out of fear for his life."

Al-Wāqidī maintained that Yazīd b. al-Muhallab did not escape from prison until after 'Umar's death.

In this year 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz died.[326]

[The Death of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz][327]

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit—the person he mentioned—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz died on the twenty-fifth of Rajab in the year 101 (February 10, 720). Muḥammad b. 'Umar reported likewise.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Amr b. 'Uthmān: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz died on the twentieth of Rajab in the year 101 (February 5, 720).

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz died on Friday the twenty-fifth of Rajab, in Dayr Sim'ān, in the year 101 (February 10, 720). He was thirty-nine years and a few months old and had been Caliph for two years and five months. He died in Dayr Sim'ān.

According to al-Ḥārith—Aḥmad b. Sa'd—Muḥammad b. 'Umar—his paternal uncle, al-Haytham b. Wāqid: I was born in the year 97/715–716, and 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz was appointed as Caliph in Dābiq on Friday the nineteenth of Ṣafar in the year 99 (October 1, 717). I have three dīnārs that were distributed by him.[328] He died in Khunāṣirah on Wednesday the twenty-fifth of [1362] Rajab in the year 101 (February 10, 720) after an illness that lasted for twenty days. He had been Caliph for two years, five months, 326. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 328; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 52; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VII, 323; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 182; FHA, 63–64; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 193, 212.

327. The rubric, which is not in the Leiden ed., is added from the Cairo ed.

328. Text: fa-aṣābanī min qismihi, which may also mean, "that were minted by him."

and four days. He died at the age of thirty-nine years and a couple of months and was buried in Dayr Sim'ān.

Some sources report: He was thirty-five years and five months old on the day he died. According to other sources: He was forty years old.

Hishām reported: 'Umar died at the age of forty years and a few months. His patronymic was Abū Ḥafṣ. The following verses were addressed to 'Umar by al-'Uwayf after the two of them had witnessed a funeral procession together:

Answer me, Abū Ḥafṣ. Did you meet Muḥammad at his pool, giving good tidings to those who were behind you?
You are a man whose two hands are both useful.
Your left hand is better than the right of others.

His mother was Umm 'Āṣim, the daughter of 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb. He was known as "The Umayyad with the scar on his forehead" because one of his father's riding animals had wounded him in the face.

According to al-Ḥārith—Ibn Sa'd—Sulaymān b. Ḥarb—al-Mubārak b. Faḍālah—'Ubaydallāh b. 'Umar—Nāfi': I frequently used to hear Ibn 'Umar[329] say, "Would that I knew who from among the children of 'Umar will have a sign on his face. That one will fill the world with justice."

According to Manṣūr b. Abī Muzāḥim—Marwān b. Shujā'—Sālim al-Afṭas: When 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz was a child in Damascus, he was kicked by an animal and carried to his mother, Umm 'Āṣim, the daughter of 'Āṣim b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who [1363] took him in her arms and wiped the blood from his face. His father came in to see her while she was taking care of the boy, and she turned to him and scolded him, blaming him for the accident, saying, "You have destroyed my son! Why didn't you make sure that he had a servant or a nurse to protect him from something like this?" He said to her, "Be quiet, Umm 'Āṣim. All is well that ends well, since he is destined to be 'The Umayyad with the scar on his forehead.'"

329. That is, 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb, who died in 73/693. See *EI*², s.v. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar.

Aspects of His Character

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Kulayb b. Khalaf—Idrīs b. Ḥanẓalah and al-Mufaḍḍal—his grandfather and 'Alī b. Mujāhid—Khālid: When 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz became Caliph, he wrote to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab as follows: "Now then, Sulaymān was one of God's servants upon whom God bestowed His blessing and then took him away. He designated me as his successor and he designated Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik—if he is still alive—to succeed me. The office that God has entrusted and allotted to me is not easily borne. Were it my desire to take many wives and acquire wealth, then the sums that He has already given me are greater than that attained by any of his creatures.[330] But I fear, in connection with the office for which I have been chosen, a difficult reckoning and a painful questioning, except for whatever defense from trial God may grant me, in His mercy. Those at our end have sworn the oath of allegiance, so now let those at your end do the same."

The letter was brought to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, who showed it to Abū 'Uyaynah. After the latter had read it, [Yazīd] said, "I will not be one of his governors." Abū 'Uyaynah asked, "Why not?" He replied, "This is not the way that members of his household have spoken in the past, and he does not intend to follow their example." Nevertheless, the soldiers swore the oath of allegiance after Yazīd called on them to do so. He said: 'Umar then wrote to [1364]
Yazīd, saying, "Appoint someone as your representative in Khurāsān and come to me." He designated his son, Makhlad, as his representative.

According to 'Alī—'Alī b. Mujāhid—'Abd al-A'lā b. Manṣūr—Maymūn b. Mihrān: 'Umar wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym as follows: "Indeed, Action ('amal) and Knowledge ('ilm) are closely related,[331] so be one who is knowledgeable of God and one who acts on His behalf. There have been people who were knowledgeable but did not act; their knowledge was detrimental to them."

---

330. Text: kāna fī-lladhī a'ṭānī min dhālika mā qad balagha bī afḍal mā balagha bi-aḥad min khalqihi.

331. The Arabic words for "action" and "knowledge," 'amal and 'ilm, have the same three-letter roots.

According to Muṣ'ab b. Ḥayyān—Muqātil b. Ḥayyān: 'Umar wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān as follows: "Now then, act like a man who knows that God will not repair the deeds of those who cause corruption."

According to 'Alī—Kulayb b. Khalaf—Ṭufayl b. Mirdās: 'Umar wrote to Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sarī as follows: "Establish inns in your lands so that whenever a Muslim passes by, you will put him up for a day and a night and take care of his animals; if he is sick, provide him with hospitality for two days and two nights; and if he has used up all of his provisions and is unable to continue, supply him with whatever he needs to reach his hometown." When Sulaymān received 'Umar's letter, the people of Samarqand said to him, "Qutaybah deceived us, defrauded us, and seized our land.[332] But now that God has made justice and equity to triumph, grant us permission to send a delegation to the Commander of the Faithful in order to present our grievances. If we are in the right, then the land will be given back to us, and we are certainly in need of that." He gave his permission, whereupon they sent a group of their people to visit 'Umar, who then wrote [1365] on their behalf to Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sariyy: "The people of Samarqand have complained to me about the injustice they were made to suffer and the mistreatment they received from Qutaybah, who expelled them from their land. Therefore, when my letter reaches you, have the judge sit and consider their complaint. If he decides in their favor, expel (the Arabs) to their campgrounds, thereby restoring the status quo to what it had been prior to Qutaybah's conquest of Samarqand."[333]

Sulaymān therefore ordered Jumay' b. Ḥāḍir al-Qāḍī al-Nājī to carry out a judicial investigation. He decreed that the Arabs of Samarqand should be sent back to their campgrounds and that the two sides should fight on equal terms, so that there would either be a new peace treaty or victory by force. The army of al-Sughd[334]

332. Qutaybah b. Muslim had conquered Samarqand in the year 93/711–12, turning the city into an Arab garrison town. See text above, II/1249ff., sub anno 93.

333. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 519.

334. Al-Sughd (also spelled al-Ṣughd) is the name of a district in Transoxiana comprising the lands east of Bukhārā from Dabūsiyah to Samarqand, the latter being its capital. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 222–23; *EI*², s.v. Soghd; Le Strange, Lands, 460–73.

said, "But we are satisfied with the old agreement and we will not initiate hostilities." The two sides came to terms on that basis. The wise people[335] among them said, "These tribesmen have mixed with us, and we dwell with them. They trust us and we trust them. But if a judgment is rendered in our favor, we will return to war, and we do not know who will be victorious; and if the judgment is not in our favor, we will have brought hostility into the struggle."[336] Therefore, they left things as they were. They were satisfied and they did not fight.

'Umar wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym ordering him to recall the Muslims who were in Transoxiana, together with their women and children. But they refused, saying, "Marw does not suffice us." 'Abd al-Raḥmān wrote to 'Umar about this, and 'Umar wrote back to him saying, "By God, I have already fulfilled my obligation. Therefore, do not send the Muslims on any more military campaigns. Let them be satisfied with the victories that God has already granted them."[337]

Our source continued: He also wrote to 'Uqbah b. Zur'ah al-Ṭā'ī, whom he had put in charge of the fiscal administration, after [1366] al-Qushayrī: "Sovereignty has several pillars, without which it will not endure: The governor is a pillar; the judge is a pillar; the head of the Public Treasury is a pillar; and I am the fourth pillar. There is no Muslim frontier that is of greater concern to me or that I consider to be as important as the Khurāsān frontier. Therefore, collect the tribute in its entirety and guard it without committing any injustice: If it proves to be sufficient to cover their stipends, that is the path of God; if not, write to me and I will transfer the money to you, thereby making it possible for you to pay them their stipends in full measure." 'Uqbah arrived and determined that the tribute they collected was greater than the stipends to which they were entitled. He therefore wrote to 'Umar notifying him of this, and 'Umar wrote back to him saying, "Distribute the surplus among the needy."

---

335. The text specifies ahl al-Rayy, "the people of al-Rayy." This should be amended to ahl al-ra'i. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

336. Text: qad iṭṭalabnā 'adāwah fī-l-munāza'ah, which could also mean "introduced animosity."

337. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 47, where it is reported that 'Umar praised the Muslims for their decision to remain in Transoxiana.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah—Dāwūd b. Sulaymān al-Ju'fī: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote as follows: "Greetings from the servant of God, 'Umar, the Commander of the Faithful, to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd. Now then, the army of al-Kūfah has been stricken by trial, hardship, and deviation from the judgments of God, as well as by corrupt customs that were imposed on them by evil governors. The foundation of religion is justice and the performance of good deeds, and there is nothing more important to you than your soul. Remember that even the smallest sin is significant. Do not treat uncultivated land like cultivated land, nor cultivated land like uncultivated land. Examine the uncultivated land, take from it whatever it can bear, and improve it so that it will flourish. Nothing should be taken from cultivated land, except the rate of the tribute. Take it gently, leaving the peasants[338] unruffled. Do not take as tribute anything [1367] but the weight of seven.[339] The following levies are not permitted: tolls;[340] the wages of mint officials; presents at the Nawrūz and Mihrajān festivals;[341] and fees for official papers, for couriers, for housing, and for weddings. No tribute shall be levied on those peasants who convert to Islam.[342] Follow my instructions in this matter, for I have commissioned you to carry out what I was commissioned to do by God. Furthermore, do not hasten, on your own initiative, to cut off the arm of the thief or to crucify someone until you have consulted with me on the matter. Finally, consider the request of women and children who desire to go on pilgrimage and immediately pay them one hundred dirhams by means of which they may perform the pilgrimage. Farewell."

338. Text: ahl al-arḍ.

339. Text: wazn sab'ah, that is, a dīnār weighing seven mithqāls. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 571ff.

340. Text: āyīn. On this term, see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 303.

341. The spring and autumn festivals of Nawrūz and Mihrajān were the pivots of the Sassanian administrative and ceremonial year. Public audiences were held, and gifts were presented to the monarch on both occasions. The requirement for gifts at Nawrūz and Mihrajān was revived by 'Abdallāh b. Darrāj, perhaps in his capacity as royal agent, who added ten million dirhams in gifts to the income from taxes. See Morony, Iraq, 73; EI[1], s.vv. Nawrūz and Mihrgān.

342. See Gibb, "The Fiscal Rescript of 'Umar II," 1–16.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Aḥmad b. Shabbawayh—his father—Sulaymān—'Abdallāh—Shihāb b. Sharī'ah al-Mujāshi'ī: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz included the wives and children of the soldiers who received stipends (in the Dīwān). Lots were cast among them, and those on whom the lot fell were assigned one hundred (dirhams), while those on whom the lot did not fall were assigned forty. He distributed money to the poor people of al-Baṣrah, giving each man three dirhams and giving the chronically ill fifty dirhams each.

He said: And I think he also awarded stipends to children upon weaning.[343]

According to 'Abdallāh—his father—al-Fuḍayl—'Abdallāh: I was told that 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz wrote to the Syrian army as follows: "Peace upon you, and the mercy of God. Now then, whoever contemplates death frequently speaks little, while he who knows that death is certain is satisfied with a little. Farewell." [1368]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Abū Mijlaz said to 'Umar: "You have put us in a wasteland,[344] so send us money." He replied, "O Abū Mijlaz, you have reversed the matter." He said, "O Commander of the Faithful, does the money belong to us or to you?" 'Umar said, "Indeed, it belongs to you when the amount you collect does not cover your stipends." He said, "But you have neither carried it to us, nor carried us to it,[345] and you have put one part of it upon the other." He said, "I will have it carried to you, God willing." But he fell ill that very night and died.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym's tenure of office in Khurāsān was sixteen months.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year, 'Umārah b. Ukaymah al-Laythī, whose patronymic was Abū al-Walīd, died at the age of seventy-nine.

---

343. Text: rizq al-faṭm. On this practice, see Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo) III, 562.

344. Text: bi-munqaṭa'i-l-turāb.

345. Text: wa-lā naḥmiluhu ilayka—"and we have not carried it to you"; read wa-lā taḥmilunā ilayhi, as suggested in footnote (g) of the Leiden text. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

A Supplement to the Biography of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz That Is Not Part of Abū Ja'far's [al-Ṭabarī's] Book, to the Beginning of the Caliphate of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān

According to 'Abdallāh b. Bakr b. Ḥabīb al-Sahmī: We were told by a man in the mosque of al-Junābidh[346] that 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz delivered a sermon to the people in Khunāṣirah in which he said:

> O people, you were not created in vain, nor will you be left to yourselves.[347] Rather, you will return to a place in which God will descend in order to judge among you and distinguish between you. Destitute and lost are those who forsake the all-encompassing mercy of God, and they will be excluded from Paradise, the borders of which are as wide as the heavens and the earth. Don't you know[348] > [1369] that protection, tomorrow, will be limited to those who feared God (today), and to those who sold something ephemeral for something permanent, something small for something great, and fear for protection? Don't you realize that you are the descendants of those who have perished, that those who remain will take their place after you, and that this will continue until you are all returned to God?[349] Every day you dispatch to God, at all times of the day, someone who has died,[350] his term having come to an end. You bury him in a crack in the earth and then leave him without a pillow or a bed. He has parted from his loved ones, severed his connections with the living, and taken up residence in the earth, whereupon he comes face to face with the accounting. He is mortgaged to his deeds: He needs his accomplishments, but not the material things he left on earth.

---

346. One of the districts of Nīshāpūr. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 165.

347. See Qur'ān 75:36.

348. Text: a-lā wa-'lamū. The translation follows Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 199, where the text is a-lam ta'lamū: "Don't you know?"

349. Text: ilā khayri-l-wārithīn. Literally, "to the best heir," applied to God, who causes those who worship him to inherit Paradise.

350. Text: wa-fī kulli yawmin tushayyi'ūna ghādiyan wa-rā'iḥan ilā-llāhi qad qaḍā naḥbahu. The expression qad qaḍā naḥbahu is Qur'ānic. See Qur'ān 33:23.

Therefore, fear God before death descends and its appointed times expire.[351] I swear by God that I say these words to you knowing that I myself have committed more sins than any of you; I therefore ask God for forgiveness and I repent. Whenever we learn that one of you needs something, I try to satisfy his need to the extent that I am able. Whenever I can provide satisfaction to one of you out of my possessions, I seek to treat him as my equal and my relative, so that my life and his life are of equal value. I swear by God that had I wanted something else, namely, affluence, then it would have been easy for me to utter the word, aware as I am of the means for obtaining this. But God has issued an eloquent Book and a just example (sunnah) by means of which He guides us to obedience and proscribes disobedience.

He lifted up the edge of his robe and began to cry and sob, causing the people around him to break into tears. Then he stepped down. That was the last sermon he gave before he died, may God have mercy on him.[352]

According to Khalaf b. Tamīm—'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Sa'd: I learned that when one of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz's sons died, one of his governors wrote to him in an effort to console him over the loss of his son.[353] 'Umar said to his scribe, "Answer him in my name," whereupon the scribe began to sharpen a reed pen. Then 'Umar said to the scribe, "Make the pen very thin because in that way the papyrus will last longer and the words will be more concise.[354] Write, 'In the name of God the Merciful, the Compassionate, now to the matter at hand. We had prepared [1370]

351. Text: qabla nuzūl al-mawt wa-nqiḍā' mawāqi'ihi, or "before death descends and overtakes you"; read mawāqitihi, following Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, vol. 14, DCXCI.

352. For variant versions of this sermon, see Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, Sīrah, 43–45, 132–33; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 199.

353. See Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 208, where the son is identified as 'Abd al-Malik b. 'Umar.

354. 'Umar was known for the scrupulous attention he paid to the proper use of public funds. Elsewhere we find him quibbling with the governor of Medina about the latter's consumption of candle wax and wicks. See Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam, Sīrah, 64ff.

ourselves for this event, so that when it occurred, we did not reject it.[355] Farewell.'"

According to Manṣūr b. Muzāḥim—Shu'ayb, that is, Ibn Ṣafwān—Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥamīd: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz said:

> He who gives sincere advice to his brother in matters of religion and looks out for the well-being of the latter's daily affairs has fulfilled his brotherly obligation and carried out the duty that was incumbent upon him. Fear God. Accept these words, for they are offered as sincere advice to you with regard to your religion; and cling fast to them, for they constitute a warning that will save you in the afterlife. The sustenance has been apportioned; therefore, let no believer exceed[356] what has been apportioned to him, and be united in seeking the good. In contentment there is abundance, subsistence, and sufficiency. The term of this life is in your necks, and Gehenna lies before you. What you see will pass away, what has been is as if it never was, and all will soon be dead. You have seen the stages of the dying man, both when he is in the agony of death, and then after his demise when he has tasted death and the people all around him are saying, "He has passed away, may God have mercy on his soul." You have witnessed the hasty manner in which he is removed, and the division of his estate, when his face is lost, his memory forgotten, and his doorway forsaken, as if he had not mixed with those who keep their word, nor inhabited the lands. Therefore, beware the horror of a day on which not so much as the weight of an ant on the scale will be despised.[357]

According to Sahl b. Maḥmūd—Ḥarmalah b. 'Abd al-'Azīz—his father—one of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz's sons: 'Umar ordered us to

---

355. Text: lam nadhkurhu: "We did not mention it"; read lam nunkirhu, following the Cairo ed.

356. Text: yaghdira, "betray"; the text should be amended to read ya'duwa. I owe this point to Professor Ihsan Abbas.

357. See Qur'ān 4:40, 10:61, and 34:3.

buy the plot for his grave, so we bought it from the monk. He said: One of the poets[358] recited: [1371]

Now that 'Umar's death has been announced to me, I say:
May the mainstay of justice and religion be not far away.
The people have left behind, in the tomb that they dug in Dayr Sim'ān, the balance of the scales.

According to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mahdī—Sufyān: 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz said: "He who acts without knowledge[359] causes more corruption than good, and he who does not consider his speech to be part of his actions sins repeatedly. Satisfaction is scarce, and the true believer should rely on patience: God never bestowed a blessing upon one of His servants and then took it away from him, giving him patience in return for that which was taken away, except that the replacement was better than what was taken away from him." Then he recited the following verse: "Surely the patient will be paid their wages in full without reckoning."[360]

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym received the following letter from him: "Do not destroy a church, synagogue, or fire temple with respect to which an agreement has been concluded with you, and do not permit the construction of a new church or fire temple.[361] Do not drag the lamb to its place of slaughter or sharpen the knife over the head of the animal. Do not combine two prayers without an excuse." [1372]

According to 'Affān b. Muslim—'Uthmān b. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd—his father—Fāṭimah, the wife of 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, said: He became extremely uncomfortable one night, and we stayed up with him. The next morning I instructed one of his servants, by the name of Marthid, saying, "Marthid, stay with the Commander of the Faithful so that if he needs anything you will be close at hand."

358. The authorship of this poem is disputed. Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 195, records a variant version of the poem in which al-Farazdaq is specified as the author. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 59, identifies the poet as Kuthayyir 'Azzah (d. 105/723).

359. Text: 'amila 'alā ghayr 'ilm—a pun. See text above, II/1364, note 331.

360. Qur'ān 39:10.

361. On the status of non-Muslim places of worship in Muslim lands, see *EI*², s.vv. Dhimma, Kanīsa.

Then we left, and our heads were throbbing[362] because we had stayed up so late. At midday I awoke and went to him, but I found Marthid sleeping outside of his room. I woke him up, saying, "Marthid, who told you to leave?" He said, "[The Caliph] did. He said, 'Marthid, leave me for by God I see something that is neither human nor jinn.' As I left, I heard him reciting this verse: 'That is the Last Abode; we appoint it for those who desire not exorbitance in the earth, nor corruption. The issue ultimate is to the godfearing.' "[363] Marthid said: When I reentered the room, I found that he had turned his face toward the qiblah and closed his eyes. He was dead, may God have mercy on him.[364]

362. Text: fa-ḍarabnā bi-ru'ūsinā. Literally this means "we were striking our heads."

363. Qur'ān 28:83.

364. This is the end of the supplement. Ibn 'Abd al-Ḥakam preserves a variant version of 'Umar's deathbed scene in which Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik is reported to have been present. See Sīrah, 116–117.

The Caliphate of Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān

The Events of the Year

101 (cont'd)

(July 24, 719–July 11, 720)[365]

In this year Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān—his patronymic was Abū Khālid—came to power. He was twenty-nine years old at the time, according to Hishām b. Muḥammad. Upon assuming the caliphate, he dismissed Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm as governor of Medina, replacing him with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī. According to al-Wāqidī, the latter arrived on a Wednesday toward the end of the month of Ramaḍān (April 10, 720). 'Abd al-Raḥmān put Salamah b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Asad al-Makhzūmī in charge of the judiciary. [1373]

According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar—'Abd al-Jabbār b. 'Umārah—Abū Bakr b. Ḥazm: When 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk arrived in Medina to replace me, I went in to see him. I greeted him, but he didn't welcome me. I said, "This matter (that is, the governorship of Medina) is one over which the Quraysh will not award

365. For other sources on the caliphate of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, see Ibn Qutaybah, Ma'ārif, 364; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 334–36; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 53–58; Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 5–21; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 195–204; FHA, 64–81; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 219–33.

the Helpers (Anṣār)[366] jurisdiction."[367] Then I returned to my residence. I was afraid of him—he was a reckless young man—and indeed he let me know that he was saying, "Only old age prevents Ibn Ḥazm from coming to me, and I am aware of his deception." I realized then that my fears had materialized and when I was sure that he had uttered that statement, I said to my informant, "Tell him, 'It is not my custom to deceive, and I do not like those who do. The governor imagines that he is going to remain in power forever. But how many governors and caliphs have occupied this residence before you and then left it, so that now all that is left of them is stories, for better or for worse? Fear God and do not pay attention to what is said by a transgressor or an envious person.'"

Relations between the two men continued to deteriorate until a man from the Banū Fihr and another from the Banū al-Najjār appealed to Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk to resolve a dispute between them. Abū Bakr had previously rendered a decision in favor of the Najjārī and against the Fihrī with regard to some land, of which they each owned one-half. Abū Bakr had awarded the land to the Najjārī. The Fihrī sent to the Najjārī and to Abū Bakr b. Ḥazm, calling on them to present themselves before Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk. The Fihrī complained about Abū Bakr b. Ḥazm, saying, "He took my property out of my hands and awarded it to this Najjārī." Abū Bakr responded, "I beg God's forgiveness, but you know that I examined the dispute between you and your co-owner for several days, after which I decided to dispossess you of your land. Furthermore, I sent you to the legal scholars (muftīs) who advised me in the matter, Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab[368] and Abū Bakr b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḥārith b. Hishām, and you questioned them." The Fihrī said, "Indeed, but their word is not binding on me." At this point, Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk felt beaten and he interjected, saying, "Stand up."

[1374]

366. The term Anṣār designates Muḥammad's Medinese supporters in distinction from his Meccan following, known as the "emigrants" (muhājirūn). See *EI*², s.v. Anṣār.

367. This is a conjectural translation. Text: hādha shay'un lā tamlikuhu qurayshun al-anṣāra; read li-l-anṣāri, following the Cairo ed. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was a Qurashī, while Abū Bakr was one of the Helpers.

368. This dispute must have occurred at least six years earlier, since Sa'īd b. al-Musayyab, one of the first specialists in religious law whose activity can be regarded as historical, died in 95/713–14. See *EI*², s.v. Fiḳh.

They stood up, and he said to the Fihrī, "You acknowledge to him that you questioned the muftīs about their judgment, but then you say to me, 'Give me my land back.' You are a fool! Leave, for you are not entitled to anything."

But Abū Bakr continued to fear Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk. Subsequently, Ibn Ḥayyān[369] asked Yazīd to allow him to retaliate against Abū Bakr, who had administered the ḥadd punishments to him on two occasions. Yazīd said, "I won't allow it, for that man was chosen and trusted by the members of my household. I will, however, appoint you as governor of Medina." He said, "I do not want that, for if I were to punish him by virtue of my authority, that would not constitute retaliation." Yazīd then wrote to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk as follows: "Now to the matter at hand. Investigate Ibn Ḥazm's punishment of Ibn Ḥayyān: If the punishment was a result of an obvious transgression, don't concern yourself with it; and if the punishment was a result of a matter that was subject to dispute, don't concern yourself with it; but if the punishment was a result of some other cause, allow Ibn Ḥayyān to retaliate against him."

'Uthmān brought the letter to 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, who said, "You have not accomplished anything. Do you think [1375] that Ibn Ḥazm punished you as a result of something that was not subject to dispute?" Then 'Uthmān said to 'Abd al-Raḥmān, "If you want to do me a favor, now is the time to do so." He said, "Now you have achieved your objective." 'Abd al-Raḥmān sent for Ibn Ḥazm and administered the ḥadd punishment to him twice, on a single occasion, without asking him a single question. Then Abū al-Maghrā'[370] b. Ḥayyān[371] returned, saying, "I am Abū al-Maghrā'[372] b. al-Ḥayyān [sic]. By God, I have not had any relations with women from the day that Ibn Ḥazm did what he did to me until this very day. Today, I shall resume my relations with women."[373]

---

369. 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī, a former governor of Medina. See text above, II/1281.

370. Text: al-Ma'zā; read al-Maghrā', following the Cairo ed.

371. That is, 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān. See note 369, above.

372. See note 370 above.

373. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 56.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year, Shawdhab the Khārijite was slain.[374]

The Slaying of Shawdhab the Khārijite

We have already mentioned the report about the delegation that Shawdhab sent to 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz in order to argue about his revolt against the Caliph.[375] According to Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā, when 'Umar died, 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān, desirous of winning the favor of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, wrote to Muḥammad b. Jarīr ordering him to attack Shawdhab and his men. Now at that moment, Shawdhab, whose two messengers had not yet returned, was unaware of 'Umar's death. Thus, when the Khārijites saw Muḥammad b. Jarīr preparing for battle, Shawdhab sent to him, asking, "What prompts you to engage in hostilities prior to the expiration of the time period upon which we had agreed? Did we not promise one another not to fight 'until Shawdhab's two messengers return?'" But Muḥammad replied, saying, "We cannot leave you in this state."

Sources other than Abū 'Ubaydah: The Khārijites said: These people would not have acted in this manner but that the righteous man[376] has died.

[1376] According to Ma'mar b. al-Muthannā: Shawdhab went forth into battle against them, and the two sides engaged in combat. Several of the Khārijites were wounded, but they killed many of the Muslims.[377] The latter turned and fled, with the Khārijites in hot pursuit, until they reached the wooden houses of al-Kūfah, where they took refuge with 'Abd al-Ḥamīd. Muḥammad b. Jarīr himself was wounded on the buttocks. Afterwards, Shawdhab returned to his camp where he remained, waiting for the return of his two messengers. They arrived and informed him of the demands they had made upon 'Umar and of the fact that he had died.

Yazīd confirmed 'Abd al-Ḥamīd as governor of al-Kūfah and 374. See Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 6–8; FHA, 64–65; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 219.

375. See text above, II/1347ff.

376. That is, 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz. See note 251, above.

377. Text: ahl al-qiblah. On this term see *EI*², s.v. Ahl al-Ḳibla. Note, however, that Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 7, and Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 68, have ahl al-Kūfah, "the Kūfan army."

sent Tamīm b. al-Ḥubāb on his behalf, with two thousand soldiers. Tamīm sent a message to the Khārijites in which he informed them that Yazīd would not leave them intact on the same terms as 'Umar had. But they cursed him and they cursed Yazīd, whereupon Tamīm attacked them. But they slew him and put his men to flight: some of them took refuge in al-Kūfah, while the others made their way back to Yazīd.[378] Then Yazīd sent against them Najdah b. al-Ḥakam al-Azdī, leading a military division, but they slew him and put his men to flight. Next he sent against them al-Shaḥḥāj b. Wadā', leading two thousand soldiers. The two sides exchanged messages, and then the Khārijites slew al-Shaḥḥāj. But several of their men were slain, including Hudbah al-Yashkurī, the paternal cousin of Bisṭām, who was a pious man; and Abū Shaybān[379] Muqātil b. Shaybān, whom they considered to be a virtuous man. Abū Tha'labah Ayyūb b. Khawalī[380] recited the following, elegizing them:

We left Tamīm in the dust, torn to pieces, [1377] mourned by his wife and his kinsmen.
Qays abandoned Tamīm and Mālik, just as al-Shaḥḥāj was abandoned by his kinsmen yesterday.
He came from Ḥarrān carrying a standard, seeking to overcome the command of God, but God overcame him.
O Hudbah, to war, O Hudbah to the muster,
O Hudbah to the tenacious adversary who attacks him!
O Hudbah! How many a cornered man[381] have you rescued, when his Fate had delivered him to the spears?
Abū Shaybān was the best fighter[382] to be sought after. His strength was feared by those who fought him.

---

378. Yazīd was in Damascus.

379. Text: Shubayl; read Shaybān, as in the sixth verse of the poem that follows; and as in Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 7.

380. Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 7, gives his name as Tha'labah b. Ayyūb b. Khawalī b. Bayham.

381. Text: mulḥam. Ibn al-Athir, Kāmil, V, 69, has muljim.

382. Text: muqātil, a pun on Abū Shaybān's name, Muqātil.

He triumphed and met God with many good deeds to his credit.
His slayer smote him with the sword while he was fighting in the path of God.
He provisioned himself with implements of this world: armor, mail, and a sharp sword whose edges did not betray him.
And a short-haired sturdy horse, as if it were,
when it attacks, (a bird of prey,) full-feathered with crooked claws.[383]

When Maslamah entered al-Kūfah, the residents of the city [1378] complained to him about Shawdhab, who had terrified them and slain many of their men. Maslamah summoned Saʿid b. ʿAmr al-Ḥarashī, who was a horseman, put him in command of ten thousand men, and sent him against Shawdhab, who was at his camp. Confronted by these insurmountable forces, Shawdhab said to his men, "For those of you who are seeking God, the time to die as a martyr has arrived; as for those of you who only came out because of this world, know that this world has come to an end, while everlasting life is to be found in the next abode." Upon hearing this, they smashed the sheaths of their swords and attacked, repeatedly putting Saʿid and his men to flight, so that he was afraid of being disgraced. Then he rebuked his men, saying, "Woe to you,[384] are you fleeing from such a small number of men? O Syrians, beware of a distressing day!"

Our source continued: The Syrians attacked the Khārijites, crushing them to pieces, leaving not one of them alive. They slew Bisṭām—that is, Shawdhab—and his horsemen, including al-Rayyān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Yashkurī, who was among those who were submissive to God.[385] His brother, Shimr b. ʿAbdallāh, recited the following elegy:

I was distressed about chiefs and horsemen from the Banū Shaybān who kindled the fire of war.

---

383. See Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 8.

384. Text: lā abā lakum, literally, "may you have no father." This proverbial expression is used as an imprecation. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 1, pp. 10–11.

385. Text: min al-muḥiththīn, "one of the instigators"; read min al-mukhbitīn, following the Cairo ed.

The accidents of time detained and destroyed them, leaving me by myself, brotherless.
Sad, with grief ringing in my heart, like a fire, because of my deep feelings for the loss of al-Rayyān.
And (about) horsemen who sold their souls to God, from the Yashkur, proving themselves knights in battle.

Ḥassān b. Ja'dah recited the following elegy:

O eye! Shed copious tears on your own, and cry for Bisṭām's men, and for Bisṭām.
As long as you live, you will never see the likes of them, none more pious or more perfect, gentle and wise.
They took their equals as an example during their time of difficulty, [1379] and had no wish to hold back from enemies.
Until they went to meet the one on whose behalf they had rebelled, leaving us landmarks and signposts as an inheritance.
Verily I know that they have been made to dwell in rooms of Paradise, where they will live in eternity, and obtained there servants.
May God water the lands where they met their deaths with abundant spring rains!

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: In this year, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab reached al-Baṣrah and took control of the city. He arrested Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik's governor, 'Adī b. Arṭāt al-Fazārī, threw him into prison, and renounced his allegiance to Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.[386]

Yazīd b. al-Muhallab Renounces His Allegiance to Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik

Having already mentioned the report of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's escape from the prison in which he had been confined by 'Umar b.

386. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 328; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 54; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 1–11; Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 8–10; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 199–200; FHA, 51–60; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 219–20; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 312ff.

ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz,[387] I will discuss here his actions following his escape in the year 101/719–20. On the very day that ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz died, the oath of allegiance was sworn to Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. Upon being informed of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's escape, the Caliph wrote to ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, ordering him to search for the fugitive and confront him. The Caliph also wrote to ʿAdī b. Arṭāt, informing him of Yazīd's escape; he ordered ʿAdī to prepare for the confrontation and to arrest those members of Yazīd's household who were in al-Baṣrah.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf: ʿAdī b. Arṭāt arrested several of Yazīd's brothers and threw them into prison: al-Mufaḍḍal, Ḥabīb, and Marwān, the sons of al-Muhallab. Meanwhile, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab advanced until he passed by Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. Marwān.[388] Yazīd said to his men, "Let's [1380] block his way, seize him, and take him with us." But his men replied, "No. Rather, advance with us and leave him alone." He marched forward, climbing up above Quṭquṭānah.[389]

ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān dispatched Hishām b. Musāḥiq b. ʿAbdallāh b. Mukhrimah b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. Abī Qays b. ʿAbd Wudd b. Naṣr b. Mālik b. Ḥisl b. ʿĀmir b. Luwayy al-Qurashī, leading a segment of the Kūfan army that included the security force, the notables, and the powerful people. ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd instructed Hishām as follows, "Set off until you come face to face with Yazīd, who will today pass by the shore of al-ʿUdhayb."[390] Hishām traveled a short distance but then returned to ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd and asked him, "Shall I bring him to you dead or alive?" He replied, "That's up to you." This statement greatly astonished those who heard it. Hishām made his way to al-ʿUdhayb, where he set up camp at a point not far from where Yazīd was located. But Hishām and his men avoided attacking Yazīd, who marched off in the direction of al-Baṣrah. The poet recited, referring to Yazīd:

Ibn al-Muhallab traveled without stopping,

---

387. See text above, II/1359ff.

388. Sulaymān b. ʿAbd al-Malik's brother, who would later serve as governor of Mosul and Palestine respectively. He died in 132/749–50. See Crone, Slaves, 129.

389. Located near al-Kūfah, facing the desert. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 374.

390. A body of fresh water between al-Qādisiyyah and al-Maghīthah, four miles from the former and thirty-two miles from the latter. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 92.

while Dhū al-Qaṭīfah, from the Kinānah, rested during the night.
He took the left side, thus taking the wise course, and he did not approach the fortresses of Quṭquṭānah.[391]

Dhū al-Qaṭīfah refers to Muḥammad b. 'Amr, (whose father, 'Amr) b. al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ is known as Abū Qaṭīfah. He was given the name Dhū al-Qaṭīfah because his beard, face, and chest were very hairy. Muḥammad is also known as Dhū al-Shāmah ("The one with the birthmark").

When Yazīd b. al-Muhallab drew near, Hishām b. Musāḥiq returned to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd, and Yazīd then marched toward al-Baṣrah. Meanwhile, 'Adī b. Arṭāt had rallied the Baṣran army, dug a trench around the city, and put al-Mughīrah b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Aqīl al-Thaqafī in command of the Baṣran cavalry. [1381]

'Abd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab said to 'Adī b. Arṭāt, who was from the Banū Fazārah: "Take my son, Ḥumayd, and put him in prison in my place. I give you my solemn pledge that I will divert Yazīd from al-Baṣrah and make him retreat to Fārs, where he will seek a promise of safe-conduct for himself and be far removed from you." But 'Adī refused. When Yazīd arrived with his soldiers, al-Baṣrah was surrounded with men, for Muḥammad b. al-Muhallab, who was not one of those who had been imprisoned, had assembled some men and youths from his household together with some of his clients and gone out to rendezvous with Yazīd. He advanced with a detachment of cavalry that struck fear in the hearts of those who saw it.

'Adī had summoned the army of al-Baṣrah and put one man in command of each tribal division (khums): He put al-Mughīrah b. Ziyād b. 'Amr al-'Atakī in command of the Azd; Muḥriz b. Ḥumrān al-Sa'dī, from the Banū Minqar, in command of the Banū Tamīm; and 'Imrān b. 'Āmir b. Misma', from the Banū Qays b. Tha'labah, in command of the Bakr b. Wā'il. But Abū Minqar, a tribesman from the Qays b. Tha'labah, said, "We will not be victorious unless the the Banū Mālik b. Misma' carry the standard." 'Adī then summoned Nūḥ b. Shaybān b. Mālik b. Misma' and put him in command of the Bakr b. Wā'il; he summoned

391. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 2–3.

Mālik b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd and put him in command of the [1382] ʿAbd al-Qays; and he summoned ʿAbd al-Aʿlā b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿĀmir al-Qurashī and put him in command of the Ahl al-ʿĀliyah. The ʿĀliyah are composed of the following tribes: Quraysh, Kinānah, Azd, Bajīlah, Khathʿam, all of Qays ʿAylān, and Muzaynah. In al-Kūfah the Ahl al-ʿĀliyah are known as the "Ahl al-Madīnah fourth-division" (rubʿ), and in al-Baṣrah they are known as the "Ahl al-ʿĀliyah fifth-division" (khums). In al-Kūfah there were, at first, five divisions, but Ziyād b. ʿUbayd reorganized them into four.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab advanced, but every horseman and tribal unit that he encountered turned away from him, allowing him to continue. Finally, he was confronted by al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh al-Thaqafī, who was leading the cavalry. Muḥammad b. al-Muhallab attacked him with his horsemen, but al-Mughīrah and his men moved out of his way. Yazīd proceeded to his house, where the people came to visit him in turns. He began to send messages to ʿAdī b. Arṭāt, saying, "If you deliver my brothers to me, I will conclude a peace agreement with you with regard to al-Baṣrah. I will leave you and the city alone so that I might acquire what I want from Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik."[392] But ʿAdī rejected his offer. Earlier, Ḥumayd b. ʿAbd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab had gone to see Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, who sent him back, accompanied by Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī and by ʿUmar b. Yazīd al-Ḥakamī. They were carrying a promise of safe-conduct for Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and his household.[393]

Yazīd b. al-Muhallab began to award stipends to the soldiers who joined him, distributing pieces of gold and silver, thereby causing the soldiers to be well-disposed toward him. ʿImrān b. ʿĀmir b. Mismaʿ joined him because he was angry with ʿAdī b. Arṭāt for taking the standard—that is, the standard of the Bakr b. Wāʾil—from him and giving it to his paternal cousin. Also joining Yazīd [1383] were the tribes of Rabīʿah, the remainder of Tamīm, Qays, and many individual soldiers, including ʿAbd al-Malik and Mālik, the

392. Yazīd wanted a guarantee of safe-conduct. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 3, where the parallel passage has, "so that I might acquire a guarantee of safe-conduct." When Yazīd b. al-Muhallab arrived in al-Baṣrah after escaping from prison, he wrote to the new Caliph asking for a promise of safe-conduct. See FHA, 52.

393. ʿUmar reportedly awarded the promise on the condition that Yazīd stay put. See FHA, 67.

two sons of Misma'. There were also some soldiers from the Syrian army with him.

'Adī, on the other hand, could offer each man only two dirhams. He would say, "I cannot give you a single dirham from the Public Treasury without the authorization of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. Be content with this until such authorization is granted." Al-Farazdaq recited in connection with this:

I suspect that the "two-dirham men" are driven to death by their Fate and by their destined ends.
The most sensible one among them is he who remains inside his house, certain that the end is inevitable.[394]

The Banū 'Amr b. Tamīm split off from 'Adī's men and established themselves in al-Mirbad.[395] Yazīd b. al-Muhallab sent against them one of his clients, known as Dāris, who attacked them and put them to flight. Al-Farazdaq recited with regard to this:

The 'Reds'[396] scattered when Dāris shouted, for they could not endure the sharp swords.
God repaid Qays for 'Adī as a reproach.
Couldn't they hold fast until the fighting broke out?[397]

After the soldiers had rallied to him, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab marched to the cemetery of the Banū Yashkur, located midway between him and the fortress, where he set up camp. The Banū Tamīm, the Qays, and the Syrian army approached him, and the two sides fought for a little while. Muḥammad b. al-Muhallab attacked them and struck Miswar b. 'Abbād al-Ḥabaṭī with his sword, smashing the nosepiece of his helmet, and then quickly [1384] thrust the sword into his nose. He also attacked Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah[398] b. Abī Nahshal b. Dārim, grabbing his belt and throwing him off his horse. When (Huraym) fell between him and the 394. See Dīwān al-Farazdaq, I, 421; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 4; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 72.

395. The Mirbad of al-Baṣrah was the famous caravan quarter at the western end of the city. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 97–99; Le Strange, Lands, 45.

396. The 'Reds' are the Persian "mawālī" (clients).

397. See Dīwān al-Farazdaq, II, 224; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 5–6.

398. Read Ṭaḥmah, as in the text; the Cairo ed. has Ṭalḥah. See Caskel, Ǧamharah, II, 287; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 5, n. 2.

horse, (Muḥammad) exclaimed, "What a futile attempt! Your paternal uncle is heavier than that."[399] The soldiers fled, pursued by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, who followed them until he approached the fortress. There, they engaged them in battle, with 'Adī himself going out to fight Yazīd. Several of 'Adī's men were slain, including al-Ḥārith b. Muṣarrif al-Awdī, one of the nobles of the Syrian army who had been a horseman under al-Ḥajjāj, Mūsā b. al-Wajīh al-Ḥimyarī—later al-Kalā'ī, and Rāshid the Mu'adhdhin. 'Adī's forces fled.

Yazīd's brothers, who were in 'Adī's prison, heard the shouts getting closer and the arrows falling inside the fortress. 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab said to them, "I see the arrows falling inside the fortress and hear the shouts coming closer. Although I think that Yazīd has triumphed, I fear that the Muḍarīs, that is, the Syrians who are with 'Adī, will come and slay us before Yazīd can reach us here in the room. Therefore, barricade the door and throw some furniture against it."[400] They obeyed his instructions. Shortly thereafter they were approached by 'Abdallāh b. Dīnār, a client of Ibn 'Umar[401] who was the commander of 'Adī's guards. He and his men tried to force their way in, but the Muhallabids had thrown some furniture[402] against the door and were leaning on it. The others tried, unsuccessfully, to push in [1385] the door, but abandoned them when the soldiers told them they had to hurry.

Yazīd b. al-Muhallab advanced and occupied the house of Sālim b. Ziyād b. Abī Sufyān,[403] which was adjacent to the fortress. Ladders were brought forward, and it was not long before 'Uthmān[404] stormed the fortress. 'Adī b. Arṭāt was captured and brought out, smiling. Yazīd said to him, "Why are you laughing?

399. The context here suggests that it is Muḥammad who attacks Huraym and throws him off his horse, although the subjects could be reversed, as in Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 5, where Muḥammad fails in his attempt to throw Huraym from his horse, whereupon it is the latter who laughs and exclaims, "What a futile attempt, O nephew! Your paternal uncle is heavier than you think."

400. Text: thiyāb, which literally means "clothing." Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 73, specifies al-raḥl, "saddlebags."

401. Text: 'Amir; read 'Umar, following the Cairo ed.

402. Text: matā'.

403. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 73, specifies Sulaymān b. Ziyād b. Abīhi. According to Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 6, the house belonged to Umm Muḥammad bt. 'Abdallāh b. 'Uthmān al-Thaqafī.

404. 'Uthmān b. al-Mufaḍḍal. See FHA, 58.

By God, two things ought to prevent you from laughing. First, the fact that you fled from a noble death and surrendered like a woman, that is the first thing; second, the fact that you have been brought to me like a runaway slave that is dragged back to its masters. You have no covenant or pact with me, so what makes you so confident that I will (not) cut off your head?" 'Adī replied: "You have, indeed, overpowered me. But I know that your survival depends on mine and that there is a price on the head of whoever might slay me. You have seen the armies of God in the West,[405] and you are aware of how God helps those people in every single place where treachery and disloyalty prevail. Make amends, then, for your hasty actions and your mistakes by repenting and asking for forgiveness before the sea casts its waves over you, because if you ask for forgiveness later, it will not be granted. Furthermore, if you sue for peace after I have sent the army against you, you will find them keeping their distance from you, but so long as the army has not been sent against you, they will not deny you anything that you may request, namely, safe passage for yourself, your family and your property."

Yazīd replied as follows:

> As for your statement, "Your survival depends on mine"—may God not keep me alive longer than the time it takes a frightened bird to sip water if that is the case. And as for your statement, "There is a price on the head of whoever slays you"—by God, suppose I had in my control [1386] > ten thousand soldiers from the Syrian army who were all of greater status than you, and I cut off their heads in one spot; they would not be as frightened and terrified by those slayings as they would be by my threat to abandon and oppose them. Furthermore, were I to ask them to shed their blood in vain for me, to give me control of their treasures, and to secure for me a great portion of their sovereignty, in exchange for terminating the war between us, they would certainly comply. Therefore, do not delude yourself: the army would forget you if news of us[406] reached them, and whatever they devise or machinate will be only for themselves; they will not remember you, nor will they pay any attention to you. Finally, as for your statement, "Make amends for your deed, ask for forgiveness, and do this and do that"—by God, I did not ask for your advice, and you are neither my friend nor a trusted adviser. Indeed, what you have said is a redundancy uttered out of weakness. Take him away!

405. That is, the Umayyad armies in Syria.

406. The text is akhyārunā, "our best men." This should be amended to read akhbārunā. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

But an hour or so after they had taken ʿAdī away, Yazīd said, "Bring him back." When they had brought him back, Yazīd said, "I would not have imprisoned you had you not imprisoned and tortured the Banū Muhallab, despite our request that you treat them gently. But you did not ease your oppression, torture, and opposition." After hearing this statement, ʿAdī manifested a greater sense of security, and he mentioned what Yazīd had said to everyone who visited him.

A man named al-Samaydaʿ al-Kindī, from the Banū Mālik b. Rabīʿah—he was a resident of ʿUmān—held the beliefs of the Khārijites.[407] As Yazīd's and ʿAdī's forces were lining up in rows, he emerged and seceded, taking with him many of the Qurʾān reciters.[408] A group from Yazīd's forces and a group from ʿAdī's forces said, "We accept the judgment of al-Samaydaʿ." Yazīd then [1387] sent a message to al-Samaydaʿ, inviting him to join forces with him. He accepted the summons, and Yazīd appointed him governor of al-Ubullah,[409] where he turned his attention to perfumes and pleasure. When Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was victorious, the leaders of the Baṣran army, from the tribes of Qays, Tamīm, and Mālik b. al-Mundhir, fled, joining ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān in al-Kūfah. Some of them made their way to Syria. Al-Farazdaq recited:

My life for a group from the Tamīm who followed one another to Syria rather than accept the judgment of al-Samaydaʿ.
Would they accept the judgment of a Ḥarūri,[410] who has strayed from the true religion,

407. On the Khārijites, see note 266 above.

408. Text: al-qurrāʾ. For a speculative view of the meaning of this term, see Shaban, Islamic History, 23, 51; cf. Juynboll, "The Qurrāʾ in Early Islamic History," 113–129; and Hinds, "Kūfan Political Allignments," 358ff.

409. A town located four farsakhs (24 km.) from al-Baṣrah, between the main course of the Tigris and one of the channels. See Barthold, Geography, 203.

410. That is, a Khārijite. See note 268, above.

more erroneous and more deviant than an ass with its ear cut off?[411]

To which Khalīfah al-Aqṭa' responded:

His judgment was sought neither because he sent a delegation to ask for it, nor because of an opportunity from which some desirable outcome was expected.
Rather, they traveled to get it, by day and by night, on the baldest buttocks that can be seen on a day of wearisome travel.
For fear that the enemy would catch up with them, they would camp only every fourth or fifth night.

Al-Ḥawārī b. Ziyād b. 'Amr al-'Atakī set out with the intention of reaching Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, fleeing from Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. He encountered Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī and 'Amr b. Yazīd al-Ḥakamī, who were traveling with Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab. They were returning from Yazīd b. 'Abd al- [1388]
Malik with a promise of safe-conduct for Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and everything that he wanted[412] from the Caliph. Al-Ḥawārī greeted the two men, who asked him about the latest events. But when he saw Ḥumayd b. 'Abd al-Malik (b. al-Muhallab) with them, he took them aside, privately. "Where are you going?" he asked. "To Yazīd b. al-Muhallab," they replied. "We have brought him everything that he wanted." Al-Ḥawārī said, "You cannot do anything for Yazīd, and he cannot do anything for you. He has defeated his enemy, 'Adī b. Arṭāt, slain many men, and imprisoned 'Adī. Turn back, both of you!" At that moment, a tribesman from the Bāhilah named Muslim b. 'Abd al-Malik passed by without stopping to greet them. They called after him and asked him to account for himself, but he still would not stop. Al-Qasrī said, "Shouldn't you bring him back and administer one hundred lashes?" But his companion said to him, "Let him go,"[413] and they waited until he disappeared.

411. See Dīwān al-Farazdaq, I, 409.

412. Text: arādahu; the Cairo ed. has the dual form, arādāhu, "(everything that) the two of them wanted." On this mission, see note 392, above.

413. Text: gharribhu 'anka; the Cairo ed. reads 'azzibhu 'anka, "leave him alone."

Al-Ḥawārī b. Ziyād continued on his way to Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, and the two men turned back, taking Ḥumayd b. ʿAbd al-Malik (b. al-Muhallab) with them. Ḥumayd said to them, "I adjure you by God not to violate the mission on which you were sent by the Caliph, for Yazīd (b. al-Muhallab) is well disposed toward you, although that one[414] and the members of his household have always been our enemies. I adjure you by God not to listen to what he says." But they rejected Ḥumayd's plea and took him with them. Eventually, they delivered him to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym[415] al-Kalbī, who had been sent to Khurāsān by Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik to serve as his governor there. When ʿAbd al-Raḥmān learned that Yazīd b. al-Muhallab had renounced his allegiance to Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, he wrote to the Caliph as follows: "Holy war against those who have opposed you is dearer to me than my appointment in Khurāsān, for which I have no [1389] need. Therefore, count me among those whom you are sending to me in order to fight against Yazīd b. al-Muhallab." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān sent Ḥumayd b. ʿAbd al-Malik (b. al-Muhallab) to Yazīd (b. ʿAbd al-Malik).

ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Zayd b. al-Khaṭṭāb arrested Khālid b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, who was in al-Kūfah, and Ḥammāl b. Zaḥr al-Juʿfī, neither of whom had uttered a word against the Caliph—although they were aware of the fact that the Banū al-Muhallab had thrown off allegiance to him. He put them in chains and sent them to Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, who imprisoned them, together (in Damascus); they died there, never having left the prison.

Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik sent some soldiers from the Syrian army to al-Kūfah in order to reassure (the Kūfans), to commend them for their obedience, and to promise to increase their stipends. Included among those who were sent was al-Quṭāmī[416] b. al-Ḥuṣayn, that is, Abū al-Sharqī—al-Sharqī's proper name is al-Walīd. When al-Quṭāmī learned that Yazīd b. al-Muhallab had thrown off allegiance to the Caliph, he recited:

Perhaps my eye might see Yazīd, leading a large, powerful army.

414. Probably al-Ḥawārī b. Ziyād, who was from the tribe of ʿAtīk.
415. Text: Sulaymān; read Sulaym, following the Cairo ed.
416. The alternative vocalization—al-Qaṭāmī.

(An army) which lets you hear the earth reverberating noisily.
(Yazīd) is not sordid, weak, or envious,[417]
Nor a coward in battle, trembling in fear.[418]
You see the crowned ones prostrating themselves to him, Bowing down, submissive, overpowered, while others welcomed (him) with welcoming delegations.
He violates neither the pact nor the stipulations of people who were of a kingly and good breed.
Every day you see them celebrating a holiday, having slaughtered their enemies deliberately.

Subsequently, al-Quṭāmī traveled to al-'Aqr, where he witnessed the fighting between Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik.[419] Yazīd b. al-Muhallab exclaimed, "How great is the discrepancy between al-Quṭāmī's poetry and his actions!"

Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik sent al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd,[420] leading [1390] four thousand horsemen without any infantry, hurrying toward al-Ḥīrah in an effort to get there before Yazīd b. al-Muhallab did. Then, Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik and regiments of the Syrian army advanced and seized al-Jazīrah along the bank of the Euphrates. The Baṣran army rallied to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, who appointed his own governors over al-Ahwāz,[421] Fārs, and Kirmān. These provinces were governed by al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh al-Ḥakamī—until he was recalled by 'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Azīz; (then) by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym al-Azdī, who was in charge of prayer, and by 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī, who had been put in charge of the fiscal administration by Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.

Mudrik b. al-Muhallab advanced, reaching Ra's al-Mafāzah.[422] Then 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym sent an agent to say to the Banū Tamīm, "Mudrik b. al-Muhallab seeks to stir up war among you. But you live in a peaceful and obedient country and you care for

417. Text: ḥasūdan. The Cairo ed. reads ḥayūdan, "turning away."
418. Text: 'adīdan, "equal"; read ri'dīdan, following the Cairo ed.
419. See text below, II/1395ff., sub anno 102.
420. Al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd was an Umayyad general, son of the Caliph, al-Walīd I. See *EI*², s.v. al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd.
421. An administrative district between al-Baṣrah and Fārs. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 284–86; *EI*², s.v. al-Ahwāz.
422. Al-Mafāzah (the wilderness) is the name of the Great Desert of Khurāsān that stretches across the high plateau of Iran from northwest to southeast. It is approximately eight hundred miles long. See Le Strange, Lands, 322–28; Barthold, Geography, 133–35.

the unity of the community." They set out at night in order to confront Mudrik. But the Azd learned of this, and approximately two thousand of their horsemen set out and intercepted the Banū Tamīm before they reached Ra's al-Mafāzah. The Azd asked the Banū Tamīm, "What has brought you here, and what has caused you to come to his place?" They made some excuses without acknowledging that they had come out in order to slay[423] Mudrik b. al-Muhallab. The Azd said to them, "We know that you have come out to confront our leader. Look, there he is, nearby. What do you want?"

Then the Azd left and joined up with Mudrik b. al-Muhallab at Ra's al-Mafāzah. They said to him, "You are dearer to us and more esteemed than any man. Your brother has revolted, declaring war on the Caliph. If God grants him victory, that will be good for us, for we are the quickest to come to you, O family of al-Muhallab, and the most ready to do that. In the other case, by [1391] God, there shall be no solace for you in our misfortune." Upon hearing this, Mudrik resolved to leave. The following was recited by Thābit Quṭnah, that is, Thābit b. Ka'b, from the tribe of Azd, from al-'Atīk:[424]

Did you not see that the Dawsar protected their brother, when the Tamīm had massed to slay him?
They saw the blue spearheads surrounding him,
and a tribe whose sacred precincts are inviolable.
(I mean) Dawsar's two branches: Shunū'ah and 'Umrān b. Ḥazm.
There the glory and the most noble descent lie.
They did not attack, but were held back by the spears of the Azd and its long-standing invincibility.
We turned Mudrik back truly and properly, without any wound on his face from you.
With horses, like divining arrows, let free with their riders on a piece of land whose parts are rich with grass.

423. Text: li-yutlifū. The Cairo ed. reads li-yutliffū, probably a typographical error for li-yatalaqqaw, "to meet." Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 8, has li-liqā'i, "to confront."

424. Thābit Quṭnah was a poet and cavalier who was a companion of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. See Ibn Qutaybah, Shi'r, II, 630–31, no. 117; Aghānī (Beirut), XIV, 247–65.

On their backs are every haughty and mighty Dawsarī who does not flee or leave his place in battle.
By means of them fools are put right by reproach, until you begin to see fools restrained by wise censure.[425]

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Mu'ādh b. Sa'd: When the army of al-Baṣrah had assembled, Yazīd stood before them and praised God. After informing them that he was summoning them to the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet, Muḥammad,[426] he incited them to holy war, claiming that those who fought in the holy war against the Syrian army would receive a greater reward than those who fought against the Turks and the Daylamīs.[427]

Our source continued: I entered the mosque with al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, whose hand was on my shoulder.[428] He asked me, "Look around. Do you recognize anyone?" I replied, "No, by God, I don't." Al-Ḥasan said, "By God, these people are transgressors."[429] We then made our way forward until we reached the pulpit. I heard (Yazīd) mention the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet. Then al-Ḥasan raised his voice and exclaimed, "By God, we have seen you as both governor and governed, and that does not suit you." At that, we jumped on al-Ḥasan, grabbing his hand and covering his mouth, and made him sit down. By God, [1392] we were sure that Yazīd had heard him, even though he did not pay any attention to him and continued his sermon. Our source said: Then we went out to the gate of the mosque where, lo and behold, al-Naḍr b. Anas b. Mālik[430] was standing at the gate, saying, "O servants of God, what prevents you from responding to the Book of God and the sunnah of His Prophet? By God, none of us has seen the likes of that one (that is, Yazīd) since the day you were born—except during the caliphate of 'Umar b. 'Abd

425. See al-A'shā, Dīwān, 340.

426. It was customary for rebels of the Umayyad period, whatever their sectarian stance, to make a call to the Book of God and the precedent of the Prophet; the collocation stood for justice. See Crone and Hinds, God's Caliph, 61, 66.

427. Turks and Daylamīs were non-Muslims.

428. The context suggests that al-Ḥasan had gone blind, a point that I am unable to corroborate.

429. Text: al-a'tā'. The Cairo ed. reads al-ghuthā', "the scum of the the earth."

430. For information on this figure, see al-Dhahabī, Kāshif, III, 203, no. 5926.

al-ʿAzīz." Al-Ḥasan exclaimed, "Praise be to God. Al-Naḍr b. Anas, too, has testified (in favor of Yazīd)."

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—al-Muthannā b. ʿAbdallāh: Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī passed by the soldiers, who had arranged themselves in two rows and raised the standards and spears in anticipation of Yazīd's emergence. They were saying, "Yazīd has summoned us to the example of the two ʿUmars."[431] Al-Ḥasan said, "Only yesterday Yazīd was striking off the heads of those whom you see here and sending them to the Marwānids, seeking thereby to win the approval of the Umayyads. But when he became angry, he lifted up a stick, tied some rags to it, and said, 'I have thrown off allegiance to (the Marwānids), so you do the same.'" Those people said, "Yes." Then al-Ḥasan said, "I summon you to the example of the two ʿUmars, which requires that chains be put on (Yazīd's) legs and that he be sent back to the prison in which ʿUmar had imprisoned him." After hearing this, some soldiers who supported al-Ḥasan said to him, "By God, it appears, Abū Saʿīd, as if you approve of the Syrian army." To which he replied, "I approve of the Syrian army! May God afflict them and render them hideous! Are they not the ones who desecrated the sacred precinct of the Messenger of God, slaughtering [1393] its inhabitants for three days and three nights, declaring them lawful for their Nabataeans and Copts, carrying off free, pious women, and not holding back from violating the honor of any sacred thing? Then they went to God's sacred house and destroyed the Kaʿbah, lighting fires amidst its stones and coverings. May the curse of God and the evil of the (Last) Abode be upon them!"[432]

Our source continued: Then Yazīd left al-Baṣrah, having appointed Marwān b. al-Muhallab as his governor. Taking weapons and the contents of the Public Treasury with him, he set out for Wāsiṭ. Now, as he was turning in the direction of Wāsiṭ he sought the counsel of his officers, saying, "Give me your advice, for the Syrian army is advancing quickly in this direction." Ḥabīb[433]—and others—advised him as follows: "We think that you should

431. That is, ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and Abū Bakr, or ʿUmar b. al-Khaṭṭāb and ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz.

432. The Syrian troops of the Umayyads ravaged Mecca in 64 (683) and 74 (694). See *EI*², s.v. Kaʿba.

433. Ḥabīb b. al-Muhallab was Yazīd's brother.

leave (al-Baṣrah) and go to Fārs, where you can seize the mountain roads and passes and draw near to Khurāsān. In this way, you will outlast the enemy, so that when the army of al-Jibāl[434] is deployed around you,[435] you will control the fortresses and strongholds." He replied, "I do not agree with your recommendation, which is unacceptable to me. You seek to turn me into a bird on a mountaintop."

Then Ḥabīb said to him:

> The plan that should have been adopted at the outset is no longer feasible. When you took control of al-Baṣrah, I ordered you to send horsemen led by members of your household back to al-Kūfah, where 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān (is the governor). Earlier, you passed by him with seventy foot soldiers, and he was unable to defeat you. He would have had even less success against a large number of your horsemen. In this way, we would have beaten the Syrian army to al-Kūfah, where the great majority of its eminent people accept you; indeed, most of them would prefer to be governed by you than by the Syrians. But since you did not obey me, I now advise you as follows: send some of your most accomplished horsemen to al-Jazīrah, together with the members of your household. Let them make their way there quickly and occupy one of its fortresses. You yourself should follow them. Thus, when the Syrian army approaches, looking for you, they will not escape any of your regiments in al-Jazīrah. As they advance toward you, they will be bogged down with your cavalry, who will keep them away from you until you come to them, at which point you will be joined by those of your tribesmen who are in Mosul.[436] The armies of Iraq and of the frontiers will be deployed [1394]

434. Al-Jibāl is the broad mountain region stretching across from the plains of Iraq in the west to the Great Desert of Khurāsān in the east. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 99–100; Le Strange, Lands, 185; *EI*², s.v. Djibāl.

435. This is a conjectural translation. The text is yanfaḍḍūna ilayka, literally, "scattered around you." Compare Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 12 (wa-ahl al-jibāl ma'aka, "and the army of al-Jibāl will be with you"); Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 9 (yanhadūna ilayka, "they will hasten toward you"); Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 76 (ya'tūna ilayka, "they will come to you").

436. The capital of the Diyār Rabī'ah, located on the west bank of the Tigris, opposite the ancient Nineveh. See EI, s.v. Moṣul.

around you,[437] and you will engage them in battle in a land of abundance and cheap prices,[438] having put all of Iraq behind you.

He said, "I do not want to divide my forces." When he arrived in Wāsiṭ, he remained there only a few days.

According to Abū Jaʿfar (al-Ṭabarī): In this year, ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī led the pilgrimage. This was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit—his source—Isḥāq b. ʿĪsā—Abū Maʿshar. A similar report was transmitted by Muḥammad b. ʿUmar.

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk was the governor of Medina on behalf of Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, while Mecca was governed by ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAbdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd. In al-Kūfah, ʿAbd al-Ḥamīd b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān served as governor, and al-Shaʿbī was in charge of the judicial administration. Al-Baṣrah had been taken over by Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym was in charge of Khurāsān.

---

437. Text: yanfaḍḍu ilayka. Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 10, reads yanqaḍḍu ilayka, "will rush to you." See note 435 above.

438. Text: fī arḍin rafīʿati-l-siʿr, "a land of high prices." The text should be amended to read fī arḍin rafīghati-l-siʿr. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

The Events of the Year

102

(JULY 12, 720—JUNE 30, 721)

One of the events of this year was the march undertaken by al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik and Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik in the direction of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, having been sent to fight him by Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik. [1395]

In this year, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was slain in the month of Ṣafar (August 11–September 8).[439]

The Slaying of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Muʿādh b. Saʿīd: Yazīd b. al-Muhallab decided to leave Wāsiṭ in order to confront Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik and al-ʿAbbās. He designated his son, Muʿāwiyah, as his representative in that city, entrusting him with the Public Treasury, the coffers, and the prisoners of war, and he dispatched an advance party headed by his brother, ʿAbd al-Malik.

439. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 332; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 54–55; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 11–25; Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 10–14; FHA, 65–74; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 220; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 316–19.

Then he set out and, after passing by Fam al-Nīl,[440] he set up camp at al-'Aqr.[441] Meanwhile, Maslamah advanced, marching along one of the banks of the Euphrates until he reached al-Anbār,[442] where, after laying a bridge over the river, he crossed over at a point near a village known as Fāriṭ.[443] Then he advanced until he encountered Yazīd b. al-Muhallab.

Yazīd's brother, 'Abd al-Malik, who had been sent ahead in the direction of al-Kūfah, was confronted in Sūrā[444] by al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd. The two armies engaged in battle after arranging themselves in ranks. The Baṣran army charged, putting (the Syrians) to flight. With al-'Abbās were some soldiers from the Banū Tamīm and Qays, who had fled from Yazīd, from al-Baṣrah; indeed, there were a good number of them with al-'Abbās, including Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah al-Mujāshi'ī. When the Syrian army was put to flight in that manner, Huraym b. Abī Ṭaḥmah called out to them, "O Syrians, fear God, fear God, and do not abandon us!" 'Abd al-Malik's soldiers had forced them to the river. In response, they called out to him, "Don't worry. It is customary for the Syrian [1396] army to feign defeat at the outset of battle. But assistance is on its way."

Then the Syrian army gained the offensive, exposing 'Abd al-Malik's forces and putting them to flight. Among those slain was al-Mantūf, a client of the Bakr b. Wā'il. Al-Farazdaq recited the following lines in an attempt to incite the Bakr b. Wā'il:

The Bakr b. Wā'il weep for al-Mantūf, but they don't let anyone cry for the two sons of Misma'.
Two youths who grew up amid the fires of war and accomplished
    noble deeds before their beards began to grow.
Were Mālik and Ibn Mālik alive,

440. A town in the Sawād of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 334–39, s.v. al-Nīl.

441. 'Aqr of Babel was near Karbalā', in the administrative district of al-Kūfah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 136; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 316, n. 1.

442. A town on the east bank of the Euphrates, near the 'Īsā Canal. See EI[2], s.v. al-Anbār; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 316, n. 1.

443. There is no entry in Yāqūt's geographical dictionary for this village.

444. An old Jewish town on the upper Sūrā Canal, near the site of the later Qaṣr Ibn Hubayrah. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 278; Le Strange, Lands, 70–72.

then they would have lit two fires whose flames would have risen high.[445]

The two sons of Misma' were Mālik b. Misma' and 'Abd al-Malik b. Misma', who were slain by Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. In response to al-Farazdaq, al-Ja'd b. Dirham,[446] a client of [Suwayd b. Ghafalah][447] from the tribe of Hamdān, recited the following lines:

We weep for al-Mantūf because he aided his tribe, but we do not weep for the two dead ones who disgraced their father.[448]
The two of them sought the ruin of the Bakr b. Wā'il, and the strength of Tamīm, had their home been attacked.
May they not find any comfort from God for even an hour, and may the eyes of the mourner who cries for them continue to shed tears forever.
Should we cry for them deceitfully, if ever we cry, [1397] when they met their death having deceived us too?

'Abd al-Malik b. al-Muhallab rejoined his brother in al-'Aqr, where he ordered 'Abdallāh b. Ḥayyān al-'Abdī to cross over the river to the side where the Ṣarāt al-Aqṣā[449] is located—there was a bridge between the two places. 'Abdallāh, together with his troops and one of Yazīd's units, set up camp there and dug a trench (around the camp). But Maslamah, accompanied by Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Ḥarashī, crossed over the water—some authorities maintain that it was al-Waḍḍāḥ who crossed over—and the two sides came face to face.

Meanwhile, Yazīd was joined by a large number of soldiers from al-Kūfah and from al-Jibāl, and soldiers from the frontiers were making their way towards him. He put 'Abdallāh b. Sufyān b. Yazīd b. al-Mughaffal al-Azdī in command of the Kūfan con-

445. See Dīwān al-Farazdaq, II, 203.
446. See EI[2], s.v. Ibn Dirham.
447. The lacuna in the text is filled in by the editor of the Cairo ed.
448. The text, al-shā'idayn, should be amended to read al-shā'inayn. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.
449. The Ṣarāt Canal branched off from the 'Īsā Canal just above the town of al-Muhawwal. Yāqūt mentions two canals by this name, the Greater and Smaller Ṣarāt. See Mu'jam, III, 399–400; Le Strange, Lands, 66–67.

tingents that had joined him, as well as of the Medinese contingent; he put al-Nuʿmān b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar al-Nakhaʿī in command of the contingent from the Madhḥij and Asad; he put Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ashʿath in command of the contingent from the Kindah and Rabīʿah; and he put Ḥanẓalah b. ʿAttāb b. Warqāʾ al-Tamīmī in command of the contingent from the Tamīm and Hamdān. He brought all of them together with al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab.[450]

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad—Abū Mikhnaf—al-ʿAlāʾ b. Zuhayr:[451] By God, we were sitting with Yazīd that day when suddenly he asked, "Do you think that they have one thousand soldiers?"[452] To which Ḥanẓalah b. ʿAttāb replied, "Yes, by God. They probably have four thousand." He said, "By God, they have never attacked with even a thousand men. By God, I reckon that [1398] there are one hundred and twenty thousand soldiers listed in my military register. But by God, I wish that I had my tribesmen from Khurāsān with me at this hour, instead of them."

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf: Then he stood up on that day, inciting us for battle. Later, he said, as he put it to us, "Those soldiers will not be turned away from their misguided actions except by a thrust into their eyes[453] and a blow on the head with the sword." Then he added, "I have been told about this yellow locust"—that is, Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik—"and that she-camel slaughterer from Thamūd,"[454] that is, al-ʿAbbās b. al-Walīd, who had blue eyes and red skin, his mother being a Greek. "By God, Sulaymān wanted to negate his lineage until I intervened on his behalf, whereupon the Caliph allowed him to adhere to his lineage. But now I learn that the two of them have no other objective but to search for me throughout the land. By God, were they to gather all of mankind,[455] while I was by myself, I would not quit the field of

450. Perhaps this should read: "under the command of al-Mufaḍḍal."

451. Text: Ruhayr; read Zuhayr, following the Cairo ed.

452. Text: alf sayf yuḍrabu bihi. Literally: "a thousand swords capable of being struck."

453. Text: ʿuyūnihim. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 15, has nuḥūrihim, "their throats," which makes better sense.

454. The tribe of Thamūd, which disappeared from Arabia some time before the appearance of Islam, was punished because one of its members had hamstrung a sacred camel. See EI, s.v. Thamūd.

455. Text: ahl al-arḍ, literally, "peasants."

battle until victory had been achieved by one side or the other." They said, "We fear that you will impose hardships upon us, just as 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad[456] did." Yazīd said, "'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad brought shame upon his family and upon his noble reputation. Was he able to exceed his appointed time?" Then he stepped down.

Our source continued: We were joined by 'Āmir b. al-'Amaythal, a soldier from the Azd, who had combined several military units. He came to Yazīd and swore the oath of allegiance to him. The wording of the oath of allegiance sworn to Yazīd was as follows: "You swear allegiance to the Book of God and to the sunnah of His Prophet that no army will pillage our country or our headquarters and that we will never again be subject to the behavior of that sinner al-Ḥajjāj. We accept the allegiance of anyone who will swear on these terms and we will engage in holy war against anyone who refuses, putting God between him and us." Then he would ask, "Do you swear allegiance to us?" If they responded affirmatively, he would accept allegiance from them.

Meanwhile, 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān had ordered his troops to set up camp in al-Nukhaylah.[457] He sent some men to the water, and they broke through the bank of the river, flooding the area between al-Kūfah and Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, so as to prevent him from reaching the city. 'Abd al-Ḥamīd also estab- [1399] lished observation points and lookouts in the vicinity of al-Kūfah in order to prevent the Kūfan army from joining Yazīd.

'Abd al-Ḥamīd sent Maslamah a military unit from al-Kūfah commanded by Sayf b. Hāni' al-Hamdānī. After flattering the soldiers and praising them for their fidelity, Maslamah exclaimed, "By God, how few are the number of those who have come to us from al-Kūfah!" 'Abd al-Ḥamīd learned of this and he sent a second, larger unit commanded by Sabrah b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Mikhnaf al-Azdī. When Sabrah arrived, Maslamah praised him, saying, "This man's household has obedience and heroic deeds. Attach to him all of the soldiers from the Kūfan army that are here." Then Maslamah sent a message to 'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. 'Abd al-

456. That is, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath, who led a revolt against al-Ḥajjāj in 80–82 or 83/699–700 or 702. See text above, II/1042ff., sub anno 80; *EI*², s.v. Ibn al-Ash'ath; Crone, Slaves, 110–11.

457. A town in Iraq, near al-Kūfah. See EI, s.v. al-Nukhaila.

Raḥmān, dismissing him. In his place, he appointed Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah, who is known as Dhū al-Shāmah.[458]

Yazīd b. al-Muhallab summoned the chiefs of his army and addressed them as follows: "I have decided to assemble twelve thousand soldiers and to send them with Muḥammad b. al-Muhallab. They will attack Maslamah by night, taking with them packsaddles and containers for use in filling in their trench. They will engage the enemy in battle at the trench throughout the night, during which time I will be sending reinforcements to Muḥammad. The next morning I will rush out to them, leading the soldiers, and we will engage them in battle. I hope that God will grant us victory over them."

But al-Samayda' objected, "We have summoned (the Syrians) to the Book of God and to the sunnah of His Prophet, Muḥammad, and they claim to have accepted this from us. Thus, we should not engage in deceit or treachery, nor should we wish any evil upon them until they reject what they claim to have accepted from us."

Abū Ru'bah, the leader of a group of Murji'ites,[459] who was accompanied by his supporters, said, "Al-Samayda' is correct.
[1400] That is the proper course." But Yazīd exclaimed, "Alas! Do you really believe that the Umayyads will act in accordance with the Book and the sunnah when they have neglected both for as long as they have been around? They say[460] to you, 'We accept you,' and they claim not to want to exercise their authority except in accordance with your orders and your instructions. But, in fact, they seek to drive you away from them so that they might engage in treachery. Therefore, do not let them deceive you first. Beat them to it. I have had experience with the Marwānids and, by God, none of them is more devious or more deeply immersed in falsehood[461] than that yellow locust"—that is, Maslamah. But 458. Dhū al-Shāmah means: "the one with the birthmark." See text above, II/1380, sub anno 101.

459. The Murji'ites were an early Islamic sect that advocated postponement (irjā') of any decision about a grave sinner. See EI, s.v. al-Murdjī'a. On Abū Ru'bah, see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 317.

460. Text: lam yaqūlū, "they did not say"; read yaqūlū, following the Cairo ed.

461. Text: ab'ada ghawran. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 80, has ab'ada ghadaran, "more treacherous."

they said, "We do not agree to act in that manner until they reject what they claim to have accepted from us." Meanwhile, Marwān b. al-Muhallab was in al-Baṣrah, inciting the soldiers to go to war against the Syrian army and sending soldiers to Yazīd. Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī, on the other hand, was imploring the soldiers not to rise with Yazīd b. al-Muhallab.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—'Abd al-Ḥamīd al-Baṣrī: Al-Ḥasan al-Baṣrī was saying at that time:

> O people, stay in your homes[462] and restrain yourselves.[463] Fear God, your Lord, and do not kill one another on account of this transient world or on account of greed for trifling things that will not survive for the people who seek them, for God is not pleased with them because of their personal acquisitions. There never was a civil war except that most of the rebels were preachers, poets, fools, drifters, and conceited men. No one is safe from that (that is, civil war), except the unknown person who is hidden[464] and the God-fearing person who is well-known. Therefore, let the hidden person among you adhere to the truth and let him hold himself back from the things of this world over which the people are contending with one another. By God, let him be satisfied with God's good opinion of him, as a sign of honor, and let that be sufficient for him in place of the things of this world. As for the person among you who is well-known and distinguished, he avoids the things of this world over which his peers vie with one another, seeking thereby to please God. Oh, how happy and righteous he is, and how greatly will God magnify his reward and lead him along His path! Tomorrow, that is to say, on the Day of Resurrection, that person will have the greatest satisfaction and will be the one most welcomed by God. [1401]

When Marwān b. al-Muhallab was informed of al-Ḥasan's statement, he stood up, as was his custom, to deliver the sermon. After ordering the soldiers to be diligent and to assemble together, he said to them, "I have learned that that errant, hypocritical

462. Text: rijālakum, "your men"; read riḥālakum, following the Cairo ed.
463. Text: wa-kuffū aydiyakum, a Qur'ānic expression. See Qur'ān 4:77.
464. Text: khafiyy. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 13, reads ḥaqīr, "despicable."

shaykh"—he did not mention his name—"is discouraging the soldiers. By God, if his neighbor had stolen a piece of wood from the roof of his house, the neighbor's nose would still be bleeding. Does he deny to us and to the people of our town the right to seek our welfare[465] and to refute injustices that we have suffered? By God, if he does not stop mentioning us and likening us to the vile ones of al-Ubullah and the Nabataeans of the Baṣran Euphrates—people who have no connection to us and who have not received a favor from a single one of us, I shall finish him off harshly."[466]

When al-Ḥasan was informed of Marwān's remarks, he said, "By God, it does not displease me that God should honor me by chastising him."[467] Then some soldiers who were his supporters said, "If he were to have evil designs on you, and you wanted us to, we would defend you." To which he replied, "In that case I would cause you to do the thing that I have forbidden you to do. I have ordered you not to kill one another for the sake of someone else. (And now it is as if) I am calling on you to kill one another for my sake."[468] Marwān b. al-Muhallab was informed of this, and he became more violent with them, frightened them, and made demands on them, forcing them to disperse. Al-Ḥasan continued to make speeches, but Marwān b. al-Muhallab avoided him.

On Friday, the fourteenth of Ṣafar (August 25), eight days after Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and Maslamah had first encountered one another, Maslamah ordered al-Waḍḍāḥ to take the Waḍḍāḥiyyah [1402] regiment in boats and to set fire to the bridge; he complied with the order. Maslamah then emerged from his camp and, after preparing the Syrian army, he marched forward with them in the direction of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. He stationed Jabalah b. Makhramah al-Kindī on his right flank and al-Hudhayl b. Zufar b. al-

465. Text: khayranā. The Cairo ed. reads ḥaqqanā.

466. Text: la-unḥiyanna ʿalayhi mibradan khashanan, literally, "I will finish him off with a rough file." See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 13: illā nālahu minnā mā yakrahu, "We will see that he comes to an unpleasant end"; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 221, reads la-afʿalanna wa-la-afʿalanna, "I will do this and that (to him)."

467. Text: mā akrahu an yukrimanī-llāhu bi-hawānihi. Compare Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 14: fa-innī akrahu an yukrimanī rabbī bi-hawāni Marwān b. al-Muhallab," It displeases me that my master should honor me by chastising Marwān b. al-Muhallab."

468. Text: dūnī. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 14, has li-ajlī, "because of me."

Ḥārith al-'Āmirī on his left. Al-'Abbās stationed Sayf b. Hānī' al-Hamdānī on his right flank and Suwayd b. al-Qa'qā' al-Tamīmī on his left. Maslamah was in command of the soldiers. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab emerged from his camp, having put Ḥabīb b. al-Muhallab on his right flank and al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab on his left flank. The Kūfan army was with al-Mufaḍḍal, who was in command of it; with him also were a substantial number of horsemen from the tribe of Rabī'ah. He was adjacent to al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—al-Ghanawī—Hishām—I suspect that al-Ghanawī is al-'Alā' b. al-Minhāl: One of the Syrians went out, challenging his opponents to a single combat, but no one accepted his challenge. Then Muḥammad b. al-Muhallab stepped forward and attacked him. The Syrian protected himself with his hand—he was wearing a glove made of iron—but Muḥammad stabbed him, tearing the iron glove, and quickly thrust the sword into his hand.[469] As the man held on to his horse's neck, Muḥammad advanced and stabbed him, saying, "A reaping hook would have served you better."[470] According to one source, that man was Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī.[471]

Al-Waḍḍāḥ approached the bridge and set fire to it, sending smoke billowing in the air. Meanwhile, the war had begun and the two sides were engaged in light fighting. But when the soldiers saw the smoke and were told that the bridge had been set on fire, they fled. After learning that the soldiers had fled, Yazīd [1403] exclaimed, "What have they fled from? Is this the type of battle from which one flees?" Someone said to him, "When they were told that the bridge had been set on fire, not a single one of them held firm in battle." He said, "May God render them hideous! (They are like) an insect that flies off when some smoke is directed towards it." He emerged together with his supporters, his clients, and his fellow tribesmen, saying, "Strike off the heads of the deserters." They complied with his order until there were many heads, which he accepted from them in huge piles. Then he said, "Leave them alone for by God I hope that God will never again cause me to occupy the same spot as they do. Leave them alone, may God expose them to hardships.[472] (They are like) sheep attacked by a wolf." Yazīd would never consider fleeing from battle.

469. That the unnamed Syrian was the standard-bearer of the Syrian army is suggested by the fact that he was the first to attack Yazīd's army; also he was wearing an iron glove. It was customary for one army to try to cut down the flag of the other by either severing or severely wounding the hand of the standard-bearer. For further details on this aspect of Islamic warfare, see Juynboll, "The Qur'ān Reciter on the Battlefield and Concomitant Issues," 25–26.

470. That is, you are better suited for farming than for fighting duels. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 17.

471. Nabataeans were viewed as peasants. On Ḥayyān, see text above, II/1290ff., sub anno 96.

Earlier, while in Wāsiṭ before arriving in al-ʿAqr, Yazīd had been approached by Yazīd b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ[473]—his mother was the daughter of al-Zibriqān al-Saʿdī—who recited:

Verily, the kingship of the Marwānids has come to an end.
If you have not noticed that, then notice it now.

Yazīd said, "I hadn't noticed." Then Yazīd b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-ʿĀṣ al-Thaqafī recited:

Live as a king or die with dignity, for if you die with your sword unsheathed in your hand, you will be forgiven.

He said, "That may be."

When Yazīd went out to his forces and was confronted by the rout, he asked al-Samaydaʿ, "Who was right—you or I? Didn't I [1404] tell you what the army had in mind?" He replied, "Yes, by God, you were right. I am here with you and I will not leave you. I am at your command." He said, "If you will not leave me, then attack," so he attacked, leading his forces. Then someone came to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and announced that Ḥabīb had been slain.

According to Hishām—Abū Mikhnaf—Thābit, a client of Zuhayr b. Salamah al-Azdī: I testify that when Yazīd was informed of Ḥabīb's death, I heard him say, "Life is not worth living without Ḥabīb! By God, I have always hated life after a defeat and, by God, this only increases my hatred. Advance!" By God, we 472. Text: yurahḥimuhumu-llāhi, "may God have mercy on them." This should be amended to read barramahumu-llāhi. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

473. Yazīd b. al-Ḥakam was an Umayyad poet who died in 105/723. See Sezgin, GAS, II, 332.

knew that Yazīd was desperate, and those who did not want to fight began to withdraw and slip away in secret. Nevertheless, a substantial number of soldiers remained with Yazīd as he approached his destiny. Whenever he passed the cavalry, he put them to flight; the units of the Syrian army turned away from him and from the path of his soldiers. Abū Ru'bah al-Murji'ī approached Yazīd and said, "The soldiers have fled." I was listening to him as he was indicating this to him. Abū Ru'bah asked, "Do you want to go to Wāsiṭ, a fortified city where you might remain until reinforcements arrive from the army of al-Baṣrah and until the armies of 'Umān and al-Baḥrayn[474] arrive by sea? You can dig a trench (around the city)." Yazīd replied, "What a bad suggestion! Are you suggesting that to me? Death would be far easier for me." Abū Ru'bah said, "I am afraid for you, for reasons that are known to you. Do you not see the iron mountains around you?" He was gesturing at him. Yazīd said to him, "I don't care whether they are mountains of iron or mountains of fire! Leave us if you do not want to fight." Our source added: Yazīd quoted the verses of Ḥārithah b. Badr al-Ghudānī.[475] Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) said: That is a mistake. The verses are by al-A'shā:[476]

Is it with death that some people[477] threaten me, [1405] when I see that those who cower in death suffer anyway?
A death I die not powerless is not a shame when the soul is taken away by its death.[478]

Yazīd b. al-Muhallab advanced toward Maslamah, riding his gray horse, oblivious to everyone else. When he drew near, Maslamah went to his horse in order to mount it.[479] But the Syrian

474. 'Umān and al-Baḥrayn are on the mainland of eastern Arabia, embracing the oases of Qaṭif and Ḥajar. See *EI*², s.v. al-Baḥrayn.

475. Ḥārithah b. Badr al-Ghudānī was a poet and notable of the Tamīmī clan of the Banū Ghudānah, at al-Baṣrah; he died in 64/684 or 66/686. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥārithah b. Badr al-Ghudānī.

476. Maymūn b. Qays al-A'shā was a prominent poet of the tribe of Qays b. Tha'labah; he died ca. A.D. 625. See *EI*², s.v. al-A'shā; Aghānī (Beirut), IX, 104–25.

477. Text: 'ibād; the Cairo ed. has 'ubād, referring to the Banū 'Ubād.

478. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 19.

479. It is reported that Yazīd challenged Maslamah to a single combat, but that he declined on the recommendation of his supporters. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 17–18.

cavalry attacked Yazīd and his forces, slaying Yazīd b. al-Muhallab. Al-Samaydaʿ and Muḥammad b. al-Muhallab were also slain.

There was a man from the tribe of Kalb, from the Banū Jābir b. Zuhayr b. Janāb al-Kalbī, by the name of al-Qaḥl b. ʿAyyāsh, who, when he saw Yazīd, said, "O Syrians, by God, there is Yazīd, and by God, either I will slay him or he will slay me. He has soldiers with him, so who will attack with me and engage his forces so that I might reach him?" Some of his comrades said to him, "We will attack with you." They did. All of them attacked, and they fought one another for a while. When the dust rose, the two sides cleared themselves away from Yazīd, who lay dead, and from al-Qaḥl b. ʿAyyāsh, who was on the point of death. Al-Qaḥl signaled to his comrades with his head, showing them the spot where Yazīd lay, and said to them, "I slew him."[480] Then he pointed at himself so as to indicate that he had been mortally wounded by Yazīd. Maslamah passed by al-Qaḥl b. ʿAyyāsh, who was lying on the ground next to Yazīd, and al-Qaḥl said, "I think that (Yazīd) is the one who mortally wounded me." A client of the Banū Murrah brought forward Yazīd's head, and someone asked him, "Did you slay him?" He replied, "No." The head was brought to Mas-[1406] lamah, who could not identify it for sure. Al-Ḥawārī b. Ziyād b. ʿAmr al-ʿAtakī said to him, "Order that his head be washed and wrapped in a turban." When this was done, Maslamah recognized it. He sent his head to Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, with Khālid b. al-Walīd b. ʿUqbah b. Abī al-Muʿayṭ.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Thābit, a client of Zuhayr: After Yazīd was slain and the army defeated, al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab continued to fight the Syrian army, unaware of the fact that Yazīd was dead and the soldiers routed. He was riding a powerful, low-built horse, and in front him was a horse covered with a coat of mail. Every time he attacked it, it turned back and withdrew; then he withdrew. He would attack with soldiers from his forces so that he was in the middle of the army and then he would return to a spot behind his forces. Whenever he saw one of us turn his head, he would point to him with his hand, thereby indicating that he should not turn his head, so that the soldiers would direct their faces exclusively against their enemy.

480. It is also reported that Yazīd b. al-Muhallab was slain by al-Hudhayl b. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith al-Kilābī. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 83.

Our source continued: We fought for a while. It was as if I were looking at ʿĀmir b. al-ʿAmaythal al-Azdī as he brandished his sword, reciting:

The mother of the newborn child knew that I am not afraid to use the blade of the sword.

By God, we fought for an hour or so, and the horsemen from Rabīʿah were put to flight. By God, I don't think that any of the Kūfan forces persevered greatly or fought vehemently. Then al-Mufaḍḍal stood before the Rabīʿah, brandishing a sword, and called out to them, "O tribe of Rabīʿah, attack, attack! By God, you never fled before, nor were you ignoble. That is not your custom. So do not let the Iraqi army be attacked from your side today. O Rabīʿah, my soul for you, persevere for a while." Then they rallied around him and came back to him and, lo, your little rally[481] took place.

We assembled, wanting to attack them, until al-Mufaḍḍal [1407] came. But someone asked him, "What are you doing here? Yazīd, Ḥabīb, and Muḥammad have all been slain, and the soldiers fled long ago." The news spread among the soldiers, who then scattered, whereupon al-Mufaḍḍal set out on the road to Wāsiṭ. I never saw an Arab of his stature who was more willing to engage in the actual fighting and to smite with his sword, or better at arraying his comrades for battle.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Thābit, a client of Zuhayr: I passed by the defensive trench and, behold, above it was a wall on which men armed with arrows were standing. I was wearing a coat of mail, and they called out, "O you, wearing the coat of mail, where are you going?" The coat of mail that I was wearing was extremely heavy, and as soon as I had passed beyond them, I dismounted and threw off the coat of mail so as to lighten my horse's burden.

---

481. This is a conjectural translation. The text is kuwayfatuka. Yāqūt mentions a place by the name of Kuwayfah ["little al-Kūfah"] near Baziqiyyah. See Muʿjam, IV, 496.

The Syrian army reached Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's camp, where Abū Ruʾbah, the leader of the Murjiʾites, engaged them in combat for an hour or so, until most of (the Murjiʾites) had gone. The Syrians captured approximately three hundred men, and Maslamah sent them to Muḥammad b. ʿAmr b. al-Walīd, who imprisoned them. When Muḥammad b. ʿAmr received a letter from Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik ordering him to slay the prisoners, he said to al-ʿUryān b. al-Haytham, the commander of his guard, "Take them out in groups of twenty and thirty."

Our source continued: Approximately thirty men from the Banū Tamīm stood up and said, "We led the soldiers in flight. Fear God and give us precedence. Send us out before the others (are slain)."[482] Al-ʿUryān said to them, "Go out, in the name of God."[483] He brought them out to the square and sent a message to Muḥammad b. ʿAmr, informing him that he had brought them out (and informing him) of what they had said. But Muḥammad replied that al-ʿUryān should slay them.

According to Abū Mikhnaf—Najīḥ, Abū ʿAbdallāh, a client of Zuhayr: "By God, I was looking at them as they were exclaiming, [1408] 'O God, we led the soldiers in flight, and this is our reward!' " No sooner had he finished with them than a messenger arrived with a letter from Maslamah in which he pardoned the prisoners and forbade their being slain. Ḥājib b. Dhubyān, from the Banū Māzin b. Mālik b. ʿAmr b. Tamīm, recited:

By my life, (the tribe of) Muʿayṭ has waded in our blood with their swords until they were covered with muck.
The tribes have never been burdened with anything graver than (shedding) forbidden blood, or retaliation, when retaliation was sought.
All of you forbade shedding the blood of those who brandished their swords against you, but murder was committed against the cavaliers of your group.

---

482. The Banū Tamīm may have expected to be spared because their flight facilitated the victory of the Syrian army.

483. Text: ʿalā-smi-llāhi, which is equivalent to bismi-llāhi. The functions of ʿalā and bi overlap to a certain extent in classical Arabic. See Hopkins, Studies, 125 (no. 119); Lane, Lexicon, pt. 5, p. 2145.

Al-'Uryān protected the cavaliers of his tribe with their bodies.
How strange! Where is integrity and justice?[484]

Al-'Uryān used to say, "By God, it was neither my intention nor wish (to slay) them, until they said, 'Give us precedence. Send us out.' I brought them out and dutifully informed the person who was charged with slaying them (that is, Muḥammad b. 'Amr), but he rejected their plea and issued the order to slay them. By God, despite what happened, I would not want a fellow tribesman to be killed in place of them. If they blame me, I am not one who heeds their reproach. So do not blame me excessively."[485] [1409]

Maslamah advanced towards al-Ḥīrah, where he set up camp. With him were approximately fifty prisoners whom he had kept with himself rather than send to al-Kūfah. When the soldiers saw that he intended to slay them, al-Ḥuṣayn b. Ḥammād al-Kalbī approached him and asked to be given three prisoners as a gift: Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī, 'Utbah b. Muslim, and Ismā'īl, a client of the family of the Banū 'Aqīl b. Mas'ūd. Maslamah gave the three prisoners to al-Ḥuṣayn and complied with his followers' requests for the other prisoners.

When the news of Yazīd's defeat reached Wāsiṭ, Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab took out thirty-two prisoners who were in his possession and slew them. Among those slain were 'Adī b. Arṭāt; Muḥammad b. 'Adī b. Arṭāt; Mālik and 'Abd al-Malik, the sons of Misma'; 'Abdallāh b. 'Azrah al-Baṣrī; 'Abdallāh b. Wā'il; and Ibn Abī Ḥāḍir al-Tamīmī, from the Banū Usayyid b. 'Amr b. Tamīm.[486] These men had said to him, "Woe to thee! We think that you are killing us only because your father was slain. But killing us will be of no use to you in this world and it will be to your disadvantage in the next." But he slew all of the prisoners with the exception of Rabī' b. Ziyād b. al-Rabī' b. Anas b. al-Rayyān.[487] When he passed over him, some men asked, "Did you forget him?" He replied, "I did not forget him, but I will not slay him for he is a noble shaykh from my tribe with a good reputation

484. See Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 20–21.

485. Text: wa-lā tukabbir 'alayya, "But do not praise me." This should be amended to read fa-lā yukaththar 'alayya." I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

486. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 332–33; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 54; Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 12; FHA, 74; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 221.

487. Text: al-Raffān; read al-Rayyān, following the Cairo ed.

and a mighty family. I cannot doubt his affection and I have no fear that he will turn against us."

Thābit Quṭnah recited, on the subject of the slaying of 'Adī b. Arṭāt:

The slaying of al-Fazārī and his son, 'Adī, did not make me happy, and I did not want Ibn Misma' to be slain.
But, O Mu'āwiyah, it was a mistake, by which you misplaced my order.

[1410] Mu'āwiyah (b. Yazīd) marched to al-Baṣrah carrying with him the Public Treasury[488] and the coffers. When al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab arrived, the entire Muhallab family was gathered in al-Baṣrah. Fearing that they would suffer the same fate as Yazīd, they prepared seagoing vessels, taking on all necessary provisions.

Earlier, Yazīd b. al-Muhallab had sent Wadā' b. Ḥumayd al-Azdī to serve as the governor of Qandābīl,[489] saying to him, "I am going out to face the enemy and when I encounter them, I will not quit the field of battle until one side or the other prevails. If I am victorious, I will bestow honors upon you; if not, you will be in Qandābīl, so that the members of my household can go to you and fortify themselves there until such time as they are able to secure a guarantee of safe-conduct for themselves. As for me, I have chosen you for my household from all of my tribesmen and I trust that you will live up to my faith in you." Yazīd made him swear weighty oaths that he would serve as a faithful counselor to his household if they took refuge with him in their hour of need.

When the Muhallabids gathered in al-Baṣrah after the defeat, they loaded their families and their possessions on the seagoing vessels and put out to sea. Upon reaching al-Baḥrayn, they were told by Harim b. al-Qarār al-'Abdī, who had been appointed governor of that province by Yazīd: "I advise you not to leave your boats, upon which you are dependent for your survival, for I fear that if you disembark from these boats, the soldiers will capture 488. Text: al-māl. See text below, II/1411, where a parallel passage reads bayt al-māl.

489. The capital of a district known as Nudhah in the province of Sind, Qandābīl is on the road from Bālis to Quṣdār. See *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳandābīl; Barthold, Geography, 75; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 402.

you and bring you to the Marwānids." So they sailed on until they were opposite Kirmān, where they disembarked from the boats and loaded their families and possessions on horses and mules.

Earlier, Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab had arrived in al-Baṣrah, carrying the coffers and the Public Treasury, acting as if [1411] he wanted to become the head of the family. But the Muhallabids assembled and said to al-Mufaḍḍal, "We accept you as our leader and our chief, even though you are only a young man of tender years, like one of your family's young slaves." Al-Mufaḍḍal continued to serve as their chief until they reached Kirmān, where he was joined by large numbers of runaway soldiers.

Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik sent Mudrik b. Ḍabb al-Kalbī in pursuit of the Muhallabids and the runaway soldiers. Mudrik caught up with al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab in Fārs after the latter had been joined by the runaway soldiers. He pursued them, finally overtaking them in 'Aqabah,[490] where they attacked him, engaging him in a heated battle. Slain along with al-Mufaḍḍal b. al-Muhallab were al-Nu'mān b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar al-Nakha'ī and Muḥammad b. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath. Taken prisoner were Ibn Ṣūl, the King of Quhistān,[491] and al-'Āliyah, al-Mufaḍḍal's concubine. 'Uthmān b. Isḥāq b. Muḥammad b. al-Ash'ath was severely wounded, but he fled to Ḥulwān,[492] where he was slain when someone identified him; his head was sent to Maslamah in al-Ḥīrah.

Some soldiers who had supported Yazīd b. al-Muhallab came back and asked for a guarantee of safe-conduct, which they received. Among these were Mālik b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar and al-Ward b. 'Abdallāh b. Ḥabīb al-Sa'dī, from the tribe of Tamīm, who had been present with 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Muḥammad at all of the battles and wars in which he had participated. Muḥammad b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān requested the guarantee of safe-conduct for al-Ward from Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik, who [1412] was both his paternal uncle and his father-in-law, and Maslamah agreed to his request. But when al-Ward came to him, Maslamah stopped him and rebuked him, while standing. He said, "You are disobedient, rebellious, hypocritical, and cowardly whenever there is a civil strife; one day you side with the weaver of the Kindah, the next with the sailor of the Azd.[493] You do not deserve to receive a guarantee of safe-conduct." Then he left.

490. This town is possibly 'Aqabah of al-Ṭīn, in Fārs. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 134. Alternatively, the text could mean, "finally overtaking them at a mountain pass ('aqabah)."

491. The mountainous region in the southern part of Khurāsān. See Barthold, Geography, 209; *EI*², s.v. al-Ḳūhistān.

492. See note 19, above.

The guarantee of safe-conduct for Mālik b. Ibrāhim b. al-Ashtar was requested by al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Sharāḥīl—Sharāḥīl's nickname was Rustam al-Ḥaḍramī. When Maslamah came and looked at Mālik, al-Ḥasan b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Ḥaḍramī said to him, "This is Mālik b. Ibrāhīm b. al-Ashtar." Maslamah told Mālik to leave, whereupon al-Ḥasan said to Maslamah, "May God cause you to prosper! Why don't you rebuke him as you did his comrade?" Maslamah said, "I hold your family in too high esteem for that, and you are dearer and more loyal to me than the family of Muḥammad b. ʿAbdallāh." Al-Ḥasan said, "But we want you to swear at him for, by God, compared to al-Ward b. ʿAbdallāh, his ancestors are of greater rank, and he has had a worse influence on the Syrian army." Several months later al-Ḥasan said, "Maslamah left Mālik alone out of envy lest our companion become distinguished. He wanted to show us that he held him in great contempt."

The Muhallabids, together with the runaway soldiers who had taken refuge with them, continued their journey until reaching Qandābīl. Meanwhile, Maslamah recalled Mudrik b. Ḍabb al-Kalbī and sent Hilāl b. Aḥwaz al-Tamīmī, from the Banū Māzin b. ʿAmr b. Tamīm, to search for them. Hilāl caught up with them (as they were about to enter) Qandābīl.[494] The Muhallabids wanted to enter Qandābīl, but were prevented from doing so by Wadāʿ b. Ḥumayd. Hilāl b. Aḥwaz had written to Wadāʿ, who did not, (at first), abandon the Muhallabids. (After receiving the letter, however, Wadāʿ) left them.[495] The Muhallabids became aware of the fact that Wadā' had abandoned them when they assembled and lined up in military ranks. Wadā' b. Ḥumayd was on the right [1413] flank and 'Abd al-Malik b. Hilāl on the left—both of them were Azdīs. Hilāl b. Aḥwaz waved the peace flag at them, whereupon Wadā' b. Ḥumayd and 'Abd al-Malik b. Hilāl joined them. The soldiers dispersed, leaving the Muhallabids by themselves.

493. The phrase "the weaver of the Kindah" refers to Ibn al-Ashʿath, who led a revolt against al-Ḥajjāj; see note 456, above. The phrase "the sailor of the Azd" refers to Yazīd b. al-Muhallab; see text above, II/1287, sub anno 96.

494. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 334; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 540; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 54–55; Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 15; Masʿūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 200–1; FHA, 74.

495. This is a conjectural translation. The text is: wa-lam yubāyin ʿal al-Muhallab fa-yufāriquhum. See Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 86, where the subject of the verb yubāyin is Hilāl b. Aḥwāz.

When Marwān b. al-Muhallab witnessed this, he started to make his way to the women, but al-Mufaḍḍal asked him, "Where are you going?" He replied, "I am going to our women, whom I intend to slay so that they will never fall into the hands of those sinners." Al-Mufaḍḍal exclaimed, "Woe to you! Would you slay your sisters and the women of your household? By God, they are not in any danger from them." He convinced him not to slay them. Then they charged with their swords and fought until they were all slain,[496] except for Abū 'Uyaynah b. al-Muhallab and 'Uthmān b. al-Mufaḍḍal, both of whom escaped and joined up with the Khāqān, Rutbīl.[497] Their women and children were sent, together with the heads of the slain men, to Maslamah, who was in al-Ḥīrah; Maslamah conveyed the heads to Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, who sent them to al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, the governor of Aleppo.[498] When the heads had been set out on display, al-'Abbās went out to look at them and said to his men, "This is the head of 'Abd al-Malik and this is the head of al-Mufaḍḍal. By God, it is as if he were sitting here talking to me."

Maslamah swore, "Verily, I will sell their women and children while they are in Dār al-Rizq (the Abode of Sustenance)."[499] Then al-Jarrāḥ b. 'Abdallāh said, "I will buy them from you in order to relieve you from your oath." He bought them from him for one hundred thousand (dirhams). Maslamah said, "Give me the mon- [1414]

496. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 86, adds: "They are: al-Mufaḍḍal, 'Abd al-Malik, Ziyād, and Marwān, the sons of Muhallab; Mu'āwiyah b. Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and al-Minhāl b. Abī 'Uyaynah b. al-Muhallab; and 'Amr and al-Mughīrah, the two sons of Qabīṣah b. al-Muhallab. Their heads were carried away; in the ear of each one was a chit bearing his name."

497. Text: Khāqān wa-Rutbīl, "The Khāqān and Rutbīl." The term Khāqān is a title meaning "supreme ruler"; it applies to the heads of the various Turkish confederations. Rutbīl (or Zanbil) was the name of the Turkish ruler of Zābulistān. See *EI*², s.v. Khāḳān; Ṭabarī, Index, s.v. Rutbīl; Gibb, Arab Conquests, 41.

498. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥalab.

499. The sale of Muslims as slaves is contrary to Islamic law. Dār al-Rizq seems to have been a depot for provisions in both al-Kūfah and al-Baṣrah; in the latter, it was adjacent to Zābūqah. See Ṭabarī, Index; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 41.

ey." Al-Jarrāḥ replied, "Take it whenever you want." But Maslamah did not take any (money) from al-Jarrāḥ, who released the women and children, except for nine boys whom he sent to Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. They were brought to Yazīd, and he beheaded them.[500]

Thābit Quṭnah recited the following elegy when he learned that Yazīd b. al-Muhallab had been slain:

O Hind,[501] how long a night have I spent!
Even the shortest night has become too long.
As if, when the Pleiades were high overhead,
I was given an adder's spittle[502] or poison to drink.
One day embittered the sweetness of life, turning my hair white though I was still a youth.
(That is the day when) your father's sons were killed while I was far away and could not see them. They departed nobly.
No, by God, I shall never forget Yazīd, or the dead who were slain unlawfully.
I hope to slay Yazīd[503] one day in retaliation for your brother, or else slay Hishām in retaliation for him.
I hope to lead the horses until they are disheveled, lean and lank, pounding the hillsides.
I will very shortly surprise the Ḥimyar with them in the morning, and the 'Akk, and frighten with those two the Judhām.
And we will give the Madhḥij and the tribe of Kalb long draughts of deadly poison to drink.
(I mean) our kinsmen who mistreat us and regularly put us to the test year after year.[504]
Were it not for them and the crime they committed against us, he would have become, in the midst of us, a king and hero.

500. Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 22, mentions eighty men who were slain by order of the Caliph. Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 15, mentions fourteen prisoners who were slain in retaliation for 'Adī b. Arṭāt and his comrades.

501. That is, Hind bt. al-Muhallab, Yazīd's sister.

502. Text: lu'āb aswad. Literally, "black drivel."

503. That is, Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik.

504. Text: 'āman bi-'āmā. This should be amended to read 'āman fa-'āma. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

He also recited the following elegy for Yazīd b. al-Muhallab:

The length of this night has refused to come to an end, and concern stirred your captivated heart.
I stayed awake, while Umm Khālid[505] slept alongside me.
I couldn't sleep for a full year.
Because of the deceased whose loss crushed the tribe. [1415]
When the Fates summoned him, he responded and submitted.
Because of a king, O friend, in al-'Aqr, to whose cavalry detachments cowardice was attributed, who met his death with his well-known emblem (of courage).
He was slain, but I was not present. Had I been present,
I would have put on the garments of mourning[506] if the tribe did not observe a day of mourning.
In the vicissitudes of time, O Hind, know that someone who seeks to retaliate has to bide his time because he has to go about it carefully.
Perhaps, if the wind blows me in the direction of Ibn Abī Dhibbān,[507] he will repent.
O Maslamah, if our spears reach you, with them we will make you taste the venom of black serpents—O Maslamah.[508]
And if al-'Abbās[509] should ever stumble, we will repay him for what he did that day.
In retaliation. Yet we will not exceed what he did to us, and even then Ibn Marwān[510] would be the wrongdoer.
You will know, if your foot slips, and some people reveal the shame they want to suppress,

505. Umm Khālid is either Thābit Quṭnah's wife or concubine.

506. Text: tassalaytu, "I would have been consoled"; read la-sallabtu, following Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 88.

507. Ibn Abī Dhibbān is either Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān (see Ṭabarī, Glossary, s.v. Ibn Abī Dhibbān), or his brother, Maslamah (see Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 14, n. 1).

508. Text: muslamā, "having been given up to destruction." This should be amended to read maslamā. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

509. Al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd.

510. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān.

[1416] Who the transgressor is who drags mischief to his household, whether the causes of a matter are clear or obscure.
Verily, we are inclined to clemency out of generosity—after we see ignorance from the extravagance of a base person.
Verily, we have established ourselves in frontier fortresses in which no one resides except for a large military regiment.
We see that the neighbors have needs and deference,[511] when such a neighbor's deference is not considered by other people.
Verily, we feed the guest from the highest part of the camel's hump, when the offers of those who can offer are made reluctantly.
When the cold wind brings forth incessant ice, on the backs of tired grey mares that stand still without eating fodder.
Our father is the father of the 'Helpers,' 'Amr b. 'Āmir,[512] and they gave birth to 'Awf, Ka'b, and Aslam.[513]
There was considerable glory in Ghassān, a glory that was old and considered magnificent.

In the year in which Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik concluded the conflict with Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik gave [1417] him joint control over the governorships of al-Kūfah, al-Baṣrah, and Khurāsān.[514] Having been charged with these assignments by Yazīd, Maslamah appointed Dhū al-Shāmah Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. al-Walīd b. 'Uqbah b. Abī Mu'ayṭ as governor of al-Kūfah.

Now, after the Muhallabids had left al-Baṣrah, control of that city was taken—according to some authorities—by Shabīb b. al-Ḥārith al-Tamīmī, who managed its affairs. But when al-Baṣrah was put under Maslamah's jurisdiction, he appointed 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym al-Kalbī as his governor there; and he put

511. The text is ḥājan wa-ḥurmatan. See Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 14: ḥaqqan wa-ḥurmatan, "rights and deference"; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 88: ḥaqqan wa-dhimmatan, "rights and protection."

512. See text above, I/1132; Caskel, Ǧamharah, II, 169, s.v. 'Amr b. 'Āmir.

513. See Caskel, Ǧamharah, I, 176.

514. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 332; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 334; FHA, 75.

'Umar b. Yazīd al-Tamīmī in charge of the police and the militia. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Sulaym wanted to review the Baṣran army,[515] but when he revealed his plan to 'Umar b. Yazīd, the latter said to him, "Do you want to review the Baṣran army when you have neither proceeded towards a fortress in Kuwayfah,[516] nor staffed it with your supporters?[517] By God, if the soldiers of the Baṣran army were to throw stones at you and your forces, I fear that they would kill us. Wait ten days so that we can prepare ourselves for that." 'Umar then sent a messenger to Maslamah, informing him of 'Abd al-Raḥmān's plan, whereupon Maslamah sent 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr b. Marwān to serve as governor of al-Baṣrah, and he confirmed 'Umar b. Yazīd's position as head of the police and the militia.

Abū Ja'far (al-Ṭabarī) recounted: In this year, Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik dispatched Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-'Azīz b. al-Ḥārith b. al-Ḥakam b. Abī al-'Āṣ, who is known as Sa'īd Khudhaynah, (to serve as governor of Khurāsān).[518] He was given this nickname, according to some authorities, because he was a soft, easy, man who lived in comfort and luxury. He arrived in Khurāsān, riding a Bukhtiyyah camel,[519] with a knife hanging from his belt. When the King of [1418] Abghar[520] went in to see him, Sa'īd was wearing dyed garments and was surrounded by dyed cushions. The King emerged and was asked, "How did you find the governor?" He replied, "He is a khudhaynah whose hair style resembles that of Sukaynah."[521] This is why he was given the nickname "Khudhaynah." The word khudhaynah means "the wife of the dihqān," (hence,) "the mistress of the house." Maslamah appointed Sa'īd Khudhaynah as governor of Khurāsān because the latter was his son-in-law, for Sa'īd was married to Maslamah's daughter.

---

515. Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 89, adds: "in order to kill them."

516. See note 481 above.

517. Text: wa-tudkhilu taḥtāju ilayhi; read wa-tudkhilu man taḥtāju ilayhi, following the Cairo ed.

518. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 335; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 524–25; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 334; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 55; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 451–52.

519. A Bukhtiyyah camel is a species of camel of Turkoman or Bactrian breed. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 1, p. 158.

520. A district of Samarqand. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 74; Le Strange, Lands, 466.

521. Text: khudhayniyyah limmatuhu sukayniyyah. Sukaynah bt. al-Ḥusayn b. 'Alī had a special hair style that was named for her.

Maslamah Appoints Saʿīd Khudhaynah as Governor of Khurāsān

When Maslamah appointed Saʿīd Khudhaynah as governor of Khurāsān, the latter dispatched to that province, prior to his own departure, Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr, who was from the Banū Dārim. According to some authorities, Sawrah arrived there one month before Saʿīd did. Saʿīd also appointed Shuʿbah b. Ẓuhayr al-Nahshalī as governor of Samarqand. Shuʿbah set out for that province, accompanied by twenty-five members of his household, taking the road to Āmul[522] and reaching Bukhārā,[523] where he was joined by two hundred men. Then he reached al-Sughd,[524] the inhabitants of which had renounced Islam during the administration of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym al-Ghāmidī, who had served as governor for eighteen months. Subsequently, they returned to the terms of the peace treaty. Shuʿbah delivered a speech to the army of al-Sughd in which he denounced the Arab inhabitants of the province and accused them of cowardice, saying, "I do [1419] not see a wounded man among you, nor do I hear anyone groaning." They made excuses to him, attributing cowardice to their governor, ʿIlbāʾ b. Ḥabīb al-ʿAbdī, who was in charge of military affairs. Then, when Saʿīd arrived, he arrested and imprisoned the governors of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qushayrī, who had been appointed during the caliphate of ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qushayrī appealed to him on behalf of them, but Saʿīd responded, "They are accused of stealing money from the tribute." ʿAbd al-Raḥmān offered to assume liability for the stolen money—the security for them was seven hundred thousand (dirhams)—but Saʿīd did not collect the sum from him.

Next, as is reported by ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, Saʿīd was informed that eight men—including Jahm b. Zaḥr al-Juʿfī, ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz b. ʿAmr b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Zabīdī, al-Muntajiʿ b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān al-Azdī, and al-Qaʿqāʿ al-Azdī—who had been appointed as governors by 522. A town in Khurāsān situated three miles from the left bank of the Oxus. See *EI*², s.v. Āmul.

523. See *EI*², s.v. Bukhārā.

524. See note 334 above.

Yazīd b. al-Muhallab, had in their possession monies that they had stolen from the levies belonging to the Muslims. He sent for them and imprisoned them in the Marw citadel.[525] Someone said to him, "These men will not pay up unless you raise your hand against them,"[526] so he sent for Jahm b. Zaḥr, who was brought from the Marw citadel on a donkey and put on display in front of al-Fayḍ b. 'Imrān. Al-Fayḍ stood before him and struck him on the nose, whereupon Jahm said to him, "O sinner, why didn't you do that when they brought you to me, drunk on wine, and I administered the ḥadd punishment to you?" Angered by Jahm, Sa'īd administered two hundred lashes to him. The merchants praised God when Jahm b. Zaḥr received his beating. Sa'īd then ordered that Jahm and the other seven men who were in the prison were [1420] to be handed over to Warqā' b. Naṣr al-Bāhilī,[527] but when Warqā' asked to be excused from that job, Sa'īd complied with his request.

'Abd al-Ḥamīd b. Dithār—or 'Abd al-Malik b. Dithār—and al-Zubayr b. Nushayṭ, a client of the tribe of Bāhilah and husband of Sa'īd Khudhaynah's mother, said, "Give us control over their imprisonment."[528] Warqā' agreed, and they slew Jahm, 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Amr, and al-Muntaji', after torturing them; they tortured al-Qa'qā' and several others to the point of death. They were still in prison when the Turks and the Soghdian army attacked, at which point Sa'īd ordered the release of those who remained. Sa'īd used to exclaim, "May God render al-Zubayr hideous, for he slew Jahm."

In this year, the Muslims carried out raids against the Soghdians and the Turks; this was the year in which the battle took place at the fortress of al-Bāhilī.

In this year, Sa'īd Khudhaynah dismissed Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr as governor of Samarqand.[529]

---

525. Text: quhunduz Marw. On the Arabic term quhunduz, see Yāqūt, Mu'jam, IV, 419.

526. Text: tabsuṭu 'alayhim, a Qur'ānic expression. See Qur'ān 5:11, 60:2.

527. Warqā' had reportedly served as commander of the guard in Khurāsān under Qutaybah b. Muslim. See text above, II/1292, sub anno 96.

528. Text: maḥābisahum; the Cairo ed. has maḥāsibahum, "(Let us settle) the score with them."

529. See Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 222–23; Gibb, Arab Conquests, 61.

Sa'īd's Dismissal of Shu'bah and the Battle at the Fortress of al-Bāhilī

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his aforementioned authorities: When Sa'īd Khudhaynah arrived in Khurāsān, he summoned a group of *dihqān*s and asked them to recommend the names of men that he might send out to the districts. They recommended a group of Arabs, whom he then appointed. Subsequently, however, he began to receive complaints about them. One day, when the people had come to see him, he said, "I arrived in this province not knowing anything about its inhabitants, so I asked for advice, and a certain group was recommended to me. I inquired about them and, after receiving positive reports, I appointed them. I adjure you to inform me about my governors!"
[1421] Then the people praised them. But 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh al-Qushayrī said, "Had you not adjured us, I would have desisted, but now that you have adjured us I can say that you sought counsel from polytheists who recommended to you people who would be amenable to themselves and their likes. This is all that we know about them." At that, Sa'īd steadied himself on his elbow[530] and then sat up straight. Then he recited, "'Take the abundance, and bid to what is honorable, and turn away from the ignorant.'[531] Leave!"

Our source continued: Sa'īd dismissed Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr from al-Sughd, putting 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Muṭarrif b. al-Shikhkhīr in command of the military administration and Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sarī, a client of the Banū 'Uwāfah, in charge of the fiscal administration. He appointed Ma'qil b. 'Urwah al-Qushayrī as his governor in Herat,[532] whereupon Ma'qil set out for that city. The soldiers, who considered Sa'īd to be a weak man, gave him the nickname "Khudhaynah," and the Turks therefore became eager to defeat Sa'īd. The Khāqān of the Turks rallied his men and sent them to al-Sughd. The commander of the Turks was a certain 530. Text: ittakā. The Cairo ed. has ittaka'a, which means the same thing.

531. Qur'ān 7:199.
532. One of the principal cities of Khurāsān and a great trading center, strategically located on the trade routes linking the Mediterranean Sea with India and China. See *EI*², s. v. Harāt; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 396–97.

Kūrṣūl.[533] They advanced to the Bāhilah fortress, where they set up camp.

Some sources say: One of the great dihqāns wanted to marry a Bāhilī woman who was in that fortress; he sent her a proposal of marriage. When she refused, he raised up an army in the hope of capturing the inhabitants of the fortress and seizing the woman.

Kūrṣūl advanced and surrounded the inhabitants of the fortress, in which there were one hundred families. Fearing that 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh, the governor of Samarqand at the time, would be slow to send them reinforcements, they sued the Turks for peace in exchange for forty thousand (dirhams); they also gave the Turks seventeen men as hostages. Meanwhile, 'Uthmān b. 'Abdallāh called for volunteers. Al-Musayyab b. Bishr al-Riyāḥī re- [1422] sponded to the summons; in addition, four thousand men from all of the tribes volunteered. But Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr scoffed, "Had the horsemen of Khurāsān been here, they could not have attained their goal."[534] Among those who volunteered from the Banū Tamīm were Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr al-Nahshalī; Bal'ā' b. Mujāhid al-'Anzī; 'Amīrah b. Rabī'ah, one of the Banū al-'Ujayf, who is known as 'Amīrat al-Tharīd; Ghālib b. al-Muhājir al-Ṭā'ī—the paternal uncle of[535] Abū al-'Abbās al-Ṭūsī; Abū Sa'īd Mu'āwiyah b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Ṭā'ī; Thābit Quṭnah; Abū al-Muhājir b. Dārah, from the tribe of Ghaṭafān; Ḥulays[536] al-Shaybānī; al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Amr al-Ṭā'ī; Ḥassān b. Ma'dān al-Ṭā'ī; and al-Ash'ath Abū Ḥaṭāmah and 'Amr b. Ḥassān, both from the Ṭayyi'.

When the forces had assembled, al-Musayyab b. Bishr said, "You are about to arrive at the arena of the Turks, the arena of the Khāqān, and others. The reward, if you are steadfast, is Paradise, and the punishment, if you flee, is Hellfire. Let those of you who intend to attack and be steadfast come forward." At this point, thirteen hundred men left him, and he marched forwards with the rest. After advancing one farsakh (6 km.), he addressed the soldiers in terms similar to those in the first speech, and one thou-533. Kūrṣūl was also known as Köl-chür. See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 61.

534. Their goal was to rescue the Muslims from the Turks.

535. The word 'amm, "paternal uncle," is omitted in the text but supplied in the Cairo ed.

536. Text: Julays; read Ḥulays, following the Cairo ed.

sand of them withdrew. He advanced another farsakh and repeated his speech, and another thousand withdrew.[537] He marched forwards—al-Ashhab b. ʿUbayd al-Ḥanẓalī served as their guide—until he was two *farsakh*s (12 km.) from the enemy, whereupon he set up camp. Then the Turkish Khāqān, the King of Qiyy,[538] [1423] approached the Muslims and said, "All of the *dihqān*s have sworn allegiance to the other Turk,[539] but I command three hundred fighters who are at your disposal. According to my information, the inhabitants of the fortress sued the Turks for peace in return for forty thousand (dirhams); they also gave them seventeen men to serve as hostages until the tribute is paid. But when the Turks learned that you were marching towards them, they slew the hostages." Among the hostages were Nahshal b. Yazīd al-Bāhilī, who managed to escape without being slain, and al-Ashhab b. ʿUbaydallāh al-Ḥanẓalī. The (Muslims) had sworn to attack (the Turks) on the morrow or let them conquer the fortress.

That night, al-Musayyab sent out two horsemen, one an Arab and the other a non-Arab, instructing them as follows, "When you approach the fortress, tether your animals to a tree and determine the status of the people." The two men set out on a dark night, but the Turks had flooded the area around the fortress in order to prevent anyone from reaching it. When they drew near to the fortress, the sentry called out to them. They responded, "Be quiet and summon ʿAbd al-Malik b. Dithār for us." The sentry complied. The two men said to ʿAbd al-Malik, "We have been sent by al-Musayyab, and deliverance is here." He asked, "Where is he?" He replied, "Two *farsakh*s (12 km.) from here. Can you hold out for the remainder of tonight and tomorrow?" ʿAbd al-Malik said, "We have sworn to protect our women and to send them to their death ahead of us[540] so that we might all die to-

537. Thus, of four thousand initial volunteers, seven hundred remained.

538. A town near Samarqand, located on a canal of the Zarafshan River. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 452, n. 2.

539. Text: al-turk ghayrī, referring to the "Khāqān of the Turks" mentioned in text above, II/1421.

540. Text: qad ajmaʿnā ʿalā taslīmi nisāʾinā wa-taqdīmihim (sic) li-l-mawti amāmanā. The translation is conjectural.

gether tomorrow." The two men reported back to al-Musayyab, who then said to his supporters, "I will march against the enemy (immediately). If anyone wants to leave, let him go." Not a single person left him, and they swore to fight to the death.

By the time al-Musayyab set out, additional water had been released around the city in order to render it inaccessible. When he was half a farsakh (3 km.) from the Turks, he dismounted and resolved to carry out a surprise attack by night. That evening, he gave the men their orders. They saddled up their horses, and he mounted his. He urged them to be steadfast; he not only incited their interest in the rewards to be received in the next life by those who had accumulated pious deeds and were steadfast but also enticed them with the honor and booty that they would receive in this world, if they were victorious. He instructed them as follows: [1424]

> Muzzle your horses and lead them forward. When you approach the enemy, mount and attack with earnestness. Exclaim the expression "God is great" and let your battle cry be "O Muḥammad." Do not pursue someone who has turned his back and fled. You are responsible for the horses, so make their backs sore,[541] for animals with sore backs will charge them more furiously than you will. A small number of steadfast men is preferable to a large number of cowards. Nor are your numbers insignificant. One cannot strike the enemy with seven hundred swords without weakening him, regardless of his number.

Our source continued: He arranged them in their places, putting Kuthayyir b. al-Dabūsī on the right flank and a man from the tribe of Rabī'ah known as Thābit Quṭnah on the left. They marched forward until they were two bowshots away from them, whereupon they exclaimed, "God is great." This occurred at dawn. The 541. The translation is conjectural. The text is fa-'qirūhā, which literally means "cut their hamstrings." A hobbled camel, however, is presumably immobile. The hobbling of camels was indeed practiced by the Arabs as a military tactic, but as a defensive, not an offensive maneuver. See J. Jandora, "The Battle of the Yarmūk," p. 16. According to Professor Abbas, the text may be amended to read fa-a'dhirūhā, "tighten their reins."

Turks leaped to their feet. The Muslims penetrated to the middle of the camp, having made the backs of their horses sore,[542] but the Turks persevered against them. The Muslims were routed and they withdrew to al-Musayyab, pursued by the Turks, who wounded the back of al-Musayyab's horse. Many Muslims dismounted in order to fight, including al-Bakhtarī Abū 'Abdallāh al-Murā'ī; Muḥammad b. Qays al-Ghanawī—also known as Muḥammad b. Qays al-'Anbarī; Ziyād al-Iṣbahānī; Mu'āwiyah b. al-Ḥajjāj; and Thābit Quṭnah. Al-Bakhtarī fought, and when his right arm [1425] was slashed he transferred the sword to his left; it, too, was slashed, and he began to defend himself with his hands until, finally, he was slain as a martyr. Also slain as martyrs were Muḥammad b. Qays al-'Anbarī—or al-Ghanawī—and Shabīb b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Ṭā'ī.

Then the polytheists were put to flight. Thābit Quṭnah struck one of their best soldiers, slaying him. Al-Musayyab's herald called out, "Do not pursue them, for they do not understand (the meaning of) fear, whether you pursue them or not! Head for the fortress, but do not carry off any goods, except money, and do not carry off anyone who can walk." Al-Musayyab said, "Whoever carries off a woman, a young boy, or a weak person for the sake of God receives his wages from God, and whoever abstains will receive forty dirhams. If there is anyone in the fortress with whom you have a pact, take him with you."

Our source continued: They all headed for the fortress and carried off whoever was in it. A man from the Banū Fuqaym reached a woman who implored him, saying "Help me, may God help you." He halted and said, "Jump onto the back of the horse." She leaped and, behold, there she was on the back of the horse; she was more skillful on a horse than a man. Al-Fuqaymī grabbed her son's hand—he was a young child—and put him between his arms. The Muslims made their way to the Turkish Khāqān, who took them into his fortress and brought them food. He said, "Go to Samarqand and do not retrace your steps." As they were setting out for Samarqand, the Turkish Khāqān asked them, "Is there anyone left in the fortress?" They replied, "Hilāl al-Ḥarīrī." He said, "I will not abandon him." He found him, with over thirty wounds on his body, and carried him away. He recovered, but was slain subsequently together with al-Junayd at the Battle of the Pass.[543] When the Turks returned the next day, they found nothing in the fortress except the corpses of their comrades. They said, "Those who came were not human."

542. Text: fa-'aqirū-l-dawābba. See the preceding note.

Thābit Quṭnah recited:

My life for the horsemen of Tamīm, [1426] on the morning of the battle in the tight spot.
My life for horsemen who had protected me[544] from the enemy amidst the dark dust.
In the fortress of al-Bāhilī. They had seen me defending where the defender was reluctant.
With my sword, after the spear had broken, boldly.
I drove them away with a sharp, well-made sword.
Circling around them with my horse, like drinkers passing a jug of wine around.
I charge with it at the time of the adversities until the adversities vanish and I no longer feel their tight grip.
Were it not for God—He has no partner—and my striking the head of the heroic king.
Then the women of the Banū Dithār would have been driven before the Turks with their anklets uncovered.
Who among the Tamīm is conspicuous like al-Musayyab, Abū Bishr, like feathers at the wing tips of a pigeon?

Jarīr recited, mentioning al-Musayyab:

Had (the Banū) Yarbū' not protected your women, [1427] people other than you would have made use of their days of purity.
Al-Musayyab defended (them) when the two armies were in trouble, since Māzin's neighbor there has no protector.
Since there is no 'Iqāl[545] to defend your sacred things, 543. See text below, II/1546–53, sub anno 112; *EI*², s.v. al-Djunayd.

544. Text: iktafawnī; read aknafūnī, following the Cairo ed.
545. 'Iqāl b. Shabbah b. 'Iqāl al-Mujāshi'ī.

and no Zurārah[546] to defend them, nor anyone attached to Zurārah.[547]

Our source continued: That night, Abū Sa'īd Mu'āwiyah b. al-Ḥajjāj al-Ṭā'ī, who had served as a provincial governor on behalf of Sa'īd, was blinded in one eye and his hand was crippled. But when he failed to pay part of what was claimed from him, he was taken to account. Sa'īd turned him over to Shaddād b. Khulayd al-Bāhilī so that the latter might settle the account with him and retrieve (the money). Shaddād treated Abū Sa'īd harshly, causing the latter to exclaim, "O tribe of Qays, when I went to the fortress of al-Bāhilī, I was a man of great might and powerful eyesight. But I was blinded in one eye and my arm was crippled while fighting with the other warriors in the effort to rescue (the Muslims in the fortress) who were on the verge of being either slain, captured, or imprisoned. Now look at the manner in which your comrade is treating me! Keep him away from me." They released him.

According to 'Abdallāh b. Muḥammad—a man who was present that night at the fortress of al-Bāhilī: "We were inside the [1428] fortress, and when the two armies engaged in battle, we thought that the Day of Resurrection had arrived on account of what we heard, namely, the groans emitted by the soldiers, the clashing of iron, and the neighing of the horses."

In this year, Sa'īd Khudhaynah crossed over the Balkh River and attacked the Soghdians, who had violated their treaty and aided the Turks against the Muslims.[548]

Sa'īd Khudhaynah's Military Expedition against the Soghdians

It is reported that Sa'īd carried out this military expedition because, after the Turks returned to al-Sughd, the troops spoke to him, saying, "The fact that you are no longer carrying out military expeditions has allowed the Turks to take the offensive and caused the Soghdians to renounce Islam." He therefore crossed over the river and headed for al-Sughd. He was met by the Turks, 546. Zurārah b. 'Udus.

547. Text: zurrār; the Cairo ed. has wuzzār. See Dīwān Jarīr, I, 326.
548. See Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 55.

together with a detachment of the Soghdian army, but the Muslims put them to flight. Sa'īd said, "Do not pursue them, for al-Sughd is the garden of the Commander of the Faithful, and you have already defeated them. Do you want to annihilate them? O army of Iraq, you have fought against the caliphs several times, but did they destroy you?"

The Muslims advanced until they reached a gorge that stood between them and the meadow.[549] 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ declared, "Let no man who is clad in armor nor any foot soldier cross over this gorge; everyone else may cross over." They crossed over. But the Turks saw them and prepared an ambush. The Muslim cavalry appeared before them, and the two armies engaged in battle. The Turks retreated, and the Muslims pursued them until they passed by the ambuscade, where they were attacked (by the Turks) and put to flight, retreating all the way back to the gorge. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Ṣubḥ said to them, "Try to defeat them without crossing over, for if you do cross over, they will destroy you." They held off the Turks, who eventually withdrew without being [1429] pursued by the Muslims.

Some authorities say: Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr and his forces were killed on that very day. Other authorities say: The Turks withdrew from them on that day, accompanied by a detachment of the Soghdian army, having been defeated. The next day, a Muslim vanguard—the members of the vanguard at that time were from the Banū Tamīm—went out and were surprised by the Turks, who attacked them from behind a thicket. Shu'bah b. Ẓuhayr, who was in command of the cavalry of the Banū Tamīm, fought against them but was slain when they drove him off his mount. One of the Arab soldiers was slain and his slave girl was brought out carrying some henna. She exclaimed, "How long shall I prepare henna such as this for you when you are dyed with blood?" She spoke for a long time, bringing the inhabitants of the military camp to tears. Approximately fifty soldiers were slain, and the members of the vanguard were put to flight.

When the cry for help reached the troops, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Muhallab al-'Adawī said, "I was the first one to reach them after we received the news. I was riding a swift horse and, behold, there was 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr[550] next to a tree. There were so many arrows in his body that he looked like a porcupine. He had been slain."

549. Apparently, a meadow in al-Sughd.

Al-Khalīl b. Aws al-'Abshamī, a young man from the Banū Ẓālim, mounted his horse and cried out, "O Banū Tamīm, I am al-Khalīl. Follow me." A detachment of soldiers joined al-Khalīl, who attacked the enemy with them. They held off the enemy, keeping them far away[551] from the soldiers until the military commander arrived with reinforcements and the enemy was put to flight. Al-Khalīl became the leader of the Banū Tamīm cavalry on that day, a position he held until Naṣr b. Sayyār was appointed governor (of Khurāsān),[552] at which point al-Khalīl's brother, al-Ḥakam b. Aws, became the leader of the Banū Tamīm.

[1430] According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his shaykhs: Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr said to Ḥayyān, "Leave, O Ḥayyān." He exclaimed, "Shall I abandon God's martyrs and depart?" He said, "O you Nabataean." He said, "May God cause you to become a Nabataean."[553] He said: Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī's nom de guerre was Abū al-Hayyāj.[554] About him the poet recited:

Verily, Abū al-Hayyāj is generous in assistance. The wind makes a sound in his garments.

Our source continued: Sa'īd crossed over the river twice but did not pass beyond Samarqand. On the first occasion, after establishing his camp across from the enemy, he was advised by Ḥayyān, the client of Maṣqalah b. Hubayrah al-Shaybānī, "O commander, attack the Soghdian army." But he replied, "No, these lands belong to the Commander of the Faithful." Later, however, he inquired about some smoke rising into the sky and was told, "The Soghdians have renounced Islam, and some of the Turks are with them." Only then did Sa'īd initiate a skirmish, whereupon the Soghdians were put to flight with the Muslims close on their heels. But Sa'īd's herald called out, "Do not pursue them, for al-Sughd is the garden of the Commander of the Faithful, and you 550. 'Abdallāh b. Zuhayr b. Salīm al-Azdī.

551. Text: wa-warra'ūhu; read wa-waza'ūhum, following the Cairo ed.
552. See text below, II/1659ff., sub anno 120.
553. Text: anbaṭa-llāhu wajhaka. This was considered an insult. See note 471, above.
554. Abū al-Hayyāj literally means "Father of fury."

have already put them to flight. Do you want to annihilate them? O army of Iraq, you fought against the Commander of the Faithful several times; but he forgave you and did not seek to destroy you, and he withdrew."

The next year, Sa'īd sent some men from the Banū Tamīm on a mission to Waraghsar.[555] They said, "Would that we might encounter the enemy so that we could attack them." But whenever a raiding party sent by Sa'īd scored a victory, acquiring booty and taking prisoners, he would send back the captives' women and children and punish the raiding party. Al-Hajarī, who was a poet, recited:

You advanced toward the enemy by night playing with a concubine, [1431] with your penis drawn and your sword sheathed.
And you are for your enemies a very courteous wife.[556]
Against us you are like a sharp sword.
How excellent were the Soghdians when they assembled!
And how strange your wavering stratagem!

Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr, who had protected Ḥayyān al-Nabaṭī despite the fact that the latter had insulted him by saying, "May God cause you to become a Nabataean!," said to Sa'īd, "That slave is the person most hostile to the Arabs and to the provincial governors. He ruined Khurāsān for Qutaybah b. Muslim and he will fall upon you, ruining Khurāsān for you. Then he will fortify himself inside one of those strongholds." Sa'īd replied, "O Sawrah, don't mention this to anyone." Several days later, Sa'īd asked for sour milk to be brought to his chamber. Some gold that he had ordered previously was ground into powder and put in Ḥayyān's cup. Ḥayyān drank the sour milk that had been laced with gold powder. Sa'īd and his soldiers then mounted their horses and rode four farsakhs (24 km.) to Bārkath,[557] pretending that they were pursuing an enemy. Then they returned. Ḥayyān lived for four days after drinking the milk and died on the fourth day.

555. Literally, "the head of the dam"; one of the twelve districts of Samarqand. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 372; Barthold, Turkestan, 83, 92.

556. Text: 'irsu khafiyyatin, "a hidden wife." This should be amended to read 'irsun ḥafiyyatun. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

557. The chief town in Buzmājan, which was one of the districts of Samarqand, on the main road to the Syr Darya. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 320; Barthold, Turkestan, 94; Le Strange, Lands, 466.

Saʿīd placed heavy burdens on the soldiers, who considered him to be weak. There was a man from the Banū Asad by the name of [1432] Ismāʿīl who was devoted to Marwān b. Muḥammad.[558] Someone mentioned Ismāʿīl's devotion to Marwān, in the presence of Khudhaynah, causing Saʿīd to exclaim, "Who is this bastard?" In response, Ismāʿīl satirized him, saying:

Khudhaynah alleges that I am a bastard, but Khudhaynah has the mirror and the comb.
(Incense) burners and kohl containers have been laid out, and musical instruments. On her cheek are spots.
Is this better, or a full coat of mail composed of double rings, and a sharp sword fashioned to cut,
In the possession of a trustworthy, powerful male, not nourished by effeminacy and effeminate embellishments?[559]
Are you angry because your mother's son spent the night with them and because your father has no reputation?
Verily, I saw their arrows covered with fitting feathers, while your arrows are featherless.[560]
And I saw them reclining on their cushions at the assembly place, while you were roaming astray in the desert.[561]

In this year, Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik departed for Syria after having been relieved of his duties in Iraq and Khurāsān.[562]

The Dismissal of Maslamah from Iraq and Khurāsān

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad, Maslamah was dismissed because, after being put in charge of the provinces of Iraq and 558. Marwān b. Muḥammad b. Marwān al-Jaʿdī was an Umayyad general and later Caliph. See EI, s.v. Marwān II b. Muḥammad.

559. Text: wa-l-laqṭu, "and the (base) status of being a foundling." This should be amended to read wa-l-luʿṭu. A luʿṭah is a black or yellow line that a woman draws on her cheek. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

560. Text: innī raʾaytu nibālahum kusiyat rīsha-l-luʾām wa-nablukum murṭ. That is to say, their men were positioned in the right places, while yours were not. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 3, p. 1200; Wörterbuch, s.v., luʾām.

561. Text: wa-antum khilṭu, "while you were half-breeds." This should be amended to read wa-antum ḫulṭu. I owe this point to Professor Abbas.

562. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 335; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 337; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 55; Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 16; FHA, 75.

Khurāsān, he did not send the surplus tribute (to Damascus).[563] Yazīd b. 'Ātikah[564] wanted to dismiss him, but was ashamed to do so. He wrote to him, saying, "Appoint a deputy governor and come here." [1433]

It is reported that Maslamah consulted with 'Abd al-'Azīz b. Ḥātim b. al-Nu'mān regarding his departure to visit Ibn 'Ātikah. 'Abd al-'Azīz said to him, "Are you going because you long for him? Why are you so emotional when you have recently been with him?" Maslamah said, "I must go." 'Abd al-'Azīz said, "In that case, no sooner will you leave this province than you will meet the new governor." Then Maslamah departed. At Dūrayn[565] he was met by 'Umar b. Hubayrah, who was traveling with five post-horses. Ibn Hubayrah came in to greet him, and Maslamah asked, "Where are you going, Ibn Hubayrah?" He replied, "The Commander of the Faithful sent me to collect the wealth of the Muhallabids." When he left, Maslamah sent for 'Abd al-'Azīz, who came to him. Maslamah said, "Behold, Ibn Hubayrah met us, as you know." 'Abd al-'Azīz said, "I told you so." He said, "But Yazīd sent him merely for the purpose of collecting the wealth of the Muhallabids." He said, "(Do you believe that) Ibn Hubayrah has been dismissed from al-Jazīrah and sent to collect the wealth of the Muhallabids? The latter is more astonishing than the former!"[566] Shortly thereafter Maslamah learned that Ibn Hubayrah had dismissed the governors he had appointed and treated them roughly. Al-Farazdaq recited:

The horses carried Maslamah away, bidding farewell.[567]
So graze, Fazārah,[568] (but) may the grazing not fatten you!
Ibn Bishr was dismissed, and Ibn 'Amr before him, and the governor of Herat expects a similar fate.
I know that if the Fazārah are invested with authority,

563. Text: lam yarfa' min al-kharāj shay'an. See FHA, 75, where the text is lam yursil ilā Yazīd shay'an, "He did not send anything to Yazīd."

564. That is, his brother, the Caliph, Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik. See note 153, above.

565. There is no entry for Durayn in Yāqūt's geographical dictionary. Dūr and Dūrān were common place names in Iraq.

566. 'Abd al-'Azīz means that Maslamah's naiveté with regard to the real purpose of Ibn Hubayrah's mission is more astonishing than his naiveté with regard to his recall by the Caliph.

567. Text: muwadda'an; read muwaddi'an, following the Cairo ed.

568. 'Umar b. Hubayrah was from the tribe of Fazārah.

the Ashja' will soon covet the emirate.
What is their situation vis-à-vis your Lord's creatures? The likes of them do covet something similar to what the Fazārah attained.[569]

[1434] "Ibn Bishr" refers to 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr b. Marwān; "Ibn 'Amr" refers to Muḥammad Dhū al-Shāmah b. 'Amr b. al-Walīd; and "the governor of Herat" refers to Sa'īd Khudhaynah b. 'Abd al-'Azīz, who served as governor of Khurāsān on behalf of Maslamah.

In this year, 'Umar b. Hubayrah attacked the Byzantines in Armenia, putting them to flight and capturing large numbers of prisoners. According to some sources, he took seven hundred prisoners.

It is reported that in this year, Maysarah sent his messengers from Iraq to Khurāsān, where the ('Abbāsid) propaganda began to circulate.[570] A man from the Banū Tamīm by the name of 'Amr b. Baḥīr b. Warqā' al-Sa'dī came to Sa'īd Khudhaynah and said, "There are people here who are saying ugly things." Sa'īd sent for them, and when they were brought to him, he asked, "Who are you?" They replied, "We are merchants." He asked, "What is the meaning of the things that are being said about you?" They replied, "We don't know." He asked, "Have you come to disseminate propaganda?" They replied, "We are too busy with our personal affairs and with our business to be able to do that." He asked, "Who knows these people?" Some soldiers from the army of Khurāsān, the majority of whom were from the tribes of Rabī'ah and Yaman, came and said, "We know them and will assume responsibility for them should they do anything that you find displeasing." Then he released them.[571]

[1435] In this year, that is, the year 102/720–21, Yazīd b. Abī Muslim was slain in Ifrīqiyah,[572] where he had been serving as governor.[573]

569. See Dīwān al-Farazdaq, I, 408.

570. See text above, II/1358, sub anno 100, note 310.

571. Many of the clients who served as leaders of the 'Abbāsid propaganda movement posed as members of the merchant and artisan class in order to provide camouflage for their clandestine activities. See Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 335; Sharon, Black Banners, 144.

572. The eastern part of the Maghrib. See *EI*², s.v. Ifrīḳiya.

573. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 333; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 56–57.

The Slaying of Yazīd b. Abī Muslim

It is reported that the circumstances of Yazīd's death were as follows: He had determined to apply to (the inhabitants of Ifrīqiyah) the policy that al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf had applied to those Muslims living in the garrison towns who were originally protected peoples (ahl al-dhimmah) from the rural districts; although they converted to Islam in Iraq, al-Ḥajjāj sent them back to their villages and lands, where they were made to pay the poll tax,[574] just as they had been prior to their conversion. When Yazīd determined to carry out such a policy, they plotted against him, reportedly resolving to murder him. They slew him and appointed as their leader the person who had served as their governor prior to Yazīd b. Abī Muslim, that is, Muḥammad b. Yazīd, a client of the Helpers, who was a soldier in Yazīd b. Abī Muslim's army. They wrote to Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik as follows: "We have not renounced our allegiance to you. However, Yazīd b. Abī Muslim imposed on us things that were displeasing to God and to the Muslims, so we slew him and reappointed your governor." Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik wrote back to them, saying, "Indeed, I was not pleased with the policies of Yazīd b. Abī Muslim and I hereby confirm Muḥammad b. Yazīd as governor of Ifrīqiyah."[575]

In this year, 'Umar b. Hubayrah b. Mu'ayyah b. Sukayn b. Khudhayj b. Mālik b. Sa'd b. 'Adī b. Fazārah was appointed governor of Iraq and Khurāsān. [1436]

In this year, the pilgrimage was led by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk, as reported by Abū Ma'shar and al-Wāqidī.

'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk was governor of Medina; 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd was governor of Mecca; Muḥammad b. 'Amr Dhū al-Shāmah was governor of al-Kūfah; al-Qāsim b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Mas'ūd was in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah; 'Abd al-Malik b. Bishr b. Marwān was governor of al-Baṣrah; Sa'īd Khudhaynah was governor of Khurāsān; and Usāmah b. Zayd was governor of Egypt.

574. Literally, "The jizyah was sealed on their necks."

575. But see Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 57, where it is reported that Yazīd appointed Bishr b. Ṣafwān al-Kalbī as the new governor.

The Events of the Year

103

(JULY 1, 721—JUNE 20, 722)

The Dismissal of Sa'īd Khudhaynah as Governor of Khurāsān

Among the events of this year was 'Umar b. Hubayrah's dismissal of Sa'īd Khudhaynah as governor of Khurāsān.[576] The circumstances of his dismissal, as reported by 'Alī b. Muḥammad on the authority of his shaykhs, were as follows: Al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī and 'Abdallāh b. 'Umayr al-Laythī approached 'Umar b. Hubayrah and complained to him about Sa'īd. As a result, 'Umar dismissed Sa'īd and appointed as governor of Khurāsān Sa'īd b. 'Amr b. al-Aswad b. Mālik b. Ka'b b. Waqdān b. al-Ḥarīsh b. Ka'b b. Rabī'ah b. 'Āmir b. Ṣa'ṣa'ah. Khudhaynah, at the time, was on a military expedition near the Gate of Samarqand. The soldiers learned of his dismissal, and Khudhaynah turned back, leaving a thousand horsemen in Samarqand. Nahār b. Tawsi'ah recited:

[1437] Who will inform the youths of my tribe that the arrows are completely covered with feathers?[577]

576. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 223.
577. Text: rīshat kulla raysh. See note 560, above.

And that God replaced one Sa'īd with another—not the effeminate one from the Quraysh?

Our source continued: Sa'īd al-Ḥarashī did not interfere with any of Khudhaynah's governors. When the man who read out his document of appointment made a grammatical mistake, Sa'īd exclaimed, "Be quiet. Whatever you people heard is the responsibility of the scribe, and the governor (that is, 'Umar b. Hubayrah) is free from any guilt." In connection with this statement, the poet recited the following verse in which he attributed weakness to al-Ḥarashī:

We were given one Sa'īd for another—bad fortune and the ordained fate.

Al-Ṭabarī reported: In this year, al-'Abbās b. al-Walīd attacked the Byzantines and conquered a city known as Raslah.[578]

In this year, the Turks invaded Alān.[579]

In this year, Mecca was added to the jurisdiction of 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Fihrī and combined with his jurisdiction over Medina.

In this year, 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh al-Naḍrī was appointed governor of al-Ṭā'if, and 'Abd al-'Azīz b. 'Abdallāh b. Khālid b. Asīd was dismissed from Mecca.

In this year, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk was ordered to effect a reconciliation between Abū Bakr b. Muḥammad b. 'Amr b. Ḥazm and 'Uthmān b. Ḥayyān al-Murrī. The relations between 'Abd al-Raḥmān and the other two men in previous years has already been mentioned.[580]

In this year, the pilgrimage was led by 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī—as reported by Abū Ma'shar and al-Wāqidī.

In this year, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk was governor of Mecca and Medina on behalf of Yazīd b. 'Ātikah; 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh al-Naḍrī was governor of al-Ṭā'if; 'Umar b. Hubayrah was governor of Iraq and Khurāsān; Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Ḥarashī was [1438]

578. Raslah may be the Byzantine city of Larissa. See Cheira, Arabes et Byzantines, 222, n. 1, and the sources cited there. Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 17, gives the name of the city as Awāsā.

579. A region in the northern Caucasus near Bāb al-Abwāb inhabited by the Alans, an Iranian people. See *EI*², s.v. Alān; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 8.

580. See text above, II/1281–82, sub anno 96; and II/1372–75, sub anno 101.

governor of Khurāsān on behalf of ʿUmar b. Hubayrah; al-Qāsim b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh b. Masʿūd was in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah; and ʿAbd al-Malik b. Yaʿlā was in charge of the judiciary in al-Baṣrah.

In this year, ʿUmar b. Hubayrah appointed Saʿīd b. ʿAmr al-Ḥarashī as governor of Khurāsān.[581]

ʿUmar b. Hubayrah's Appointment of Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī as Governor of Khurāsān

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: When Ibn Hubayrah was appointed governor of Iraq, he sent Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik the names of those men who had demonstrated their bravery at the battle of al-ʿAqr.[582] Al-Ḥarashī's name did not appear on the list, causing Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik to exclaim, "Why didn't he mention al-Ḥarashī?" Yazīd then wrote to Ibn Hubayrah, ordering him to appoint al-Ḥarashī as governor of Khurāsān, which he did. Al-Ḥarashī dispatched al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim al-Sulamī to take command of his vanguard in the year 103/721–22. Then al-Ḥarashī traveled to Khurāsān, where he found the army face to face with the enemy, having already suffered a disastrous defeat. In a speech to the soldiers, he urged them to engage in holy war, saying, "The struggle against the enemy of Islam is not undertaken on the basis of numbers, but on the basis of the support of God and the might of Islam. Say, 'There is no power and no strength except in God.'" Then he recited the following lines:

I don't belong to the ʿĀmir if you do not see me in front of the horsemen stabbing with the spearheads.
[1439] For I will strike the head of their greatest warrior with the edge of a well-polished, sharp sword.
I am not one who submits in battles, nor do I fear the combat of the soldiers.
My father protected me from every censure,

581. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 26; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 223; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 452.

582. See text above, II/1395ff., sub anno 102.

and my maternal uncle is the best maternal uncle during times of misfortune.
When the tribe of Ka'b paraded haughtily before me, and the Banū Hilāl strutted like mountains.

In this year, at the time of Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Ḥarashī's arrival, the Soghdian army left their lands and traveled to Farghānah, where they asked the king for assistance against the Muslims.[583]

The Soghdians Leave Their Country for Farghānah

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: The Soghdians had aided the Turks during the administration of Khudhaynah. Therefore, when al-Ḥarashī was appointed as their governor, they feared for their lives, and their leaders resolved to leave their lands. Their king, however, advised them as follows: "Don't do this. Stay where you are; pay him whatever tribute you owe and guarantee him all future tribute; promise him that you will maintain your lands in a good state of cultivation and that you will accompany him on raids should he desire that; apologize for your past behavior, and give him hostages to hold." They said, "We fear that he will not be satisfied and that he will not accept these terms from us. Therefore, we are going to Khujandah,[584] where we will ask the king for protection. Then we will send a message to the governor (that is, al-Ḥarashī), asking him to forgive us for our past behavior and assuring him that henceforth we will not commit any repugnant acts." Their king said, "I am one of you, and my advice to you is in your best interests." But they rejected [1440] his advice and set out for Khujandah.

Kārzanj, Kishshīn, Bayārkath, and Thābit took the army of Ishtīkhan,[585] and they sent a message to al-Ṭār, the King of Farghānah, asking him to protect them and to allow them to settle in 583. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 335–36; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 452–54.

584. A town and district in Transoxiana; the town was strung out along the left bank of the middle Sir Darya at the entrance to the Farghānah valley. See *EI*², s.v. Khudjand(a); Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 347–48.

585. A city five farsakhs (30 km.) from Samarqand that was administered independently of the latter. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 196.

his city. He was on the verge of agreeing when his mother said to him, "Don't let those satans enter your city. Rather, clear out some rural district for them to reside in." He sent to them, saying, "Name a rural district so that I might clear it out for you. Give me a delay of forty days"—according to some sources—twenty days. "If you wish, I will clear out for you the pass occupied by ʿIṣām b. ʿAbdallāh al-Bāhilī, who had been left behind by Qutaybah to serve as their governor. They agreed to accept ʿIṣām's Pass and sent to al-Ṭār, saying, "Clear it out for us." He said, "I will, but you have no agreement and no covenant of protection with me until you enter it. If the Arabs should overtake you before you enter it, I will not protect you." They accepted his terms, and he cleared out the pass for them.

Some authorities say: Ibn Hubayrah appealed to them before they left their lands, asking them to remain and offering to appoint a governor of their choice. But they rejected his offer and set out for Khujandah.

ʿIṣām's Pass is in the rural district controlled by Asfarah, who at that time was the heir apparent to the King of Farghānah, Bilādhā.[586] Bīlādhā,[587] Abū Anūjūr, was the King.

It is said that Kārzanj said to them, "I will give you three options from which to choose. Failure to choose at least one will result in your destruction. Saʿīd, who is known as "the horseman [1441] of the Arabs," has sent ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qushayrī with his vanguard, leading a detachment of his men. Carry out a surprise attack against him at night and kill him. Thus, when al-Ḥarashī learns of this, he will not attack you." But they rejected this suggestion. He said, "Cross over the Shāsh River[588] and ask them, 'What do you want from us?' If they respond then you are saved; if not, then go to Sūyāb."[589] This, too, they rejected. He said, "Then pay them (the tribute)."

586. But see text above, II/1440, where the King of Farghānah is identified as al-Ṭār.

587. The discrepancy in the spelling of the King's name is in the text. De Goeje suggests that Bilādhā and Bīlādhā should both be read Naylān as at text below, II/1442 sub anno 104 and II/1554, sub anno 112.

588. The Shāsh River is in Transoxiana. See EI, s.v. Tashkent; Yāqūt, Muʿjam, III, 308–09.

589. The Turgesh capital, destroyed by the Chinese in A.D. 748. See Barthold, Turkestan, 195, 201.

Our source continued: Kārzanj and Jalnaj set out with the army of Qiyy, while Abār b. Mākhnūn and Thābit set out with the army of Ishtīkhan. The army of Bayārkath[590] and the army of Sabaskath[591] set out with a thousand men wearing gold belts, accompanied by the *dihqān*s of Buzmājan.[592] Al-Dīwāshinī set out with the army of Bunjīkath[593] for the fortress of Abghar. Kārzanj and the Soghdian army reached Khujandah.

590. There is no entry for Bayārkath in Yāqūt's geographical dictionary. Bayārkath may be identical with the place name Bārkath mentioned at text above, II/1431, sub anno 102, or with the personal name mentioned at text above, II/1440. Kath is the usual ending of town names.

591. Yāqūt mentions a town by the name of Isbaskath, two *farsakh*s (12 km.) from Samarqand. See Mu'jam, I, 172.

592. One of the twelve districts of Samarqand; its chief town was Bārkath. See Barthold, Turkestan, 92, 94; Le Strange, Lands, 466.

593. A town near Samarqand; it is not to be confused with the town of the same name in Ushrūsanah (see n. 598, below). See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 452, n. 2; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 499.

The Events of the Year

104

(JUNE 21, 722—JUNE 9, 723)

In this year, the battle took place between al-Ḥarashī and the Soghdian army in which he slew many dihqāns.[594]

The Battle between al-Ḥarashī and the Soghdian Army

According to ʿAlī—his authorities: Al-Ḥarashī undertook a military expedition in the year 104/722–23. He crossed over the river [1442] and reviewed the soldiers. Then he traveled to Qaṣr al-Rīḥ ("The Castle of the Winds"),[595] two farsakhs (12 km.) from al-Dabūsiyah,[596] where he set up camp. But his army did not join him. Therefore, al-Ḥarashī ordered the soldiers to pack up and leave. But Hilāl b. ʿUlaym al-Ḥanẓalī rebuked him, saying, "I say! You are a better political leader than you are a military commander. The land has no one to defend it. Yet, when your army failed to join you, you gave the order to pack up and leave." Al-Ḥarashī asked, "What should I do?" Hilāl replied, "Order them to establish camp." Al-Ḥarashī accepted his advice.

594. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 26–27.

595. A village in the area of Nīshāpūr. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, IV, 357; Le Strange, Lands, 388, 430.

596. A town in Transoxiana located in the administrative district of al-Sughd. See Yāqūt, Muʿjam, II, 437–38; Le Strange, Lands, 468, 471.

Al-Naylān, the paternal cousin of the King of Farghānah, came to al-Ḥarashī, who had set up camp near Mughūn,[597] and said, "The Soghdian army is in Khujandah." Al-Naylān apprised al-Ḥarashī of their actions and said, "Try to overtake them before they reach 'Iṣām's Pass, for their protection agreement with us does not take effect until the expiration of the (forty day) time period." Al-Ḥarashī put 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī and Ziyād b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Qushayrī in command of a division of soldiers and sent them off, accompanied by al-Naylān. Subsequently, however, he regretted what he had done, saying, "I have endangered the lives of a division of Muslims on the strength of what I was told by an infidel. But I don't know if he was telling the truth or lying." Al-Ḥarashī set off in pursuit of them, reaching Ushrūsanah,[598] where he made peace with (the inhabitants of that district) in return for a trifling sum. Then, while he was eating his dinner, one of his men interrupted him, saying, "'Aṭā' al-Dabūsī is here." He was one of the men whom al-Ḥarashī had sent with al-Qushayrī. Startled, al-Ḥarashī dropped the morsel of food that was in his hand and summoned 'Aṭā'. When he entered, al-Ḥarashī asked, "Woe is you! Have you engaged anyone in battle?" He replied, "No." He said, "Praise be to God." Al-Ḥarashī resumed his meal and informed 'Aṭā' of his regrets regarding the mission.[599]

Al-Ḥarashī set out at an extremely quick pace and managed to catch up with al-Qushayrī after three days. He advanced and, [1443] upon reaching Khujandah, he asked al-Faḍl b. Bassām, "What do you think we should do?" He replied, "I think we should attack

597. One of the villages of Busht, in the administrative district of Nīshāpūr. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, V, 162.

598. The mountainous district between Samarqand and Khujandah, including the upper course of the Zarafshan River. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 197; *EI*², s.v. Afshīn; Le Strange, Lands, 474–76.

599. Text: mā qadama lahu 'alayhi. The translation is conjectural.

them immediately." He said, "I disagree. Where can a soldier go if he is wounded, and where can we take the body of someone who is slain? I think that we should establish camp here, proceed deliberately, and make preparations for battle." He established camp, erecting some buildings and busying himself with preparations. But when the enemy did not come forward, the soldiers accused al-Ḥarashī of cowardice, saying, "That one is renowned for his valor and good judgment in Iraq, but when he comes to Khurāsān, he acts like a fool."

One of the Arab soldiers attacked, striking the Khujandah gate with a pole, whereupon the gate was opened. Earlier, the Soghdians had dug a defensive trench on the outskirts of the city, beyond the outer gate. They covered the trench with reeds and placed dirt on top of it, as a trick. They reasoned that if they were forced to retreat after the two armies met in battle, they would know the way, while the Muslims, who would not, would fall into the trench. When the Soghdians emerged, they fought the Muslims and were put to flight, but they took the wrong path and fell into the trench. The Muslims removed forty soldiers from the trench, each one wearing a double coat of mail. Al-Ḥarashī surrounded the city, setting up mangonels. The Soghdians sent a message to the King of Farghānah, claiming that he had deceived them and asking for assistance. In his reply, he said to them, "I did not deceive you, nor will I help you. Take care of yourselves, for the Arabs reached you before the deadline expired. Thus, you are not under my protection." When the Soghdians had despaired of receiving his assistance, they sued for peace and asked for safe-conduct so that they might return to al-Sughd. Al-Ḥarashī im-[1444] posed the following stipulations on them: they were to return the Arab women and children who were in their possession, pay all arrears in tribute, not murder anyone, and not leave anyone behind in Khujandah. Furthermore, if they caused any mischief, their blood would become lawful.

The man who negotiated the agreement between the two sides was Mūsā b. Mishkān, a client of the Bassām family. Kārzanj approached al-Ḥarashī and said, "I have a favor to ask of you." He asked, "What is it?" He said, "If one of my men commits a crime after the peace treaty has taken effect, I want you to absolve me of responsibility for his action." Al-Ḥarashī said, "I have a favor to ask of you." He asked, "What is it?" He said, "Don't attach anything repugnant to my stipulations!"

He removed the nobles[600] and merchants from the eastern side of the town, but left the people of Khujandah, who were the inhabitants of the town, as they were. Kārzanj asked al-Ḥarashī, "What are you doing?" He replied, "I fear that the army will attack you without permission."[601]

The Soghdian leaders who were with al-Ḥarashī in the military camp stayed as guests with the soldiers who were known to them. Kārzanj stayed with Ayyūb b. Abī Ḥassān. When al-Ḥarashī was told that the Soghdians had slain one of the women who had been in their possession, he said to them, "I have learned that Thābit al-Ishtīkhanī slew a woman and buried her under a walled garden." But they denied the allegation. Al-Ḥarashī sent for the judge of Khujandah and upon investigation it was determined that the woman had, indeed, been slain.

Our source continued: Al-Ḥarashī summoned Thābit. Meanwhile, Kārzanj sent his servant to the Surādiq Gate to gather information. Al-Ḥarashī asked Thābit and others about the woman, but Thābit denied the charge. Convinced that Thābit had slain her, al-Ḥarashī put him to death. The servant then returned to Kārzanj and informed him that Thābit had been slain, whereupon Kārzanj grabbed his beard and began to bite it off with his teeth. Fearing that al-Ḥarashī would slay the Soghdians indiscriminately, Kārzanj said to Ayyūb b. Abī Ḥassān, "I am your guest and [1445] your friend. How will it look if your friend is slain wearing old, worn-out trousers?" Ayyūb said, "Take my trousers." Kārzanj replied, "How will it look if I am slain wearing your trousers? Send one of your servants to my nephew, Jalnaj, so that he might bring me new trousers." Earlier, Kārzanj had explained to his nephew, "If I send to you asking for trousers, you will know that they intend to slay me." When his nephew received the request for trousers, he took out some green cloth, cut it into strips, and tied the strips around the heads of his armed retinue. Then he went out, accompanied by his armed retinue, and advanced 600. Text: al-mulūk, literally "kings."

601. Text: akhāfu 'alaykum ma'arrata-l-jund. This may also mean, "I want to spare you the disgrace that may be brought upon you by the soldiers."

against the soldiers, killing many men. He passed by Yaḥyā b. Ḥuḍayn and wounded him slightly on his leg, leaving him with a permanent limp. The inhabitants of the military camp submitted, and the soldiers suffered greatly from Jalnaj, until he encountered Thābit b. ʿUthmān b. Masʿūd on a narrow road. Thābit slew him using ʿUthmān b. Masʿūd's sword.

The Soghdians slew one hundred and fifty Muslim prisoners who were in their possession. Some say: they slew forty of them. A young boy escaped and informed al-Ḥarashī of the slaughter. Some say: A man came to him and reported what was happening. He asked the Soghdians about the Muslim prisoners but, when they denied the allegation, he sent someone to them in order to determine what was happening. Upon discovering that the report was true, al-Ḥarashī ordered that the Soghdians be put to death. First, however, he separated the merchants from the rest of them—there were four hundred merchants who possessed large quantities of merchandise; they had brought the wares from China.

Our source continued: Although they did not have any weapons the Soghdian soldiers tried to defend themselves. They fought with wooden clubs and were slain to the last man. The next day, al-Ḥarashī summoned the farmers, who were unaware of what their comrades had done. He put a seal on every man's neck and sent him from one field to the next, whereupon the man would be slain. There were three thousand of them. Some say: There were [1446] seven thousand. Al-Ḥarashī sent Jarīr b. Himyān, al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-ʿAmarraṭah, and Yazīd b. Abī Zaynab to assess the value of the property belonging to the merchants who had been separated from the others. The merchants said, "We shall not participate in the fighting." He made a selection from the property of the Soghdians and from their women and children, taking whatever he wanted. Then he summoned Muslim b. Budayl al-ʿAdawī, from the tribe of ʿAdī of al-Ribāb and said, "I am putting you in charge of dividing up the spoils." Muslim said, "After what your agents did during the night, you can give the job to someone else!" Al-Ḥarashī then assigned this task to ʿUbaydallāh b. Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān al-ʿAdawī, who put aside the fifth and then divided up the wealth. Al-Ḥarashī wrote a letter to Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, but he did not write to ʿUmar b. Hubayrah. This is one reason why ʿUmar

b. Hubayrah was angry with him. Thābit Quṭnah recited, recalling the leaders that they had slain:

There is consolation in the slaughter of Kārzanj and Kishshīn and the fate of Bayār,
And Dīwāshinī, and the fate of Jalnaj, in the fortress of Khujandah, when they perished and were annihilated.

According to another transmission, the first line cited reads: "There is consolation in the slaughter of Kārzanj and Kishkīsh." It is said that Dīwāshinī was a Samarqandian dihqān whose name, Dīwā-shanj, was arabicized as Dīwāshinī.

It is reported that 'Ilbā' b. Aḥmar al-Yashkurī, who was in charge of the spoils in Khujandah, sold a small basket to a man for two dirhams. When the man found gold ingots in the basket, he returned clutching his beard; his eyes bulged out of his head.[602] [1447] He returned the basket and took back his two dirhams. They looked for him, but did not find him.

Our source said: Al-Ḥarashī sent Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sarī, a client of the Banū 'Uwāfah, to a fortress that was surrounded by the wādī of al-Sughd[603] on all sides except one. He was accompanied by Shawkar b. Ḥamīk, by the Khwārazm Shāh,[604] and by 'Awram, the ruler of Akhrūn[605] and Shūmān.[606] Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sariyy put al-Mussayab b. Bishr al-Riyāḥī in command of his vanguard and dispatched him. The Soghdians met him one farsakh (6 km.) from the fortress in a village known as Kūm,[607] where al-Musayyab defeated them, forcing them back into the fortress. Sulaymān then besieged them. The dihqān of the fortress was known as "Dīwāshinī."

Al-Ḥarashī wrote to Sulaymān offering to send reinforcements.

---

602. Text: ka-annahu ramada. Literally: "as if he were suffering from ophthalmia."

603. Text: lā yuṭīfu bihā wādī al-sughd. In the translation, I ignore the negative particle lā, following Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 109.

604. On the use of this title, see *EI*², s.v. Khʷārazm-Shāhs.

605. A province in Transoxiana west of Shūmān. See Barthold, Turkestan, 74, 185.

606. A small, independent principality in Transoxiana bounded by the Zarafshan and Qizil-Ṣu Rivers. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥiṣār; Le Strange, Lands, 440.

607. There is no entry for Kūm in Yāqūt's geographical dictionary.

But the latter wrote back, saying, "The spot where we would rendezvous is very narrow, so march towards Kiss.[608] We are under the protection of God, if God wills." Al-Dīwāshinī asked Sulaymān to place him under the authority of al-Ḥarashī and to send him to the latter, accompanied by al-Musayyab b. Bishr. Sulaymān kept his promise and sent him to Saʿīd al-Ḥarashī, who treated him with kindness and generosity, but only as a ploy. The inhabitants of the fortress sued for peace after al-Dīwāshinī's departure on the condition that Sulaymān agree not to harm one hundred families who were living there. In return, they agreed to deliver the fortress to him. Sulaymān wrote to al-Ḥarashī requesting that he send trustworthy agents to collect the contents of the fortress.

Al-Ḥarashī dispatched Muḥammad b. ʿAzīz al-Kindī and ʿIlbāʾ b.
[1448] Aḥmar al-Yashkurī, who auctioned off the contents of the fortress to the highest bidders. He took the fifth and divided the rest among them. Al-Ḥarashī set out for Kiss, the inhabitants of which sued him for peace, agreeing to pay ten thousand sheep.[609] It was stated that al-Ḥarashī made peace with the dihqān of Kiss, whose name is Wayk, in return for six thousand sheep to be delivered in forty days, on the condition that he would not attack him. When he was done in Kiss, al-Ḥarashī set out for Rabinjan,[610] where he slew al-Dīwāshinī, crucifying him on a (Christian) burial place. He imposed upon the people of Rabinjan the obligation to pay one hundred (dīnārs) if the body were removed from its place. He put Naṣr b. Sayyār[611] in charge of collecting the settlement agreed upon in Kiss. Then he dismissed Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr, replacing him with Naṣr b. Sayyār, and put Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sarī in charge of military and fiscal affairs in Kiss and Nasaf. He sent al-Dīwāshinī's head to Iraq and his left hand to Sulaymān b. Abī al-Sarī in Ṭukhāristān.

608. A fortified town on the Kushkah Daryā River, known in Persian as Shahr-i-Sabz ("The Green City"). See Le Strange, Lands, 469.

609. Text: raʾs; literally, "heads."

610. A town between Bukhārā and Samarqand, on the south side of the Sughd River. See Le Strange, Lands, 468, 471.

611. Naṣr b. Sayyār al-Laythī, d. 131/748 at the age of 85. See EI, s.v. Naṣr b. Saiyār.

Our source continued: When Khuzār[612] proved to be impregnable, al-Mujashshir b. Muzāḥim asked Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Ḥarashī, "May I recommend to you someone who will conquer it on your behalf without a fight?" Sa'īd replied, "Of course." Mujashshir said, "Al-Musarbal b. al-Khirrīt b. Rāshid al-Nājī." Al-Ḥarashī sent him to that province. Now, al-Musarbal was a friend of Subuqrī,[613] the King of Khuzār, whose people held al-Musarbal in high esteem. He frightened the King by telling him what al-Ḥarashī had done to the people of Khujandah, whereupon the king asked him, "What do you think I should do?" He replied, "I think that you should accept his protection." The King replied, "But what shall I do with all of my retainers?" He said, "Include them with you in the protection agreement." He sued them for peace, and [1449] they granted protection to him and his lands.

Al-Ḥarashī returned to Marw, taking Subuqrī with him. He encamped at Usnān[614] and, after dispatching Muhājir b. Yazīd al-Ḥarashī with an order to deliver Bardhūn b. Kushānīshāh, he slew Subuqrī and crucified him, although he had a guarantee of protection. It is said: That was a dihqān from Buzmājan[615] who approached Ibn Hubayrah and received a guarantee of safe-conduct for the Soghdian army. But al-Ḥarashī imprisoned him in the Marw citadel. When al-Ḥarashī reached Marw, he summoned him. Then he slew him, crucifying him in the public square. The poet recited, in the rajaz meter:

Behold, Sa'īd marched off with the tribal divisions, in dust that takes the breath away.
The bitterest cup turned against the Turks, who fled on the backs of their camels.
They turned in flight, with no strings on their bows.

In this year, Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik dismissed 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī from Medina and Mecca. This oc-

612. A site near Wakhsh, in the district of Balkh, south of Nasaf. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, II, 364. Note: Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 110, has khazā'in, "treasure houses," instead of Khuzār.

613. Vocalization follows Gibb, Arab Conquests, 64.

614. One of the villages of Herat. See Yāqūt Mu'jam, I, 189.

615. The text is dihqān Ibn Mājir. See Ṭabarī, Addenda et Emendanda, DCCII, where the reading dihqān Buzmājan is given.

curred in the middle of the month of Rabīʿ I (early September, 704), after he had served as governor of Medina for three years.

In this year, Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik appointed ʿAbd al-Wāḥid (b. ʿAbdallāh b. Bishr) al-Naḍrī as governor of Medina.

Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik's Dismissal of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk from Medina

The circumstances of his dismissal,[616] as reported by Muḥam-[1450] mad b. ʿUmar—ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. Abī Yaḥyā: ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Qays al-Fihrī proposed to Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn,[617] but she replied, "By God, I do not want to marry, for I already have these children to raise." She tried to hold him off without antagonizing him, for she was afraid of him. But he pressed her, saying, "By God, if you don't marry me, I will flog your oldest son"—that is, ʿAbdallāh b. al-Ḥasan—"for drinking wine." Now, at that time, the military register in Medina was headed by Ibn Hurmuz, a soldier in the Syrian army. Yazīd wrote to Ibn Hurmuz, asking him to prepare his reckoning and deliver the register. The latter went to see Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn in order to say good-bye to her. He asked, "Is there anything I can do for you?" She replied, "Inform the Commander of the Faithful of the manner in which Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk is treating me and how he imposes himself on me."

Fāṭimah sent a messenger to Yazīd, carrying a letter in which she informed him of what had transpired; she reminded Yazīd of the blood ties that connected her to him, and mentioned Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk's threat and his behavior toward her. Ibn Hurmuz and Fāṭimah's messenger arrived together. Ibn Hurmuz went in to see Yazīd, who inquired about the situation in Medina. When asked if there was any news to relate, Ibn Hurmuz said nothing about Bint al-Ḥusayn. Then the chamberlain announced, "May God cause the Commander to prosper! A messenger sent by Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn is at the gate." Then Ibn Hurmuz said, "May God cause the Commander to prosper! On the day I set out, Fāṭimah bt. al-

616. See Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 56; Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 17; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 229.

617. Fāṭimah bt. al-Ḥusayn b. ʿAlī b. Abī Ṭālib, d. 111/729–30. See Dhahabī, Kāshif, III, 478.

Ḥusayn gave me a message for you." Only then did he tell him [1451] the story.

Our source continued: Yazīd came down from on top of his cushions and said, "You bastard![618] Why didn't you tell me about the message you were carrying when I asked you if there was any news to report?" Ibn Hurmuz claimed that he forgot. Then the messenger was granted permission to enter. Yazīd took the letter, read it, and began to strike the ground with a rod that was in his hand,[619] exclaiming, "How dare Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk! What man will give me the pleasure of hearing him scream in pain while I am reclining on my cushions?" Someone said to him, "'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh b. Bishr al-Naḍrī." Then he called for some papyrus and wrote the following letter in his own hand to 'Abd al-Wāḥid, who was in al-Ṭā'if: "Greetings. Now to the matter at hand. I have appointed you to serve as governor of Medina. When you receive my letter, go there and remove Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk from office. Fine him forty thousand dīnārs and torture him so that I can hear him screaming while I am reclining on my cushions."

Our source continued: The postal messenger took the letter and brought it to Medina, where Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk became apprehensive when the courier did not come to see him; he summoned the courier and showed him a thousand dīnārs that were hidden under a blanket, saying, "These thousand dīnārs are for you. You have my solemn promise that if you tell me why you were sent here, I will give you the money." The messenger told him. Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk asked the courier to wait three days before leaving for al-Ṭā'if, and he complied with this request. Then Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk set [1452] out at a quick pace and, when he had reached Maslamah b. 'Abd al-Malik,[620] he said, "I am under your protection." The next day, Maslamah went to visit Yazīd, to whom he addressed some carefully chosen words regarding a certain need on account of which he had come. Yazīd said, "I am willing to grant you any request so long as it does not involve Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk." He said, "By God, it is 618. Text: lā umma laka, literally, "You have no mother," said in anger and reviling. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 1, p. 89.

619. Text: fī yadayhi, "in his hands." Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 114, reads fī yadihi, "in his hand."

620. Maslamah was reportedly in Damascus at the time. See Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 229.

about Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk!" He said, "By God, I will never forgive him after what he has done." So Maslamah sent Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk back to Medina, to al-Naḍrī.

ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad said: I saw Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk in Medina, wearing a wool garment, begging from the people, after having been tortured and ill-treated. Al-Naḍrī arrived in Medina on a Saturday in the middle of Shawwāl in the year 104 (March 27, 723).

According to Muḥammad b. ʿUmar—Ibrāhīm b. ʿAbdallāh b. Abī Farwah—al-Zuhrī: I advised ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. al-Ḍaḥḥāk as follows: "You are putting (yourself) ahead of your kinsmen, but they reject everything that is contrary to their customs.[621] Therefore, adhere to whatever they have resolved upon and consult with al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad[622] and Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh,[623] for they will spare no effort in guiding you." Al-Zuhrī said, "But he rejected my advice, acted in a hostile manner towards all of the Helpers, and unjustly and wrongfully flogged Abū Bakr b. Ḥazm on the basis of a false accusation. The poets all mock him in verse, and righteous men reproach him and say ugly things about him. When Hishām became Caliph,[624] I saw Ibn al-Ḍaḥḥāk in a state of abasement."

ʿAbd al-Wāḥid b. ʿAbdallāh b. Bishr became governor of Medina and established his residence in that city. The Medinese were never fonder of a man who came to them as governor, for he pursued excellent policies and always consulted with al-Qāsim and Sālim before deciding on a matter.

[1453] In this year, al-Jarrāḥ b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥakamī, the governor of Armenia and Ādharbayjān, carried out an expedition in the land of the Turks.[625] He commanded the conquest of Balanjar[626] and 621. Text: innaka tuqdimu ʿalā qawmika wa-hum yunkirūna kulla shayʾin khālafa fiʾlahum. The translation is conjectural.

622. Abū Muḥammad al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr, d. 107/725–26. See Dhahabī, Kāshif, II, 393; Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, 42.

623. Sālim b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar, d. 106/724–25. See Dhahabī, Kāshif, I, 344; Juynboll, Muslim Tradition, 42.

624. See text below, II/1466, sub anno 105.

625. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 337; Yaʿqūbī, Taʾrīkh, III, 56; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 29–34; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 111–13.

626. An important Khazar town lying on the river of the same name, north of Bāb al-Abwāb at the eastern extremity of the Caucasus. See *EI*², s.v. Balanjar.

defeated the Turks, slaying them, together with most of their women and children, by drowning them in water.[627] The Muslims took as many prisoners as they desired. Al-Jarrāḥ also conquered the strongholds adjacent to Balanjar, forcing most of their inhabitants into exile.

It is reported that in this year, Abū al-ʿAbbās ʿAbdallāh b. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī[628] was born in the month of Rabīʿ II (September 18—October 16, 722).

In this year, Abū Muḥammad al-Ṣādiq went to visit Muḥammad b. ʿAlī, accompanied by a number of his Khurāsānī supporters.[629] The visit took place fifteen days after the birth of Abū al-ʿAbbās. Muḥammad b. ʿAlī brought out the infant, wrapped in diapers, and said to them, "By God, this cause will be fulfilled so that you might take revenge upon your enemy."

In this year, ʿUmar b. Hubayrah dismissed Saʿīd b. ʿAmr al-Ḥarashī as governor of Khurāsān, replacing him with Muslim b. Saʿīd b. Aslam b. Zurʿah al-Kilābī.[630]

ʿUmar b. Hubayrah's Dismissal of Saʿīd b. ʿAmr al-Ḥarashī as Governor of Khurāsān

It is reported that ʿUmar dismissed al-Ḥarashī because the latter had angered him in connection with al-Dīwāshinī.[631] This is because al-Ḥarashī had slain al-Dīwāshinī, despite the fact that ʿUmar had written to him ordering him to release the Turk. Al-Ḥarashī regularly treated Ibn Hubayrah's orders with contempt: Whenever a courier or messenger arrived from Iraq, al-Ḥarashī would ask him, "How is Abū al-Muthannā?" Then he would say to [1454] his scribe, "Write to Abū al-Muthannā"—without saying 'the governor.' He would often say, "Abū al-Muthannā said" and "Abū al-Muthannā did." When Ibn Hubayrah learned about this, he summoned Jumayl b. ʿImrān and said to him, "I have heard certain 627. Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 17, specifies that al-Jarrāḥ drowned the Turks in a river.

628. The first ʿAbbāsid caliph, d. 136/754. See *EI*², s.v. Abū ʾl-ʿAbbās al-Ṣaffāḥ.
629. See text above, II/1358, sub anno 100; Balādhurī, Ansāb, III, 82; Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 18; Maqdisī, Bad', VI, 59; Sharon, Black Banners, 143, n. 162.
630. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 229–30; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 453–54.
631. See text above, II/1448.

things about al-Ḥarashī. Go to Khurāsān and pretend that you are there for the purpose of inspecting the military registers, but let me know what you find out about him." Jumayl arrived, and al-Ḥarashī asked him, "How is Abū al-Muthannā?" Then he began to inspect the military registers. Someone said to al-Ḥarashī, "Jumayl has come here to spy on you, not to inspect the military registers." Ibn Hubayrah therefore laced a watermelon with poison and sent it to Jumayl, who ate it and became sick, losing all of his hair. Jumayl returned to Ibn Hubayrah where, after receiving medical treatment, he recovered and regained his health. He said to Ibn Hubayrah, "Things are even worse than you thought. Sa'īd thinks that you are merely one of his agents." Enraged, Ibn Hubayrah dismissed Sa'īd and tortured him until his stomach was covered with small pustules. At the time of his dismissal, Sa'īd made the following statement, "Were 'Umar to ask me for a dirham so that he might buy some kohl with it,[632] I would not give it to him." But when he was tortured, he paid. Someone mocked him, saying, "Didn't you claim that you wouldn't give him a single dirham?" To which Sa'īd replied, "Don't chide me, for I broke down when the iron struck me." Udhaynah b. Kulayb, or Kulayb b. Udhaynah, recited:

Be steadfast, Abū Yaḥyā, for according to our knowledge you used to be patient, rising up under the weight of debts.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Ibn Hubayrah's anger with Sa'īd is related to the following incident: Ibn Hubayrah sent Ma'qil b. 'Urwah to Herat to serve either as his governor there or in [1455] some other capacity. Ma'qil went down to Herat without stopping to see al-Ḥarashī. Ma'qil arrived in Herat, but al-Ḥarashī wouldn't allow him to assume his new position. Ma'qil wrote to al-Ḥarashī, who wrote to his governor as follows, "Send Ma'qil to me." When he was brought to him, al-Ḥarashī asked, "Why didn't you come to me before you went to Herat?" He replied, "I am one of Ibn Hubayrah's governors, having been appointed by him in the same manner as you were." Sa'īd administered two hundred lashes to Ma'qil and shaved off his hair. This was why Ibn Hubayrah dis-

632. Text: yaḍa'uhu fī 'aynihi, literally, "so that he might put it in his eye."

missed Sa'īd and appointed Muslim b. Sa'īd b. Aslam b. Zur'ah as governor of Khurāsān.

Ibn Hubayrah wrote a letter to al-Ḥarashī in which he called him the son of a foul-smelling woman. After reading the letter, Sa'īd exclaimed, "He is the son of a foul-smelling woman." Then Ibn Hubayrah wrote to Muslim saying, "Send al-Ḥarashī to me, together with Ma'qil b. 'Urwah." He sent al-Ḥarashī to Ibn Hubayrah, who treated him with great severity. Then, one day he gave an order to torture al-Ḥarashī, saying, "Torture him until he dies." That evening, while Ibn Hubayrah was engaged in conversation with his companions, he asked, "Who is the most eminent man among the Qays?" They replied, "You are." He said, "What! The most eminent man among the Qays is al-Kawthar b. Zufar.[633] He has only to sound the bugle at night and twenty thousand men show up; furthermore, they do not ask, 'Why have you summoned us?' nor do they question his orders. But that ass lying in prison whom I have ordered to be slain is their bravest man. Am I not the man who seeks the best interests of the Qays? Indeed, whenever some matter comes to my attention and I think that I will be able to derive some benefit or advantage from it (for the Qays), I pursue it." To which a bedouin from the tribe of Banū Fazārah replied, "You are not what you claim to be, for if you really had the best interests of the Qays in mind, you would not have ordered that their bravest man be slain." He then sent a message to Ma'qil, saying, "Ignore my previous order."

According to 'Alī—Muslim b. al-Mughīrah: When Ibn Hubay- [1456]
rah fled, Khālid[634] sent Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Ḥarashī to apprehend him. He overtook him at a point on the Euphrates as he was crossing over to the other side of the river in a boat. Inside the boat was a servant of Ibn Hubayrah by the name of Qubayḍ. Al-Ḥarashī recognized him and asked, "Are you Qubayḍ?" The servant replied, 633. Zufar b. al-Ḥārith, whose family was considered to be the very incarnation of Qaysiyyah, is invariably described as a man of great nobility who was above political considerations. His sons, Hudhayl and Kawthar, inherited the respect accorded to him. They too were held in high esteem by the caliphs. See text above, II/1300, sub anno 96 and II/1360, sub anno 101; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 211, 321; Crone, Slaves, 100, no. 19.

634. Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī replaced Ibn Hubayrah as governor of Iraq and Khurāsān in Shawwāl of the year 105 (March, 724). See text below, II/1467–71, sub anno 105.

"Yes." He asked, "Is Abū al-Muthannā in the boat?" Again, the servant said, "Yes." Then Ibn Hubayrah emerged, and al-Ḥarashī asked him, "Abū al-Muthannā, what do you imagine that I am going to do with you?" He said, "I think that you are a man who would not hand over a fellow tribesman to a Qurashī.[635] He said, "You are right." Ibn Hubayra said, "Then I am saved."

According to ʿAlī—Abū Isḥāq b. Rabīʿah: When Ibn Hubayrah imprisoned al-Ḥarashī, Maʿqil b. ʿUrwah al-Qushayrī approached the former, saying "May God cause the governor to prosper! You have put the bravest man of the Qays in chains and disgraced him. Now, although I don't like him, I wouldn't want you to torture him to the extent that I was tortured." He said, "Serve as an arbiter between us. When I came to Iraq, I appointed him governor of al-Baṣrah; subsequently, I appointed him governor of Khurāsān. But I dismissed him because he sent me a diseased horse, treated my orders with contempt, and betrayed me. I referred to him as Ibn Nasʿah, and he referred to me as Ibn Busrah."[636] Maʿqil said, "Did he act like that, the son of the prostitute?"

Maʿqil went to visit al-Ḥarashī in the prison. "O Ibn Nasʿah," he said, "your mother entered and was sold for eighty mangy she-goats. She was with the shepherds, who came to her one after the other as if she were the riding animal of someone who is con-[1457] stantly coming and going.[637] Do you consider her the equal of Bint al-Ḥārith b. ʿAmr b. Ḥarajah?"[638] And he uttered other calumnies against him.

When Ibn Hubayrah was removed from office and Khālid[639] arrived in Iraq, al-Ḥarashī asked for permission to take vengeance on Maʿqil b. ʿUrwah. Al-Ḥarashī brought proof that Maʿqil had 635. ʿUmar and Saʿīd were both Qaysīs. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 319–21.

636. Nasʿah and Busrah were the mothers of al-Ḥarashī and ʿUmar b. Hubayrah, respectively. It was considered an insult to refer to someone by his matronymic rather than his patronymic.

637. Text: tarādafahā al-rīʿā' maṭiyyat al-ṣādir wa-l-wārid. The translation is conjectural.

638. Al-Ḥārith was a military commander who fought against the Turks in Ādharbayjān. See text below, II/1526, sub anno 111, and II/1532, sub anno 116; Caskel, Ǧamharah, I, 130.

639. Khālid al-Qasrī. See note 634, above.

made false accusations against him, whereupon Khālid said to al-Ḥarashī, "Flog him." As al-Ḥarashī was administering the ḥadd punishment to him, he said, "Were it not for the fact that Ibn Hubayrah sapped my strength, I would have pierced you through the heart." A tribesman from the Banū Kilāb said to Ma'qil, "You mistreated your paternal cousin and slandered him; therefore God has allowed him to prevail over you, and you are no longer a credible witness among the Muslims." As the ḥadd punishment was being administered to Ma'qil, he slandered al-Ḥarashī again, causing Khālid to order that the punishment be administered a second time. But the qāḍī said, "He is not to be flogged again."

He said: 'Umar b. Hubayrah's mother is Busrah bt. Ḥassān, of the tribe of 'Adī, from 'Adī of al-Ribāb.

In this year, 'Umar b. Hubayrah appointed Muslim b. Sa'īd b. Aslam b. Zur'ah b. 'Amr b. Khuwaylid al-Ṣa'iq as governor of Khurāsān, after having dismissed Sa'īd b. 'Amr al-Ḥarashī from that office.[640]

The Appointment of Muslim b. Sa'īd as Governor of Khurāsān

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—Abū al-Dhayyāl, 'Alī b. Mujāhid, and others: When Sa'īd b. Aslam was killed, al-Ḥajjāj took his son, Muslim b. Sa'īd, and raised him together with his own children, providing him with an excellent education. When 'Adī b. Arṭāt arrived,[641] he wanted to confer an appointment upon Muslim, so he consulted with his scribe, who said, "(First) give him a minor appointment and then promote him." 'Adī put him [1458] in charge of a certain province, where he established himself, doing a fine job of managing its affairs. At the time of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab's revolt,[642] (Muslim) took the revenues (of that province) to Syria. Subsequently, when 'Umar b. Hubayrah arrived,[643] he summoned Muslim, having resolved to appoint him to a gover-

640. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 28.

641. That is, arrived in al-Baṣrah, to serve as governor. See text above, II/1346, sub anno 99.

642. See text above, II/1379ff., sub anno 101.

643. That is, arrived in Khurāsān, to serve as governor. See text above, II/1433, sub anno 102.

norship. ʿUmar looked at Muslim, who until then had no grey hair, and saw white hair in his beard. "God is great," he exclaimed.

ʿUmar stayed up late one night talking, and Muslim, who was one of his companions, stayed behind after the other men had left. Ibn Hubayrah threw a quince that he was holding in his hand at Muslim, saying, "Would it please you if I were to appoint you as governor of Khurāsān?" He said, "Yes." He said, "Tomorrow, if God wills." The next morning ʿUmar held an audience and when the people came to see him, he appointed Muslim as governor of Khurāsān. He wrote out the document of appointment and ordered him to depart. He also wrote to his fiscal agents, ordering them to correspond with Muslim b. Saʿīd. Then he summoned Jabalah b. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān, a client of the Bāhilah, and appointed him governor of Kirmān. Jabalah said, "What has my clientage done to me? It was Muslim's hope[644] that I would become governor of a great province and then put him in charge of a district. Now he has been appointed governor of Khurāsān, while I have been appointed governor of Kirmān!"

Muslim set out, reaching Khurāsān at the end of the year 104/722–23 or 103/721–22. He arrived in the middle of the day, but found the gate of the royal residence locked. He went to the royal stable, but it, too, was locked. Finally, he entered the mosque, where the gate to the ruler's enclosure (al-maqṣūrah) was locked. As Muslim was performing his prayers, a servant emerged from the enclosure, and someone said to him, "The governor is here." The servant led him to the governor's audience room in the royal residence. Al-Ḥarashī was told that Muslim b. Saʿīd b. Aslam had arrived, and he sent him the following message: "Have you come as a governor, as a minister, or as a visitor?" Muslim replied, "A man of my stature would not come to Khurāsān as either a visitor or as a minister." Al-Ḥarashī ap-[1459] proached Muslim, who swore at him and ordered that he be thrown into prison. Someone said to him, "If you send him out in broad daylight, someone may slay him." Muslim therefore ordered that al-Ḥarashī be kept near him until evening. Then, during the night, he sent him to the prison, where he was tied up in shackles. Some time later he ordered the jailor to put on additional shackles. The latter approached al-Ḥarashī with a sad look on his face. "What is the matter with you?" al-Ḥarashī asked. "I have been ordered to put on more shackles," he replied. Al-Ḥarashī then said to his scribe, "Write to Muslim as follows: "Your jailor tells me that you ordered him to put additional shackles on me. If this order issued from a higher authority, we hear and obey; but if this was your idea, you will pay for this."[645] He recited:

644. Text: yanbaghī yaṭma'; read yanbaghī, following the Cairo ed.

If they manage to find me, they will slay me;
but whomever I overtake will not last.

But some relate it thus:

If you find me, then slay me;
but whomever I overtake will not last.
They are the enemies, whether present or absent, full of hatred, with black livers.
Do pursue me in your own manner, for verily I, with (my horse) Ḥadhfah,[646] am like the bone sticking fast in the throat beneath the carotid artery.

And some relate it thus:

Do seek me in your own manner.

Our source continued: Muslim dispatched a man to his districts to serve as his agent in charge of military affairs there.

Previously, Ibn Hubayrah, in his zeal, had arrested and imprisoned a man who had worked as a steward for Yazīd b. al-Muhallab and who was knowledgable about Khurāsān and its leading men. The steward accused all the leading men of the province (of misappropriating revenues). Ibn Hubayrah dispatched Abū 'Ubaydah al-'Anbarī, together with a man known as Khālid, and he wrote to al-Ḥarashī ordering him to hand over those men who had been named by the steward so that he might demand the money from them. But al-Ḥarashī refused and he sent back Ibn Hubayrah's messenger. Now, when Ibn Hubayrah appointed Muslim b. Sa'īd [1460]

645. Text: fa-sayruka al-ḥaqḥaqah, literally, "You will be driven to exhaustion."

646. The text is Ḥidhqah. See Lane, Lexicon, pt. 3, p. 1189, s.v. r-w-gh.

as governor, he ordered him to collect those revenues. Muslim arrived and wanted to hold the people accountable for the revenues that had been distributed among them,[647] but he was advised as follows:

> If you do that to those men, you will not have any peace and quiet in Khurāsān. If, on the other hand, you are dismissed because of your failure to accomplish this,[648] Khurāsān will be ruined, both for you and for them. The men whom you want to hold accountable for those revenues—the chiefs of the country—have been falsely accused: Mihzam b. Jābir owed only three hundred thousand (dirhams), but they added a hundred thousand, raising the debt to four hundred thousand. But most of those whose names have been given to you are among those whose debts have been greatly exaggerated.

Muslim wrote to Ibn Hubayrah informing him of the situation, and sent him a delegation that included Mihzam b. Jābir among its members. Mihzam said to Ibn Hubayrah, "O Commander, the accusation that has been brought before you is false and unjust. If the truth were told, we are accountable for only a small portion of that sum, which we would pay—if we were asked to do so." Then Ibn Hubayrah recited, "God commands you to deliver trusts back to their owners." But Mihzam said, "Recite the remainder of the verse: 'And when you judge between the people, that you judge with justice.'"[649] Ibn Hubayrah said: "We must have that money." Mihzam declared:

> By God, if you take it, you will be taking it from men who are capable of inflicting great havoc upon your enemies. Furthermore, that would harm the army of Khurāsān with respect to its military equipment, horses, and weapons. We live on a frontier where we fight against an en-> [1461] emy that is constantly at war. We wear iron so often that the rust sticks to our skin; indeed, the smell of iron causes a female servant to turn her face away from her

647. Text: qurifat ʿalayhim; read furriqat ʿalayhim, following the Cairo ed.
648. Text: taʿmal fī hādhā ḥattā tūḍaʿa ʿanhum. The translation is conjectural.
649. Qurʾān 4:58.

> master and from other men that she serves. You, on the other hand, stay at home, adorning yourselves in fine clothes dyed with saffron. Now, the men who have been accused of appropriating those revenues—the leaders of the army of Khurāsān and the army of the provinces—undertake enormous expenses in order to carry out military expeditions. There are men here who have come to us riding on donkeys from the deepest ravines. Having been appointed as governors of the provinces, they collected the revenues which are heaped up in abundance.[650]

Ibn Hubayrah wrote to Muslim b. Sa'īd informing him of the delegation's statement and ordering him to seize the revenues from the men who, according to the delegation, possessed them. When Muslim received Ibn Hubayrah's letter, he arrested the tributaries in connection with those revenues and ordered Ḥājib b. 'Amr al-Ḥārithī to torture them. After they had been tortured, he seized the revenues that had been distributed among them.[651]

In this year, the pilgrimage was led by 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh al-Naḍrī, as was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. Al-Wāqidī reported the same.

The governor of Mecca, Medina, and al-Ṭā'if in this year was 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh al-Naḍrī. 'Umar b. Hubayrah was governor of Iraq and the East.[652] Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥasan al-Kindī was in charge of the judiciary in al-Kūfah. 'Abd al-Malik b. Ya'lā was in charge of the judiciary in al-Baṣrah.

---

650. Text: muwaffarah; the Cairo ed. reads mawqarah, "a tree overladen with fruit."

651. Text: qurifa 'alayhim; read furriqa 'alayhim, following the Cairo ed.

652. 'The East' refers to Khurāsān.

The Events of the Year 105

(JUNE 10, 723—MAY 28, 724)

[1462]

The events of this year included a military expedition against Alān that was carried out by al-Jarrāḥ b. ʿAbdallāh al-Ḥakamī, who passed through that country to the towns and strongholds beyond Balanjar.[653] He conquered some of that region, expelling many of its inhabitants and collecting considerable quantities of booty.

In this year, Saʿīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik raided Byzantium. He dispatched a military detachment that included approximately one thousand fighters, all of whom reportedly perished.

In this year, Muslim b. Saʿīd carried out a military expedition against the Turks, but when he did not conquer any lands, he returned to Khurāsān. Later in the year, he carried out a raid against Afshīnah,[654] one of the towns in al-Sughd, where he concluded a peace agreement with its king and inhabitants.[655]

653. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Taʾrīkh, I, 339; Azdī, Taʾrīkh, 20.

654. Afshīnah was located in the district of Samarqand. See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 454, n. 1.

655. See Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525.

Muslim b. Sa'īd's Expedition against the Turks

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: Muslim b. Sa'īd appointed Bahrām Sīs as a provincial governor.[656] Late in the summer of the year 105/723–24, Muslim undertook a military expedition, but when he did not make any conquests, he turned back. The Turks pursued him, overtaking him as the soldiers were crossing over the Balkh River. The cavalry of Tamīm, led by 'Ubaydallāh b. Zuhayr b. Ḥayyān, was in command of his rear-guard and they protected the other soldiers until they had crossed over the river. (This was when) Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik died, and [1463] Hishām became Caliph. Then Muslim raided Afshīn[657] and concluded a peace agreement with its King whereby he was to receive six thousand head (of sheep). He left at the end of the year 105/723–24, after the King had delivered the fortress to him.

The Death of Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik

In this year, the Caliph, Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwān, died on the twenty-sixth of Sha'bān (January 28, 724).[658] This was related to me by Aḥmad b. Thābit—his authority—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā—Abū Ma'shar. Al-Wāqidī transmitted the same report.

According to al-Wāqidī: He died in Balqā',[659] which is in the district of Damascus, at the age of thirty-eight. Some authorities say that he died at the age of forty, while others maintain that he was thirty-six.

According to Abū Ma'shar, Hishām b. Muḥammad, and 'Alī b. Muḥammad, he served as Caliph for four years and one month. According to al-Wāqidī, he was Caliph for four years. Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik's patronymic was Abū Khālid. This was related by Abū Ma'shar, Hishām b. Muḥammad, al-Wāqidī, and others.

---

656. Text: al-marzubān. On this term, see note 97 above.

657. Note the discrepancy between the spelling of the name here and in the previous paragraph. On the distinction between Afshīn, a personal name, and Afshīnah, the name of a town, see Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 432, 454; Balādhurī, Futūḥ (Cairo), III, 525.

658. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 339–40; Dīnawarī, Akhbār, 336; Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, III, 58; Kūfī, Futūḥ, VIII, 35; Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 18; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 195; FHA, 80–81; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 231.

659. The administrative district of Transjordan, dependent on the jund of Damascus. See *EI*², s.v. Balqā'.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad: Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik died at the age of thirty-five or thirty-four, on Friday the twenty-sixth of Sha'bān in the year 105 (January 28, 724). He died in Arbad,[660] in the district of Balqā'. His son, al-Walīd, who was fifteen years old, prayed over him.[661] On that day, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik was in Ḥimṣ. This was related to me by 'Umar b. Shabbah, on the authority of 'Alī.

According to Hishām b. Muḥammad: Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik died at the age of thirty-three.

According to 'Alī: Abū Māwiyah or some other Jew said to [1464] Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik, "You will reign for forty years." One of the Jews said, "He lied, may God curse him. He predicted that he would reign for forty qaṣabahs." A qaṣabah is equivalent to one month. But he turned a month into a year.

Aspects of His Character[662]

According to 'Umar b. Shabbah—'Alī: Yazīd b. 'Ātikah was one of their (that is, the Marwānids') youths.[663] One day, when he was in a good mood, he said, in the presence of Ḥabābah[664] and Sallāmah,[665] "Let me fly." Ḥabābah said, "To whom will you entrust the Muslim community?"[666] When he died, Sallāmah of al-Qass[667] recited:

---

660. A village in Jordan, near Tiberias. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 136ff.

661. It is also reported that Yazīd's brother, Hishām, prayed over his body. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, I, 340; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 233.

662. See Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 18–21; Maqdisī, Bad', VI, 48–49; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 232–33.

663. Text: min fityānihim. According to Azdī, Ta'rīkh, 5, Yazīd's nickname was al-fatā, "the youth."

664. Ḥabābah was a singing slave girl of Medina who exerted complete control over the Caliph Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik due to his infatuation with her. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥabāba.

665. Sallāmah was a Medinese slave girl, purchased by the Caliph Yazīd, who performed as a singer. See *EI*², s.v. Ḥabāba; Aghānī (Beirut), VIII, 336–53.

666. Yazīd reportedly answered, "To you." See Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 199; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 121.

667. An allusion to her love affair with the Meccan jurist and Qur'ān reciter, 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Ammār al-Jushamī, who was known as al-Qass ("the priest"), because of his great piety. See Aghānī (Beirut), VIII, 336ff.; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 122–23.

Do not criticize us if we submit or are on the point of submitting.
By my life, I stayed up all night, as if afflicted by a painful disease.
Anxiety slept closer to me than did my bedfellow.[668]
Because of what happened to us today, namely, the difficult affair.[669]
Every time that I saw a home that was empty, my eyes began to tear.
It is empty of a lord who never neglected us.[670]

Then she cried out, "O Commander of the Faithful!"[671] The poetry was composed by one of the Helpers.[672]

According to 'Alī: Yazīd b. 'Abd al-Malik performed the pilgrimage during the caliphate of Sulaymān b. 'Abd al-Malik, and it was on this occasion that he purchased Ḥabābah, whose (original) name was al-'Āliyah, for four thousand dīnārs from 'Uthmān b. Sahl b. Ḥunayf. Sulaymān said, "I want to prohibit Yazīd from squandering his money." As a result, Yazīd returned Ḥabābah, who was then purchased by an inhabitant of Egypt. Subsequently, Su'dah asked Yazīd, "O Commander of the Faithful, is there anything in the world that you still desire?" He said, "Yes there is: [1465] Ḥabābah." Su'dah therefore sent a man who purchased Ḥabābah for four thousand dīnārs. Su'dah made her up and adorned her so that she would not look travel weary, and then she brought her to Yazīd and placed her behind a curtain. She asked, "O Commander of the Faithful, is there anything in the world that you still desire?" He replied, "Yes. Didn't I tell you when you asked me this question previously?" Then she lifted up the curtain and said, "Behold! Ḥabābah." Su'dah stood up, leaving Ḥabābah alone with

668. Text: thumma bāta-l-hammu minnī dūna man lī min ḍaiī'. Literally, "Then anxiety slept with respect to me not as close as (my) bedfellow."

669. Text: al-faḍī'; read al-faẓī', following the Cairo ed.

670. See al-Aḥwaṣ, Shi'r, no. 103, p. 152; FHA, 80.

671. Her cry signaled the Caliph's death. See Aghānī (Beirut), VIII, 348.

672. It is reported that al-Aḥwaṣ composed the poem for Sallāmah, who recited it as a lamentation. See Aghānī (Beirut), VIII, 350; Mas'ūdī, Murūj (Beirut), III, 196.

the Caliph. This act endeared Suʿdah to Yazīd, who was generous with her and gave her many presents. Suʿdah, who was from the family of ʿUthmān b. ʿAffān, was Yazīd's wife.

According to ʿAlī—Yūnis b. Ḥabīb: One day, Ḥabābah, a slave girl belonging to Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik, sang the following song:

Between the collarbones and the uvula is a burning heat that does not subside and is not easy to swallow, and thus cool down.[673]

Yazīd extended his arms to fly, but she said, "O Commander of the Faithful, we need you." When she became very ill,[674] he asked, "How are you, Ḥabābah?" But she did not answer. He cried and recited:

If the soul forgets you, or desire abandons you,
the heart forgets out of despair, not out of hardness.

Yazīd heard one of her servants recite the following line:

It is sufficient mourning for the love-sick, bewildered one to see the abodes of the one he desired left untended and deserted.

Yazīd also recited this.

[1466] According to ʿUmar—ʿAlī: Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik refused to see anyone for seven days after Ḥabābah died, on the recommendation of Maslamah, who feared that Yazīd would appear foolish in the eyes of the people.[675]

---

673. See FHA, 77.

674. Yazīd, who wanted to be alone with Ḥabābah, ordered his servants not to disturb him under any circumstances. While the two of them were sitting together in a garden, Ḥabābah began to choke on a pomegranate seed (according to some versions: a grape seed that the Caliph threw at her). Ḥabābah died after Yazīd's pleas for assistance were dutifully ignored by his servants. See FHA, 77–78; Maqdisī, Bad', VI, 48–49; Ibn al-Athīr, Kāmil, V, 121.

675. That is, because of his grief over Ḥabābah. See FHA, 77.

The History of al-Ṭabarī

VOLUME XXV

The End of Expansion

TRANSLATED BY KHALID YAHYA BLANKINSHIP

The Events of the Year

105

(JUNE 10, 723—MAY 28, 724)

The Caliphate of Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik [1466]

In this year, Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik was made Caliph in the latter part of Shaʿbān [105] (January 3–31, 724). He was then some months beyond his thirty-fourth birthday.

According to ʿUmar b. Shabbah[1] —ʿAlī[2] —Abū Muḥammad al-Qurashī,[3] Abū Muḥammad al-Ziyādī, al-Minhāl b. ʿAbd al-Malik and Suḥaym b. Ḥafṣ al-ʿUjayfī:[4] Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik was born the year Muṣʿab b. al-Zubayr was slain, that is the year 72 (691). His mother was ʿĀʾishah bt. Hishām b. Ismāʿīl b. Hishām b. al-Walīd b. al-Mughīrah b. ʿAbdallāh b. ʿUmar b. Makhzūm. As she was retarded, her family ordered her not to speak to ʿAbd al-Malik until she gave birth. She would pile up pillows and then climb on one of them, driving it as if it were a steed. She would also

1. Abū Zayd ʿUmar b. Zayd (nicknamed Shabbah) b. ʿUbayd b. Rayṭah, the mawlā of the Banū Numayr c. 172(788)–262(876). Well-known historian and traditionist from al-Baṣrah. See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 125; Sezgin, GAS, I, 345.

2. That is, al-Madāʾinī.

3. Possibly Abū Muḥammad b. Dhakwān al-Qurashī. Compare isnāds in Ṭabarī, II/2, 209–10.

4. Abū al-Yaqẓān ʿĀmir b. Abī Muḥammad Ḥafṣ, the mawlā of the Banū ʿUjayf. Nicknamed Suḥaym. Famous genealogist and historian of the Tamīm as well as other Muḍarī tribes. Died 170(786) or 190(806). See Ibn al-Nadīm, Fihrist, 106–7; Sezgin, GAS, I, 266–7; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 235.

buy frankincense and, after chewing it up, she would mold out of it images which she would then set on the pillows. Having given to each image the name of a slave girl, she would call out, "O so-and-so," and so on. 'Abd al-Malik later divorced her because of her retardedness. When 'Abd al-Malik went out to fight Muṣ'ab and killed him, the news of the birth of Hishām reached the Caliph. Looking upon his birth as a good omen, he named the child Manṣūr, but the mother gave him the name of her father, Hishām. 'Abd al-Malik did not oppose that, and he thus became Hishām. He was given the patronymic Abū al-Walīd.

[1467] According to Muḥammad b. 'Umar[5] —his informants: The Caliphate came to Hishām while he was at al-Zaytūnah[6] at his residence on a small estate of his there. Muḥammad b. 'Umar saw it himself and regarded it as small. (There) a postal rider brought Hishām the staff and ring of office, and he was saluted as Caliph, whereupon he rode from al-Ruṣāfah[7] until coming to Damascus.

Bukayr b. Māhān and the 'Abbāsid Revolutionaries

In this year Bukayr b. Māhān[8] came from Sind, where he had been serving as a translator for al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān.[9] When al-Junayd b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān was removed from office, Bukayr came to al-Kūfah, having with him four bars of silver and one of gold. There he met Abū 'Ikrimah al-Ṣādiq,[10] Maysarah,[11] Muḥammad

5. That is, al-Wāqidī.

6. A Syrian desert retreat of Hishām, it was believed to be on or near the Euphrates, but possibly may be identified with Qaṣr al-Ḥayr al-Gharbī near al-Qaryatayn between Palmyra and Damascus. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ḳaṣr al-Ḥayr al-Gharbī; Yāqūt, Mu'jam, III, 163.

7. Thought to be Qaṣr al-Ḥayr al-Sharqī between Palmyra and al-Raqqah, it was Hishām's favorite residence. See EI^{2}, s.v. Ḳaṣr al-Ḥayr al-Sharqī; EI^{1}, s.v. al-Ruṣāfa.

8. Abū Hāshim al-Hurmuzfarrahī, the mawlā of the Yamanī Banū Musliyah. From the village of Hurmuzfarrah in the Marw oasis, he was the chief agent of the Hāshimiyyah in al-Kūfah until his death about 127(745). See EI^{2}, s.v. Bukayr b. Māhān.

9. Al-Murrī, wrongly called Ibn 'Abdallāh in EI^{2}. Governor of Khurasan 111(729)-116(734). See EI^{2}, s.v. Djunayd b. 'Abd Allāh; Crone, Slaves, 98.

10. Abū 'Ikrimah Ziyād b. Dirham al-Sarrāj al-Ṣādiq, the mawlā of the Hamdān, who assumed the kunyah of Abū Muḥammad for purposes of secrecy. See note 120; also Ṭabari, III/2, 1358, 1453; Akhbār al-Dawlah, 191–2, 203–5; Sharon, Black Banners, 136–7.

11. Abū Rabāḥ (or Riyāḥ) al-Nabbāl, also al-Raḥḥāl, the mawlā of the Azd. See

b. Khunays,[12] Sālim al-A'yan,[13] and Abū Yaḥyā, the mawlā of the Banū Musliyah.[14] They told Bukayr about the missionary work of the Banū Hāshim. He accepted their call completely and spent all that he had with him on them. Afterwards, he went to Muḥammad b. 'Alī,[15] and, when Maysarah died,[16] Muḥammad b. 'Alī sent Bukayr b. Māhān to Iraq to take over Maysarah's post.

Ibrāhīm b. Hishām Leads the Pilgrimage

Ibrāhīm b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl[17] led the pilgrimage this year while al-Naṣrī[18] was governor of al-Madīnah.

According to al-Wāqidī—Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Shuraḥbīl—his father: Ibrāhīm b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl, while leading the pilgrimage, sent a messenger to 'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ[19] to ask when he should give his sermon at Mecca. 'Aṭā' answered, "After the noon worship a day before the watering."[20] But Ibrāhīm then gave the sermon before noon, saying that his messenger had brought Akhbār al-Dawlah, 183; Sharon, Black Banners, 134.

---

12. The mawlā of the Hamdān. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 183.

13. Probably the same as Sālim b. Bujayr b. 'Abdallāh al-A'mā, the mawlā of the Banū Musliyah, he died on the way to al-Kūfah from al-Ḥumaymah during the early phase of revolutionary activity. He was leader of the Hāshimite missionaries. See Akhbār al-Dawlah, 183, 191–2; Sharon, Black Banners, 136,146.

14. Text: Salamah; read Musliyah. As we have seen Bukayr b. Māhān himself, the Sālim in this list, and many of the early Hāshimite agents were clients of the Musliyah. Akhbār al-Dawlah, 192.

15. Grandson of 'Abdallāh b. al-'Abbās and progenitor of the 'Abbāsid dynasty. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Abbāsids; Sharon, Black Banners, passim.

16. In 100(719). Ṭabarī's story about Bukayr b. Māhān here compresses the events of a number of years. See Sharon, Black Banners, 149–50.

17. Maternal uncle of the Caliph Hishām, he was executed with his brother by al-Walīd b. Yazīd's order in 125(743). See Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 354; Zubayrī, Nasab, 329.

18. Text: al-Naḍrī; read al-Naṣrī, as in Mss. B and O. He is 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh b. Ka'b al-Naṣrī. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 270.

19. Text: Riyāḥ; read Rabāḥ. That is Abū Muḥammad 'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ 27(646)–114(732) or 115(733), the mawlā of Quraysh and a Meccan jurist. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Aṭā' b. Abī Rabāḥ.

20. The day of watering (tarwiyah) in the pilgrimage is the eighth of Dhū al-Ḥijjah, when the pilgrims draw a supply of water for their move to Minā that day and to 'Arafah the following day. The sermons delivered at 'Arafah on the ninth and Minā on the tenth are the main ones, so it is strange that importance is attached to the timing of a sermon by the pilgrimage leader on the seventh, especially when that leader seems to have had a choice in the timing of the main sermons. See Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. r-w-a and n-f-r; Bukhārī, Saḥīḥ, II, 199, 215.

him such instructions from 'Aṭā', whereupon the latter responded that he had only instructed him to speak after the noon worship. In this way Ibrāhīm b. Hishām was put to shame on that day, for the people believed that the incident showed his ignorance.

Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī Becomes Governor of the East

In this year Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik dismissed 'Umar b.
[1468] Hubayrah[21] from the governorship of Iraq and the eastern provinces that went with it. He turned all of it over in Shawwāl (March 2 - 30, 724) to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī.[22]

According to Muḥammad b. Salām al-Jumaḥī—'Abd al-Qāhir b. al-Sarī[23] —'Umar b. Yazīd b. 'Umayr al-Usayyidī[24] : I entered into the presence of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik while Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī was there, reminding him of the loyalty of the Yaman. At this, I gave one loud clap of the hands saying, "By God, I never before saw such a mistake nor anything so nonsensical. By God, never was discord begun in Islam except by the Yaman. It was they who slew the Commander of the Faithful 'Uthmān and they who renounced (their allegiance to) the Commander of the Faithful 'Abd al-Malik. Our swords yet drip with the blood of the family of al-Muhallab."[25] Then when I got up, a man of the family of Marwān[26] who had been present followed me and said, "O brother from the Banū Tamīm, my fire has been kindled by you! I heard your remarks. The Commander of the Faithful has just appointed Khālid as governor over Iraq; it is no place for you now."

---

21. Governor of Iraq and the East 103(721)-105(724). See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Umar b. Hubayra.

22. Governor of Iraq and the East 105(724)–120(738) and governor of Mecca ca. 89(708)–96(715) and possibly once before. See EI^{2}, s.v. Khālid b. 'Abd Allāh al-Ḳasrī.

23. Abū Rifā'ah al-Sulamī of al-Baṣrah, a descendant of Qays b. al-Haytham al-Sulamī, the early tribal leader. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 368.

24. He was in charge of the security force at al-Baṣrah in 102(721) and earlier, and was killed in 109(727). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1417, 1495–6.

25. Refers to the slaughter of Yazīd b. al-Muhallab al- Azdī's family in 102(720) after the failure of his revolt. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1401, 1411–3; Wellhausen, Arab Kingdom, 318–9.

26. That is, a relative of Marwān b. al-Ḥakam, the progenitor of the ruling family.

According to 'Abd al-Razzāq[27] —Ḥammād b. Sa'īd al-Ṣan'ānī— Ziyād b. 'Ubaydallāh[28] I came to Syria (al-Sha'm) and secured a loan (iqtaraḍtu).[29] One day, while I was at the door, that is, Hishām's door, a man suddenly came out from his presence and asked me, "Where are you from, young man?" I said that I was a Yamanī. Then he asked who I was. I told him Ziyād b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Madān. Thereupon he smiled, saying, "Get up and go to the military camp and tell my companions to set out, for the Commander of the Faithful is well pleased with me and has bidden [1469] me to set out and assigned me someone to see to my departure." I then asked, "Who are you, may God have mercy on you?" He said, "Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī. Now command them, young man, to give you the head cloth from my clothes and my yellow horse." When I had gone a few steps, he called out, saying to me, "Young man, if you hear one day that I have been appointed governor of Iraq, then join me."

After that I went to them and said, "The amīr has sent me to you to say that the Commander of the Faithful is well pleased with him (i.e., Khālid) and has ordered him to go forth." At this, some started hugging me while others kissed my head. When I saw them doing that, I continued, "He has also ordered that you give me the head cloth from his clothes and his yellow steed." They answered, "Yes, by God, gladly," and they gave me both the head cover from his clothes and his yellow steed. No one in the camp was better dressed than I nor had a better mount after that.

It was only a little while later when it was said, "Khālid has been made governor of Iraq." That worried me, whereupon one of our officers from the ranks asked me, "Do I see you worried?" I

27. Abū Bakr 'Abd al-Razzāq b. Humām b. Nāfi' al-Ṣan'ānī, the mawlā of the Ḥimyar, 125(744)–211(827). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 310–5.

28. Ziyād b. 'Ubaydallāh b. 'Abd al-Ḥijr b. 'Abd al-Madān al-Ḥārithī, the brother-in-law of Muḥammad b. 'Alī, the 'Abbāsid imām. See Crone, Slaves, 149; Zubayrī, Nasab, 26-31.

29. Text: iqtaraḍtu. Crone insists that this should read (iftaraḍtu), giving the meaning of the sentence, "I enrolled in the Damascus division of the army." However, there is no indication that Hishām was in Damascus at the time, so that al-Sha'm here may be taken to mean geographical Syria rather than Damascus. Presumably Ziyād came from outside Syria then, perhaps from Iraq. While the meaning could be that Ziyād had enrolled in the army, the attested reading in the text is not impossible either, especially if he was there seeking largesse from Hishām near the outset of the latter's reign. See Crone, Slaves, 55, 149, 243n.

answered, "Yes, Khālid has been made governor of such and such. I have found a pittance to get by on here, but I am afraid that if I go to him my circumstances may change and I may wind up a loser one way or another. Therefore, I don't know what I should do." The officer then asked, "Would you make an arrangement?" I asked what it might be. He said, "Let me manage your sources of income here while you set out. Then if you get what you want, I will keep (the revenues from) your sources of income for myself, and if not, you will come back and I will turn them over to you." I agreed and set out.

When I came to al-Kūfah, I put on some of my best clothes. The people were summoned (to the mosque). I waited until they sat down, then I entered and stood at the door, giving them greetings, wishing them well and invoking praise. Here the narrator raised his head and said: I gave them most friendly greetings indeed and did not return to my residence until I had gathered six hundred [1470] dīnārs in cash and goods.

Afterwards, I used to visit Khālid often. One day he asked me, "Can you write, Ziyād?" I answered, "I can read, but I can't write, may God make the amīr prosper!" At this Khālid hit his forehead with his hand, saying, "We are God's and unto Him we return![30] There goes nine-tenths of what I wanted from you! Only one-tenth is left to you, in which there is the wealth of all time." I asked, "O amīr, is that one thing worth the price of a slave?" He answered, "What are you driving at now?" I said, "Buy a slave who can write and send him to me; he can teach me (to write)." To which Khālid replied, "Come now! You're too old for that!" But I said, "I am not," so he bought a slave who knew both writing and arithmetic for sixty dīnārs and sent him to me. Then I threw myself into the (study of) writing, and began to come to Khālid only at night. After only fifteen nights, I could write and read as I wished.

One night when I was at Khālid's, he questioned whether I had made any progress in the matter, to which I answered that I had and could now both write and read as I liked. But he said, "I think that you have only grasped a little bit, and that has impressed you." I said, "Certainly not!" Thereupon he raised his quilted cloak, and behold, there was a scroll. He then said, "Read this scroll." I read it from end to end, and lo, it was from Khālid's governor in al-Rayy. Khālid said, "Go, for I have given you his office."

30. Qur'ān 2:156.

I then went forth until I reached al-Rayy. There I seized the official in charge of taxation. He had sent a messenger to me, (first telling him), "This is only a crazy bedouin Arab, for the governor never sent an Arab to supervise taxation before. He is only in charge of the (military) supplies. Tell him if he keeps me in my office he can have three hundred thousand (dirhams)." I looked at my commission and saw that I was indeed only in charge of the supplies. So I said, "By God, no! I am beaten!" Then I wrote to Khālid, "You sent me to al-Rayy and I thought you had given me [1471] complete charge, but the official in charge of taxation has asked me to keep him in office and offered me three hundred thousand dirhams." Khālid wrote back to me saying, "Accept what he has given you and know that you have been cheated." After that, I remained there for a certain period of time. Then I wrote to Khālid saying, "I long for you, so recall me." He did so, and when I came to him he made me commander of his security force.

Governors

The governor of al-Madīnah, Mecca, and al-Ṭā'if this year was 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh al-Naṣrī.[31] The judiciary of al-Kūfah was entrusted to al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥasan[32] al-Kindī and that of al-Baṣrah to Mūsā b. Anas.[33]

It has also been said that Hishām only appointed Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī over Iraq and Khurāsān in 106 and that his governor of Iraq and Khurāsān in the year 105 was 'Umar b. Hubayrah.

31. See note 18.

32. Text: Ḥusayn b. Ḥasan; read al-Ḥusayn b. al-Ḥasan. For his nasab, see Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 237, II, 355.

33. Son of the young companion of the Prophet Anas b. Mālik b. al-Naḍr. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 351; Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 192.

The Events of the Year 106

(MAY 29, 724—MAY 18, 725)

In this year, Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik removed 'Abd al-Wāḥid b. 'Abdallāh from al-Madīnah as well as from Mecca and al-Ṭā'if and appointed over all of them his own material uncle Ibrāhīm b. Hishām b. Ismā'īl al-Makhzūmī. He came to al-Madīnah on Friday the seventeenth of Jumādā II of the year 106 (November 10, 724). Al-Naṣrī's governorship of al-Madīnah lasted a year and [1472] eight months.

In it, Sa'īd b. 'Abd al-Malik[34] led the summer campaign (against the Byzantines).

In it al-Ḥajjāj b. 'Abd al-Malik[35] campaigned against al-Lān.[36] He made peace with the populace, whereupon they handed over the jizyah.[37]

Also in this year, 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī[38] was born in Rajab (November 22–December 21, 724).

---

34. Hishām's half-brother, killed by the 'Abbāsids 132(750). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 89; Zubayrī, Nasab, 165.

35. Another half-brother of Hishām. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 89; Zubayrī, Nasab, 165.

36. A Christian land in the North Caucasus near the pass of Derbent by the Caspian Sea. See EI^{2}, s.v. Alān, al-Ḳabḳ.

37. Tribute taken from non-Muslims. See EI^{2}, s.v. Djizya.

38. 'Abd al-Ṣamad was the half-brother of Muḥammad b. 'Alī, the 'Abbāsid imām, by a concubine. Zubayrī, Nasab, 29.

The Pilgrimage of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik

In this year, the imām Ṭā'ūs,[39] the mawlā of Baḥīr b. Raysān al-Ḥimyarī, died at Mecca. Sālim b. 'Abdallāh b. 'Umar[40] also died. Hishām led the prayers over them. Ṭā'ūs's death was at Mecca and that of Sālim at al-Madīnah.

According to al-Hārith[41] —Ibn Sa'd—Muhammad b. 'Umar—'Abd al-Ḥakīm b. 'Abdallāh b. Abī Farwah: Sālim b. 'Abdallāh died in the year 105 at the end of Dhū al-Ḥijjah (about May 28, 724). Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik led the prayer over him at al-Baqī'.[42] There I saw al-Qāsim b. Muḥammad b. Abī Bakr[43] sitting at the grave when Hishām approached wearing only a loose-fitting robe.

He stopped before al-Qāsim to greet him, and al-Qāsim rose to meet him. Hishām asked him, "How are you, Abū Muḥammad? How is your health?" Al-Qāsim answered, "Fine." Hishām said, "I wish, by God, that He make you (all) well." Noticing that the people were many, Hishām levied from them a draft of four thousand (men for military service). Therefore, this year became known as the Year of the Four Thousand.

In it, Ibrāhīm b. Hishām entrusted Muḥammad b. Ṣafwān al-Jumaḥi[44] with the judiciary (at al-Madīnah), then replaced him with al-Ṣalt al-Kindī.[45]

In this year, the fight occurred between the Muḍar on the one hand and the Yaman and the Rabī'ah on the other at al-Barūqān[46] near Balkh.

---

39. Abū 'Abd al-Raḥman Ṭā'ūs b. Kaysān al-Jundī, the Ḥijāzī jurist, also said to have died 101(720). Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 8–10.

40. Abū 'Umar, 'Umar b. al-Khaṭṭāb's grandson, Medinese scholar. Also said to have died in 105(723), 107(725) or 108(726). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, III, 436–8.

41. That is, al-Ḥārith b. Muḥammad.

42. Famous Muslim cemetery at al-Madīnah in which many of the Prophet's companions are buried. See EI^{2}, s.v. Bakī' al-Gharkad.

43. The Caliph Abū Bakr's grandson and Madinan scholar born before 38(658), died between 101(720) and 112(730). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 333–5.

44. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 24, II, 424; Wakī', al-Quḍāh, I, 168–9.

45. He is al-Ṣalt b. Zubayd b. al-Ṣalt b. Ma'dīkarib b. Walī'ah, the ḥalīf of the Banū Jumaḥ. See Wakī', al-Quḍāh, I, 169–70. His complete nasab may be derived from Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 239.

46. A village about six miles from Balkh, possibly center of Muslim army camp at this time, after destruction of Balkh by Qutaybah a few years earlier. See Yāqūt, Mu'jam, I, 405; EI^{2}, s.v. Asad b. 'Abdallāh and Balkh; Barthold, Turkestan, 77, 189.

[1473] The Reason for the Fight at al-Barūqān

According to what has been reported, the reason for it was that when Muslim b. Sa'īd[47] went out to cross the Oxus to raid the enemy, many of the people delayed in joining him, among them al-Bakhtarī b. Dirham.[48] When Muslim reached the Oxus, he sent back to Balkh Naṣr b. Sayyār,[49] Salīm b. Sulaymān b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim,[50] Bal'ā' b. Mujāhid b. Bal'ā' al-'Anbarī, Abū Ḥafṣ b. Wā'il al-Ḥanẓalī,[51] 'Uqbah b. Shihāb al-Māzinī, and Sālim b. Dhu'ābah, making Naṣr b. Sayyār their overall commander and ordering him to get the people (to come) out (of Balkh) to join him. Therefore, Naṣr burned down the door of al-Bakhtarī and Ziyād b. Ṭarīf al-Bāhilī, but 'Amr b. Muslim,[52] who was in charge of Balkh, prevented Naṣr's forces from entering the city.

Muslim b. Sa'īd crossed the Oxus anyway, while Naṣr camped at al-Barūqān. While there, he was joined by the forces of Ṣaghāniyān,[53] which included Maslamah al-'Uqfānī[54] of the Banū Tamīm and Ḥassān b. Khālid al-Asadī, each of whom had five hundred men, and also Sinān al-A'rābī,[55] Zur'ah b. 'Alqamah,[56] Salamah b. Aws, and al-Ḥajjāj b. Hārūn al-Numayrī,[57] with his household. Meanwhile, (the forces of) the Bakr and the Azd gath-

47. Muslim b. Sa'īd b. Aslam b. Zur'ah al-Kilābī, governor of Khurāsān 104(722)–106(724). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 286 – 287; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 356.

48. Or Ibn Abī Dirham, of the Banū al-Ḥārith b. 'Ubād b. Ḍubay'ah b. Qays b. Tha'labah, a branch of the Bakr b. Wā'il. See Ṭabarī III/2, 1475, 1498.

49. Abū Layth al-Laythī ca. 46(666)–131(748), the great Muḍarī warrior and governor of Khurāsān 120(738)–131(748). EI[1], s.v. Naṣr b. Saiyār.

50. Al-Sulamī, grandson of the famous governor Ibn Khāzim. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 262.

51. Probably Abū Ḥafṣ 'Alī b. Wā'il of the Rabī'ah b. Ḥanẓalah of the Tamīm, father-in-law to Naṣr b. Sayyār. See Ṭabarī III/2, 1664, 1860.

52. Abū Qays al-Bāhilī, died 120/738, pro-Yaman brother of Qutaybah b. Muslim. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 246; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 519.

53. Hephthalite principality in the valley of the Chaghān Rūd directly north of al-Tirmidh. Its ancient capital of the same name is now Denaw in Soviet Uzbekistan. See EI[2], s.v. Caghāniyān and Caghān-Rūd.

54. Of a very small branch of the Yarbū'. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 145.

55. Al-Sulamī. A former supporter of Mūsā b. 'Abdallāh b. Khāzim, he was still active in 128(746) for the Muḍar party. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 1163, III/2, 1583, 1595, 1929.

56. Al-Sulamī. At al-Tirmidh with Mūsā in 85(704). See Ṭabarī II/2, 1163.

57. Al-Ḥajjāj b. Hārūn b. Mālik b. Sāriyah, of an important Qaysite family with Syrian connections. See Ṭabarī III/2, 1723.

ered at al-Barūqān under al-Bakhtarī, who camped half a farsakh[58] away from Naṣr's forces. Naṣr sent to the people of Balkh saying, "You've taken your stipends; therefore, go join your commander who has already crossed the Oxus!" Thereupon the Muḍar came out to Naṣr, while the Rabī'ah and the Azd joined 'Amr b. Muslim. Some of the Rabī'ah said, "Muslim b. Sa'īd intends to revolt and (thus) is forcing us to go forward." At this point, the Taghlib[59] communicated with 'Amr b. Muslim saying, "You are one of us," and they recited for him a poem which traced back the origin of Bāhilah to Taghlib. (Likewise,) the Banū Qutaybah who were of Bāhilah, said, "We are (descended) from Taghlib." But the Bakr[60] disliked that those should be from the Taghlib, who would thereby become too numerous, and one of them expressed this, saying:

The Qutaybah claim that they are (descended) from Wā'il[61]
A genealogy far-removed indeed, Qutaybah, (just try to) climb.

It has been said that the Banū Ma'n of the Azd are called the Bāhilah. [1474]

According to Sharīk b. Abī Qaylah al-Ma'nī: 'Amr b. Muslim used to say, while attending the tribal councils of the Banū Ma'n, "If we are not from you, then we are not Arabs." When a Taghlibī traced him back (genealogically) to the Banū Taghlib, 'Amr b. Muslim said, "As for a blood relationship, I don't know of any, but as for protection, I will protect you!"[62]

'Amr sent al-Ḍaḥḥāk b. Muzāḥim[63] and Yazīd b. al-Mufaḍḍal al-Ḥuddānī to speak to Naṣr and plead with him, but he would have none of it. Thus the troops of 'Amr b. Muslim and al-Bakhtarī attacked Naṣr's forces, shouting "O for the Bakr!" However, they were repulsed and Naṣr returned the attack against them. The first to be slain was a Bāhilī. 'Amr b. Muslim, (as commander, now) had with him al-Bakhtarī and Ziyād b. Ṭarīf al-Bāhilī. Besides those 58. About 5.95 km or 3.7 mi. See EI^{2}, s.v. Farsakh.

59. A branch of the Rabī'ah.
60. The other large branch of the Rabī'ah.
61. The mutual parent of the Bakr and the Taghlib.
62. On the Bāhilah's complex connections, see Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 244–5; Ibn Durayd, Ishtiqāq, 271; Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, III, 161; EI^{2}, s.v. Bāhila.
63. Abū al-Qāsim, of the Banū 'Abd Manāf b. Hilāl, a Muḍarī group, he was a jurist at Balkh. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, IV, 453–4; Ibn Qutaybah Ma'ārif, 457.

slain in flight, eighteen of 'Amr's troops were killed in the clash, including Kardān, brother of al-Furāfiṣah, Mas'adah, and a man [1475] from the Bakr b. Wā'il called Isḥāq. 'Amr b. Muslim, defeated, was driven back into his fortress.

At this juncture, 'Amr sent to Naṣr (asking), "Send to me Bal'ā' b. Mujāhid." When the latter came, 'Amr said (to him), "Get me a guarantee of safe-conduct from Naṣr." Naṣr complied but said, "If only I would not have made the Bakr b. Wā'il maliciously delighted by it, I would have killed you."

It is said: 'Amr b. Muslim was captured in a mill and taken with a rope around his neck to Naṣr, who granted him safety and said to him as well as to Ziyād b. Ṭarīf and al-Bakhtarī b. Dirham, "Go join your commander."[64]

It is said: Rather Naṣr and 'Amr met at al-Barūqān, and thirty of the Bakr b. Wā'il and of the Yaman were killed. Whereupon the Bakr said, "Why should we fight our brothers and our commander, when we have ascribed a blood relationship (with ourselves) to this man, but he has denied it?" Then they stood aside, while the Azd fought on (alone), were beaten, and fled to a fortress which Naṣr thereupon laid siege to. After this, 'Amr b. Muslim, al-Bakhtarī, who was one of the Banū 'Ubād, and Ziyād b. Ṭarīf al-Bāhilī were taken, each of whom Naṣr gave a hundred lashes and then shaved their heads and beards and dressed them in hair cloth. It is said that al-Bakhtarī was taken in a thicket which he had entered, after which Naṣr said about the day of al-Barūqān:

I see the eye is stormy, running with tears, but that which Answers it is not running with tears.
I am not slow when war rolls up its sleeves (for action), [1476] Its fire burning in the side of the armies,
But I call upon the Khindif[65] whose Backbone rises up eagerly to (bear) a heavy burden.
The Bakr did not keep their alliance there;
    Now they have on them the shame of (betraying) the Qays as well as their (new) shame.

64. That is, Muslim b. Sa'īd, who had already crossed the Oxus.

65. Khindif, the wife of Ilyās b. Muḍar to whom his descendants are usually traced back. The Khindif, including the Quraysh, Kinānah and Tamīm, among others, is one half of the Muḍar, the other half being the Qays 'Aylān. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 10.

Even if the Bakr in Iraq acknowledge their being part of Nizār,
In the land of Marw are found their weak ones and their deviation.
They tried on the day of al-Barūqān a fight
In which the Khindif were victorious, while destruction came upon the Bakr,
I have heard news of a victory of the Qays over the Bajīlah
And that was long awaited before today.

This last verse means when Yūsuf b. 'Umar seized Khālid and his sons.[66]

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—al-Walīd b. Muslim: 'Amr b. Muslim, having fought and defeated Naṣr b. Sayyār, said to a man of the Banū Tamīm who was with him, "What do you think of the buttocks of your people (showing in flight), O brother of the Banū Tamīm?" thus mocking him for their defeat. But the Tamīm came back, defeating 'Amr's forces. When the dust had cleared, revealing Bal'ā' b. Mujāhid leading a group of the Banū Tamīm driving 'Amr's forces (before him), the Tamīmī said to 'Amr, "These are the buttocks of my people!"

Thus, 'Amr was defeated. Bal'ā' ordered his men, "Do not kill the prisoners, but strip them and cut out holes in the rear of their trousers," and so they did. Bayān al-'Anbarī said this, mentioning their fight at al-Barūqān: [1477]

While I was at the city, I heard news of a battle
Which the Tamīm won that shook everything most severely.
The eyes of the spotted ones, the Bakr b. Wā'il, continue
To weep when mention is made of those slain at al-Barūqān.
They delivered 'Amr b. Muslim over to death
And scattered in flight while the spearheads were bleeding.
There was ever a custom for (their) young men in war,
And they did not persevere where the spears were broken.

In this year Muslim b. Sa'īd attacked the Turks. After he had crossed the Oxus to fight them, (news of) his removal from (the 66. This happened in 126(743), thus dating the poem twenty years after al-Barūqān. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1821–2.

governorship of) Khurāsān and the appointment of Asad b. 'Abdallāh[67] to it reached him from Khālid b. 'Abdallāh.

Muslim b. Sa'īd's Campaign (the Day of Thirst)

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: Muslim campaigned in this year. Speaking to the people in Maydān Yazīd, he said, "I am not leaving behind anything more worrisome to me than a group of people who stay behind, with perfumed necks, leaping from behind walls on the women of those out fighting for their faith. O God, deal with them and deal with them again! I [1478] have ordered Naṣr to slay every malingerer that he finds. I will not pity them on account of any torment which God sends down upon them," meaning 'Amr b. Muslim and his companions.

When Muslim got to Bukhārā, he received a letter from Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī, informing him that he had been made governor of Iraq. But Khālid had written, "Complete your campaign"; therefore, Muslim marched toward Farghānah. At this point, Abū al-Ḍaḥḥāk al-Rawāḥī, one of the Banū Rawāḥah from the Banū 'Abs, who are numbered among the Azd[68] —he attended to the account of the military roll—declared that no one who stayed behind this year would be held disobedient. At that, four thousand stayed behind, while Muslim b. Sa'īd went forth.

When Muslim got to Farghānah, he heard that the Khāqān[69] had drawn near him. Shumayl or Shubayl b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Māzinī came to him and reported, "I have seen the Khāqān's troops in such and such a place." Thereupon Muslim sent to 'Abdallāh b. Abī 'Abdallāh al-Kirmānī, the mawlā of the Banū Sulaym, [70] commanding him to prepare to march out. When it was

67. The brother of Khālid b. 'Abdallāh, governor of Iraq and the East. See EI^{2}, s.v. Asad b. 'Abd Allāh.

68. The 'Abs would normally belong to the Qays, but in Khurāsān and perhaps elsewhere they became part of the Azd. Such switches, usually involving a changed genealogy, were quite common. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 114–5.

69. The khān or king of the Turgesh or Western Turks. In this case and for most of Hishām's reign he was Sū-Lū (717–737/8). Barthold, Turkestan, 187; EI^{2}, s.v. Khāḳān.

70. This man, a mawlā of Iranian origin, is apparently the same as Qutaybah b. Muslim's financial officer in Khwārizm in 93(712) and was in charge of supplies and disbursements for the army in 112(730). Ṭabarī, II/2, 1253, III/2, 1544, 1548–9, 1551. Ya'qūbī, Ta'rīkh, II, 287.

morning, he set out with the troops and covered three days' journeying in a day. Then the next day he went on till he crossed Wādī al-Subūḥ.[71] The Khāqān drew near them, as horsemen rallied to him from all directions. At this, 'Abdallāh b.Abī 'Abdallāh had a group of lesser tribal commanders and clients set up camp. The Turks attacked those whom 'Abdallāh had stationed at that place and killed them, while seizing pack animals belonging to Muslim. Al-Musayyab b. Bishr al-Riyāḥī, al-Barā', who was one of al-Muhallab's cavalrymen, and Ghūrak's[72] brother were slain, but the men became aroused facing the Turks and drove them from their encampment. Muslim gave the battle standard to 'Āmir b. Mālik al-Ḥimmānī[73] and departed with the men. Thereafter they [1479] travelled (continuously) for eight days while the Turks surrounded them. When the ninth evening came, Muslim wished to camp; therefore, he consulted the men, who advised him to camp, saying, "In the morning we will go straight to the water, which is not far away, but if you camp on the meadow, the men will split up (foraging) for fruit and your camp will be plundered." Muslim then asked Abū al-'Alā' Sawrah b. al-Ḥurr,[74] "O Abū al-'Alā', what do you think?" He answered, "I agree with the others." So they pitched camp.

However, no structures were raised inside the camp, and the men burned all the heavy vessels and baggage, to the value of one million (dirhams). In the morning, they went on until they came to the water, but there, before the river, were the forces of Farghānah and al-Shāsh.[75] Muslim b. Sa'īd thereupon declared, "I urge every man to unsheathe his sword," and so they did, the whole place becoming swords. Then the Turks left the water and

71. Exact location unknown, but apparently beyond the Jaxartes.

72. The Sughdī prince of Samarqand, ruled ca. 92(711)–ca. 120(738). See Gibb, Arab Conquests, 72, 79.

73. Of one of the noblest houses of the Tamīm, commander of the Tamīmī division of the army in 112(730) and possibly here. His home was in Jūzjān in Lower Ṭukhāristān, and his career extended from 91(710) to 128(746) or 129(747). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 220; Ṭabarī, II/2, 1218, III/2, 1535, 1921, 1971.

74. Ibn Abjar, al-Abānī al-Tamīmī. Entered Khurāsān 102(721), slain by Turks 112(730). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 229; Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rikh, 505; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1418, 1541.

75. The district northwest of Farghānah on the north bank of the Jaxartes, modern Tashkent. These forces were, of course, hostile to the Muslims. See Barthold, Turkestan, 169–75; EI[1], s.v. Tashkent.

the Muslims crossed. Muslim stayed a day and then departed on the next day. A son of the Khāqān followed them.

Ḥumayd b. ʿAbdallāh, the commander of the rear, sent to Muslim saying, "Stop an hour so that I can fight the two hundred Turks who are behind me," although he was suffering from a wound. Thereupon the troops stopped, while Ḥumayd turned back against the Turks, taking captive the men of al-Sughd,[76] their commander and the commander of the Turks with seven (men), while the rest fled. Ḥumayd went on, but was hit by an arrow in the knee and died.

[1480] The men thirsted. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym al-Ghāmidī[77] was carrying twenty waterskins on his camels, and when he saw how the men suffered, he brought them forth and they drank a swallow. Also Muslim b. Saʿīd asked for water on the Day of Thirst; they brought him a vessel, but Jābir or Ḥārithah b. Kathīr, brother of Sulaymān b. Kathīr,[78] grabbed it away from his mouth. At this, Muslim said, "Let him go, for were it not for the heat he wouldn't have fought with me for my drink."

When at last they reached Khujandah[79] suffering from hunger and exhaustion, the troops spread out in disorder. Suddenly two horsemen (appeared) asking for ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym. They had brought him his appointment as (temporary) governor of Khurāsān from Asad b. ʿAbdallāh. ʿAbd al-Raḥmān made Muslim read it, at which Muslim said, "I heed and obey."

ʿAbd al-Raḥmān was the first to use tents in the desert of Āmul.[80]

The richest of the troops on the Day of Thirst was Isḥāq b.

---

76. Ancient Sogdiana, the district of Samarqand. See EI[1], s.v. Soghd.

77. Text: al-ʿĀmirī; read: al-Ghāmidī. His patronymic is Abū Zuhayr. A well-known Yamanī, formerly governor of Khurāsān for ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz 100(719)–102(721). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 378; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1357.

78. He is only known from this passage, but his brother Sulaymān b. Kathīr al-Khuzāʿī d. 133(750) was the leader of the secret Hāshimite movement's Khurāsānī supporters. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 242.

79. An ancient town at the entrance to the Farghānah valley and just south of the Jaxartes. Now Leninabad in Tajikistan. Barthold, Turkestan, 164–5; EI[2], s.v. Khujand.

80. Āmul, modern Charjuy in Turkmenistan, was the main crossing point on the Oxus between Marw and Bukhārā. Mention of the desert of Āmul here seems not to relate to the expedition of 106(724). See EI[2], s.v. Āmul.

Muḥammad al-Ghudānī.[81]

Ḥājib al-Fīl[82] said to Thābit Quṭnah,[83] who is Thābit b. Ka'b:

We decide matters, but the Bakr do not witness them,
Being busy between the oars and the rudder.
People don't know anything about him except his piece of cotton;[84]
Except for it, his ancestors are unknown.

'Abd al-Raḥmān had these sons: Nu'aym, Shadīd, 'Abd al-Salām, Ibrāhīm and al-Miqdām,[85] the strongest of whom were Nu'aym and Shadīd.

When Muslim b. Sa'īd was removed, al-Khazraj al-Taghlibī said: We fought the Turks, but they surrounded the Muslims until we were sure we would perish. I looked at them and their faces had turned pale. Ḥawtharah b. Yazīd b. al-Ḥurr b. al-Ḥunayf b. Naṣr b. Yazīd b. Ja'wanah[86] attacked the Turks with four thousand troops, fought them for an hour and then retreated. But Naṣr b. Sayyār came up with thirty horsemen and fought them until he drove them out of their positions. At this, the entire force assaulted the Turks, who were defeated. This Ḥawtharah is the nephew of Raqabah b. al-Ḥurr.[87] [1481]

'Umar b. Hubayrah had said to Muslim b. Sa'īd at the time he made him governor of Khurāsān, "Let your chamberlain be one of the best of your mawālī for he is your tongue and spokesman.

---

81. Nephew of Wakī' b. Ḥassān b. Qays b. Abī Sūd, the Tamīmī governor of Khurāsān 96(715)–97(716). See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1513–4.

82. Ḥājib b. Dhubyān al-Māzinī, a Tamīmī tribal poet. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 211; Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XIII, 50–52.

83. Abū al-'Alā'. A well-known Arab poet of al-Sughd, affiliated with the 'Atīk, the Muhallabīs' branch of the Azd, but the mention of the Bakr here coupled with Ḥājib al-Fīl's comments on Thābit's lack of genealogy make it possible that he was originally from the Bakr but was raised in status by his Muhallabī patrons to affiliation with their own tribe. This is not mentioned, though, by the sources, which say he was an Azdī or at least a client of the Azd. See Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XIII, 49–56.

84. His nickname, Quṭnah, was because he wore a piece of cotton as an eyepatch. See Iṣbahānī, Aghānī, XIII, 49.

85. Text: al-Miqdād; read: al-Miqdām, as in Ṭabarī, III/2, 1607, 1609, 1830, 1923–4.

86. Al-'Anbarī, later the chief of the Tamīm, of noble lineage. See Ṭabarī, III/2, 1582; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 208.

87. Famous Khurāsānī warrior. See Ṭabarī, II/2, 696–8, 1156–7, 1159, 1163.

Encourage[88] the commander of your guard to be faithful. Also take for yourself governors of excuse." Muslim asked, "What are governors of excuse?" 'Umar answered, "Command every town to choose for themselves. When they have chosen a man, appoint him. If he turns out well, it will be to your credit; if he turns out badly, it will be their fault, not yours, and you will be excused." After this, Muslim b. Sa'īd wrote Ibn Hubayrah to send Tawbah b. Abī Usayd, the mawlā of the Banū al-'Anbar.[89] Thereupon Ibn Hubayrah wrote to his governor in al-Baṣrah saying, "Send Tawbah b. Abī Usayd to me." He then sent Tawbah, who came. Tawbah was a handsome, striking man of fine bearing, and when he entered into Ibn Hubayrah's presence, the latter declared, "The like of this (man) should be appointed to office!" When he sent him to Muslim, Muslim said to him, "This is my ring, so do as you see [1482] fit." Remaining with Muslim until Asad b. 'Abdallāh came, Tawbah wished to depart with Muslim, but Asad said to him, "Stay with me, because I need you more than Muslim does." Thus he stayed with Asad, treating the people well and softening his heart (towards them), while behaving kindly toward the troops, giving them their provisions.[90] Asad told him, "Make them swear to divorce [their wives] if any should stay behind from his expedition or put a substitute in his place." But Tawbah refused to do that and thus did not make them swear to divorce (their wives). After Tawbah, his successors made the soldiers swear such oaths. When 'Āṣim b. 'Abdallāh[91] came, he wished to make the troops swear to divorce (their wives), but they refused, saying, "We only swear by the oaths of Tawbah." They knew that (henceforth) as "the oaths of Tawbah."

88. Text: ḥutt; read: ḥuththh.

89. A Baṣran, his name is more probably Abū al-Muwarra' Tawbah b. Kaysān b. Abī al-Asad ca. 57(677)-131(749), born in al-Yamāmah to a Sijistānī Iranian father and Arab mother from the Banū Numayr. He was always in demand for his administrative skills. See Ibn Sa'd, Ṭabaqāt, VII, 240–1; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 515.

90. That is, he was in charge of supplies and disbursements.

91. Al-Hilālī, governor of Khurāsān 116(734)–117(735). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 274; Ṭabarī, III/2, 1564, 1573.

The Pilgrimage of Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik (Cont'd.)

This year Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik led the pilgrimage.

According to Aḥmad b. Thābit,[92] —his informant—Isḥāq b. 'Īsā[93] —Abū Ma'shar,[94] and likewise al-Wāqidī and others reported that, there being no difference between them.

According to al-Wāqidī—Ibn Abī al-Zanād[95] —his father: Hishām b. 'Abd al-Malik wrote to me before he entered al-Madīnah asking me to write the recommended rituals (sunan) of the pilgrimage for him, so I wrote them. Then Abū al-Zanād met Hishām. According to Abū al-Zanād: That day I was in a procession behind him, when Sa'īd b. 'Abdallāh b. al-Walīd b. 'Uthmān b. 'Affān[96] encountered him, while Hishām was going along. Hishām got down for him and greeted him; then Sa'īd went to his side. Hishām called out, "Abū al-Zanād!" whereupon I advanced, going to his other side. Thereupon, I heard Sa'īd say, "O Commander of the Faithful, God has not ceased blessing the people of [1483] house of the Commander of the Faithful and helping his wronged Caliph![97] Nor have they stopped cursing Abū Turāb[98] in these good lands; likewise, the Commander of the Faithful ought to curse him in these good lands." But his talk was hard for Hishām to bear and wore heavy upon him. Then he said, "We did not come to revile anyone nor to curse him; we have come as pilgrims." At that, he cut short his speech and approached me saying, "O 'Abdallāh b. Dhakwān, have you finished what I wrote to you to be done?" I answered, "Yes." Abū Zanād added: That which I had witnessed him say before Hishām weighed heavily on Sa'īd, and I noticed he looked broken whenever he saw me.

In this year, Ibrāhīm b. Muḥammad b. Ṭalḥah[99] spoke to 92. Al-Jaḥdarī, of al-Baṣrah, alive 255(869). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 21.

93. Apparently Abū Ya'qūb Isḥāq b. 'Īsā b. Nujayḥ al-Baghdādī 140(757)–215(830). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, I, 245.

94. Nujayḥ b. 'Abd al-Raḥmān al-Madanī al-Sindī, a historian of Yamanite origin. Died 170(786). See Sezgin, GAS, I, 291–2.

95. 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. 'Abdallāh b. Dhakwān 100(719)–174(790). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VI, 170–2. For Abū al-Zanād himself, 64(684)–130(748). See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, V, 203–5.

96. Great-grandson of the third caliph 'Uthmān, also great-great-grandson of the first caliph Abū Bakr. Zubayrī, Nasab, 121.

97. That is, 'Uthmān b. 'Affān.

98. Pejorative nickname of 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib. See EI^{2}, s.v. 'Alī b. Abī Ṭālib.

99. Al-A'raj, the grandson of Ṭalḥah b. 'Ubaydallāh al-Taymī (killed 36(656)). See Hishām b. ʿAbd al-Malik while Hishām was standing after he had just worshiped in al-Ḥijr.[100] He said to him, "I ask you by God and by the sacredness of this house[101] and city[102] whose right you have gone forth to honor that you set right for me the injustice done to me." Hishām asked, "What injustice?" Ibrāhīm answered, "My house." Hishām then asked, "Where did you stand with the Commander of the Faithful ʿAbd al-Malik?" Ibrāhīm replied, "He wronged me." Hishām then asked, "And with al-Walīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik?" Ibrāhīm answered, "He wronged me." Again Hishām inquired, "And with Sulaymān?" Ibrāhīm returned, "He wronged me." The Caliph asked, "And with ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz?" Ibrāhīm answered, "May God have mercy on him, he gave it back to me, by God." Hishām then asked, "And with Yazīd b. ʿAbd al-Malik?" Ibrāhīm replied, "He wronged me, by God. He took it from me after I had taken possession of it, and it is now in your hands." Hishām then said, "By God, if you could bear a beating, I would beat you!" Ibrāhīm said, "I can stand, by God, being struck with the sword or the whip!" Then Hishām went off, with al-Abrash[103] following him. Hishām asked al-Abrash, "O Abū [1484] Mujāshiʿ, how did you hear this tongue?" He answered, "What an excellent tongue this is!" He added, "This is the Quraysh, whose tongue still shows up among the people in remnants that I have seen such as this."

Asad b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī in Khurāsān

In this year Khālid b. ʿAbdallāh al-Qasrī came as governor to Iraq. In the same year, Khālid appointed his brother Asad b. ʿAbdallāh as governor of Khurāsān. Asad came to his province while Muslim b. Saʿīd was still on his expedition in Farghānah. It has been reported about Asad that when he came to the Oxus to cross, al-Ashhab b.

Zubayrī, Nasab, 283–4. for this story in more detail.

100. A semicircular, partially enclosed space on the north side of the Kaʿbah. See EI^{2}, s.v. al-Ḥidjr.

101. That is, the Kaʿbah.

102. That is, Mecca.

103. According to Ibn al-Kalbī, he is Saʿīd b. al-Walīd b. Bakr ['Abd 'Amr] b. Jabalah; according to Ibn Ḥazm he is Saʿīd b. Bakr b. ʿAbd Qays b. al-Walīd b. ʿAbd 'Amr, Hishām's chief minister. See Ibn al-Kalbī, Jamharah, I, 289, II, 501; Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 458.

ʿUbayd al-Tamīmī, one of the Banū Ghālib[104] who was in charge of the ferry at Āmul, prevented him. Asad said to him, "Take me across." But al-Ashhab replied, "There is no way I can take you across, because I have been commanded not to do that." Asad then said, "Give him kind treatment and food," but al-Ashhab refused. Finally Asad said, "I am the (new) governor." At this al-Ashhab took him over. Asad then said (to his companions), "Mark this (man) so that we may give him a share in (guarding) our trust." Thus Asad crossed the Oxus and came to al-Sughd.

Asad camped in the fields of al-Sughd. In charge of the tax office at Samarqand was Hāni' b. Hāni'. The people came out to meet Asad, coming to the meadow where he was camped while he was sitting on a stone. This the people took as a good omen, saying, "A lion[105] on a rock; what this brings is good." Hāni' asked him, "Have you come as governor, so that we should do by you what we do by governors?" Asad answered, "Yes, I have come as governor." Then he called for lunch, which he had at the meadow. He said, "Who hurries along on his way when he has only fourteen dirhams? (It is said also that he said thirteen dirhams.) Yet here they are in my sleeve." Meanwhile, he would cry profusely, saying, "I am only a man like yourselves."

Then Asad mounted up and entered Samarqand, sending two men with the appointment of ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym to command the army. The two men came to ʿAbd al-Raḥmān b. Nuʿaym while he was in Wādī Afshīn in command of the rear guard, which consisted of mawālī[106] from the people of Samarqand and of the tribal regiments from the people of al-Kūfah. They asked after ʿAbd al-Raḥmān and were told, "He is in the rear." They brought him his appointment and a letter about returning (from the expedition) and giving permission to the troops to do so. ʿAbd al- [1485]

104. Of al-Barājim, a group of the ʿAbd al-Qays that had entered the Tamīm and been enrolled in the subtribe of the ʿAbdallāh b. Dārim. However, they called themselves the Rabīʿah b. Ḥanẓalah, which betrays their original association with the Rabīʿah, of which the ʿAbd al-Qays are a part. Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 222, 295–6.

105. Asad means "lion" in Arabic.

106. Plural of mawlā, which may be translated as client but really has a much wider meaning. Here it refers to those Sughdīs who had recently become Muslims but, not being Arabs, had to associate themselves with Arab tribes as their "clients" in order to serve in the army, whose organization was based on such tribal affiliations. Ibn Manẓūr, Lisān, s.v. w-l-y; EI[1], s.v. Mawlā.

Raḥmān read the letter and then brought it, together with his appointment, to Muslim, who said, "I heed and obey." At this, 'Amr b. Hilāl al-Sadūsī—or it is said al-Taymī—stood up and whipped Muslim a couple of lashes for what he had done at al-Barūqān, while Ḥusayn b. 'Uthmān b. Bishr b. al-Muḥtafiz[107] reviled him, but 'Abd al-Raḥmān b. Nu'aym rebuked both of them.

According to 'Alī b. Muḥammad—his sources: They came to Asad when he was at Samarqand. Then Asad went off to Marw, removing Hāni' and appointing over Samarqand al-Ḥasan b. Abī al-'Amarraṭah al-Kindī[108] from the family of Ākil al-Murār.

While Ya'qūb b. al-Qa'qā'[109] was judge of Khurāsān, al-Janūb[110] who was the daughter of al-Qa'qā' b. al-A'lam, the chief of the Azd, and (also) the wife of al-Ḥasan came to her husband, and he came out to meet her. The Turks had attacked the Muslims, and al-Ḥasan was told, "These Turks have come to you." They were seven thousand. Al-Ḥasan said, "They haven't come to us; rather, we have come to them, taken their country from them and en-[1486] slaved them. By God, despite this I will most certainly bring you close upon them and tie the forelocks of your horses to the forelocks of their horses." Then he went out (to fight), but procrastinated until the Turks had raided and departed. Thus the people said, "He went out to his wife to meet her in a hurry, but he went out to the enemy procrastinating." Al-Ḥasan heard this; therefore, he spoke to the people saying, "You talk and criticize! O God, cut off their traces! Hurry up their destinies! Send harm down upon them! Take happiness away from them!" For this, the people cursed him inside themselves.

Al-Ḥasan's deputy when he went out against the Turks was Thābit Quṭnah. When he tried to give a sermon before the people, he faltered, saying, "Whoever obeys God and His messenger has gone astray." At this, he became confused and did not speak a word. When he had come down from the pulpit, he said:

107. Al-Muzanī, from a Qaysī subtribe associated with the Tamīm, at least in Khurāsān, where this family had been long established. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 201–2; Ṭabari, II/2, 596, 696; Balādhurī, Futūḥ, 511–3.

108. His father fought for the Shī'ite rebel Ḥujr b. 'Adī against Mu'āwiyah. See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 427.

109. Abū al-Ḥasan al-Azdī. This family's subtribe is unknown. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, VIII, 329–30, XI, 393–4.

110. Sister of the Ya'qūb b. al-Qa'qā' just mentioned.

Even if I am not a speaker among you, still I am certainly A speaker with my sword when the clamor (of battle) is in earnest.

It was said to him then, "If only you had said this on the pulpit, you would have been (accounted) a speaker!" Ḥājib al-Fīl al-Yashkurī[111] said, criticizing his faltering:

O Abū al-'Alā', you met with a misfortune
Of anxiety and choking, on (that) Friday.
You twisted your tongue when you wanted to speak with it,
Just as one who slips tumbles from a lofty peak.
When the eyes of people turned to you in public. [1487]
You began, on standing up, to swallow your saliva hard from worry.
As for the Qur'ān, you will never be guided to a single firm (verse)
Of the Qur'ān, nor will you ever be guided to success.

Governors

In this year, 'Abd al-Ṣamad b. 'Alī was born in Rajab (November 22–December 21, 724). The governor of al-Madīnah, Mecca and al-Ṭā'if this year was Ibrāhīm b. Hishām al-Makhzūmī. Over Iraq and Khurāsān was Khālid b. 'Abdallāh al-Qasrī. Khālid's official in charge of worship at al-Baṣrah was 'Uqbah b. 'Abd al-A'lā,[112] in charge of the guard there was Mālik b. al-Mundhir b. al-Jārūd,[113] while the judiciary was given to Thumāmah b. 'Abdallāh b. Anas.[114] Asad b. 'Abdallāh ruled Khurāsān.

111. This is a mistake, for Ḥājib was a Māzinī, not a Yashkurī. See note 82.

112. Al-Kalā'ī of the Banū Dhī al-Kalā', a subtribe of the Ḥimyar. Also a Damascene. See Ibn Khayyāṭ, Ta'rīkh, 535, Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 434, 478.

113. Al-'Abdī from the 'Abd al-Qays, whose most noted family at al-Baṣrah were descendents of al-Jārūd. See Crone, Slaves 115–6.

114. Grandson of Anas b. Mālik al-Anṣārī. See note 30; Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, II, 28–9.

The Events of the Year 107

(MAY 19, 725—MAY 7, 726)

Among these (events) was the Khārijite rebellion of ʿAbbād al-Ruʿaynī[115] in the Yaman. Yūsuf b. ʿUmar[116] killed him, and all his companions were slain with him, three hundred in all.

In this year Muʿāwiyah b. Hishām[117] led the summer expedition. Maymūn b. Mihrān[118] commanded the Syrian army, crossing the sea until he reached Cyprus. The force which Hishām had ordered prepared during his pilgrimage in the year 106 went with the other [1488] forces. This (new) force came in the year 107 on fixed stipends, half of them going out to fight and half staying behind. Maslamah b. ʿAbd al-Malik[119] led the land attack.

115. Of Dhū Ruʿayn, a large subtribe of Ḥimyar. According to Ibn Khayyāṭ, this took place in 108(726) not in the Yaman but at or near al-Rayy. But apparently Ṭabarī is to be preferred here, as Yūsuf b. ʿUmar was governor of the Yaman from 106(725). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 433–4; Ibn Khayyāt, Taʾrīkh, 495.

116. Al-Thaqafī, the cousin of al-Ḥajjāj b. Yūsuf, governor of the Yaman 106(725)–120(738) and of Iraq and the East 120(738)–126(744), killed 127(745). See Ibn Ḥazm, Jamharah, 267; EI[1], s.v. Yūsuf b. ʿOmar.

117. The son of the Caliph by a concubine, he was a commander on the Byzantine front for much of his father's reign. See Zubayrī, Nasab, 168.

118. Abū Ayyūb al-Jazarī d. 117(735), a jurist born in al-Kūfah who flourished in al-Raqqah, near Hishām's residence. He is said to have been governor of al-Jazīrah for ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAzīz; more probably he was in charge only of taxation and the judiciary. Anti-Shīʿite. No doubt of non-Arab origin. See Ibn Ḥajar, Tahdhīb, X, 390–2; Ibn Kathīr, Bidāyah, IX, 314–9.

119. The half-brother of Hishām, he was the son of a concubine, a great military

During the year, a severe plague occurred in Syria.

In it, Bukayr b. Māhān sent Abū 'Ikrimah, that is, Abū Muḥammad al-Ṣādiq,[120] Muḥammad b. Khunays, and 'Ammār al-'Ubādī,[121] with a number of their party, including Ziyād, the maternal uncle of al-Walīd al-Azraq, to Khurāsān. A man from the Kindah then came to Asad b. 'Abdallāh and denounced them to him. Thereupon Abū 'Ikrimah, Muḥammad b. Khunays and most of their companions were brought to Asad, though 'Ammār escaped. Asad cut off the hands and feet of those he had captured and crucified them. At this, 'Ammār went back to Bukayr b. Māhān, telling him the news. Then Bukayr wrote about it to Muḥammad b. 'Alī, who wrote back, "Praise be to God Who has shown the truth of your words and your mission! But victims who will be slain yet remain among you."

Also, in this year Muslim b. Sa'īd was conveyed to Khālid b. 'Abdallāh. Asad b. 'Abdallāh had treated Muslim kindly in Khurāsān: he tried neither to harm nor imprison him. When Muslim came (to Iraq), Ibn Hubayrah decided to flee, but Muslim forbade that, saying to him, "Those people have a better opinion of us than you had of them." [1489]

Also, in this year Asad attacked the mountains of Namrūn, King of al-Gharshistān,[122] which are next to the mountains of al-Ṭālaqān.[123] Namrūn made peace with Asad and became a Muslim through him. Thus today they are mawālī of the Yaman.

In it, Asad attacked al-Ghūr,[124] which is the mountain region of Herat.

---

commander famous for his siege of Constantinople 99(717)–100(718) and governor of Iraq 102(721)–103(722), in addition to his service under Hishām. See EI[1], s.v. Maslama b. 'Abd al-Malik.

120. It would appear from this text that Abū 'Ikrimah al-Sarrāj and Abū Muḥammad al-Ṣādiq are two different persons, but that is specifically refuted by Ṭabarī, III/2, 1358, and by Akhbār al-Dawlah, 203. See note 10; also, Sharon, Black Banners, 136–7n.

121. Text: al-'Abbādī; read: al-'Ubādī. He seems most likely to have been a mawlā of the Banū 'Ubād b. Ḍubay'ah b. Qays b. Tha'labah of the Bakr, though other possibilities exist. See Ibn al-Athīr, Lubāb, II, 109–11.

122. Or Gharchistān. The mountainous country northeast of Herat in northwest Afghanistan. EI[2], s.v. Ghardjistān.

123. Now the town of Qeyṣār in northwest Afghanistan. EI[1], s.v. Ṭālaḳan; Barthold, Turkestan, 79.

124. The high, mountainous country of central Afghanistan. EI[2], s.v. Ghūr.

The Attack of Asad in This Campaign (to al-Ghūr)

According to ʿAlī b. Muḥammad—his authorities: When Asad attacked al-Ghūr, its people took their valuable possessions and hid them in a cave to which there was no path, but Asad ordered boxes to be prepared, put men in them, and lowered them with chains, thus bringing out what they could. Thābit Quṭnah said:

I see Asad responsible for excesses
By which kings, possessors of screening, are frightened.
He went high in the country around Marw with horses,
And you urge them on between (shouts of) 'go' and 'giddy-up,'
To Ghūrīn[125] where the hairy one[126] won possession
And came to fight with swords and spearpoints.
God guided us (there) by the slain whom you see Crucified in the mouths of the ravines.
Battles did not leave to the lords of Kalb Abuse, nor to the Banū Kilāb.[127]
He brought to them spoils and came back from them
With the best of what can be taken of spoils.
And he would, when he camped in the dwelling-place of a people,
Show them humiliating kinds of torment.
Did he not cause the mountains to be visited, the mountains of Mulʿ, Beneath which you see pieces of the clouds,
